The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will return to Baltimore next season for another series of five concerts. The assisting artists announced are two vocalists and a violinist—Miss Geraldine Farrar and Madame Melba and Fritz Kreisler, all of whom are successful artists of the first rank.

As heretofore the concerts will be given on Wednesday nights. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, 1916, February 16 and

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Mr. Strube's Latest Composition For Orchestra.

To the Editor of The Evening Sun:

Sir—At the Boston Symphony concert on Wednesday evening we will hear a new work of special interest to Baltimoreans. It is "Variations on an Original Theme," by Gustav Strube, for many years assistant conductor and first violinist of the Boston Orchestra, and now professor of theory at the Peabody.

Mr. Strube is without doubt one of the most gifted living writers for the orchestra, and has achieved a profound mastery of orchestra color and technique. The warmest admirers of his talent are the Boston Symphony musicians who play his compositions—and they know. Dr. Karl Muck, who gave the first performance of Mr. Strube's new work in Boston about two weeks ago, has said that he regarded it as the most interesting novelty which he had produced this year. The composition was again performed by the Boston Symphony in Worcester a few days ago. One of the Worcester papers comments thus:

> Certain it is that Mr. Strube has devised not merely a theme of great melodic beauty, but he has given it a set of variations some of which are positively fascinating in their charm and color.

The performance in Baltimore on Wednesday will therefore be the third reading by the famous orchestra within a few weeks. Fortunate indeed is the composer whose work falls into the hands of Dr. Muck and the incomparable artists of the greatest orchestra in the world, and it is needless to add that Baltimore will welcome this opportunity to hear the work of a distinguished musician whom we may now claim as a citizen.

For every creator of music—the highest form of art—who wins a deserving title to fame there are literally thousands of successful executant musicians. In New York alone there are 25,000 orchestral players, many of them of the first rank. There is a whole army of executant musicians in Germany, but there is only a bare handful of living composers of great music in the whole world today. How fortunate we are in Baltimore to have one of these connected with the staff of the Peabody Conservatory!

Last year a very beautiful composition by Mr. Strube for wood wind instruments and French horn was played at the Florestan Club by the famous Longy Club of Boston Symphony musicians, and last summer Mr. Strube began work on the music for an opera, the libretto for which was written by Frederic Arnold Kummer.

The "Variations on an Original Theme" were composed by Mr. Strube in the spring of 1914. The theme, molto adagio is in F major, and there are 10 variations and a finale.

EDWIN L. TURNBULL.

Baltimore, March 15.

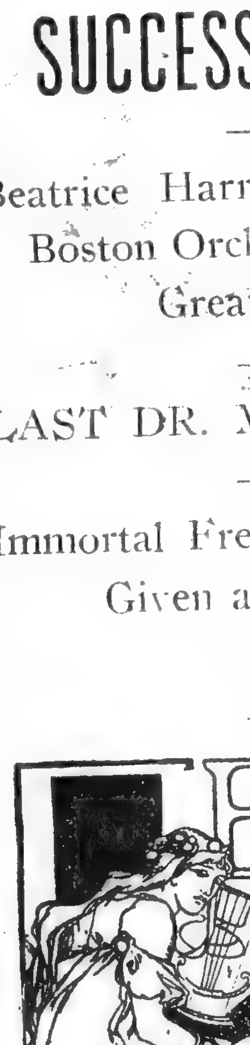
From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

WOMAN CELLIST WINS SUCCESS AT ACADEMY

Beatrice Harrison, Soloist With Boston Orchestra, Captivates Great Audience

LAST DR. MUCK CONCERT

Immortal Freischutz Overture Is Given as a Delightful Finale



BEATRICE HARRISON, a soloist new to this public, scraped and bowed her way into the good graces of a Boston orchestra audience at the Academy of Music last evening, in the final concert of Doctor Muck's local series. The scraping was on the strings of a superb cello—for Miss Harrison is a cello player of high degree—the bowing, likewise educed from this noble instrument the wayward, fascinating strains of Tschaikowsky's dazzling "Variations on Rococo Theme," drowned, at times, in the all-pervading immensity of accompaniment by Doctor Muck's galaxy of star instrumentalists.

Miss Harrison is plump, petite and pretty. In her right arm is muscularity and wondrous flexibility, and the fingers of her sinister hand seemed multiplied again and again as they flashed over the resonant strings.

The seven variations in their entirety were played with artistic authority and graceful refinement, together with a naive, earnest enthusiasm that quite captivated the great audience, and heavy preliminary installments of Brahms and Wagner.

Miss Harrison scored an artistic and popular success—and this without the Sandow strength and Hennig technique traditionally associated with cello playing by virtuosi. Her stopping is flawless, her technique facile and brilliant, and her range of tonal expression large, flexible and under instant control. And her style, moreover, is all her own, proclaimed and enforced without reminiscent suggestion or ad captandum mannerisms.

Before this grateful disclosure of a new star soloist, Doctor Muck's great orchestra ran through the movements of Johannes Brahm's first symphony in C minor over which inharmonious pundits in south Germany are still at war. Afterward came Wagner's mighty "Faust" overture, played as only the Boston musicians can play it.

As a delightful finale was given the immortal "Freischutz" overture—for the most part in the peculiar tempi so strangely affected by orchestral concert conductors, who sometimes love to smite dramatism with an ax.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Series Closes With Magnificent Cello Performance by Beatrice Harrison and a Brahms Symphony.

PROGRAM.

First Symphony .... Brahms
Faust Overture .... Wagner
Variations on a Rococo Theme.... Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Der Freischuetz" .... Weber

The patient vigil of hours which many of the hearers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cheerfully undergo at the Academy doors for each concert was never more richly rewarded than in last night's finale of the 30th season.

Beatrice Harrison, the young English artist, was the soloist in the Tschaikowsky Variations for the violoncello. This is her first season in this country. She carried all before her in Russia and Germany ere coming to America. English by birth she took at 9 the gold medal offered conjointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music in London—the youngest of all who have been thus honored—and at 17 received the Mendelsshon prize in Berlin. Her chief teacher has been Hugo Becker, the Frankfort master.

Her playing was the poetry of motion in the supple grace of the bowing wrist and arm. With fingers holding the strings in vise-like tenacity she drew from the fine old instrument tones of unctuous sonority and sweetness. It was a rare combination of tenderness and power—of compelling pathos and virile strength. Like the rest of the few who have conquered this elusive and difficult instrument so seldom essayed by a woman, incessant study has brought her to the point where the effort entailed vanishes into the perfected art, and the arduous precedent toil of the studio is obliterated. Miss Harrison is an artist in the true sense consecrated to her calling and convincingly endowed with the divine fire—the true Promethean flame that burns in the inspiration of a Bloomfield Zeisler.

The audience applauded and recalled to the echo, and the tribute was acknowledged with unaffected modesty and a genuflection not less rhythmically graceful than the manipulation of the bow. It was completely a triumph.

The Weber "Der Freischuetz" overture, with Agatha's Prayer taken at a strikingly deliberate pace to elicit the full mellow concordance of the horns, held contrasting episodes of sparkling gayety such as only Weber can write and only such leadership as Muck's can properly set forth; the Faust overture, in nowise memorably great music, was given with its full quota of Byronic stress and sentiment. But the orchestral glory of the program was the noble symphony and the glory of the symphony was the work of the choir of wood-wind. Such a luscious voice as that of the oboe in the first movement, and in its more extended opportunity in the Andante, places Mr. Longy in a class by himself. The flute was admirable, so was the clarinet, and it was a wonderful outpouring of the violas in the Andante. The thir movement passed without cessation into th finale at the Adagio where first the horns, the the flute, then the trombones—silenced till tha time—were heard in tones of supreme and en chanting beauty. The Chestertonian Mr. Wite as concertmeister comported himself admirabl

---

From Freie Presse
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date MAR 1916

Established

zuthun.

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra.

Das Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra gab geſtern Abend unter der Leitung ſeines genialen Dirigenten, Dr. Carl Muck, in der Academy of Muſic das letzte Konzert in dieſer Saiſon und war die Soliſtin die Celliſtin Beatrice Harriſon. Die Küſtlerin ſpielte höchſtvollendet Tſchaikowski's Variationen über ein Roccoco-Thema und endete großen Applaus ſeitens des das Haus anſehnlich füllenden Publikums. Das Orcheſter wartete mit Mozarts bekannter Jupiter Symphony (C-Dur), Goldmarks „Sakuntala" Gehör vertüre, die ganz vorzüglich zu reizender gebracht wurde, und Dvoraks Sowohl
Ouvertüre „Karneval" auf. die auch die
Dirigent Dr. Carl Muck ten ſich meh= langanhaltend
verbeugen.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
MAR 1 1915
Date

Establishe

SYMPHONY TO PLAY HIS COMPOSITION

GUSTAV STRUBE

ORCHESTRA TO PLAY STRUBE COMPOSITION

Concert At Lyric Tonight To Be Last Of The Boston Symphony Series.

A feature of particular interest at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Lyric tonight will be the first performance in this city of the work of a Baltimore composer, the "Original Theme with Variations," by Gustave Strube, who succeeded the late O. B. Boise at the Peabody Conservatory as director of the department of harmony and composition.

Mr. Strube is well known as a composer and his works have frequently found a prominent place on the programs of organizations as important as the Boston Symphony. The number that will be heard tonight was splendidly received at its initial Boston performance a few weeks ago. The composer was for 21 years a member of the Boston Symphony organization, having served for some time as assistant director.

The concert tonight will be the fifth and last of the Boston orchestra's local season. Beatrice Harrison, the English cellist, will be the soloist, her number being Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Roroco Theme."

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, will present Sibelius First Symphony as the principal orchestral offering and will close the concert with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
MAR 22 1915
Date

Establishe

Am Samstag Nachmittag brachte
Muck die diesjährige New Yorker Saiſ der Boſtoner mit einem virtuos d führten Programm zu einem höc freulichen Ende. Die Schubert'ſ
Dur-Symphonie eine der köſtlichſt ſtungen der Boſtoner, in Klangſ getaucht, von einer liebevollen Aus lung der Melodie, die hinreißend dabei von Muck mit jener edlen G heit dirigirt, die das Wort von der liſchen „Länge" vergeſſen macht.
erquicklich war eine recht ausgedeh gekünſtelte „Phantaſie" für Orch Oboe von d'Indy, welche franzöſiſch lieder verarbeitet, ſie dabei jedo verunziert. Geſpielt wurde gan zeichnet, und der erſte Oboiſt de ſters, Herr Longy, heiſchte wi wunderung für ſeinen entzückenden leichten Ton, ſeine reife Phraſirung und die Geläufigkeit ſeiner Technik. Dvorak's „Carneval"-Ouverture beendete das Konzert und die Spielzeit der Boſtoner in einer Weiſe, die nur den Wunſch erläßt: „Auf Wiederſehen im nächſten Jahre!"

H.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SERIES HERE

Schubert Symphony, d'Indy Fantasia and Dvorak Overture Given.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the perfection of the great band's playing gave renewed cause for regret that the Boston's concerts are so few. If only Dr. Muck would make his programmes equal in interest to his readings! But this is an apt and apparently hopeless plaint.

There were only three numbers on the programme yesterday—the Schubert C major Symphony, Vincent d'Ind.'s Fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk tunes, and Dvorak's "Carneval" Overture.

The great Schubert symphony was given a most beautiful performance, especially in the scherzo and the finale. Dr. Muck brought out superbly the romantic poetry of the composition, and his musicians responded to his slightest wish. At least for the Schubert numbers we must be grateful.

The d'Indy fantasia was a novelty to New York. Dr. Muck has not been partial to French music this season, and the introduction of this work, which, though first published in Paris in 1888, has only just reached the shores of the New World, will therefore add to the Boston orchestra leader's claim to eclecticism of taste. But the work itself will add to neither M. d'Indy's fame nor to the pleasure of musical remembrance. It was a well made composition, but the oboe is not an instrument suited to a large hall, accompanied by a full orchestra. To a piano accompaniment in a chamber music concert the fantasia might possess a certain limited appeal. In the vast reaches of Carnegie Hall all effect was lost and only monotony remained. Mr. George Longy, who sustained the solo part, did all that he could to bring recognition to the work, and such an excellent artist could not altogether fail.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CHARMS IN FINAL ACADEMY CONCERT

Beatrice Harrison, the young English 'cellist, was the soloist at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night. The programme comprised Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, spanning a century of orchestral composition and preserving neutrality between the forces at war.

The opening number was played in a manner that seemed to solve the mystery that enshrouds its name. The air of supernatural dignity and power, the calm impressive sweep of the theme, interspersed with the unexpected triplets, and followed by the optimistic brilliancy of the fugue finale sounded as though Dr. Muck were seeking to strengthen the theory that Mozart's work was the description of a great god in rare good humor.

"Sakuntala," the first and most popular of Goldmark's important works, was presented with the same descriptive fidelity, and if the audience was not quick to perceive the indications of its composer's intent in the various themes, as emphasized by the commentatore, the performance was not less pleasing.

Miss Harrison played in the Tschaikowsky number in a manner that merited every one of the six recalls she received. The piece is not a work for public performance by any save artists of the first rank, but the demure English 'cellist was mistress of every variation. Retaining a firm grip with her knees upon the body of the instrument, she swept a strong [illegible] bow across the strings, with an accuracy of technical skill that, far from sacrificing tone, set the 'cello singing in sympathy. Miss Harrison's performance furnished more than a glimpse of the possibilities of the 'cello as a tenor instrument.

"Carnival," with its swift play of the emotions furnished a fitting finale to the concert and the series. In the five concerts of the season Dr. Muck has presented four works of Beethoven, two of Brahms, two of Sibelius, two of Richard Strauss, one from Handel, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Ropartz, Saint-Saens, Schumann, and Weber, in addition to those on the programme last night. Four soloists have appeared—Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer, Fritz Kreisler and the 'cellist [illegible].

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Establi

Calais.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will return to Baltimore next season for another series of five concerts. The assisting artists announced are two vocalists and a violinist—Miss Geraldine Farrar and Madame Melba and Fritz Kreisler, all of whom are successful artists of the first rank.

As heretofore the concerts will be given on Wednesday nights. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, 1916; February 16 and

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date ....

Mr. Strube's Latest Composition For Orchestra.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN:

Sir—At the Boston Symphony concert on Wednesday evening we will hear a new work of special interest to Baltimoreans. It is "Variations on an Original Theme," by Gustav Strube, for many years assistant conductor and first violinist of the Boston Orchestra, and now professor of theory at the Peabody.

Mr. Strube is without doubt one of the most gifted living writers for the orchestra, and has achieved a profound mastery of orchestra color and technique. The warmest admirers of his talent are the Boston Symphony musicians who play his compositions—and they know. Dr. Karl Muck, who gave the first performance of Mr. Strube's new work in Boston about two weeks ago, has said that he regarded it as the most interesting novelty which he had produced this year. The composition was again performed by the Boston Symphony in Worcester a few days ago. One of the Worcester papers comments thus:

> Certain it is that Mr. Strube has devised not merely a theme of great melodic beauty, but he has given it a set of variations some of which are positively fascinating in their charm and color.

The performance in Baltimore on Wednesday will therefore be the third reading by the famous orchestra within a few weeks. Fortunate indeed is the composer whose work falls into the hands of Dr. Muck and the incomparable artists of the greatest orchestra in the world, and it is needless to add that Baltimore will welcome this opportunity to hear the work of a distinguished musician whom we may now claim as a citizen.

For every creator of music—the highest form of art—who wins a deserving title to fame there are literally thousands of successful executant musicians. In New York alone there are 25,000 orchestral players, many of them of the first rank. There is a whole army of executant musicians in Germany, but there is only a bare handful of living composers of great music in the whole world today. How fortunate we are in Baltimore to have one of these connected with the staff of the Peabody Conservatory!

Last year a very beautiful composition by Mr. Strube for wood wind instruments and French horn was played at the Florestan Club by the famous Longy Club of Boston Symphony musicians, and last summer Mr. Strube began work on the music for an opera, the libretto for which was written by Frederic Arnold Kummer.

The "Variations on an Original Theme" were composed by Mr. Strube in the spring of 1914. The theme, molto adagio is in F major, and there are 10 variations and a finale.

EDWIN L. TURNBULL.

Baltimore, March 15.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ____________

WOMAN CELLIST WINS SUCCESS AT ACADEMY

Beatrice Harrison, Soloist With Boston Orchestra, Captivates Great Audience

LAST DR. MUCK CONCERT

Immortal Freischutz Overture Is Given as a Delightful Finale

BEATRICE HARRISON, a soloist new to this public, scraped and bowed her way into the good graces of a Boston orchestra audience at the Academy of Music last evening, in the final concert of Doctor Muck's local series. The scraping was on the strings of a superb cello—for Miss Harrison is a cello player of high degree—the bowing, likewise, educed from this noble instrument the wayward, fascinating strains of Tschaikowsky's dazzling "Variations on a Rococo Theme," drowned, at times, in the all-pervading immensity of accompaniment by Doctor Muck's galaxy of star instrumentalists.

Miss Harrison is plump, petite and pretty. In her right arm is muscularity and wondrous flexibility, and the fingers of her sinister hand seemed multiplied again and again as they flashed over the resonant strings.

The seven variations in their entirety were played with artistic authority and graceful refinement, together with a naive, earnest enthusiasm that quite captivated the great audience, and ban- [illegible] of musical [illegible] from heavy preliminary installments of Brahms and Wagner.

Miss Harrison scored an artistic and popular success—and this without the Sandow strength and Hennig technique traditionally associated with cello playing by virtuosi. Her stopping is flawless, her technique facile and brilliant, and her range of tonal expression large, flexible and under instant control. And her style, moreover, is all her own, proclaimed and enforced without reminiscent suggestion or ad captandum mannerisms.

Before this grateful disclosure of a new star soloist, Doctor Muck's great orchestra ran through the movements of Johannes Brahm's first symphony in C minor, over which inharmonious pundits in south Germany are still at war. Afterward came Wagner's mighty "Faust" overture, played as only the Boston musicians can play it.

As a delightful finale was given the immortal "Freischutz" overture—for the most part in the peculiar tempi so strangely affected by orchestral concert conductors, who sometimes love to smite dramatism with an ax.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia

Date ....

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Series Closes With Magnificent Cello Performance by Beatrice Harrison and a Brahms Symphony.

PROGRAM.

First Symphony	Brahms
Faust Overture	Wagner
Variations on a Rococo Theme	Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Der Freischuetz"	Weber

The patient vigil of hours which many of the hearers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cheerfully undergo at the Academy doors for each concert was never more richly rewarded than in last night's finale of the 30th season.

Beatrice Harrison, the young English artist, was the soloist in the Tschaikowsky Variations for the violoncello. This is her first season in this country. She carried all before her in Russia and Germany ere coming to America. English by birth she took at 9 the gold medal offered conjointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music in London—the youngest of all who have been thus honored—and at 17 received the Mendelsshon prize in Berlin. Her chief teacher has been Hugo Becker, the Frankfort master.

Her playing was the poetry of motion in the supple grace of the bowing wrist and arm. With fingers holding the strings in vise-like tenacity she drew from the fine old instrument tones of unctuous sonority and sweetness. It was a rare combination of tenderness and power—of compelling pathos and virile strength. Like the rest of the few who have conquered this elusive and difficult instrument so seldom essayed by a woman, incessant study has brought her to the point where the effort entailed vanishes into the perfected art, and the arduous precedent toil of the studio is obliterated. Miss Harrison is an artist in the true sense consecrated to her calling and convincingly endowed with the divine fire—the true Promethean flame that burns in the inspiration of a Bloomfield Zeisler.

The audience applauded and recalled to the echo, and the tribute was acknowledged with unaffected modesty and a genuflection not less rhythmically graceful than the manipulation of the bow. It was completely a triumph.

The Weber "Der Freischuetz" overture, with Agatha's Prayer taken at a strikingly deliberate pace to elicit the full mellow concordance of the horns, held contrasting episodes of sparkling gayety such as only Weber can write and only such leadership as Muck's can properly set forth; the Faust overture, in nowise memorably great music, was given with its full quota of Byronic stress and sentiment. But the orchestral glory of the program was the noble symphony and the glory of the symphony was the work of the choir of wood-wind. Such a luscious voice as that of the oboe in the first movement, and in its more extended opportunity in the Andante, places Mr. Longy in a class by himself. The flute was admirable, so was the clarinet, and it was a wonderful outpouring of the violas in the Andante. The third movement passed without cessation into the finale at the Adagio where first the horns, then the flute, then the trombones—silenced till that time—were heard in tones of supreme and enchanting beauty. The Chestertonian Mr. Witek as concertmeister comported himself admirably, and was quite the life of the great violin choir. The concert left the auditors in the mood of deep regret that it is a long, long time to next November.

---

nthun.

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra.

Das Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra gab geſtern Abend unter der Leitung ſeines genialen Dirigenten, Dr. Carl Muck, in der Academy of Muſic das letzte Konzert in dieſer Saiſon und war die Soliſtin die Celliſtin Beatrice Harriſon. Die Küſtlerin ſpielte höchſtvollendet Tſchaikowski's Variationen über ein Roccoco=Thema und endete großen Applaus ſeitens des das Haus anſehnlich füllenden Publikums. Das Orcheſter wartete mit Mozarts bekannter Jupiter Sympho (C=Dur), Goldmarks „Sakuntala" vertüre, die ganz vorzüglich zu gebracht wurde, und Dvoraks Ouvertüre „Karneval" auf. Dr. Carl Muck

Gehör
reizender Sowohl die auch die ten ſich meh= anganhaltend
verbeugen.

EVENING NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
MAR 1[illegible] 1915

SYMPHONY TO PLAY HIS COMPOSITION

GUSTAV STRUBE

ORCHESTRA TO PLAY STRUBE COMPOSITION

Concert At Lyric Tonight To Be Last Of The Boston Symphony Series.

A feature of particular interest at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Lyric tonight will be the first performance in this city of the work of a Baltimore composer, the "Original Theme with Variations," by Gustave Strube, who succeeded the late O. B. Boise at the Peabody Conservatory as director of the department of harmony and composition.

Mr. Strube is well known as a composer and his works have frequently found a prominent place on the programs of organizations as important as the Boston Symphony. The number that will be heard tonight was splendidly received at its initial Boston performance a few weeks ago. The composer was for 21 years a member of the Boston Symphony organization, having served for some time as assistant director.

The concert tonight will be the fifth and last of the Boston orchestra's local season. Beatrice Harrison, the English cellist, will be the soloist, her number being Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Roroco Theme."

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, will present Sibelius First Symphony as the principal orchestral offering and will close the concert with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

AATS-ZEITUNG
New York City
MAR 22 1915

Am Samstag Nachmittag brachte Muck die diesjährige New Yorker Sai der Boſtoner mit einem virtuos durchg führten Programm zu einem höchſt erfreulichen Ende. Die Schubert'ſche C=Dur=Symphonie eine der köſtlichſten Leiſtungen der Boſtoner, in Klangſchönheit getaucht, von einer liebevollen Ausmeißelung der Melodie, die hinreißend wirkte, dabei von Muck mit jener edlen Einfachheit dirigirt, die das Wort von der himmliſchen „Länge" vergeſſen macht. Weniger erquicklich war eine recht ausgedehnte und gekünſtelte „Phantaſie" für Orcheſter und Oboe von d'Indy, welche franzöſche Volkslieder verarbeitet, ſie dabei jedoch ſtark verunziert. Geſpielt wurde ganz ausgezeichnet, und der erſte Oboiſt des Orcheſters, Herr Longy, heiſchte wieder Bewunderung für ſeinen entzückenden leichten Ton, ſeine reife Phraſirung und die Geläufigkeit ſeiner Technik. Dvorak's „Carneval"=Ouverture beendete das Konzert und die Spielzeit der Boſtoner in einer Weiſe, die nur den [illegible] Wunſch zuläßt: „Auf Wiederſehen im nächſten Jahre!"

H.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City

Date .... MAR 21

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SERIES HERE

Schubert Symphony, d'Indy Fantasia and Dvorak Overture Given.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the perfection of the great band's playing gave renewed cause for regret that the Boston's concerts are so few. If only Dr. Muck would make his programmes equal in interest to his readings! But this is an apt and apparently hopeless plaint.

There were only three numbers on the programme yesterday—the Schubert C major Symphony, Vincent d'Ind.'s Fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk tunes, and Dvorak's "Carneval" Overture.

The great Schubert symphony was given a most beautiful performance, especially in the scherzo and the finale. Dr. Muck brought out superbly the romantic poetry of the composition, and his musicians responded to his slightest wish. At least for the Schubert numbers we must be grateful.

The d'Indy fantasia was a novelty to New York. Dr. Muck has not been partial to French music this season, and the introduction of this work, which, though first published in Paris in 1888, has only just reached the shores of the New World, will therefore add to the Boston orchestra leader's claim to eclecticism of taste. But the work itself will add to neither M. d'Indy's fame nor to the pleasure of musical remembrance. It was a well made composition, but the oboe is not an instrument suited to a large hall, accompanied by a full orchestra. To a piano accompaniment in a chamber music concert the fantasia might possess a certain limited appeal. In the vast reaches of Carnegie Hall all effect was lost and only monotony remained. Mr. George Longy, who sustained the solo part, did all that he could to bring recognition to the work, and such an excellent artist could not altogether fail.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR [illegible]

Date ____________

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CHARMS IN FINAL ACADEMY CONCERT

Beatrice Harrison, the young English 'cellist, was the soloist at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night. The programme comprised Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, spanning a century of orchestral composition and preserving neutrality between the forces at war.

The opening number was played in a manner that seemed to solve the mystery that enshrouds its name. The air of supernatural dignity and power, the calm impressive sweep of the theme, interspersed with the unexpected triplets, and followed by the optimistic brilliancy of the fugue finale sounded as though Dr. Muck were seeking to strengthen the theory that Mozart's work was the description of a great god in rare good humor.

"Sakuntala," the first and most popular of Goldmark's important works, was presented with the same descriptive fidelity, and if the audience was not quick to perceive the indications of its composer's intent in the various themes, as emphasized by the commentatore, the performance was not less pleasing.

Miss Harrison played in the Tschaikowsky number in a manner that merited every one of the six recalls she received. This piece is not a work for public performance by any save artists of the first rank, but the demure English 'cellist was mistress of every variation. Retaining a firm grip with her knees upon the body of the instrument, she swept a strong free bow across the strings, with an accuracy of technical skill that, far from sacrificing tone, set the 'cello singing in sympathy. Miss Harrison's performance furnished more than a glimpse of the possibilities of the 'cello as a tenor instrument.

"Carnival," with its swift play of the emotions furnished a fitting finale to the concert and the series. In the five concerts of the season Dr. Muck has presented four works of Beethovan, two of Brahms, two of Sibelius, two of Richard Strauss, one from Handel, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Ropartz, Saint-Saens, Schumann, and Weber, in addition to those of the programme last night. Four soloists have appeared—Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer, Fritz Kreisler and the 'cellist of last evening.

---

timore, Md.

ON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT SEASON

Boston Symphony Orchestra arl Muck, conductor, will re- Baltimore next season for another series of five concerts. The assisting artists announced are two vocalists and a violinist—Miss Geraldine Farrar and Madame Melba and Fritz Kreisler, all of whom are successful artists of the first rank.

As heretofore the concerts will be given on Wednesday nights. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, 1916; February 16 and

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

1884

Mr. Strube's Latest Composition For Orchestra.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN:

Sir—At the Boston Symphony concert on Wednesday evening we will hear a new work of special interest to Baltimoreans. It is "Variations on an Original Theme," by Gustav Strube, for many years assistant conductor and first violinist of the Boston Orchestra, and now professor of theory at the Peabody.

Mr. Strube is without doubt one of the most gifted living writers for the orchestra, and has achieved a profound mastery of orchestra color and technique. The warmest admirers of his talent are the Boston Symphony musicians who play his compositions—and they know. Dr. Karl Muck, who gave the first performance of Mr. Strube's new work in Boston about two weeks ago, has said that he regarded it as the most interesting novelty which he had produced this year. The composition was again performed by the Boston Symphony in Worcester a few days ago. One of the Worcester papers comments thus:

> Certain it is that Mr. Strube has devised not merely a theme of great melodic beauty, but he has given it a set of variations some of which are positively fascinating in their charm and color.

The performance in Baltimore on Wednesday will therefore be the third reading by the famous orchestra within a few weeks. Fortunate indeed is the composer whose work falls into the hands of Dr. Muck and the incomparable artists of the greatest orchestra in the world, and it is needless to add that Baltimore will welcome this opportunity to hear the work of a distinguished musician whom we may now claim as a citizen.

For every creator of music—the highest form of art—who wins a deserving title to fame there are literally thousands of successful executant musicians. In New York alone there are 25,000 orchestral players, many of them of the first rank. There is a whole army of executant musicians in Germany, but there is only a bare handful of living composers of great music in the whole world today. How fortunate we are in Baltimore to have one of these connected with the staff of the Peabody Conservatory!

Last year a very beautiful composition by Mr. Strube for wood wind instruments and French horn was played at the Florestan Club by the famous Longy Club of Boston Symphony musicians, and last summer Mr. Strube began work on the music for an opera, the libretto for which was written by Frederic Arnold Kummer.

The "Variations on an Original Theme" were composed by Mr. Strube in the spring of 1914. The theme, molto adagio is in F major, and there are 10 variations and a finale.

EDWIN L. TURNBULL.

Baltimore, March 15.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

6 1915

Date

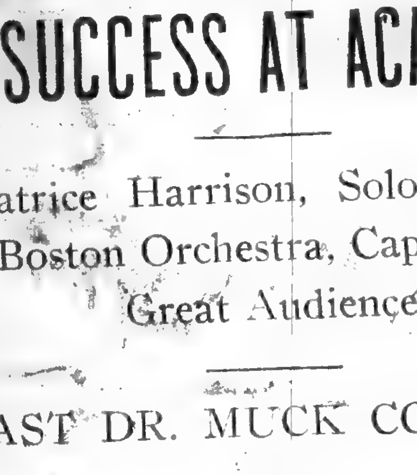
Est 884

WOMAN CELLIST WINS SUCCESS AT ACADEMY

Beatrice Harrison, Soloist With Boston Orchestra, Captivates Great Audience

LAST DR. MUCK CONCERT

Immortal Freischutz Overture Is Given as a Delightful Finale



BEATRICE HARRISON, a soloist new to this public, scraped and bowed her way into the good graces of a Boston orchestra audience at the Academy of Music last evening, in the final concert of Doctor Muck's local series. The scraping was on the strings of a superb cello—for Miss Harrison is a cello player of high degree—the bowing, likewise, educed from this noble instrument the wayward, fascinating strains of Tschaikowsky's dazzling "Variations on a Rococo Theme," drowned, at times, in the all-pervading immensity of accompaniment by Doctor Muck's galaxy of star instrumentalists.

Miss Harrison is plump, petite and pretty. In her right arm is muscularity and wondrous flexibility, and the fingers of her sinister hand seemed multiplied again and again as they flashed over the resonant strings.

The seven variations in their entirety were played with artistic authority and graceful refinement, together with a naive, earnest enthusiasm that quite captivated the great audience, and ban- [illegible] musical [illegible] from heavy preliminary instalments of Brahms and Wagner.

Miss Harrison scored an artistic and popular success—and this without the Sandow strength and Hennig technique traditionally associated with cello playing by virtuosi. Her stopping is flawless, her technique facile and brilliant, and her range of tonal expression large, flexible and under instant control. And her style, moreover, is all her own, proclaimed and enforced without reminiscent suggestion or ad captandum mannerisms.

Before this grateful disclosure of a new star soloist, Doctor Muck's great orchestra ran through the movements of Johannes Brahm's first symphony in C minor, over which inharmonious pundits in south Germany are still at war. Afterward came Wagner's mighty "Faust" overture, played as only the Boston musicians can play it.

As a delightful finale was given the immortal "Freischutz" overture—for the most part in the peculiar tempi so strangely affected by orchestral concert conductors, who sometimes love to smite dramatism with an ax.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia

Date MAR - 6

884

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Series Closes With Magnificent Cello Performance by Beatrice Harrison and a Brahms Symphony.

PROGRAM.

First Symphony	Brahms
Faust Overture	Wagner
Variations on a Rococo Theme	Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Der Freischuetz"	Weber

The patient vigil of hours which many of the hearers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cheerfully undergo at the Academy doors for each concert was never more richly rewarded than in last night's finale of the 30th season.

Beatrice Harrison, the young English artist, was the soloist in the Tschaikowsky Variations for the violoncello. This is her first season in this country. She carried all before her in Russia and Germany ere coming to America. English by birth she took at 9 the gold medal offered conjointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music in London—the youngest of all who have been thus honored—and at 17 received the Mendelsshon prize in Berlin. Her chief teacher has been Hugo Becker, the Frankfort master.

Her playing was the poetry of motion in the supple grace of the bowing wrist and arm. With fingers holding the strings in vise-like tenacity she drew from the fine old instrument tones of unctuous sonority and sweetness. It was a rare combination of tenderness and power—of compelling pathos and virile strength. Like the rest of the few who have conquered this elusive and difficult instrument so seldom essayed by a woman, incessant study has brought her to the point where the effort entailed vanishes into the perfected art, and the arduous precedent toil of the studio is obliterated. Miss Harrison is an artist in the true sense consecrated to her calling and convincingly endowed with the divine fire—the true Promethean flame that burns in the inspiration of a Bloomfield Zeisler.

The audience applauded and recalled to the echo, and the tribute was acknowledged with unaffected modesty and a genuflection not less rhythmically graceful than the manipulation of the bow. It was completely a triumph.

The Weber "Der Freischuetz" overture, with Agatha's Prayer taken at a strikingly deliberate pace to elicit the full mellow concordance of the horns, held contrasting episodes of sparkling gayety such as only Weber can write and only such leadership as Muck's can properly set forth; the Faust overture, in nowise memorably great music, was given with its full quota of Byronic stress and sentiment. But the orchestral glory of the program was the noble symphony and the glory of the symphony was the work of the choir of wood-wind. Such a luscious voice as that of the oboe in the first movement, and in its more extended opportunity in the Andante, places Mr. Longy in a class by himself. The flute was admirable, so was the clarinet, and it was a wonderful outpouring of the violas in the Andante. The third movement passed without cessation into the finale at the Adagio where first the horns, then the flute, then the trombones—silenced till that time—were heard in tones of supreme and enchanting beauty. The Chestertonian Mr. Witek as concertmeister comported himself admirably, and was quite the life of the great violin choir. The concert left the auditors in the mood of deep regret that it is a long, long time to next November.

---

on Symphony Orcheſtra.

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra gab Abend unter der Leitung ſeines en Dirigenten, Dr. Carl Muck, in Academy of Muſic das letzte Konzert dieſer Saiſon und war die Soliſtin die Celliſtin Beatrice Harriſon. Die Küſtlerin ſpielte höchſtvollendet Tſchaikowski's Variationen über ein Roccoco-Thema und endete großen Applaus ſeitens des das Haus anſehnlich füllenden Publikums. Das Orcheſter wartete mit Mozarts bekannter Jupiter Symph Gehör (C-Dur), Goldmarks „Sakuntal eizender vertüre, die ganz vorzüglich Sowohl gebracht wurde, und Dvorak die auch die Ouvertüre „Karneval" au ten ſich meh- Dr. Carl Mu langanhaltend erbeugen.

EVENING NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

MAR 1 7 1915

SYMPHONY TO PLAY HIS COMPOSITION

GUSTAV STRUBE

ORCHESTRA TO PLAY STRUBE COMPOSITION

Concert At Lyric Tonight To Be Last Of The Boston Symphony Series.

A feature of particular interest at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Lyric tonight will be the first performance in this city of the work of a Baltimore composer, the "Original Theme with Variations," by Gustave Strube, who succeeded the late O. B. Boise at the Peabody Conservatory as director of the department of harmony and composition.

Mr. Strube is well known as a composer and his works have frequently found a prominent place on the programs of organizations as important as the Boston Symphony. The number that will be heard tonight was splendidly received at its initial Boston performance a few weeks ago. The composer was for 21 years a member of the Boston Symphony organization, having served for some time as assistant director.

The concert tonight will be the fifth and last of the Boston orchestra's local season. Beatrice Harrison, the English cellist, will be the soloist, her number being Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Roroco Theme."

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, will present Sibelius First Symphony as the principal orchestral offering and will close the concert with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

AATS-ZEITUNG
New York City

MAR 2 2 1915

Establishe

‥ Samstag Nachmittag brachte Dr. Muck die diesjährige New Yorker Saiſon der Boſtoner mit einem virtuos durchgeführten Programm zu einem höchſt erfreulichen Ende. Die Schubert'ſche C-Dur-Symphonie eine der köſtlichſten Leiſtungen der Boſtoner, in Klangſchönheit getaucht, von einer liebevollen Ausmeißelung der Melodie, die hinreißend wirkte, dabei von Muck mit jener edlen Einfachheit dirigirt, die das Wort von der himmliſchen „Länge" vergeſſen macht. Weniger erquicklich war eine recht ausgedehnte und gekünſtelte „Phantaſie" für Orcheſter und Oboe von d'Indy, welche franzöſche Volkslieder verarbeitet, ſie dabei jedoch ſtark verunziert. Geſpielt wurde ganz ausgezeichnet, und der erſte Oboiſt des Orcheſters, Herr Longy, heiſchte wieder Bewunderung für ſeinen entzückenden leichten Ton, ſeine reife Phraſirung und die Geläufigkeit ſeiner Technik. Dvorak's „Carneval"-Ouverture beendete das Konzert und die Spielzeit der Boſtoner in einer Weiſe, die nur den [illegible] Wunſch zuläßt: „Auf Wiederſehen im nächſten Jahre!"

H.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City

Date MAR 2 1

Esta 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SERIES HERE

Schubert Symphony, d'Indy Fantasia and Dvorak Overture Given.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the perfection of the great band's playing gave renewed cause for regret that the Boston's concerts are so few. If only Dr. Muck would make his programmes equal in interest to his readings! But this is an apt and apparently hopeless plaint.

There were only three numbers on the programme yesterday—the Schubert C major Symphony, Vincent d'Indy's Fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk tunes, and Dvorak's "Carneval" Overture.

The great Schubert symphony was given a most beautiful performance, especially in the scherzo and the finale. Dr. Muck brought out superbly the romantic poetry of the composition, and his musicians responded to his slightest wish. At least for the Schubert numbers we must be grateful.

The d'Indy fantasia was a novelty to New York. Dr. Muck has not been partial to French music this season, and the introduction of this work, which, though first published in Paris in 1888, has only just reached the shores of the New World, will therefore add to the Boston orchestra leader's claim to eclecticism of taste. But the work itself will add to neither M. d'Indy's fame nor to the pleasure of musical remembrance. It was a well made composition, but the oboe is not an instrument suited to a large hall, accompanied by a full orchestra. To a piano accompaniment in a chamber music concert the fantasia might possess a certain limited appeal. In the vast reaches of Carnegie Hall all effect was lost and only monotony remained. Mr. George Longy, who sustained the solo part, did all that he could to bring recognition to the work, and such an excellent artist could not altogether fail.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 2 6

Date

rk, 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CHARMS IN FINAL ACADEMY CONCERT

Beatrice Harrison, the young English 'cellist, was the soloist at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night. The programme comprised Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, spanning a century of orchestral composition and preserving neutrality between the forces at war.

The opening number was played in a manner that seemed to solve the mystery that enshrouds its name. The air of supernatural dignity and power, the calm impressive sweep of the theme, interspersed with the unexpected triplets, and followed by the optimistic brilliancy of the fugue finale sounded as though Dr. Muck were seeking to strengthen the theory that Mozart's work was the description of a great god in rare good humor.

"Sakuntala," the first and most popular of Goldmark's important works, was presented with the same descriptive fidelity, and if the audience was not quick to perceive the indications of its composer's intent in the various themes, as emphasized by the commentatore, the performance was not less pleasing.

Miss Harrison played in the Tschaikowsky number in a manner that merited every one of the six recalls she received. This piece is not a work for public performance by any save artists of the first rank, but the demure English 'cellist was mistress of every variation. Retaining a firm grip with her knees upon the body of the instrument, she swept a strong free bow across the strings, with an accuracy of technical skill that, far from sacrificing tone, set the 'cello singing in sympathy. Miss Harrison's performance furnished more than a glimpse of the possibilities of the 'cello as a tenor instrument.

"Carnival," with its swift play of the emotions furnished a fitting finale to the oncert and the series. In the five conrts of the season Dr. Muck has presnted four works of Beethovan, two of ahms, two of Sibelius, two of Richard auss, one from Handel, Mendelssohntholdy, Ropartz, Saint-Saens, Schunn, and Weber, in addition to those he programme last night. Four so have appeared—Pasquale Amato, d Bauer, Fritz Kreisler and the t of last evening.

---

timore, Md.

N SYMPHONY HERE NEXT SEASON

Boston Symphony Orchestra, arl Muck, conductor, will re- Baltimore next season for another series of five concerts. The assisting artists announced are two vocalists and a violinist—Miss Geraldine Farrar and Madame Melba and Fritz Kreisler, all of whom are successful artists of the first rank.

As heretofore the concerts will be given on Wednesday nights. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, 1916, February 16 and

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Est

MUSIC OF TODAY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

1884

Splendid Program at the Lyric Includes Composition By Local Artist.

Playing some remarkably significant music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the fifth and last of its season's concerts in Baltimore at the Lyric last night. Features of the program were Miss Beatrice Harrison, violoncellist, as special soloist, and the performance for the first time in Baltimore of the theme and variations, in F major, by Gustav Strube, principal instructor of harmony and composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music. The audience filled the hall.

Dr. Muck's program was particularly acceptable because it contained music of the present day—music representative of the world as it is rather than as it has been. Of this there was much—more than was necessary for a well-balanced program, in fact, but not too much by comparison with other programs the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given in this city this season. The program was also particularly agreeable because none of its numbers has been heard often in Baltimore.

Genius comes into the world in the most unexpected places. In Finland was born Jan Sibelius, whose Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Opus 39, was played last night. He is recorded to have composed four symphonies so far. His first was composed in 1899.

This first symphony of Sibelius' contains countless periods of marvelous expression. It contains a message and a warning for modern composers the world over. The message is the need of active, positive expression in music, the need of sharp visualization of musical thought. The warning is that much of musical composition is drifting into nothingness, into meaninglessness, through the passive, negative thoughts and methods of composers. Musical art today is going to sleep. It is sleeping. It is talking in its sleep. Sibelius' music is awake; and it is speaking rationally, earnestly. Who will hear? Who will heed?

Dvorak's Overture, Carnival, Opus 92, which closed the concert, was played most brilliantly by the orchestra. It is a lively, fervent piece, and shows Dvorak to better advantage than his familiar New World Symphony.

Miss Harrison played Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme, for violoncello, Opus 33, with orchestral accompaniment. While not wholly like the characteristic Tschaikowsky, the work is interesting, nevertheless, and frequently quite beautiful. Miss Harrison played it exceedingly well and in a manner which proved her to be a virtuoso. Her performance was most skilful and Dr. Muck directed the orchestra with such certainty and co-operation with the soloist as to allow her reading of the composition its full individuality. This individuality was full of poise, subtleties and charm.

Mr. Strube's new composition is wholly worthy music, and it was well received. After its performance Mr. Strube himself appeared upon the stage four times in response to continued applause. The work was presented well, even though its playing seemed a little cautious. It is scored for full orchestra and consists of an original theme, ten variations in many keys and a finale.

Mr. Strube was one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years and resigned his position with the orchestra to succeed Otis Bardwell Boise as teacher of composition at the Peabody Conservatory, after Mr. Boise's death. A large number of Mr. Strube's compositions have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Mr. Strube's ideas and his management of the orchestra in his new work are full of beauty and genuine skill. Baltimore is fortunate to have such an able resident musician.

J. N. H.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City

Date

Esta

Boston Orchestra Gives Its Closing Evening Concert

188

By Sylvester-Rawling.

DR. KARL MUCK and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last evening concert of their New York season at Carnegie Hall last night. Only the matinee for to-morrow remains for a farewell. Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy" was the principal number. It is so rarely played that it has the virtue of a new work, and it was played so superbly last night that one may be forgiven for overestimating its worth.

Too prolix, of course, as are most musical works, not excluding those of the present day, it has a comprehensive ideal, intrinsic beauty and sound musicianship to recommend it, which the crowded and distinguished musical and society audience was not slow to recognize. If for nothing else it served to introduce a rare artist at the viola, Emile Ferir, the head of the orchestra's violist choir, who made an unmistakable impression as the soloist, representing Harold in the symphony.

Besides the programme held "Ormazd," a symphonic poem by our own Frederick Shepherd Converse, in which he strives to depict the eternal fight between light and darkness. It is cleverly orchestrated, superficially effective, and yet fails to reach the inner consciousness with a lightning bolt of inspiration. A third number was Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia after Shakespeare. All were played masterfully. Dr. Muck, who had insisted that Mr. Ferir share the honors with him in the Berlioz work, made the whole orchestra at the end rise to acknowledge the applause.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Est

EXPLAINS SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fique on Programme for Tonight at Academy by Bostonians.

34

Carl Fique last night in the lecture hall of the Academy of Music gave an explanatory recital of the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play tonight in the opera house of the Academy. Before a Brooklyn Institute audience Mr. Fique said that in this time of war it is pleasant to know one realm that is strictly neutral, the realm of music. This programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he said, shows one Russian surrounded by three Austrians. He referred to Tschaikowsky, whose "Variations on a Rococo Theme for the Violoncello" will be played by Miss Beatrice Harrison tonight with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Fique characterized Tschaikowsky as one of the greatest musicians of all times. Discussing Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Mr. Fique said that the composer did not give to his work that name; it was so called by the great pianist, Cramer. This was considered one of the greatest symphonies of olden times before the days of Beethoven. The "adagio" movement, Mr. Fique believes, is one of the most wonderful pieces ever written at any age. Mozart did not pose as a reformer nor did he have any pronounced principles to give to the world, but simply wrote as if he were inspired. He was the first man who made the orcehstra instruments sing. The minuet is a very characteristic piece of writing and seems to portray the Vienna of the later eighteenth century.

Mr. Fique then took up the overture to "Sakuntala," by Goldmark, which, he said, was written for the drama, and not for opera. This was followed by the "Carnival" overture of Dvorak, a brilliant composition, the name of which describes its whole contents, one mad whirl of masquerades and merriment.

Mr. Fique begged the indulgence of the audience because of an injury to one of the fingers of his right

---

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

Date

Esta

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ga its fifth and last evening concert of t season in Carnegie Hall last night, pr senting a programme that had one adm able quality, brevity. If such works the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy must be given, it is advisable not to d tain an audience too long. That it w beautifully played even those who d not hear it will admit, and Mr. Emi Férir deserved the applause he receive In his hands the viola is quite as inte esting as a violin.

Had Mr. Converse adopted the Walt Whitman philosophy of life and "invited his soul to loaf," instead of developing technique by long and careful study of the composers, whose feelings and thoughts created individual means of expression, his "Ormazd" might have been something that it is not, convincing. Whenever the composer seemed to say something, the taunting fiend, memory, would make one say, "Where have I heard that?" and "Ormazd" was lost for the time being.

Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," did much in the cause of romantic music. It does not need "Harold in Italy" and "Ormazd" to give it interest by contrast, but it was fortunate for them that the exigencies of programme making put it last. Tchaikovsky made melodies do what others attempt with instrumental trickeries. It was the love duet so exquisitely played, that the audience took away, not the wanderings of Harold or the battle of Light and Darkness.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Est

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON

88

Gustav Strube's Composition Proves Theme Of Enduring Quality.

The last of the five concerts given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of peculiar interest, including, as it did, Sibelius' most characteristic symphony in E minor, and a work altogether new to Baltimore—"Variations on an Original Theme," by Gustav Strube.

The symphony has all the virtues and vices of the typical Slavonic school of today; it is highly imaginative, most original in orchestral coloring and crowded with picturesque and fanciful episodes; but, in spite of all these allurements, the impression left at the end is something indefinite, intangible and lacking in finality.

It is indeed much as if a series of problems were presented for solution and at the end remained still unsolved. This is particularly the case in the first and last movements, but in the opening of the second movement a really beautiful theme in a rhythm easily intelligible was a delightful relief. The scherzo is eccentric and bizarre more than anything else, and is only redeemed by a very striking and original horn episode in the middle.

Mr. Strube is to be heartily congratulated on his very musicianly and interesting composition. There are not many composers living today capable of writing a theme of such enduring quality, as will bear so many variations without monotony, but this is just what Mr. Strube has succeeded in doing; and then the variations themselves are remarkable specimens of their kind both in orchestral coloring and as illustrations of the latest developments of the evolution of variation form.

The soloist was Miss Beatrice Harrison, the young English violoncellist, who was heard in Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," unfortunately one of the most unoriginal and uncharacteristic works of this composer.

Miss Harrison has remarkable gifts; her playing is finished and most refined, and she has, moreover, a brillant technic; but somehow she just fails to attain real greatness as a player through a certain want of virility and individuality, though, in all justice, it must be said that this might be accounted for to some extent by the nature of Tschaikowsky's composition.

The concert concluded with a particularly brilliant performance of Dvorak's "Carnival." Perhaps never before have we parted from Dr. Muck so unwillingly, for, with the single exception of Beethoven's "Overture to Egmont," his readings this season have been practically beyond criticism; and, what is more, he has, on the whole, been far more sympathetic in his programs than ever before, giving us a full share of the classics, and at the same time only the best of modern productions.

H. D. P.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Estal

FIQUE EXPLAINS TO-NIGHT'S BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

34

Carl Fique gave an explanatory recital of the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play to-night, in the lecture hall of the Academy of Music last evening. This programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he said, shows one Russian surrounded by three Austrians. He referred to Tschaikowsky, whose variations on a rococo theme for the violoncello will be played by Miss Beatrice Harrison to-night with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Fique characterized Tschaikowsky as one of the greatest musicians of all times.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony was discussed by Mr. Fique, who said the composer did not give his work this name, but it was so called by the great pianist Cramer.

Then Mr. Fique took up the overture to "Sakuntala" by Goldmark which he said was written for the drama, not an opera.

Mr. Fique begged the indulgence of the audience because of an injury to one of the fingers of his right hand. Despite this handicap, he played with splendid technical skill and sympathetic insight themes and passages in illustration of his talk.

From PRESS
Address: New York City

Date MAR 21 1915

Esta

FAREWELL CONCERT GIVEN

Boston Orchestra Plays for Last Time This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There were no extraordinary demonstrations for the famous band, however, nor even for Dr. Karl Muck, though the distinguished Bavarian conductor, whose contract expires this spring, may have been wielding the baton for the last time in this city.

After Schubert's symphony in C major, which received a beautifully euphonious and transparent, though hardly an inspiring, performance at the beginning of the programme, all the musicians stood up, at their leader's request, in recognition of the applause. But the Boston orchestra's subscribers have come to consider that act a feature of every concert.

Georges Longy, veteran member of the organization, evoked much enthusiasm with d'Indy's Fantasia on French Folk Tunes, for oboe and orchestra, opus 31. Presumably, little of the approval was intended for the work itself—an admirably scored composition without a scintilla of inspiration.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture brought

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

BEATRICE HARRISON FAMED AS 'CELLIST

1884

Philadelphia Orchestra Program Will Present American Singer as Soloist.

TSCHAIKOWSKY SYMPHONY

Other Musical Events That Will Be of Interest to Local Concert-Goers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its thirtieth consecutive season in Philadelphia to an end tomorrow evening with a concert in the Academy of Music. At the beginning of the season the management promised but three soloists—Amato, Bauer and Kreisler—all of whom have appeared. Notwithstanding this, there will be a soloist at this last concert, Beatrice Harrison, a young English violoncellist. Those who have heard Miss Harrison play agree that she has a remarkable talent. She took the gold medal given jointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music of London when she was 9 years old, the youngest who had ever received that honor, and when she was 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. A greater part of her studying was done with Hugo Becker, of Frankfort.

BEATRICE HARRISON

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert comprises the First Symphony of Brahms, in C minor, the "Faust" Overture of Wagner, Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme, for violoncello and orchestra, and Weber's Overture, "Der Freischuetz."

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

MUSIC OF TODAY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Splendid Program at the Lyric Includes Composition By Local Artist.

Playing some remarkably significant music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the fifth and last of its season's concerts in Baltimore at the Lyric last night. Features of the program were Miss Beatrice Harrison, violoncellist, as special soloist, and the performance for the first time in Baltimore of the theme and variations, in F major, by Gustav Strube, principal instructor of harmony and composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music. The audience filled the hall.

Dr. Muck's program was particularly acceptable because it contained music of the present day—music representative of the world as it is rather than as it has been. Of this there was much—more than was nessessary for a well-balanced program, in fact, but not too much by comparison with other programs the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given in this city this season. The program was also particularly agreeable because none of its numbers has been heard often in Baltimore.

Genius comes into the world in the most unexpected places. In Finland was born Jan Sibelius, whose Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Opus 39, was played last night. He is recorded to have composed four symphonies so far. His first was composed in 1899.

This first symphony of Sibelius' contains countless periods of marvelous expression. It contains a message and a warning for modern composers the world over. The message is the need of active, positive expression in music, the need of sharp visualization of musical thought. The warning is that much of musical composition is drifting into nothingness, into meaninglessness, through the passive, negative thoughts and methods of composers. Musical art today is going to sleep. It is sleeping. It is talking in its sleep. Sibelius' music is awake; and it is speaking rationally, earnestly. Who will hear? Who will heed?

Dvorak's Overture, Carnival, Opus 92, which closed the concert, was played most brilliantly by the orchestra. It is a lively, fervent piece, and shows Dvorak to better advantage than his familiar New World Symphony.

Miss Harrison played Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme, for violoncello, Opus 33, with orchestral accompaniment. While not wholly like the characteristic Tschaikowsky, the work is interesting, nevertheless, and frequently quite beautiful. Miss Harrison played it exceedingly well and in a manner which proved her to be a virtuoso. Her performance was most skilful and Dr. Muck directed the orchestra with such certainty and co-operation with the soloist as to allow her reading of the composition its full individuality. This individuality was full of poise, subtleties and charm.

Mr. Strube's new composition is wholly worthy music, and it was well received. After its performance Mr. Strube himself appeared upon the stage four times in response to continued applause. The work was presented well, even though its playing seemed a little cautious. It is scored for full orchestra and consists of an original theme, ten variations in many keys and a finale.

Mr. Strube was one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years and resigned his position with the orchestra to succeed Otis Bardwell Boise as teacher of composition at the Peabody Conservatory, after Mr. Boise's death. A large number of Mr. Strube's compositions have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Mr. Strube's ideas and his management of the orchestra in his new work are full of beauty and genuine skill. Baltimore is fortunate to have such an able resident musician.

J. N. H.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

Boston Orchestra Gives Its Closing Evening Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

DR. KARL MUCK and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last evening concert of their New York season at Carnegie Hall last night. Only the matinee for to-morrow remains for a farewell. Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy" was the principal number. It is so rarely played that it has the virtue of a new work, and it was played so superbly last night that one may be forgiven for overestimating its worth. Too prolix, of course, as are most musical works, not excluding those of the present day, it has a comprehensive ideal, intrinsic beauty—and sound musicianship to recommend it, which the crowded and distinguished musical and society audience was not slow to recognize. If for nothing else it served to introduce a rare artist at the viola, Emile Ferir, the head of the orchestra's violist choir, who made an unmistakable impression as the soloist, representing Harold in the symphony.

Besides the programme held "Ormazd," a symphonic poem by our own Frederick Shepherd Converse, in which he strives to depict the eternal fight between light and darkness. It is cleverly orchestrated, superficially effective, and yet fails to reach the inner consciousness with a lightning bolt of inspiration. A third number was Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia after Shakespeare. All were played masterfully. Dr. Muck, who had insisted that Mr. Ferir share the honors with him in the Berlioz work, made the whole orchestra at the end rise to acknowledge the applause.

---

m EAGLE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

EXPLAINS SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fique on Programme for Tonight at Academy by Bostonians.

Carl Fique last night in the lecture hall of the Academy of Music gave an explanatory recital of the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play tonight in the opera house of the Academy. Before a Brooklyn Institute audience Mr. Fique said that in this time of war it is pleasant to know one realm that is strictly neutral, the realm of music. This programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he said, shows one Russian surrounded by three Austrians. He referred to Tschaikowsky, whose "Variations on a Rococo Theme for the Violoncello" will be played by Miss Beatrice Harrison tonight with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Fique characterized Tschaikowsky as one of the greatest musicians of all times. Discussing Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Mr. Fique said that the composer did not give to his work that name; it was so called by the great pianist, Cramer. This was considered one of the greatest symphonies of olden times before the days of Beethoven. The "adagio" movement, Mr. Fique believes, is one of the most wonderful pieces ever written at any age. Mozart did not pose as a reformer nor did he have any pronounced principles to give to the world, but simply wrote as if he were inspired. He was the first man who made the orcehstra instruments sing. The minuet is a very characteristic piece of writing and seems to portray the Vienna of the later eighteenth century.

Mr. Fique then took up the overture to "Sakuntala," by Goldmark, which, he said, was written for the drama, and not for opera. This was followed by the "Carnival" overture of Dvorak, a brilliant composition, the name of which describes its whole contents, one mad whirl of masquerades and merriment.

Mr. Fique begged the indulgence of the audience because of an injury to one of the fingers of his right hand

---

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night, presenting a programme that had one admirable quality, brevity. If such works as the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," must be given, it is advisable not to detain an audience too long. That it was beautifully played even those who did not hear it will admit, and Mr. Emile Férir deserved the applause he received. In his hands the viola is quite as interesting as a violin.

Had Mr. Converse adopted the Walt Whitman philosophy of life and "invited his soul to loaf," instead of developing technique by long and careful study of the composers, whose feelings and thoughts created individual means of expression, his "Ormazd" might have been something that it is not, convincing. Whenever the composer seemed to say something, the taunting fiend, memory, would make one say, "Where have I heard that?" and "Ormazd" was lost for the time being.

Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," did much in the cause of romantic music. It does not need "Harold in Italy" and "Ormazd" to give it interest by contrast, but it was fortunate for them that the exigencies of programme making put it last. Tchaikovsky made melodies do what others attempt with instrumental trickeries. It was the love duet so exquisitely played, that the audience took away, not the wanderings of Harold or the battle of Light and Darkness.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON

Gustav Strube's Composition Proves Theme Of Enduring Quality.

The last of the five concerts given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of peculiar interest, including, as it did, Sibelius' most characteristic symphony in E minor, and a work altogether new to Baltimore—"Variations on an Original Theme," by Gustav Strube.

The symphony has all the virtues and vices of the typical Slavonic school of today; it is highly imaginative, most original in orchestral coloring and crowded with picturesque and fanciful episodes; but, in spite of all these allurements, the impression left at the end is something indefinite, intangible and lacking in finality.

It is indeed much as if a series of problems were presented for solution and at the end remained still unsolved. This is particularly the case in the first and last movements, but in the opening of the second movement a really beautiful theme in a rhythm easily intelligible was a delightful relief. The scherzo is eccentric and bizarre more than anything else, and is only redeemed by a very striking and original horn episode in the middle.

Mr. Strube is to be heartily congratulated on his very musicianly and interesting composition. There are not many composers living today capable of writing a theme of such enduring quality, as will bear so many variations without monotony, but this is just what Mr. Strube has succeeded in doing; and then the variations themselves are remarkable specimens of their kind both in orchestral coloring and as illustrations of the latest developments of the evolution of variation form.

The soloist was Miss Beatrice Harrison, the young English violoncellist, who was heard in Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," unfortunately one of the most unoriginal and uncharacteristic works of this composer.

Miss Harrison has remarkable gifts; her playing is finished and most refined, and she has, moreover, a brillant technic; but somehow she just fails to attain real greatness as a player through a certain want of virility and individuality, though, in all justice, it must be said that this might be accounted for to some extent by the nature of Tschaikowsky's composition.

The concert concluded with a particularly brilliant performance of Dvorak's "Carnival." Perhaps never before have we parted from Dr. Muck so unwillingly, for, with the single exception of Beethoven's "Overture to Egmont," his readings this season have been practically beyond criticism; and, what is more, he has, on the whole, been far more sympathetic in his programs than ever before, giving us a full share of the classics, and at the same time only the best of modern productions.

H. D. P.

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

FIQUE EXPLAINS TO-NIGHT'S BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Carl Fique gave an explanatory recital of the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play to-night, in the lecture hall of the Academy of Music last evening. This programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he said, shows one Russian surrounded by three Austrians. He referred to Tschaikowsky, whose variations on a rococo theme for the violoncello will be played by Miss Beatrice Harrison to-night with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Fique characterized Tschaikowsky as one of the greatest musicians of all times.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony was discussed by Mr. Fique, who said the composer did not give his work this name, but it was so called by the great pianist Cramer.

Then Mr. Fique took up the overture to "Sakuntala" by Goldmark which he said was written for the drama, not an opera.

Mr. Fique begged the indulgence of the audience because of an injury to one of the fingers of his right hand. Despite this handicap, he played with splendid technical skill and sympathetic insight themes and passages in illustration of his talk.

PRESS
ess: New York City
MAR 21 1915

FAREWELL CONCERT GIVEN

Boston Orchestra Plays for Last Time This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There were no extraordinary demonstrations for the famous band, however, nor even for Dr. Karl Muck, though the distinguished Bavarian conductor, whose contract expires this spring, may have been wielding the baton for the last time in this city.

After Schubert's symphony in C major, which received a beautifully euphonious and transparent, though hardly an inspiring, performance at the beginning of the programme, all the musicians stood up, at their leader's request, in recognition of the applause. But the Boston orchestra's subscribers have come to consider that act a feature of every concert.

Georges Longy, veteran member of the organization, evoked much enthusiasm with d'Indy's Fantasia on French Folk Tunes, for oboe and orchestra, opus 31. Presumably, little of the approval was intended for the work itself—an admirably scored composition without a scintilla of inspiration.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture brought the matinee to a brilliant close.

Interested auditors were Arturo Toscanini and his musical associate in the Metropolitan Opera House, Giorgio Polacco.

BEATRICE HARRISON FAMED AS 'CELLIST

Philadelphia Orchestra Program Will Present American Singer as Soloist.

TSCHAIKOWSKY SYMPHONY

Other Musical Events That Will Be of Interest to Local Concert-Goers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its thirtieth consecutive season in Philadelphia to an end tomorrow evening with a concert in the Academy of Music. At the beginning of the season the management promised but three soloists—Amato, Bauer and Kreisler—all of whom have appeared. Notwithstanding this, there will be a soloist at this last concert, Beatrice Harrison, a young English violoncellist. Those who have heard Miss Harrison play agree that she has a remarkable talent. She took the gold medal given jointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music of London when she was 9 years old, the youngest who had ever received that honor, and when she was 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. A greater part of her studying was done with Hugo Becker, of Frankfort.

BEATRICE HARRISON

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert comprises the First Symphony of Brahms, in C minor, the "Faust" Overture of Wagner, Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme, for violoncello and orchestra, and Weber's Overture, "Der Freischuetz."

* *

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

MUSIC OF TODAY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Splendid Program at the Lyric Includes Composition By Local Artist.

Playing some remarkably significant music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave the fifth and last of its season's concerts in Baltimore at the Lyric last night. Features of the program were Miss Beatrice Harrison, violoncellist, as special soloist, and the performance for the first time in Baltimore of the theme and variations, in F major, by Gustav Strube, principal instructor of harmony and composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music. The audience filled the hall.

Dr. Muck's program was particularly acceptable because it contained music of the present day—music representative of the world as it is rather than as it has been. Of this there was much—more than was nessessary for a well-balanced program, in fact, but not too much by comparison with other programs the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given in this city this season. The program was also particularly agreeable because none of its numbers has been heard often in Baltimore.

Genius comes into the world in the most unexpected places. In Finland was born Jan Sibelius, whose Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Opus 39, was played last night. He is recorded to have composed four symphonies so far. His first was composed in 1899.

This first symphony of Sibelius' contains countless periods of marvelous expression. It contains a message and a warning for modern composers the world over. The message is the need of active, positive expression in music, the need of sharp visualization of musical thought. The warning is that much of musical composition is drifting into nothingness, into meaninglessness, through the passive, negative thoughts and methods of composers. Musical art today is going to sleep. It is sleeping. It is talking in its sleep. Sibelius' music is awake; and it is speaking rationally, earnestly. Who will hear? Who will heed?

Dvorak's Overture, Carnival, Opus 92, which closed the concert, was played most brilliantly by the orchestra. It is a lively, fervent piece, and shows Dvorak to better advantage than his familiar New World Symphony.

Miss Harrison played Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme, for violoncello, Opus 33, with orchestral accompaniment. While not wholly like the characteristic Tschaikowsky, the work is interesting, nevertheless, and frequently quite beautiful. Miss Harrison played it exceedingly well and in a manner which proved her to be a virtuoso. Her performance was most skilful and Dr. Muck directed the orchestra with such certainty and co-operation with the soloist as to allow her reading of the composition its full individuality. This individuality was full of poise, subtleties and charm.

Mr. Strube's new composition is wholly worthy music, and it was well received. After its performance Mr. Strube himself appeared upon the stage four times in response to continued applause. The work was presented well, even though its playing seemed a little cautious. It is scored for full orchestra and consists of an original theme, ten variations in many keys and a finale.

Mr. Strube was one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years and resigned his position with the orchestra to succeed Otis Bardwell Boise as teacher of composition at the Peabody Conservatory, after Mr. Boise's death. A large number of Mr. Strube's compositions have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Mr. Strube's ideas and his management of the orchestra in his new work are full of beauty and genuine skill. Baltimore is fortunate to have such an able resident musician.

J. N. H.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City

Date

Boston Orchestra Gives Its Closing Evening Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

DR. KARL MUCK and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last evening concert of their New York season at Carnegie Hall last night. Only the matinee for to-morrow remains for a farewell. Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy" was the principal number. It is so rarely played that it has the virtue of a new work, and it was played so superbly last night that one may be forgiven for overestimating its worth. Too prolix, of course, as are most musical works, not excluding those of the present day, it has a comprehensive ideal, intrinsic beauty and sound musicianship to recommend it, which the crowded and distinguished musical and society audience was not slow to recognize. If for nothing else it served to introduce a rare artist at the viola, Emile Ferir, the head of the orchestra's violist choir, who made an unmistakable impression as the soloist, representing Harold in the symphony.

Besides the programme held "Ormazd," a symphonic poem by our own Frederick Shepherd Converse, in which he strives to depict the eternal fight between light and darkness. It is cleverly orchestrated, superficially effective, and yet fails to reach the inner consciousness with a lightning bolt of inspiration. A third number was Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia after Shakespeare. All were played masterfully. Dr. Muck, who had insisted that Mr. Ferir share the honors with him in the Berlioz work, made the whole orchestra at the end rise to acknowledge the applause.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

EXPLAINS SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fique on Programme for Tonight at Academy by Bostonians.

Carl Fique last night in the lecture hall of the Academy of Music gave an explanatory recital of the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play tonight in the opera house of the Academy. Before a Brooklyn Institute audience Mr. Fique said that in this time of war it is pleasant to know one realm that is strictly neutral, the realm of music. This programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he said, shows one Russian surrounded by three Austrians. He referred to Tschaikowsky, whose "Variations on a Rococo Theme for the Violoncello" will be played by Miss Beatrice Harrison tonight with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Fique characterized Tschaikowsky as one of the greatest musicians of all times. Discussing Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Mr. Fique said that the composer did not give to his work that name; it was so called by the great pianist, Cramer. This was considered one of the greatest symphonies of olden times before the days of Beethoven. The "adagio" movement, Mr. Fique believes, is one of the most wonderful pieces ever written at any age. Mozart did not pose as a reformer nor did he have any pronounced principles to give to the world, but simply wrote as if he were inspired. He was the first man who made the orcehstra instruments sing. The minuet is a very characteristic piece of writing and seems to portray the Vienna of the later eighteenth century.

Mr. Fique then took up the overture to "Sakuntala," by Goldmark, which, he said, was written for the drama, and not for opera. This was followed by the "Carnival" overture of Dvorak, a brilliant composition, the name of which describes its whole contents, one mad whirl of masquerades and merriment.

Mr. Fique begged the indulgence of the audience because of an injury to one of the fingers of his right hand. Despite this handicap, he played with splendid technical skill and sympathetic insight themes and passages in illustration of his talk.

...mphony Orches...

Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night, presenting a programme that had one admirable quality, brevity. If such works as the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," must be given, it is advisable not to detain an audience too long. That it was beautifully played even those who did not hear it will admit, and Mr. Emile Férir deserved the applause he received. In his hands the viola is quite as interesting as a violin.

Had Mr. Converse adopted the Walt Whitman philosophy of life and "invited his soul to loaf," instead of developing technique by long and careful study of the composers, whose feelings and thoughts created individual means of expression, his "Ormazd" might have been something that it is not, convincing. Whenever the composer seemed to say something, the taunting fiend, memory, would make one say, "Where have I heard that?" and "Ormazd" was lost for the time being.

Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," did much in the cause of romantic music. It does not need "Harold in Italy" and "Ormazd" to give it interest by contrast, but it was fortunate for them that the exigencies of programme making put it last. Tchaikovsky made melodies do what others attempt with instrumental trickeries. It was the love duet so exquisitely played, that the audience took away, not the wanderings of Harold or the battle of Light and Darkness.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON

Gustav Strube's Composition Proves Theme Of Enduring Quality.

The last of the five concerts given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of peculiar interest, including, as it did, Sibelius' most characteristic symphony in E minor, and a work altogether new to Baltimore—"Variations on an Original Theme," by Gustav Strube.

The symphony has all the virtues and vices of the typical Slavonic school of today; it is highly imaginative, most original in orchestral coloring and crowded with picturesque and fanciful episodes; but, in spite of all these allurements, the impression left at the end is something indefinite, intangible and lacking in finality.

It is indeed much as if a series of problems were presented for solution and at the end remained still unsolved. This is particularly the case in the first and last movements, but in the opening of the second movement a really beautiful theme in a rhythm easily intelligible was a delightful relief. The scherzo is eccentric and bizarre more than anything else, and is only redeemed by a very striking and original horn episode in the middle.

Mr. Strube is to be heartily congratulated on his very musicianly and interesting composition. There are not many composers living today capable of writing a theme of such enduring quality, as will bear so many variations without monotony, but this is just what Mr. Strube has succeeded in doing; and then the variations themselves are remarkable specimens of their kind both in orchestral coloring and as illustrations of the latest developments of the evolution of variation form.

The soloist was Miss Beatrice Harrison, the young English violoncellist, who was heard in Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," unfortunately one of the most unoriginal and uncharacteristic works of this composer.

Miss Harrison has remarkable gifts; her playing is finished and most refined, and she has, moreover, a brilliant technic; but somehow she just fails to attain real greatness as a player through a certain want of virility and individuality, though, in all justice, it must be said that this might be accounted for to some extent by the nature of Tschaikowsky's composition.

The concert concluded with a particularly brilliant performance of Dvorak's "Carnival." Perhaps never before have we parted from Dr. Muck so unwillingly, for, with the single exception of Beethoven's "Overture to Egmont," his readings this season have been practically beyond criticism; and, what is more, he has, on the whole, been far more sympathetic in his programs than ever before, giving us a full share of the classics, and at the same time only the best of modern productions.

H. D. P.

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

FIQUE EXPLAINS TO-NIGHT'S BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Carl Fique gave an explanatory recital of the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play to-night, in the lecture hall of the Academy of Music last evening. This programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he said, shows one Russian surrounded by three Austrians. He referred to Tschaikowsky, whose variations on a rococo theme for the violoncello will be played by Miss Beatrice Harrison to-night with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Fique characterized Tschaikowsky as one of the greatest musicians of all times.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony was discussed by Mr. Fique, who said the composer did not give his work this name, but it was so called by the great pianist Cramer.

Then Mr. Fique took up the overture to "Sakuntala" by Goldmark which he said was written for the drama, not an opera.

Mr. Fique begged the indulgence of the audience because of an injury to one of the fingers of his right hand. Despite this handicap, he played with splendid technical skill and sympathetic insight themes and passages in illustration of his talk.

PRESS
...ess: New York City

MAR 21 1915

FAREWELL CONCERT GIVEN

Boston Orchestra Plays for Last Time This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There were no extraordinary demonstrations for the famous band, however, nor even for Dr. Karl Muck, though the distinguished Bavarian conductor, whose contract expires this spring, may have been wielding the baton for the last time in this city.

After Schubert's symphony in C major, which received a beautifully euphonious and transparent, though hardly an inspiring, performance at the beginning of the programme, all the musicians stood up, at their leader's request, in recognition of the applause. But the Boston orchestra's subscribers have come to consider that act a feature of every concert.

Georges Longy, veteran member of the organization, evoked much enthusiasm with d'Indy's Fantasia on French Folk Tunes, for oboe and orchestra, opus 31. Presumably, little of the approval was intended for the work itself—an admirably scored composition without a scintilla of inspiration.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture brought the matinee to a brilliant close.

Interested auditors were Arturo Toscanini and his musical associate in the Metropolitan Opera House, Giorgio Polacco.

BEATRICE HARRISON FAMED AS 'CELLIST

Philadelphia Orchestra Program Will Present American Singer as Soloist.

TSCHAIKOWSKY SYMPHONY

Other Musical Events That Will Be of Interest to Local Concert-Goers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its thirtieth consecutive season in Philadelphia to an end tomorrow evening with a concert in the Academy of Music. At the beginning of the season the management promised but three soloists—Amato, Bauer and Kreisler—all of whom have appeared. Notwithstanding this, there will be a soloist at this last concert, Beatrice Harrison, a young English violoncellist. Those who have heard Miss Harrison play agree that she has a remarkable talent. She took the gold medal given jointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music of London when she was 9 years old, the youngest who had ever received that honor, and when she was 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. A greater part of her studying was done with Hugo Becker, of Frankfort.

BEATRICE HARRISON

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert comprises the First Symphony of Brahms, in C minor, the "Faust" Overture of Wagner, Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme, for violoncello and orchestra, and Weber's Overture, "Der Freischuetz."

SUN

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21 1915

DR. CARL MUCK LEADS SCHUBE

tabl

Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Concert of Season at Carnegie Hall.

SOME REMARKS ON AUDIE

Philip Hale's Orange Colored phlet Supplies Hard Concrete Talk on Abstract Matters.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Let us admit that about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its last concert of the season yesterday afternoon, there is something of the sublime. The high position of the mother-in-law has been commented upon. She is a combination of the dignity of the mother and the majesty of the law.

There are a similar dignity and majesty about the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is not only orchestral and symphonic, but it is Bostonian. There is no need to say more. There is no need even to use the blessed word intellectual.

When you attend a Boston Symphony concert you notice two things. The first is that the house is always full—I refer to the quantity and not the state of the audience—and the second is that it is very serious. Also, if it is an evening concert there are a lot of men. Young people hardly ever go to a Boston Symphony concert. They scent, though unjustly, something educatory. But forgive them a natural timidity. Children are cruelly expose to education.

Another feature of these musical ceremonies is an orange-colored book, a pile of which is left, with careful carelessness, on a window ledge opposite the hall. This book is some forty pages long and is a guide to the music. Oh! Art, what misdeeds are committed in thy name!

Some people become so engrossed in the guide that they forget the music, as the ceaseless progress of the taximeter destroys the pleasure of your ride.

The current tome—"book" is hardly a term of sufficient volume—contains references to Zoroaster, Ahriman, Childe Harold, Duzahk, Garodman, the Fravashis, Mily Balakireff—which are not fortresses on the Dardanelles—the Girondists, Friar Laurence, Trepaks in the Arbatsky Palace, Hanslick, Donizetti, Phaeton, the Stone Man, Don Giovanni Apollo, Jean Paul Richter, Meyerbeer, Felix Weingartner, Edmonstoune Duncan, Millet, Tiersot, performing lions, "Signor" Caruso, John Evelyn, the diarist; Thomas Gray, the elegist; Tomaseo and Bellini, John Milton and Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson. The encyclopaedist is Philip Hale.

Real Conversational Manual.

It is stated that Bostonians of small education but ready acumen make a point of studying Mr. Hale's booklets, look up the references, and thus are able to maintain their places in public and private as intellectual conversationalists until the next booklet issues. The fund of conversation is never exhausted, for the encyclopedia of music cross references with miscellaneous learning and literature, appears weekly. Music is an abstract subject hard to discuss. Philip Hale supplies the concrete.

But the men whom you see at the evening concerts deserve particular notice. They are not the wild and wide-eyed, the Maenad Laired creatures you see at the ordinary recital, suggesting a pandemonium, and belonging apparently to some intermediate sex and almost fainting in delicious agony to a chord of the diminished fifth.

The men you see at Carnegie Hall on these Boston nights all look like keen-witted New England lawyers living on the quarrels, calamities and delusions of foolish New Yorkers. Whether the passions and emotions of music convey to those well-balanced and iron-sinewed hearts any flutter or thrill is a question that has never been discovered. But they listen to Brahms, Strauss and Wagner with the concentrated but frigid attention they might devote to the perusal of a legal document. They show adumbrations of enthusiasm at the last concert of the season. But they are always there and always pay for their seats.

No Deadheads.

And the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have succeeded in excluding the professional deadheads, those depressing chain gangs that through the indulgence of some impresarios and the encouragement of others become the leeches and vampires of entertainments. The women who attend—ah! that is another thing—their general tone is one of unquestioned refinement and understanding. They may be a bit stern and Puritanic. They may take their music slightly on its mathematical side, and they would never stand globbing and sobbing in the aisle-ways crying, as some did to Caruso on his farewell night, "Oh! Come back to us! Do no (sob) desert us." When everybody knew he was coming back in a few weeks.

No; among the women of the Boston Symphony audiences there are no Bacchantes, only Dianas and Heras, and a lot of tranquil-faced Pallas Athenes from the schools and colleges outside the city, poor hardworking women who have scraped and saved that they may come up to New York for the "Boston Saturday" afternoon, and after the humblest lunch attend the gloomy and frowsy old Carnegie Hall to lose themselves a while in that impersonal world of peace, fulfillment and exquisite visions that only music, and music as the Boston Symreveal. wistful look on these is something not to be forgotten. It ways makes me want to surrender seats to them.

Concerning yesterday's programme tle remains to be said. The symph was Schubert's in C major. It is l but its length is not felt.

We had something by M. Vin d'Indy, a pendant and an experiment without inspiration, and also Dvo

---

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Established: Lo

THE LYRIC

With a soloist of unusual interest, and with the performance of a new work by one of the leading musicians of Baltimore, the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 17, promises to be one of the best of the series. As already announced, the soloist will be Beatrice Harrison, the young English cellist, who has had such an extraordinary career. According to those best fitted to judge, Miss Harrison can be compared only with the unique Pablo Casals, who is amongst violoncellists what Kreisler is among violinists and Paderewski among pianists. She will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a Rococo theme.

Mr. Gustav Strube, whose new variations on an original theme, opens the second half of the program, has, since the fall of 1913, been chief teacher of theory and composition in the Peabody Conservatory. For 21 years previous to that he had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first number on the program will be the fine first symphony of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, and the final number will be Dvorak's merry Carnival overture.

BEATRICE HARRISON
SOLOIST
BOSTON SYM. ORCHESTRA
AT THE LYRIC
MARCH 17TH

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 20,

SYMPHONY PLAYERS TO 'FRISCO MAY 9

Special Train of Nine Cars —Four Days En Route.

Thirteen Exposition Programs— "Pops" to Begin June 3.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, carrying its entire membership of 100 men, will leave this city en route for the Panama Exposition by special train Sunday afternoon, May 9, at 2 o'clock. The trip will be made by way of Chicago, Omaha and Cheyenne. Four days will be consumed.

Notwithstanding the offers of local managers in cities along the way, there will be no intermediate concerts and no stopovers. The Panama Exposition retains the exclusive right of presenting the orchestra, and is said to have guaranteed to pay a large sum of money for each of the 13 concerts to be played on its grounds.

New sleeping cars have been promised. Five will be necessary. There will be a private car for Dr Muck and the executive staff, two baggage cars and a diner. This will be the first excursion of the orchestra west of Chicago since the early '90's, when a tour embraced Minneapolis, St Paul and St Louis. Nikisch was then conductor. The Western trip planned to precede the season, but abandoned of necessity because of the war, would have extended to Omaha.

Dr Muck has made programs which in no way lower the symphonic standards of the organization, notwithstanding the popular character of music usually associated with a World's Fair.

Because of this engagement, one which will enable thousands in the West to hear an orchestra whose fame has spread to them, the season of "Pop" concerts will not begin until Thursday, June 3.

WORLD
Address: New York City
Date 1915

tablished: Lon

Season of Orchestral Music Will Be Concluded This Week

By Pierre V. R. Key.

NEW YORK'S orchestral music season is nearing its close. Yesterday the Boston Symphony and the Russian Symphony organizations finished their regular subscription series. Last Tuesday afternoon the New York Symphony Society concluded its efforts here with the fifth master-composer programme. Next Saturday evening the Philharmonic will play for a local audience for the final occasion during 1914-1915. The music season still has five weeks to continue, the Metropolitan Opera farewell being scheduled for April 24. Between now and that time there will be a number of excellent miscellaneous concerts, and sufficient recitals of vocal and instrumental music to supply the waning demand of a public that has had an abundance of the best to be obtained in the art. But until next autumn there will be no serious symphonic concerts other than the five that Josef Stransky and his musicians are preparing to give during the seven days to come. Since the latter part of October, New York has been plentifully supplied with orchestral composition of the loftiest character. For the most part it has been performed in a satisfying manner, often with an artistic skill actually superlative. The Boston, the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony Orchestras have maintained the standard. Except for some lamentable programmes by the first mentioned organization, their achievements deserve high commendation.

Leading its associates, the Philharmonic has given the greatest amount of symphonic concerts in this city, the total number when it shall have finised its present labors being fifty. Next comes the New York Symphony, with forty-five; then the Boston musicians, who have played ten concerts, and finally the Russian society, with four. Nearly 250,000 tickets have been purchased by the public of Manhattan for admittance to these undertakings.

Symphony Audiences Growing

There was a time when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Carnegie Hall to single audiences of dispiritingly small proportions. Now the subscription sale is so large that few seats for any performance are obtainable at any price. These concerts have come to be musical functions; they attract cultivated assemblages which are musically superior to those who patronize the Metropolitan Opera.

At the beginning of this season the writer received an unsigned letter from "an orchestral manager" depicting the praise accorded this visiting orchestra and asking for a stronger support of the New York societies, who were declared to be the equals of the Boston musicians as an orchestral unit. "Help the home industry" was the cry of the correspondent; "it is equal to that from the Massachusetts city."

New York Orchestras Improving

While it is true that some people regard both the New York and the Philharmonic Orchestras as units approximately on a par with that endowed by Col. Higginson, connoisseurs recognize a difference which is to the advantage of the Boston players. And when the facts are scrutinized it is only natural that they should be; for until very recently neither of the two representative musical bodies of this city was financially as strong as the third, nor in a position making possible a gradual building up of so efficient an orchestral machine.

But the improvement of the Philharmonic personnel during the last two seasons has been so pronounced that it is now nearing the time when it may justly challenge the Boston. Its membership is larger than that of the New York Symphony, and when it is at its best its performances are of a very high order. The New York Symphony too is becoming seasoned; and since the endowment of Harry Harkness Flagler the days of financial struggling are past.

New York Music Patrons Face a Duty

The time has arrived for the thinking people of this city to extend a support to the Philharmonic and to the New York Symphony Society such as each now deserves. Encouragement must be consistently provided to any individual effort if it is to progress and endure. Neither the New York nor the Philharmonic receives a patronage in a season within many thousands of dollars of what should be extended. In place of a "sold out house" for every concert, these orchestras have to be content with occasional crowded auditoriums.

In a city of 5,000,000 inhabitants who are as cosmopolitan as Greater New York's, two first class symphony orchestras are needed to supply music of a character which cultivated men and women require. From eighty to 100 concerts in the course of twenty weeks' season are none too many to permit 10 per cent. of the population to hear an amount of the finest orchestral music which is positively necessary to those who claim intellectual superiority, and who are fast recognizing that a certain knowledge or familiarity with good music is no less essential than an acquaintance with literature, politics and progress in the sciences and philosophy.

Good Orchestral Music a Necessity

The best music, adequately performed, is a civilizing element in any progressive community. It stirs the finer side of human nature, it stimulates imagination and it feeds the intellect. While chamber music is admittedly the highest type of music, the compositions written for orchestra not only rank next, but they contain a quality of appeal not to be found in writing for string quartets or other chamber music bodies whose means of expression are not so broad as those of the orchestra, not so colorful and not so interesting.

During a year when Europe has been denuded of so much in the way of music, the United States—and particularly its metropolis—should be thankful for the abundance of what it has been provided with in this great art. To express that appreciation in the form of steady patronage would form no more convincing tribute of sincerity and it is to be hoped that 1915-1916 will see New York music patrons rallying to the standards of its own orchestras in that degree worthy both of the people themselves and of these admirable and uplifting institutions.

SUN

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City

MAR 2 1 1915

Date

DR. CARL MUCK LEADS SCHUBE

stabl

Boston Symphony Orchestra (Last Concert of Season at Carnegie Hall.

SOME REMARKS ON AUDIE

Philip Hale's Orange Colored phlet Supplies Hard Concrete Talk on Abstract Matters.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Let us admit that about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its last concert of the season yesterday afternoon, there is something of the sublime. The high position of the mother-in-law has been commented upon. She is a combination of the dignity of the mother and the majesty of the law.

There are a similar dignity and majesty about the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is not only orchestral and symphonic, but it is Bostonian. There is no need to say more. There is no need even to use the blessed word intellectual.

When you attend a Boston Symphony concert you notice two things. The first is that the house is always full—I refer to the quantity and not the state of the audience—and the second is that it is very serious. Also, if it is an evening concert there are a lot of men. Young people hardly ever go to a Boston Symphony concert. They scent, though unjustly, something educatory. But forgive them a natural timidity. Children are cruelly expose to education.

Another feature of these musical ceremonies is an orange-colored book, a pile of which is left, with careful carelessness, on a window ledge opposite the hall. This book is some forty pages long and is a guide to the music. Oh! Art, what misdeeds are committed in thy name!

Some people become so engrossed in the guide that they forget the music, as the ceaseless progress of the taximeter destroys the pleasure of your ride.

The current tome—"book" is hardly a term of sufficient volume—contains references to Zoroaster, Ahriman, Childe Harold, Duzahk, Garodman, the Fravashis, Mily Balakireff—which are not fortresses on the Dardanelles—the Girondists, Friar Laurence, Trepaks in the Arbatsky Palace, Hanslick, Donizetti, Phaeton, the Stone Man, Don Giovanni Apollo, Jean Paul Richter, Meyerbeer, Felix Weingartner, Edmonstoune Duncan, Millet, Tiersot, performing lions, "Signor" Caruso, John Evelyn, the diarist; Thomas Gray, the elegist; Tomaseo and Bellini, John Milton and Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson. The encyclopaedist is Philip Hale.

Real Conversational Manual.

It is stated that Bostonians of small education but ready acumen make a point of studying Mr. Hale's booklets, look up the references, and thus are able to maintain their places in public and private as intellectual conversationalists until the next booklet issues. The fund of conversation is never exhausted, for the encyclopedia of music cross references with miscellaneous learning and literature, appears weekly. Music is an abstract subject hard to discuss. Philip Hale supplies the concrete.

But the men whom you see at the evening concerts deserve particular notice. They are not the wild and wide-eyed, the Maenad Laired creatures you see at the ordinary recital, suggesting a pandemonium, and belonging apparently to some intermediate sex and almost fainting in delicious agony to a chord of the diminished fifth.

The men you see at Carnegie Hall on these Boston nights all look like keen-witted New England lawyers living on the quarrels, calamities and delusions of foolish New Yorkers. Whether the passions and emotions of music convey to those well-balanced and iron-sinewed hearts any flutter or thrill is a question that has never been discovered. But they listen to Brahms, Strauss and Wagner with the concentrated but frigid attention they might devote to the perusal of a legal document. They show adumbrations of enthusiasm at the last concert of the season. But they are always there and always pay for their seats.

No Deadheads.

And the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have succeeded in excluding the professional deadheads, those depressing chain gangs that through the indulgence of some impresarios and the encouragement of others become the leeches and vampires of entertainments. The women who attend—ah! that is another thing—their general tone is one of unquestioned refinement and understanding. They may be a bit stern and Puritanic. They may take their music slightly on its mathematical side, and they would never stand globbing and sobbing in the aisle-ways crying, as some did to Caruso on his farewell night, "Oh! Come back to us! Do no (sob) desert us." When everybody knew he was coming back in a few weeks.

No; among the women of the Boston Symphony audiences there are no Bacchantes, only Dianas and Heras, and a lot of tranquil-faced Pallas Athenes from the schools and colleges outside the city, poor hardworking women who have scraped and saved that they may come up to New York for the "Boston Saturday" afternoon, and after the humblest lunch attend the gloomy and frowsy old Carnegie Hall to lose themselves a while in that impersonal world of peace, fulfillment and exquisite visions that only music, and music as the Boston Symreveal. The wistful look on these ... It is something not to be forgotten. It ... ways makes me want to surrender seats to them.

Concerning yesterday's programme ... tle remains to be said. The symph was Schubert's in C major. It is l but its length is not felt.

We had something by M. Vin d'Indy, a pendant and an experiment without inspiration, and also Dvo

---

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Established: Lo

THE LYRIC

With a soloist of unusual interest, and with the performance of a new work by one of the leading musicians of Baltimore, the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 17, promises to be one of the best of the series. As already announced, the soloist will be Beatrice Harrison, the young English cellist, who has had such an extraordinary career. According to those best fitted to judge, Miss Harrison can be compared only with the unique Pablo Casals, who is amongst violoncellists what Kreisler is among violinists and Paderewski among pianists. She will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a Rococo theme.

Mr. Gustav Strube, whose new variations on an original theme, opens the second half of the program, has, since the fall of 1913, been chief teacher of theory and composition in the Peabody Conservatory. For 21 years previous to that he had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first number on the program will be the fine first symphony of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, and the final number will be Dvorak's merry Carnival overture.

BEATRICE HARRISON
SOLOIST
BOSTON SYM. ORCHESTRA
AT THE LYRIC
MARCH 17TH

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 20,

SYMPHONY PLAYERS TO 'FRISCO MAY 9

Special Train of Nine Cars —Four Days En Route.

Thirteen Exposition Programs— "Pops" to Begin June 3.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, carrying its entire membership of 100 men, will leave this city en route for the Panama Exposition by special train Sunday afternoon, May 9, at 2 o'clock. The trip will be made by way of Chicago, Omaha and Cheyenne. Four days will be consumed.

Notwithstanding the offers of local managers in cities along the way, there will be no intermediate concerts and no stopovers. The Panama Exposition retains the exclusive right of presenting the orchestra, and is said to have guaranteed to pay a large sum of money for each of the 13 concerts to be played on its grounds.

New sleeping cars have been promised. Five will be necessary. There will be a private car for Dr Muck and the executive staff, two baggage cars and a diner. This will be the first excursion of the orchestra west of Chicago since the early '90's, when a tour embraced Minneapolis, St Paul and St Louis. Nikisch was then conductor. The Western trip planned to precede the season, but abandoned of necessity because of the war, would have extended to Omaha.

Dr Muck has made programs which in no way lower the symphonic standards of the organization, notwithstanding the popular character of music usually associated with a World's Fair.

Because of this engagement, one which will enable thousands in the West to hear an orchestra whose fame has spread to them, the season of "Pop" concerts will not begin until Thursday, June 3.

WORLD
Address: New York City

Date

tablished: Lon

Season of Orchestral Music Will Be Concluded This Week

By Pierre V. R. Key.

NEW YORK'S orchestral music season is nearing its close. Yesterday the Boston Symphony and the Russian Symphony organizations finished their regular subscription series. Last Tuesday afternoon the New York Symphony Society concluded its efforts here with the fifth master-composer programme. Next Saturday evening the Philharmonic will play for a local audience for the final occasion during 1914-1915. The music season still has five weeks to continue, the Metropolitan Opera farewell being scheduled for April 24. Between now and that time there will be a number of excellent miscellaneous concerts, and sufficient recitals of vocal and instrumental music to supply the waning demand of a public that has had an abundance of the best to be obtained in the art. But until next autumn there will be no serious symphonic concerts other than the five that Josef Stransky and his musicians are preparing to give during the seven days to come. Since the latter part of October, New York has been plentifully supplied with orchestral composition of the loftiest character. For the most part it has been performed in a satisfying manner, often with an artistic skill actually superlative. The Boston, the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony Orchestras have maintained the standard. Except for some lamentable programmes by the first mentioned organization, their achievements deserve high commendation.

Leading its associates, the Philharmonic has given the greatest amount of symphonic concerts in this city, the total number when it shall have finised its present labors being fifty. Next comes the New York Symphony, with forty-five; then the Boston musicians, who have played ten concerts, and finally the Russian society, with four. Nearly 250,000 tickets have been purchased by the public of Manhattan for admittance to these undertakings.

Symphony Audiences Growing

There was a time when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Carnegie Hall to single audiences of dispiritingly small proportions. Now the subscription sale is so large that few seats for any performance are obtainable at any price. These concerts have come to be musical functions; they attract cultivated assemblages which are musically superior to those who patronize the Metropolitan Opera.

At the beginning of this season the writer received an unsigned letter from "an orchestral manager" deploring the praise accorded this visiting orchestra and asking for a stronger support of the New York societies, who were declared to be the equals of the Boston musicians as an orchestral unit. "Help the home industry" was the cry of the correspondent; "it is equal to that from the Massachusetts city."

New York Orchestras Improving

While it is true that some people regard both the New York and the Philharmonic Orchestras as units approximately on a par with that endowed by Col. Higginson, connoisseurs recognize a difference which is to the advantage of the Boston players. And when the facts are scrutinized it is only natural that they should be; for until very recently neither of the two representative musical bodies of this city was financially as strong as the third, nor in a position making possible a gradual building up of so efficient an orchestral machine.

But the improvement of the Philharmonic personnel during the last two seasons has been so pronounced that it is now nearing the time when it may justly challenge the Boston. Its membership is larger than that of the New York Symphony, and when it is at its best its performances are of a very high order. The New York Symphony too is becoming seasoned; and since the endowment of Harry Harkness Flagler the days of financial struggling are past.

New York Music Patrons Face a Duty

The time has arrived for the thinking people of this city to extend a support to the Philharmonic and to the New York Symphony Society such as each now deserves. Encouragement must be consistently provided to any individual effort if it is to progress and endure. Neither the New York nor the Philharmonic receives a patronage in a season within many thousands of dollars of what should be extended. In place of a "sold out house" for every concert, these orchestras have to be content with occasional crowded auditoriums.

In a city of 5,000,000 inhabitants who are as cosmopolitan as Greater New York's, two first class symphony orchestras are needed to supply music of a character which cultivated men and women require. From eighty to 100 concerts in the course of twenty weeks' season are none too many to permit 10 per cent. of the population to hear an amount of the finest orchestral music which is positively necessary to those who claim intellectual superiority, and who are fast recognizing that a certain knowledge or familiarity with good music is no less essential than an acquaintance with literature, politics and progress in the sciences and philosophy.

Good Orchestral Music a Necessity

The best music, adequately performed, is a civilizing element in any progressive community. It stirs the finer side of human nature, it stimulates imagination and it feeds the intellect. While chamber music is admittedly the highest type of music, the compositions written for orchestra not only rank next, but they contain a quality of appeal not to be found in writing for string quartets or other chamber music bodies whose means of expression are not so broad as those of the orchestra, not so colorful and not so interesting.

During a year when Europe has been denuded of so much in the way of music, the United States—and particularly its metropolis—should be thankful for the abundance of what it has been provided with in this great art. To express that appreciation in the form of steady patronage would form no more convincing tribute of sincerity and it is to be hoped that 1915-1916 will see New York music patrons rallying to the standards of its own orchestras in that degree worthy both of the people themselves and of these admirable and uplifting institutions.

SUN

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

MAR 21 1915

Date

DR. CARL MUCK LEADS SCHUBERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert of Season at Carnegie Hall.

SOME REMARKS ON AUDIENCES

Philip Hale's Orange Colored Pamphlet Supplies Hard Concrete Talk on Abstract Matters.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Let us admit that about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its last concert of the season yesterday afternoon, there is something of the sublime. The high position of the mother-in-law has been commented upon. She is a combination of the dignity of the mother and the majesty of the law.

There are a similar dignity and majesty about the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is not only orchestral and symphonic, but it is Bostonian. There is no need to say more. There is no need even to use the blessed word intellectual.

When you attend a Boston Symphony concert you notice two things. The first is that the house is always full—I refer to the quantity and not the state of the audience—and the second is that it is very serious. Also, if it is an evening concert there are a lot of men. Young people hardly ever go to a Boston Symphony concert. They scent, though unjustly, something educatory. But forgive them a natural timidity. Children are cruelly expose to education.

Another feature of these musical ceremonies is an orange-colored book, a pile of which is left, with careful carelessness, on a window ledge opposite the hall. This book is some forty pages long and is a guide to the music. Oh! Art, what misdeeds are committed in thy name!

Some people become so engrossed in the guide that they forget the music, as the ceaseless progress of the taximeter destroys the pleasure of your ride.

The current tome—"book" is hardly a term of sufficient volume—contains references to Zoroaster, Ahriman, Childe Harold, Duzahk, Garodman, the Fravashis, Mily Balakireff—which are not fortresses on the Dardanelles—the Girondists, Friar Laurence, Trepaks in the Arbatsky Palace, Hanslick, Donizetti, Phaeton, the Stone Man, Don Giovanni Apollo, Jean Paul Richter, Meyerbeer, Felix Weingartner, Edmonstoune Duncan, Millet, Tiersot, performing lions, "Signor" Caruso, John Evelyn, the diarist; Thomas Gray, the elegist; Tomaseo and Bellini, John Milton and Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

The encyclopaedist is Philip Hale.

Real Conversational Manual.

It is stated that Bostonians of small education but ready acumen make a point of studying Mr. Hale's booklets, look up the references, and thus are able to maintain their places in public and private as intellectual conversationalists until the next booklet issues. The fund of conversation is never exhausted, for the encyclopedia of music cross references with miscellaneous learning and literature, appears weekly. Music is an abstract subject hard to discuss. Philip Hale supplies the concrete.

But the men whom you see at the evening concerts deserve particular notice. They are not the wild and wide-eyed, the Maenad Laired creatures you see at the ordinary recital, suggesting a pandemonium, and belonging apparently to some intermediate sex and almost fainting in delicious agony to a chord of the diminished fifth.

The men you see at Carnegie Hall on these Boston nights all look like keen-witted New England lawyers living on the quarrels, calamities and delusions of foolish New Yorkers. Whether the passions and emotions of music convey to those well-balanced and iron-sinewed hearts any flutter or thrill is a question that has never been discovered. But they listen to Brahms, Strauss and Wagner with the concentrated but frigid attention they might devote to the perusal of a legal document. They show adumbrations of enthusiasm at the last concert of the season. But they are always there and always pay for their seats.

No Deadheads.

And the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have succeeded in excluding the professional deadheads, those depressing chain gangs that through the indulgence of some impresarios and the encouragement of others become the leeches and vampires of entertainments. The women who attend—ah! that is another thing—their general tone is one of unquestioned refinement and understanding. They may be a bit stern and Puritanic. They may take their music slightly on its mathematical side, and they would never stand globbing and sobbing in the aisle-ways crying, as some did to Caruso on his farewell night, "Oh! Come back to us! Do no (sob) desert us." When everybody knew he was coming back in a few weeks.

No; among the women of the Boston Symphony audiences there are no Bacchantes, only Dianas and Heras, and a lot of tranquil-faced Pallas Athenes from the schools and colleges outside the city, poor hardworking women who have scraped and saved that they may come up to New York for the "Boston Saturday" afternoon, and after the humblest lunch attend the gloomy and frowsy old Carnegie Hall to lose themselves a while in that impersonal world of peace, fulfillment and exquisite visions that only music, and music as the Boston Symreveal. The wistful look on these faces is something not to be forgotten. It always makes me want to surrender my seats to them.

Concerning yesterday's programme little remains to be said. The symphony was Schubert's in C major. It is long, but its length is not felt.

We had something by M. Vincent d'Indy, a pendant and an experimentalist without inspiration, and also Dvorak's Carnival Overture.

C

unusual interest, formance of a new the leading musicians the last concert of the ne Boston Symphony Or- which will be given in the heater next Wednesday even- arch 17, promises to be one e best of the series. As already nounced, the soloist will be Beat- ice Harrison, the young English cellist, who has had such an extraordinary career. According to those best fitted to judge, Miss Harrison can be compared only with the unique Pablo Casals, who is amongst violoncellists what Kreisler is among violinists and Paderewski among pianists. She will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a Rococo theme.

Mr. Gustav Strube, whose new variations on an original theme, opens the second half of the program, has, since the fall of 1913, been chief teacher of theory and composition in the Peabody Conservatory. For 21 years previous to that he had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first number on the program will be the fine first symphony of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, and the final number will be Dvorak's merry Carnival overture.

BEATRICE HARRISON
SOLOIST
BOSTON SYM. ORCHESTRA
AT THE LYRIC
MARCH 17TH

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 20,

SYMPHONY PLAYERS TO 'FRISCO MAY 9

Special Train of Nine Cars —Four Days En Route.

Thirteen Exposition Programs— "Pops" to Begin June 3.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, carrying its entire membership of 100 men, will leave this city en route for the Panama Exposition by special train Sunday afternoon, May 9, at 2 o'clock. The trip will be made by way of Chicago, Omaha and Cheyenne. Four days will be consumed.

Notwithstanding the offers of local managers in cities along the way, there will be no intermediate concerts and no stopovers. The Panama Exposition retains the exclusive right of presenting the orchestra, and is said to have guaranteed to pay a large sum of money for each of the 13 concerts to be played on its grounds.

New sleeping cars have been promised. Five will be necessary. There will be a private car for Dr Muck and the executive staff, two baggage cars and a diner. This will be the first excursion of the orchestra west of Chicago since the early '90's, when a tour embraced Minneapolis, St Paul and St Louis. Nikisch was then conductor. The Western trip planned to precede the season, but abandoned of necessity because of the war, would have extended to Omaha.

Dr Muck has made programs which in no way lower the symphonic standards of the organization, notwithstanding the popular character of music usually associated with a World's Fair.

Because of this engagement, one which will enable thousands in the West to hear an orchestra whose fame has spread to them, the season of "Pop" concerts will not begin until Thursday, June 3.

WORLD

New York City

ed: Lon

Season of Orchestral Music Will Be Concluded This Week

By Pierre V. R. Key.

NEW YORK'S orchestral music season is nearing its close. Yesterday the Boston Symphony and the Russian Symphony organizations finished their regular subscription series. Last Tuesday afternoon the New York Symphony Society concluded its efforts here with the fifth master-composer programme. Next Saturday evening the Philharmonic will play for a local audience for the final occasion during 1914-1915. The music season still has five weeks to continue, the Metropolitan Opera farewell being scheduled for April 24. Between now and that time there will be a number of excellent miscellaneous concerts, and sufficient recitals of vocal and instrumental music to supply the waning demand of a public that has had an abundance of the best to be obtained in the art. But until next autumn there will be no serious symphonic concerts other than the five that Josef Stransky and his musicians are preparing to give during the seven days to come. Since the latter part of October, New York has been plentifully supplied with orchestral composition of the loftiest character. For the most part it has been performed in a satisfying manner, often with an artistic skill actually superlative. The Boston, the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony Orchestras have maintained the standard. Except for some lamentable programmes by the first mentioned organization, their achievements deserve high commendation.

Leading its associates, the Philharmonic has given the greatest amount of symphonic concerts in this city, the total number when it shall have finised its present labors being fifty. Next comes the New York Symphony, with forty-five; then the Boston musicians, who have played ten concerts, and finally the Russian society, with four. Nearly 250,000 tickets have been purchased by the public of Manhattan for admittance to these undertakings.

Symphony Audiences Growing

There was a time when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Carnegie Hall to single audiences of dispiritingly small proportions. Now the subscription sale is so large that few seats for any performance are obtainable at any price. These concerts have come to be musical functions; they attract cultivated assemblages which are musically superior to those who patronize the Metropolitan Opera.

At the beginning of this season the writer received an unsigned letter from "an orchestral manager" depicting the praise accorded this visiting orchestra and asking for a stronger support of the New York societies, who were declared to be the equals of the Boston musicians as an orchestral unit. "Help the home industry" was the cry of the correspondent; "it is equal to that from the Massachusetts city."

New York Orchestras Improving

While it is true that some people regard both the New York and the Philharmonic Orchestras as units approximately on a par with that endowed by Col. Higginson, connoisseurs recognize a difference which is to the advantage of the Boston players. And when the facts are scrutinized it is only natural that they should be; for until very recently neither of the two representative musical bodies of this city was financially as strong as the third, nor in a position making possible a gradual building up of so efficient an orchestral machine.

But the improvement of the Philharmonic personnel during the last two seasons has been so pronounced that it is now nearing the time when it may justly challenge the Boston. Its membership is larger than that of the New York Symphony, and when it is at its best its performances are of a very high order. The New York Symphony too is becoming seasoned; and since the endowment of Harry Harkness Flagler the days of financial struggling are past.

New York Music Patrons Face a Duty

The time has arrived for the thinking people of this city to extend a support to the Philharmonic and to the New York Symphony Society such as each now deserves. Encouragement must be consistently provided to any individual effort if it is to progress and endure. Neither the New York nor the Philharmonic receives a patronage in a season within many thousands of dollars of what should be extended; in place of a "sold out house" for every concert, these orchestras have to be content with occasional crowded auditoriums.

In a city of 5,000,000 inhabitants who are as cosmopolitan as Greater New York's, two first class symphony orchestras are needed to supply music of a character which cultivated men and women require. From eighty to 100 concerts in the course of twenty weeks' season are none too many to permit 10 per cent. of the population to hear an amount of the finest orchestral music which is positively necessary to those who claim intellectual superiority, and who are fast recognizing that a certain knowledge or familiarity with good music is no less essential than an acquaintance with literature, politics and progress in the sciences and philosophy.

Good Orchestral Music a Necessity

The best music, adequately performed, is a civilizing element in any progressive community. It stirs the finer side of human nature, it stimulates imagination and it feeds the intellect. While chamber music is admittedly the highest type of music, the compositions written for orchestra not only rank next, but they contain a quality of appeal not to be found in writing for string quartets or other chamber music bodies whose means of expression are not so broad as those of the orchestra, not so colorful and not so interesting.

During a year when Europe has been denuded of so much in the way of music, the United States—and particularly its metropolis—should be thankful for the abundance of what it has been provided with in this great art. To express that appreciation in the form of steady patronage would form no more convincing tribute of sincerity and it is to be hoped that 1915-1916 will see New York music patrons rallying to the standards of its own orchestras in that degree worthy both of the people themselves and of these admirable and uplifting institutions.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1 4 1915
Established:

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its thirtieth consecutive season in Philadelphia to an end tomorrow evening with its fifth concert of the winter in the Academy of Music. The concert should be more than usually interesting. At the beginning of the season the management of the orchestra promised but three soloists, Messrs. Amato, Bauer and Kreisler, all of whom have appeared. Notwithstanding this there will be a soloist at this last concert, Beatrice Harrison, the young English violoncellist. Those who have heard Miss Harrison play agree that she has remarkable talent.

It seems to be accepted that Pablo Casals, the Spanish 'cellist, is a unique figure in the world of art. That being true, it is equally certain that Miss Harrison more nearly approaches him than any other practitioner of this instrument. Miss Harrison took the gold medal given jointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music of London when 9 years old, the youngest who had ever received that honor, and when she was 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. A greater part of her studying was done with Hugo Becker, of Frankfort.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert comprises the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, the "Faust" overture of Wagner, Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo theme for violoncello and orchestra and Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz."

BEATRICE HARRISON

Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tomorrow

SUNDAY POST, MARCH 28, 1915

Symphony's May Tour

The Boston Orchestra's Visit to San Francisco—Only Symphony Orchestra Invited to Appear There—Miss Duncan and Her New Dances—Letters of Giuseppe Verdi and Their Words of Wisdom for Rising Composers—Aborn Opera to Visit Boston—Other Musical Activities of Near Future

On May the 9th the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take train at the South station for San Francisco, where 13 performances under Dr. Muck's baton will be given. The programmes of the concerts, which include a number of the most successful performances and compositions of the past season in Boston, have been sent on, and all arrangements for the tour are completed. The orchestra will be gone for three weeks, after which the return to Boston will see the opening of the Pops season, which lasts through to the end of July.

The invitation of the Boston orchestra to visit the exposition was delivered at Symphony Hall last fall. The orchestra is the only Symphony Orchestra invited to appear at the exposition. The coming visit has aroused the keenest anticipation in the West—the real West, which the orchestra visits for the first time in its history, having up to this time gone only as far West as St. Paul, Minneapolis, St. Louis and Wisconsin. From cities and towns which are in many cases hundreds of miles distant from San Francisco, large companies of people have been arranging for transportation for the express purpose of attending the Boston Symphony concerts. Thus from Los Angeles, an over night journey by rail, 2000 people have already subscribed. Many cities to be passed on the route have applied for concerts. It has been impossible to gratify these requests, for the Boston orchestra's contract stipulates that the only performances to be given during the May tour are to be those at the exposition, but the number and the urgency of the requests that have been made are gratifying. They bear additional testimony to the reputation of the Boston Symphony and its present conductor. It is furthermore an interesting and not irrelevant fact that other well known orchestras, one in particular, which contemplated taking its chances on a western tour, have decided to abandon the project.

recognized

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 2 1 1915
Est 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert of the Season Gives Much Pleasure.

The last matinee concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Schubert's C major symphony, a fantasy on French folk tunes for oboe and orchestra by Vincent d'Indy and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. The solo player was George Longy, the first oboist of the orchestra. Mr. d'Indy's fantasy dates back to December 23, 1888, when it was first heard at a concert lamoureux in Paris. Mr. Longy first played it in this country with piano accompaniment in Boston in January, 1903. These historical facts are supplied by Mr. Hale's programme notes.

The fantasy is a work of simple purpose and of unquestionable charm. Mr. d'Indy writes frequently in moods of deep reflection and introspection, but this composition is full of quiet happiness of outdoors. It is melodious, of course, but the orchestral background is full o lights and shadows and the music as a whole may be heard with gentle pleasure appropriate to its character. Mr. Longy played the solo part admirably. His exhibition of tone and phrasing went hand in hand with his display of taste.

The Schubert symphony and the Dvorak overture were played by the Philharmonic Society under Josef Stransky on March 12. No great harm was done by the repetition yesterday, since both compositions, and more particularly the symphony, sounded like different works. A contemporary recently voiced a regret that in spite of the liberality of public spirited backers of local orchestras we had to receive such demonstrations from visitors. It is indeed a sorry tale.

Those who support musical doings dislike the telling of this tale. It brings them nothing but campaigns of slander, intimidation and espistolary vituperation. They would be glad for their own peace of mind to compel the Boston Symphony Orchestra to stay at home. But the general public is not interested in the peace of mind of the slaves of the concert mills, and so the Boston players will continue to come and the facts will have to be published.

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAR 1 4 1915
Establishe

Karl Muck, who will direct the Boston Symphony when it comes to the exposition in May, began his training as a chorus master in a small opera-house. He sets the highest value on this training, which, by the way, was that of Henry Hadley of the San Francisco Symphony and of Josiah Zuro, who is to lead the San Francisco opera. Here are some notable words from Dr. Muck:

"You must first examine any great composition with a view to discovering what we may call its dramatic point. Whatever the work is, whatever its school or its period, it has its apex, its climactic feature. With the operatic conductor of experience this becomes instinctive far more quickly than with the conductor who has had experience only in the concert hall. The constant habit, moreover, of making each phrase plastic in the orchestra and foreseeing the action and dialogue of conducting in such a way that the orchestra becomes as eloquent and as fluent in its expression as any soloist on the stage—this is sure to develop the modern conductor as no other kind of training can."

* *

that our choral

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date 1915
Est 1884

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra said farewell to us for the season at the Saturday afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall, to the regret of us all. Modest Altschuler and the Russian Symphony Orchestra followed suit in the same place on Saturday night. Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Society Orchestra, also in the same place, had made a last appearance a day or two earlier. By the end of this week, also at Carnegie Hall, Josef Stransky and the Philharmonic Society Orchestra will have said good-by. No more orchestral concerts until next autumn!

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date MAR 2 2 1915
E k, 1884

OTHER MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last New York concert of the season Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The large audience was treated to fine performances of Schubert's great C major symphony, d'Indy's fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk tunes, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Georges Longy displayed his extraordinary tone and technical skill in the d'Indy piece. The operas sung at the Metropolitan Saturday were three—"Die Walküre" in the afternoon and "L'Oracolo" and "Pagliacci" in the evening.

The Philharmonic Society devoted its last Sunday concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to Wagner. In Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon that accomplished 'cellist, Joseph Malkin, gave a recital, assisted by his brother, Manfred Malkin, the pianist. John McCormack crowded the Century Opera House in the evening with a programme largely made up of ballads. The soloists at the "opera concert" last evening were Josef Hofmann, Mme Gadski, and Mr. Middleton.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAR 14 1915
Establis

BOSTON SYMPHONY CARRIES IMMENSE INSTRUMENTATION

Loring Club to Be Heard in New Works This Month—Kreisler Publishes War Volume.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has more artists under annual engagement than any orchestra in the world. The usual size is eighty-five, besides the conductor, but in order to maintain its high standard it has been the policy or this organization to keep men permanently engaged, even if they only play a few times during the season, and the orchestra is therefore equipped to play the most modern works without calling in extra help.

The entire personnel of the body will come to San Francisco, and Dr. Muck is now at work on the programme, which will soon be announced. The instrumentation is as follows: Thirty violins, ten violas, ten cellos, eight double-basses, sixteen wood winds, seventeen brass players, two harps and eight men in the percussion department and extras.

* * * *

Newspap-

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date MAR 2 2 1915
Establi 1884

Other Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its season here on Saturday afternoon with a better programme than this organiaztion usually offers to its New York subscribers. It included two masterworks, Schubert's C major symphony and Dvorák's "Carnaval" overture; and in view of this circumstance one could pardon the weakness of D'Indy's fantasia for orchestra and oboe, which was the third number. George Longy played the solo part beautifully, and the orchestra was at its best throughout the concert.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 1 4 19[illegible]
Established:

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its thirtieth consecutive season in Philadelphia to an end tomorrow evening with its fifth concert of the winter in the Academy of Music. The concert should be more than usually interesting. At the beginning of the season the management of the orchestra promised but three soloists, Messrs. Amato, Bauer and Kreisler, all of whom have appeared. Notwithstanding this there will be a soloist at this last concert, Beatrice Harrison, the young English violoncellist. Those who have heard Miss Harrison play agree that she has remarkable talent.

It seems to be accepted that Pablo Casals, the Spanish 'cellist, is a unique figure in the world of art. That being true, it is equally certain that Miss Harrison more nearly approaches him than any other practitioner of this instrument. Miss Harrison took the gold medal given jointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music of London when 9 years old, the youngest who had ever received that honor, and when she was 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. A greater part of her studying was done with Hugo Becker, of Frankfort.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert comprises the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, the "Faust" overture of Wagner, Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo theme for violoncello and orchestra and Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz."

BEATRICE HARRISON
Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tomorrow

SUNDAY POST, MARCH 28, 1915

Symphony's May Tour

The Boston Orchestra's Visit to San Francisco—Only Symphony Orchestra Invited to Appear There—Miss Duncan and Her New Dances—Letters of Giuseppe Verdi and Their Words of Wisdom for Rising Composers—Aborn Opera to Visit Boston—Other Musical Activities of Near Future

On May the 9th the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take train at the South station for San Francisco, where 13 performances under Dr. Muck's baton will be given. The programmes of the concerts, which include a number of the most successful performances and compositions of the past season in Boston, have been sent on, and all arrangements for the tour are completed. The orchestra will be gone for three weeks, after which the return to Boston will see the opening of the Pops season, which lasts through to the end of July.

The invitation of the Boston orchestra to visit the exposition was delivered at Symphony Hall last fall. The orchestra is the only Symphony Orchestra invited to appear at the exposition. The coming visit has aroused the keenest anticipation in the West—the real West, which the orchestra visits for the first time in its history, having up to this time gone only as far West as St. Paul, Minneapolis, St. Louis and Wisconsin. From cities and towns which are in many cases hundreds of miles distant from San Francisco, large companies of people have been arranging for transportation for the express purpose of attending the Boston Symphony concerts. Thus from Los Angeles, an over night journey by rail, 2000 people have already subscribed. Many cities to be passed on the route have applied for concerts. It has been impossible to gratify these requests, for the Boston orchestra's contract stipulates that the only performances to be given during the May tour are to be those at the exposition, but the number and the urgency of the requests that have been made are gratifying. They bear additional testimony to the reputation of the Boston Symphony and its present conductor. It is furthermore an interesting and not irrelevant fact that other well known orchestras, one in particular, which contemplated taking its chances on a western tour, have decided to abandon the project.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 1
Est 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert of the Season Gives Much Pleasure.

The last matinee concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Schubert's C major symphony, a fantasy on French folk tunes for oboe and orchestra by Vincent d'Indy and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. The solo player was George Longy, the first oboist of the orchestra. Mr. d'Indy's fantasy dates back to December 23, 1888, when it was first heard at a concert lamoureux in Paris. Mr. Longy first played it in this country with piano accompaniment in Boston in January, 1903. These historical facts are supplied by Mr. Hale's programme notes.

The fantasy is a work of simple purpose and of unquestionable charm. Mr. d'Indy writes frequently in moods of deep reflection and introspection, but this composition is full of quiet happiness of outdoors. It is melodious, of course, but the orchestral background is full o lights and shadows and the music as a whole may be heard with gentle pleasure appropriate to its character. Mr. Longy played the solo part admirably. His exhibition of tone and phrasing went hand in hand with his display of taste.

The Schubert symphony and the Dvorak overture were played by the Philharmonic Society under Josef Stransky on March 12. No great harm was done by the repetition yesterday, since both compositions, and more particularly the symphony, sounded like different works. A contemporary recently voiced a regret that in spite of the liberality of public spirited backers of local orchestras we had to receive such demonstrations from visitors. It is indeed a sorry tale.

Those who support musical doings dislike the telling of this tale. It brings them nothing but campaigns of slander, intimidation and espistolary vituperation. They would be glad for their own peace of mind to compel the Boston Symphony Orchestra to stay at home. But the general public is not interested in the peace of mind of the slaves of the concert mills, and so the Boston players will continue to come and the facts will have to be published.

From [illegible]
Address [illegible]ncisco, Cal.
Date
Established

Karl Muck, who will direct the Boston Symphony when it comes to the exposition in May, began his training as a chorus master in a small operahouse. He sets the highest value on this training, which, by the way, was that of Henry Hadley of the San Francisco Symphony and of Josiah Zuro, who is to lead the San Francisco opera. Here are some notable words from Dr. Muck:

"You must first examine any gr[illegible] composition with a view to discovering what we may call its dramatic point. Whatever the work is, whatever its school or its period, it has its apex, its climactic feature. With the operatic conductor of experience this becomes instinctive far more quickly than with the conductor who has had experience only in the concert hall. The constant habit, moreover, of making each phrase plastic in the orchestra and foreseeing the action and dialogue of conducting in such a way that the orchestra becomes as eloquent and as fluent in its expression as any soloist on the stage—this is sure to develop the modern conductor as no other kind of training can."

* *

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date
Est 1884

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra said farewell to us for the season at the Saturday afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall, to the regret of us all. Modest Altschuler and the Russian Symphony Orchestra followed suit in the same place on Saturday night. Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Society Orchestra, also in the same place, had made a last appearance a day or two earlier. By the end of this week, also at Carnegie Hall, Josef Stransky and the Philharmonic Society Orchestra will have said good-by. No more orchestral concerts until next autumn!

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date 2 '15
Est k, 1884

OTHER MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last New York concert of the season Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The large audience was treated to fine performances of Schubert's great C major symphony, d'Indy's fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk tunes, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Georges Longy displayed his extraordinary tone and technical skill in the d'Indy piece. The operas sung at the Metropolitan Saturday were three—"Die Walküre" in the afternoon and "L'Oracolo" and "Pagliacci" in the evening.

The Philharmonic Society devoted its last Sunday concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to Wagner. In Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon that accomplished 'cellist, Joseph Malkin, gave a recital, assisted by his brother, Manfred Malkin, the pianist. John McCormack crowded the Century Opera House in the evening with a programme largely made up of ballads. The soloists at the "opera concert" last evening were Josef Hofmann, Mme Gadski, and Mr. Middleton.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date
Establis

BOSTON SYMPHONY CARRIES IMMENSE INSTRUMENTATION

Loring Club to Be Heard in New Works This Month—Kreisler Publishes War Volume.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has more artists under annual engagement than any orchestra in the world. The usual size is eighty-five, besides the conductor, but in order to maintain its high standard it has been the policy or this organization to keep men permanently engaged, even if they only play a few times during the season, and the orchestra is therefore equipped to play the most modern works without calling in extra help.

The entire personnel of the body will come to San Francisco, and Dr. Muck is now at work on the programme, which will soon be announced. The instrumentation is as follows: Thirty violins, ten violas, ten cellos, eight double-basses, sixteen wood winds, seventeen brass players, two harps and eight men in the percussion department and extras.

* * * *

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date MAR 2 1915
Establi

Other Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its season here on Saturday afternoon with a better programme than this organiaztion usually offers to its New York subscribers. It included two masterworks, Schubert's C major symphony and Dvorák's "Carnaval" overture; and in view of this circumstance one could pardon the weakness of D'Indy's fantasia for orchestra and oboe, which was the third number. George Longy played the solo part beautifully, and the orchestra was at its best throughout the concert.

WORLD

ADVERTISER,

MARCH 27

VARIED SYMPHONY PROGRAM PLEASES

MODERN AND CLASSICAL BOTH REPRESENTED

Vocal Soloist Adds to Pleasure—Borodin, Beethoven and Brahms

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME

Borodin—Symphony in B minor, No. 2
Beethoven—Three songs with Orchestra.
Soloist, Miss Elena Gerhardt.
Reger—Four Tone-pictures for Orchestra.
Brahms—Three Songs with Orchestra.
Miss Elena Gerhardt.
Weber—"Oberon" Overture.

In such a varied programme everybody must have found something to his taste, and the catholic auditor must have found some pleasure in almost all of it. Dr. Muck followed his usual scheme of neutralizing the moderns by giving classical selections after their works. Thus Borodin was ameliorated by Beethoven, and Reger by Weber and Brahms. We are never very anxious for vocalists in these concerts, but such a musicianly singer as Elena Gerhardt is always welcome, and as the Lieder had orchestral accompaniment, the continuity of the programme was rather enhanced than disturbed by her work, although we would have preferred a smaller frame than Symphony Hall for her work.

Borodin has his music by legitimate inheritance, for he claims direct descent from King David (we will not dwell upon such an ancient family scandal). It is wonderful how many Russian composers have a double career. We do not mean of the Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde type, but duality of occupation. Many of them have been officials in the Army or Navy, but Borodin was a success both in Chemistry and in Music, sciences which seem as far apart as the poles.

Good Impression

His B minor symphony made a very good impression yesterday afternoon. It is somewhat like Mahler's works in giving very dramatic effects without, however, explaining their definite purport. It is programme music with the programme left untold. But it is, thank heaven, thoroughly Russian, and he builds on a sure foundation who uses the folk-music of his native land. Especially in the third movement do we find the flavor of Russian folk-music, even though the themes are Borodin's own. But the very portico of this edifice, the beginning of the first movement, is majestic enough, with the lofty proclamation of the chief theme by the whole orchestra, in unison and with thunderous power, and at the end, after many changes, it comes back grandly, in augmentation. The sudden changes, the abrupt transitions, the sharp contrasts, all remind of the style of Mahler, although the material is very different from the works of that composer, and we think better.

[illegible] ment has all the barbaric [illegible] olden time, and one can almost see the great Boyars in gorgeous array. Still more does one find a Russian flavor in the Andante. Here Borodin has attempted to picture the bards and minstrels of his country. The contrast with the impetuous Scherzo, that preceded, was very effective. Here, too, the mysterious pizzicato effects seemed to intimate strange events which the auditor was obliged to guess at, since the composer gave no clue, and there was a picturesque monotony. The restless finale, with its free use of 5/4 rhythm, seemed less effective than the first movement, but Borodin does not attempt the fierce revelry with which Tschaikowsky generally ends a symphonic work. Dr. Muck did not over-inflate the Finale, but gave it with broad dignity.

After all, in Music, the contents are more than the workmanship. Reger showed infinitely more learned skill than Borodin, yet we preferred the Russian because of originality, intensity and enthusiasm. And Borodin's symphony might well teach a lesson to many a modern composer, for he has something to say, and, having said it, he actually stops!! We get the real flavor of Orientalism in much music nowadays. One cannot help thinking back upon the time when Beethoven and Mozart wrote so-called Turkish music which was about as Turkish as Pumpernickel, or when Beethoven took a Russian theme in his Rasoumoffsky quartettes and made it sound as if "made in Germany."

Beethoven's Songs

And while we are finding spots upon the sun let us add that we are not devout admirers of Beethoven's songs. They are often merely instrumental in character ("Adelaide" is but a violoncello solo in disguise) and are not equal to the vocal offerings of Schubert, Schumann, Robert Franz, Brahms, or Hugo Wolf. But Elena Gerhardt sang them with almost convincing power and with good quality of voice. Yet the succeeding Brahms numbers seemed the more delightful of the two sets. The breadth of the ending of Beethoven's "Die Ehre Gottes" won the most applause. The accompaniment was skilfully repressed by Dr. Muck, yet on the whole we longed for the singer in a much smaller hall and with a piano.

Boecklin seems to have inspired more music than any other painter. Of course one may remember how Liszt was inspired by Kaulbach, how Paine wrote an Island Fantasy after a picture by Appleton Brown, etc., etc., but this painter has caused Rachmaninoff, Weingartner, Huber, and Reger, to try to translate pictures into tones. Of all of these Rachmaninoff has achieved the greatest result. There is nothing like the portentous and awful character of the Russian's setting of the [illegible] and music as the [illegible]ston Sym-

"Isle of the Dead" in the Reger tone-poems, although he has attempted the same subject, for all of those who set Boecklin to music seem to make at least one excursion to this island. More interesting was "The Fiddling Hermit," which introduced Mr. Noack in an important obbligato. Here at first there were suggestions of Gregorian tones that fitted well to the picture, but later on the hermit fiddled in a more heterodox fashion. A Puritan auditor might say that Reger tried to prove that the fiddle was a means of falling from Grace. But the performance was brilliant, even if it by no means suggested the listening angels in the painting.

Best of the set, perhaps because the most palpable, was the Bacchanale. Boecklin's picture is not at all squeamish, and the music was as frankly abandoned as Chopin's wicked song on a similar topic. What the contrapuntal treatment in the centre meant we cannot decipher, but it did not long interfere with the hiccoughs (in syncopation) or the wild outcries of the drunken orgie. We are glad that Schoenberg has not discovered this picture.

"The Sport of the Waves" suggested neither surges nor beauty; the "Isle of the Dead" was almost an insult after Rachmaninoff's mighty setting. The kettledrum was used in it in the conventional manner to picture dread and suspense, and at one time they had quite a disturbance upon the island. It is evident that 50 Reger's could not picture one Boecklin, for Boecklin had a sense of beauty! Perhaps the final Bacchanale was a suggestion that the characters, having heard the preceding music, had taken to drink.

Then came the Brahms songs as a sedative, and then the concert ended brilliantly with Weber's "Oberon" overture. Sir Huon blew his horn and the muted violin fairies responded to his call, the little fairy march of the introduction and the concluding crash, were all a good introduction. Every Weber work has more horns than a dilemma, and the instruments were well shaded yesterday. The brilliancy of the chief theme, the development and the Coda was done full justice to and the contrasted tenderness of the subordinate theme, given by clarinette, was very effective, and is one of the earliest good clarinette solos in musical history. Altogether the nub of this concert was in its first number, and the Borodin symphony outshone all the rest of the programme.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 27,

SONGS AND POEMS AT SYMPHONY

Miss Gerhardt, Soloist—Four Pieces by Reger

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Elena Gerhardt, mezzo-soprano, was soloist. Four tone poems by Max Reger after pictures by Arnold Boecklin were played for the first time here. Weber's overture to Oberon concluded the programme.

MISS GERHARDT'S SINGING

Miss Gerhardt sang songs by Beethoven and Brahms. The songs of Beethoven are not among the best songs that a composer who was not at his best as a composer of songs produced. "Wonne der Wehmut," "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" from the Egmont music, and "Glory to God in Nature"—these songs illustrate sadly the passage of time. How many thousands of times have they been sung in the past, and what inspiration have they been to thousands of hearts! And how sentimental, lachrymose and weak they were yesterday. This despite the remarkable beauty and freshness of Miss Gerhardt's voice, and her evident sincerity in interpretation. Her tones are youthful and golden, and she is an intelligent singer.

But, unfortunately, she is not a singer with a style. Miss Gerhardt's sentiment is that of many other singers of her race. Often it is convincing and moving by its depth and earnestness, and she has before this sung songs by Wolf and other moderns in an effective manner. The fact remains that she is not a singer of striking individuality. The voice is there; the heart is there. Miss Gerhardt has worked seriously and honorably, and holds a high place in European concert halls. For all that, the tone that searches and illumines, and imparts a kindling fire to the text, and runs the gamut of a hundred emotions and effects—that tone is not hers, nor is hers the incisive, telling manner of those singers who by means of dramatic diction often accomplish what singers with more beautiful voices fail to achieve.

This was particularly the case—in fact it was for us a rare instance of directly bad taste upon Miss Gerhardt's part when she sang the "Immer leiser" of Brahms so slowly that it dropped apart, and one unfamiliar with the lied would have had not the slightest notion of the turn that the melodic line was to take, or whether he was listening to the beginning, the middle, or climax of one of Brahms most [illegible] inspirations. "Wir wandelten, wir Zwei," was more characteristic and more fortunately treated. The sentiment was arch and tender without being superficial or frivolous, and there was the thought of a tenderness deeper than that betrayed by the mere words of the poem. It was as the speech of a lover who conceals or makes light of the intensity of his emotion.

"Auf dem Kirchofe" is in its first part one of Brahms most dark and dramatic songs, and of all the three songs that Miss Gerhardt sang it is the only one which justifies the orchestration of Reger. The other songs are more effective with the original piano accompaniment.

Miss Gerhardt was applauded with enthusiasm, especially after her first group of songs, and repeatedly recalled. Nearly everyone is applauded and recalled with enthusiasm at these concerts, including artists of far less distinction and reputation than Miss Gerhardt. It is probably because of the healthy belief of Symphony patrons that whatever occurs the Boston Symphony can do no wrong. And a very proper feeling, too.

Borodine's symphony, which delighted Liszt in the 70's, is vital and colorful music today. There is much of Borodine's opera "Prince Igor" in it. It is gorgeous, virile Russian music, by one of the raciest of Russian composers.

It was undoubtedly the finest moment of the concert, for Reger's pieces are irritatingly, uninspired, facile, and lumpish. It should be understood that Max Reger, a composer who composes a great deal too much, so that much that is good is snowed under a great deal that is good for the ash-barrel, can be facile and lumpish at the same time. It is not unnatural for him to proceed over pages and pages just as the cow goes over the meadow, placing her foot in every puddle. One understands that Reger girded up his loins one morning after breakfast. "Let's see, what shall I compose this a. m.?" There lay a book of prints of Boeklin pictures, just received from an artist friend. "Why not . . . after Reger?" No sooner said than done.

For the picture "The Hermit Fiddling Before the Statue of the Madonna," he dabbles in old modes. Very plausible. Too plausible, in fact. "The Sport of the Waves" is a clumsy attempt at naivette and orchestral impressionism. "The Island of the Dead" is annoying to those acquainted with the remarkable tone poem of Sergie Rachmaninoff, whose imaginative and introspective nature fitted him well for that composition. Reger takes his island less seriously. There is no comparison between any measure of his piece and that marvellous moment in Rachmaninoff's composition when, after a long sustained tone of the horn, the violas intone the theme of the "Dies Irae." Reger's music is distressingly commonplace, conventional, in part Tschaikowsky, and not to spare the last stroke, with an apotheosis at the end of the piece after the pet method of the underpaid composer of theatre music. How could a man treat thus the superb fantasy of Boecklin? But then—Reger and Boecklin! You might as well talk of Dante and Pierpont Morgan.

The Bacchanale has a brilliant conclusion, but it is a Bacchanale of counterpoint and orchestration. It is forced. We do not object to brutishness of certain Russian composers, of Berlioz and his brigands, of Charpentier and his Bohemians, Puccini and ruffians, or any other composers who feels as he writes and writes as he feels. But this is all show, and all superficial, and all composed by the peck. It is not the Reger of the 100 variations on a theme of Hiller, nor yet of the Tragic overture, nor even of a harmless serenade or two offering a sirup of Bach and Brams. It is simply Reger turning out another batch for the publisher. Reger diluted, non-essential. The original essence is crude enough.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

MARCH 27, 1915.

SYMPHONY GIVES SUPERB CONCERT

Miss Gerhardt's Singing One of Several Notable Features.

Elena Gerhardt is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts and the orchestral novelty consists of four tone poems by Max Reger, which were suggested by the Boecklin pictures, "The Fiddling Hermit," "Sport of the Waves," "The Island of the Dead" and "Bacchanale."

But these did not overwhelm the other attractions. Borodin's second symphony is one of the finest products of the Russian school, and the brilliancy of Weber's "Oberon" overture, the final number on the program, is time-honored.

Miss Gerhardt's beautiful voice and artistic manner of singing earned much applause for her at yesterday's concert. She sang three Beethoven songs, "Wonne der Wehmut," "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur," also three songs by Brahms, "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," "Wit wandelten, wir Zwei" and "Auf dem Kirchofe."

The Reger tone poems are works of uneven effectiveness. The tone painting of the hermit playing the violin before the statue of the Madonna is true program-music. The other pieces have fairly been criticized as being mere sketches of moods.

The Borodin is a superb tone picture of feudal Russia, with knights and troubadours in gala mood, and the fine performance of the work was keenly enjoyed yesterday.

Next week Dr. Muck will conduct Liszt's "Faust Symphony" for the second time this season. The earlier performances were so enthusiastically received that the repetition will be welcomed all around. Paul Draper will sing the solo and the Apollo Club will sing the choral music. The other number on the program will be a new work for organ, trumpets and trombone, written by Frederick Klose.

BOSTON HERALD,

MARCH 27,

18TH PUBLIC REHEARSAL

Dr. Muck Conducts Afternoon Program of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 18th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in B minor	Borodin
Three songs with orchestra Wonne der Wehmut. Freudvoll und leidvoll, from the music to "Egmont." Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur.	Beethoven
Four tone poems for orchestra (after Boecklin)	Reger
Three songs with orchestra Immer leiser fird mein Schlummer. Wir wandelten, wir Zwei. Auf dem Kirchofe.	Brahms
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber

Reger's tone poems, heard in Boston for the first time, were inspired by pictures of Arnold Boecklin: "The Hermit Fiddling Before the Statue of the Madonna," "Sport of the Waves," "The Island of the Dead" and "Bacchanale. They were performed for the first time at Essen in 1913. Pictures by this Swiss painter have led other composers to write music. Hans Huber's "Beoecklin" symphony, Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" and Weingartner's "Elysian Fields" have been heard here.

It has been said that Reger's aim was to paint moods and not to unite program music. If this is so he caught the religious mood of the Hermit picture by suggesting ecclesiastical tones used in the divine service. The picture compelled him to employ a solo violin. These solo passages were finely played by Mr. Noack in the absence of Mr. Witek, but it would not be easy to imagine the Holy Mother pleased by the strains if we did not remember that She accepted gratefully the pious homage of the Jongleur that in the legend seemed irreverent to the good monks The whole tone poem, like the three others, is distinctly work of the head; without genuine feeling, true fancy. "Sport of the Waves" is more panoramic. The more melodious measures have a Mendelssohnian flavor.

The first impressions made by Boecklin's "Island of the Dead" are awful stillness—absolute rest. The picture is the most familiar of the four chosen by Reger, who seems to have wholly misconceived, in this instance, the sentiment of the painting. Many of us remember Rachmaninoff's music; how admirably he reproduced this picture in tones, how there was the feeling of a mysterious hush, a solemn quiet unbroken even by the rowed boat with its burden—that is, when the composer conducted, for Mr. Fiedler afterwards made a sad mess of it and turned at once the tranquil sea into storm-tossed billows. Rachmaninoff introduced an episode of mighty lamentation, but in Reger's music the wailing begins almost immediately and there is little calm, no suggestion of the remote island, visited only by the shrouded in the coffin with attendant mourner. Nor is there in this setting a new or impressive note of grief.

The Bacchanale is the least significant of the four pieces. Boecklin's picture might have been painted by a Teniers of Italy; for these revellers before the wine shop near Rome are the tosspots of Teniers and Jan Steen. Perhaps Boecklin wished to show the contrast between the landscape and the lords of the earth. His Bacchanale has not the sacred frenzy; it is neither heroic nor delirious. There is no vinous exaltation; there is merely a lively movement, noisy, crashing; sportive only as the elephant of Milton was mirthful.

These tone poems are another proof of Reger's fatal fluency, his facility in routine, his thick instrumentation, his lack of imagination.

Borodin, the chemist, had in no way the training of Reger or his contrapuntal birthright, but how vivid and vital his symphony sounded in comparison with the four-tone poems. The Russians say that this symphony has a truly national character, yet it appeals to the musically sensitive beyond the boundaries. It is oriental in the repetition of a phrase, the insistence of motive or rhythm, the glaring colors. There is the barbaric pomp, the wild and melancholy beauty of a people's song, the savage din of triumphant feasters. In comparison, Tschaikowsky is a timid cosmopolite with a modern and snivelling dread of death. Glazounoff is a thoroughly trained and reactionary German professor.

The performance was a brilliant one, and on the poems of Reger an equal care was bestowed by Dr. Muck and the players.

Miss Gerhardt was evidently suffering from a cold nor was her choice of songs fortunate. The orchestration of the accompaniments did not make the songs more appropriate to the large hall. Mr. Nikisch, who orchestrated two of the airs by Beethoven, showed a more discreet taste than Reger, who was clumsy in his treatment of Brahms's "Auf dem Kirchofe." Miss Gerhardt took "Immer leise" at so slow a pace that the beauty of the melody and the pathos of the sentiment were lost. She was sentimental in Beethoven's "Wonne der Wehmut," which is an example of Beethoven at his weakest, and explosive in the song from "Egmont." She was more effective in "Auf dem Kirchofe" and "Die Ehre Gottes."

The program of next week will consist of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony (Apollo Club and Mr. Draper, tenor); Klose's Prelude and Double Fugue for organ, trumpets and trombones (Mr. Marshall, organist).

MONITOR,

MARCH 27, 1915

BORODIN WORK AND REGER TONE POEMS ON PROGRAM FOR SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

SYMPHONY HALL—Eighteenth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of March 26. The program: Borodin, symphony in B minor, No. 2; Beethoven, songs with orchestra, "Wonne der Wehmut," "Freudvoll und leidvoll" and "Die Himmel ruehmen des Ewigen Ehre" (Miss Elena Gerhardt, soloist); Reger, four tone poems for orchestra after pictures of Boecklin (first time in Boston); Brahms, three songs with orchestra, "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," "Wir wandelten, wir Zwei" and "Auf dem Kirchhofe" (Miss Gerhardt); Weber, overture to "Oberon."

The performance was one of the master efforts of the season. Except for a short time in the closing portion of the second movement of the symphony, conductor and players were every minute at their best. The music interested the men and it stimulated them to their utmost. If there was a moment in the playing of the symphony when interpretation failed to touch the highest level, that is to be laid to the piece itself. For the last pages of Borodin's scherzo are far below the rest of the work in power. Inevitably, if strength of reading was to depend on quality of music, there would be a sagging at some point in the presentation of a Russian symphony, especially if it were, like Borodin's, of the nationalist school, and not a Germanized Russian composition, like one by Tschaikowsky or Rachmaninoff. For Russian art in its characteristic manifestations is pretty likely to have a spot of incompleteness or inferiority somewhere. Vast and audacious design and imperfect execution are what we find again and again. The Russians seem to have just a trace of perversity in their attitude to art. They will not allow it to be quite perfect, even when they can as well as not.

It must have seemed strange to many listeners that the Borodin symphony in B minor, an older work than the "Pathetic" of Tschaikowsky, and perhaps a better, should only now get established in the repertory of the orchestra. Music is indeed an inexplicable form of expression, inasmuch as it can keep its message hid for a generation from a public that dearly likes to cultivate it, and can finally speak out, like the Borodin work on Friday, with irresistible appeal. Much experimentation and uncertainty in the program-making of the winter is atoned for by the impressive reading by Dr. Muck of this piece. The discovery of an old composer means more than the discovery of a new one. For an old one whose work sounds fresh is likely to be one with a genuine and lasting message. A new one is less of a certainty. If a Borodin symphony can give pleasure to a public that has been trained up on the entertainment of the Strauss and Debussy tone poems, it must have permanent quality.

On an equality with the presentation of the symphony was the reading of the new group of tone poems by Reger. And here was no moment of falling off, for Reger is nothing if not a thorough workman. The four pieces, composed after pictures of Boecklin, are to be regarded as one of the modern forms of symphony. The noteworthy difference between the picture poems and a regular symphony is that the first member of the group is outwardly more like a slow movement than an opening allegro. But the difference is wholly of time, not of feeling or of form. The poem describing the hermit playing the violin is an intellectual meditation, not a sentimental one. It has a development which is quite in the manner of first movements and has no touch of romantic song, such as is characteristic of slow movements. The second poem, describing nymphs and monsters of the sea sporting on the waves, is clearly a scherzo, and altogether is the most imaginative and original of the set. The poem describing the "Island of the Dead" is unmistakably in the manner of symphonic slow movements, and the "Bacchanale," with which the set closes, is an allegro such [illegible] recognised as

The more the music of Reger gets a hearing, the more the world must be conscious of new sentiments finding expression. Here is something as far as possible from the music of Wagner and Strauss. Reger's art, viewed superficially, could be regarded as a return to the ways of Schumann and Brahms.

But it is not, except perhaps in externals, in any sense reactionary. It is full of sympathy with modern thinking. It strives to voice the idea of mankind quietly controlling the forces of nature to its needs, rather than the idea of mankind being emotionally overcome by the magnificence of those forces. In a word, Reger forsakes that romanticism which composers of the nineteenth century made it their chief business to express.

To complete the catalogue of excellencies in this program, the soloist acquitted herself with high honor. The conductor is severe in his demand that the concerts shall be wholly orchestral, with the result that singers sometimes are in the uninteresting position of presenting songs to a transcribed accompaniment. But the voice is the thing. And Miss Gerhardt brought a soprano voice of the purest tone and the most finished technique to the work of the day.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 27

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FRESH MUSIC FROM REGER AND BORODIN

The Bavarian's Interesting Tone-Poems in His New Spirit and Manner — The Russian's Pictorial and Opera-Like Symphony—Miss Gerhardt Betters Her Singing—The Overture to "Oberon" and a Feat

PLEASURE of many sorts—and not one arduous—was plentiful at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, when as usual, after a fortnightly interval, the audience seemed especially warm toward Dr. Muck at his first coming to the stage. Orchestra and conductor were in form as, according to some ears, they are not always after their monthly journeys Southward and beyond questioning their playing of Weber's overture to his opera of "Oberon" was a feat of virtuosity that they only in American concert-rooms can achieve. The gossips say that the celebrated chord separating the introduction from the main body of the overture haunts the imagination of conductors. They hear in vision the perfect unanimity, precision, edgelessness and fire with which they would have their orchestras accomplish this tonal and dramatic stroke. Dr. Muck and the men came as near to these perfections as mortals may. In a single and instant flash, the chord clove the air and, familiar as it is, set the audience quivering, even as ninety years ago the first hearers of "Oberon" may have stirred to it. The horns may not be quite the best of the choirs of the orchestra, but their tone, through the long introduction, summoned the golden and suffused beauty of Weber's romantic song.

Orchestra and conductor struck tonal and rhythmic fire through the glowing and mounting course and the changeful and graphic eloquence of the rest of the overture. It remains still a masterpiece of romantic music; yet, with all the glories of the performance, it was good to have done for the season with Weber's three overtures and it is permissible to hope that for a year at least they may not return to the Symphony Concerts. Dr. Muck seems overdisposed to go an annual round of classic overtures for the closing number of his programmes as though they were a conventional and inevitable finale like the potpourri that usually closes an operetta. So doing, he overlooks more than one overture, ancient, modern and contemporary, that has gone too long unheard and unillumined by his hand.

In the overture to "Oberon," Dr. Muck was operatic conductor again, compassing atmosphere and mystery out of the song of the horns and filling the rest of the piece with the glow and the glamor, the diversity and the impetuosity of romantic action that the opera itself, unless so animated and transfigured, hardly yields. He was intrinsically operatic conductor again in Borodin's symphony in B minor that he has now revived, even as he first made it known to the public of the concerts. Not even Händel himself was more frugal with his music than these Russians—Borodin and Moussorgsky certainly and presumably not a few of the rest. If they began the composition of an opera and then abandoned it; if they labored at a ballet only to have the producing theatre shy at it; if they so much as sketched a song and then laid it by, sooner or later they utilized the music for some new purpose. Like Händel they tempt the hearer to an unmitigated cynicism over the graphic power of music when they mate the same tones to very different words and use them to very different purpose. Yet the music of Borodin remains often as intrinsically pictorial in the symphony as it was destined to be in the opera for which it was composed. It has even its operatic kinships. Out of the finale rise the great forms of the barbaric boyards pompously feasting as they feast under their wooden and painted walls in a scene of Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina"; clarinet, harp and horn have no sooner begun the plaintive, exotic and quasi-oriental song of the slow movement than the eye sees the minstrels that hymn more than one prince in Rimsky-Korsakoff's operas; the recurring theme, the broad expansions, the rugged tonal pomps of the first movement recall one and another scene of stately ceremony in Russian music-drama. Only the scherzo seems quite self-contained, as becomes a movement in a symphony so formally continent as this of Borodin.

The virtues and shortcomings of the music alike accord with its original pictorial purpose in an opera of old Russia like "Prince Igor" that we are to hear next autumn. The repetitions may emphasize the action upon the stage; the occasional thinness may be as veils lifted upon the course of the music-drama; the alternation of melodic material rather than the orthodox development and interweaving of it may be due in measure to the original dramatic purpose of the music as well as to the familiar abstentions—and also limitations—of the Russian nationalists. Per contra, the richness and diversity of Borodin's harmonic and instrumental color; the force of his rhythms, the saliency, the individuality and the atmospheric suggestion of his melodies may all have their source, not only in him but in the original operatic purpose of the music. Above all, it is a rugged and full-voiced symphony, changeful as the Slav temperament, now of barbaric and iterated force, now of insinuating Oriental suggestion—a music different from that with which in essence the Western World has been content these hundred years. The power of Borodin, the Russian, has its occasional kinship with the power of Sibelius the Finn. To both, since they are rugged and strange and colorful, we Americans, being none of the three, lend a willing and approving ear.

In a sense Reger had the lion's share of the rest of the concert; since not only had he written his own four tone-poems "after" familiar pictures by Boecklin; but he had scored for orchestra the three songs of Brahms that Miss Gerhardt sang. Perhaps Reger, being often heavy-handed and involved in his own scoring, is not exactly the man that most of us would choose to give songs light, clear and elastic instrumental vesture. Nor has he any very obvious kinship with the Brahms of the grave or playful, the homely or the introspective, the quietly longing or the glowingly contemplative lyrics that fill his song-books and disclose his most human side. Reger is self-contained and singular; he suffices unto himself; he does not overflow with diverse human sympathies and impulses. His feet are well-planted on this firm set earth and especially upon the terrain of musical knowledge and resource. Only in his capacity for "head-work" in the art of composition and in his devotion to "absolute" music is he to be likened to Brahms. By "head-work" and a hand that the broadening and the softening years seem to be making lighter and more elastic, he scored these songs and only once and again did he lay upon them a heavier and a more intricate orchestral garment than they can fittingly and persuasively bear. He is even capable of the finely attuned violin part that he devises for "Wir Wandelten." Yet Mr. Nikisch doing likewise for three of Beethoven's songs that Miss Gerhardt also sang considerably excelled him.

In all these pieces the singer did not always rise to her best capabilities; but she was nearer to them than she was in much of her singing in her concert in Boston with Miss Harrison a few weeks ago. Clearly Miss Gerhardt is not at the top of her vocal form; she failed once and again to fulfil her clear intent with her tones; and not always did wisdom guide that will. Perhaps much journeying and one or another intimate irritation have dimmed her spirit and clouded her powers. Her upper notes were sometimes neither steady nor full; and some of her intervals were hardly clean and sure progression from tone to tone. On the other hand, her middle voice often regained its old limidity, radiance and melting softness and more than once she proved anew her warmth and lusciousness of phrase after phrase as they flowed into the long, unbroken and artfully curving line of her sustained song. Then, as in Beethoven's "Wonne der Wehmut" and in Brahms's "Wir Wandelten," she was the Gerhardt of rare tonal beauty and of rare fineness of feeling in songs of contemplative and introspective sentiment. Singer, song and sensation were as one. She brought unexpected sweep of line and breadth of phrase to Beethoven's stark and far-flung song of the universe praising its Maker; but she was not so fortunate, perhaps because of the blows of Reger's orchestra, in Brahms's storm-tossed song of the churchyard. No more did "Freudvoll and Leidvoll" quite sparkle out of itself; but the poignant and [illegible] longing of Brahms's "Immer Leiser"—a bitter, [illegible] little tragedy of suggestion—spoke out of her tones. Yesterday Miss Gerhardt neared justice to herself and the full pleasure that her audiences expect from her. This evening she may quite achieve them.

Reger's four tone-poems were most interesting as the first hint that we in Boston have received of the new spirit, method and manner in his music. We have still to hear his "Ballet Suite" which does not lack charm, fancy or lightness of workmanship; and we know not as yet the warm imagination and the free and ardent procedure of his "Romantic Suite." But the tone-poems of yesterday plainly suggested the change that impulse from without or within has wrought. In his earlier fashion he overdoes the expression of the mood of passionate lamentation that Boecklin's picture, "The Isle of the Dead," seems with a strange insistence to stir in him: "Bacchanal," suggested by the picture of fat, drunken and sprawling Romans, necessarily implies a robustious, coarse-fibred and similarly sprawling music and Reger has done more than fulfill graphically enough the prescription that the choice of the canvas and the theory and practice of musical contrast laid upon him. On the other hand, he is sportive, light, quick-witted and even flashing with his gay, bright and playful response in tones to "The Frolic of the Waves" and he charms by the play of a shrewd and smiling scholarship through the ecclesiastical voice and the aerated sentiment of "The Fiddling Hermit."

In all four pieces Reger is neither involved nor acrid, and no heavier than "Bacchanal" in itself and his own notion of "The Isle of the Dead" required. Especially in the two lighter pieces he is almost graceful of melody and mood; sprightly of invention; clear, pliant and fanciful in coloring; adept with his rhythms, transmitting a vivid impression in clear and free unity of mood, method and material. Neither "The Fiddling Hermit" nor "The Sport of the Waves" is a remarkable piece except as it shows the new spirit that has entered into Reger and the new manner that gives it voice; and the music suggests little of the pictures whence Reger borrows his titles. "The Sport of the Waves" is a fancifully invented and fancifully developed scherzo, light, limpid and frolicsome. "The Fiddling Hermit" transforms ecclesiastical modes dashed with sentiment into tonal folk-tale. "Bacchanal" is music after the kind of Boecklin's picture or the Sunday sprees of the big-bodied Bavarian peasants who in their cups are not so far from these pictured Romans. It is of Reger flinging tone and progression about to boisterous rhythm and with the amplest of ready means. Curiously, his music from "The Isle of the Dead" affords hardly a hint of the tone-painting to which it has stirred other composers. Reger lifts only the voice of plangent lamentation and troubled longing, as though the quick as well as the dead dwelt within the isle. Yet it is a more human and a clearer voice than has often come into his older—or rather younger—music.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER.

APRIL 3

LISZT'S SYMPHONY CONCERT IN ITSELF

INTERPRETATION BOTH MEMORABLE AND INSPIRING

Dr. Muck Brings Out All the Subtleties and Scores Great Triumph

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME.

Liszt. "Faust" Symphony.

Klose. Prelude and Double Fugue for Organ, Trumpets and Trombones.

A short list but a long programme, for Liszt's Symphony is a concert in itself. It was given a short time ago when the present reviewer was absent from Boston, but echoes reached him of a phenomenal performance such as Boston had never heard before. These rumors were verified yesterday when an interpretation that was memorable and tremendously inspiring was given by the Symphony orchestra, the Apollo Club and Mr. Paul Draper, tenor soloist. The Liszt additions, changes and excisions in this revised version, are interesting but not of very great importance. Bass clarinette effects and the Marguerite touches in the movement devoted to Mephistopheles are the most striking, the latter a decided improvement.

Wagner has often been accused of borrowing from Liszt, but in this work one cannot help thinking that the boot was on the other leg and that Wagner might exclaim, with the ghost in "Hamlet,"—"Liszt, Liszt! O Liszt!"

Most Beautiful

The movement picturing "Marguerite" is the most beautiful of the work, a tender, pathetic picture in a vein that is totally absent from Wagner's treatment of "Faust" in his overture. It is not strange that this movement should often be given apart from the long symphony. The "Gretchen" (or "Marguerite") theme is deliciously presented in its first appearance, by the oboe, the instrument of innocent naivete, and the viola, the instrument of melancholy. The gradual change from limpid simplicity to the pasison of Love is almost psychologically given, the Faust theme being intertwined with the Gretchen one. The end of the movement, Gretchen alone and deserted, had infinite pathos. The movement owed much to the beauty of the obbligato playing. The shading here was very refined.

But the first and third movements were the great triumphs of Dr. Muck. The loftiness of the Faust movement which begins the symphony can never be described in cold leaden type. Of course, Liszt makes much more of "Faust" than Berlioz, who only uses him to damn him, or Gounod who serves him up in syrup and makes him a lover only, or Wagner who makes him a very discontented individual with unfulfilled longings, great ambitions and a fondness for the bass tuba. Liszt has caught the true idea of Goethe, the idea which is most faithfully pictured by Schumann in his great "Faust" work.

Greatest of Symphony

How poetically this idea is caught by Liszt may be seen in the movement which is the greatest and most remarkable of the symphony, and which was the orchestral triumph of yesterday afternoon—the "Mephistopheles" movement. Georg Henschel once said to the present writer: "One thing can never be pictured in Music, and that is Irony"—but Schumann's setting of Heine's poem disproves this. We translate it thus:—

A youth he loves a maiden,
Another she doth prefer.
The other has chosen another
And given his love to her.

The maid's love turns to anger,
And then she takes in scorn,
The first man in her pathway.
The youth is left to mourn.

It is an old, old story,
Yet new it doth remain,
And he to whom it happens,
His heart may rive in twain.

And the accompaniment of this is the most heartless jingle in the world. And Liszt gives bitter irony, in a much more extended manner, all through this movement. The very tempo mark—"Allegro Vivace Ironico,"—shows that Liszt did not share Mr. Henschel's opinion. And there is something more than mere Irony here, there is a metaphysical or ethical touch that is superb, for Mephistopheles is given no especial theme, but the destructive spirit, the soul of negation, the being that destroys but never creates, is portrayed by mocking at the themes of Faust, sneering at the aspirations and ambitions of the hero, yet, (a touch most purely ethical) the themes of Marguerite are beyond his power and escape unscathed amid the storm of destruction.

Subtleties of Picture

One can imagine how Dr. Muck would bring out all the subtleties of such a picture. The reading became one of the greatest triumphs he has achieved among us, and there is a long list to his credit, and every man in the orchestra, from first violinist to the player of the cymbals deserves praise.

The choral ending with its introduction of Goethe's pregnant words relative to "Das ewig Weibliche" is musically as great as what had preceded: we can imagine both Goethe and Liszt very much moved by "the eternal feminine." The chorus sang with steadiness, and to Mr. Paul Draper, after having sung the strange measures in Reznicek's "Schlemihl," the Liszt progressions must have seemed mere child's play, yet the tenor soloist betrayed effort in one or two phrases.

The words were sung in German and we can congratulate das Apollo-verein upon its clever pronunciation. In England it would be sufficient to cause them all to be imprisoned as Teutonic spies.

The final climaxes of orchestra and chorus were the grandest we have ever heard. Had not Liszt been so great a pianist the world would have recognized him sooner as a great composer. He stood in his own light—overshadowing himself.

There was wild enthusiasm at the end of the symphony, and the work and its performance certainly deserved it. The finale of the Faust symphony can scarcely be over-estimated.

Friedrich Klose is a modern, a teacher of composition in the Munich Academy, and this Prelude and Double Fugue is a 20th century composition. In this blessed century composers seem to choose one of two paths, each thorny enough. Either they write for a tremendous orchestra which runs from Celesta to Xyllophones, and give no melodies at all, but merely tonal grunts, or they become ascetically classical and scorn a single fugue or a direct canon as infantile, and aim at contrapuntal complexities that are the higher mathematics of music. Of the two evils the last is much the least, for in suc learned work we can always find coherency and logic.

The combination of organ and brasses in the final chorale was effective. It sounded well in the hall, the organ somehow being always acoustically more in synchronism with the auditorium than even the orchestra, while the masses of trumpets and trombones gave an incisive effect that was altogether out of the common. The final brass-playing was quite a new flavor and one which awakened even the jaded symphony auditor and caused him to sit up and take notice.

The organ solo, which formed the bulk of the composition, was excellently played by John P. Marshall, and the construction of the double fugue was as learned as anyone would expect from a Conservatory professor, yet it was not dry or tedious, and, as above intimated, infinitely above the free maunderings of the modern iconoclasts. Mr. Marshall was tasteful in his registration, too, and gave effective contrasts. But, like a wasp, the most important feature of this work was in its tail. There were, we think, 10 trumpets and 10 trombones, and when they let loose (like the German bands in a church belfry on Sylvesterabend) they could have been heard in Chelsea. It must have been something of this kind that was played a good many years ago before the walls of Jericho.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 27. 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FRESH MUSIC FROM REGER AND BORODIN

The Bavarian's Interesting Tone-Poems in His New Spirit and Manner — The Russian's Pictorial and Opera-Like Symphony—Miss Gerhardt Betters Her Singing—The Overture to "Oberon" and a Feat

PLEASURE of many sorts—and not one arduous—was plentiful at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, when as usual, after a fortnightly interval, the audience seemed especially warm toward Dr. Muck at his first coming to the stage. Orchestra and conductor were in form as, according to some ears, they are not always after their monthly journeys Southward and beyond questioning their playing of Weber's overture to his opera of "Oberon" was a feat of virtuosity that they only in American concert-rooms can achieve. The gossips say that the celebrated chord separating the introduction from the main body of the overture haunts the imagination of conductors. They hear in vision the perfect unanimity, precision, edgelessness and fire with which they would have their orchestras accomplish this tonal and dramatic stroke. Dr. Muck and the men came as near to these perfections as mortals may. In a single and instant flash, the chord clove the air and, familiar as it is, set the audience quivering, even as ninety years ago the first hearers of "Oberon" may have stirred to it. The horns may not be quite the best of the choirs of the orchestra, but their tone, through the long introduction, summoned the golden and suffused beauty of Weber's romantic song.

Orchestra and conductor struck tonal and rhythmic fire through the glowing and mounting course and the changeful and graphic eloquence of the rest of the overture. It remains still a masterpiece of romantic music; yet, with all the glories of the performance, it was good to have done for the season with Weber's three overtures and it is permissible to hope that for a year at least they may not return to the Symphony Concerts. Dr. Muck seems overdisposed to go an annual round of classic overtures for the closing number of his programmes as though they were a conventional and inevitable finale like the potpourri that usually closes an operetta. So doing, he overlooks more than one overture, ancient, modern and contemporary, that has gone too long unheard and unillumined by his hand.

In the overture to "Oberon," Dr. Muck was operatic conductor again, compassing atmosphere and mystery out of the song of the horns and filling the rest of the piece with the glow and the glamor, the diversity and the impetuosity of romantic action that the opera itself, unless so animated and transfigured, hardly yields. He was intrinsically operatic conductor again in Borodin's symphony in B minor that he has now revived, even as he first made it known to the public of the concerts. Not even Händel himself was more frugal with his music than these Russians—Borodin and Moussorgsky certainly and presumably not a few of an opera and then abandoned it, if they labored at a ballet only to have the producing theatre shy at it; if they so much as sketched a song and then laid it by, sooner or later they utilized the music for some new purpose. Like Händel they tempt the hearer to an unmitigated cynicism over the graphic power of music when they mate the same tones to very different words and use them to very different purpose. Yet the music of Borodin remains often as intrinsically pictorial in the symphony as it was destined to be in the opera for which it was composed. It has even its operatic kinships. Out of the finale rise the great forms of the barbaric boyards pompously feasting as they feast under their wooden and painted walls in a scene of Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina"; clarinet, harp and horn have no sooner begun the plaintive, exotic and quasi-oriental song of the slow movement than the eye sees the minstrels that hymn more than one prince in Rimsky-Korsakoff's operas; the recurring theme, the broad expansions, the rugged tonal pomps of the first movement recall one and another scene of stately ceremony in Russian music-drama. Only the scherzo seems quite self-contained, as becomes a movement in a symphony so formally continent as this of Borodin.

WORLD

The virtues and shortcomings of the music alike accord with its original pictorial purpose in an opera of old Russia like "Prince Igor" that we are to hear next autumn. The repetitions may emphasize the action upon the stage; the occasional thinness may be as veils lifted upon the course of the music-drama; the alternation of melodic material rather than the orthodox development and interweaving of it may be due in measure to the original dramatic purpose of the music as well as to the familiar abstentions—and also limitations—of the Russian nationalists. Per contra, the richness and diversity of Borodin's harmonic and instrumental color; the force of his rhythms, the saliency, the individuality and the atmospheric suggestion of his melodies may all have their source, not only in him but in the original operatic purpose of the music. Above all, it is a rugged and full-voiced symphon changeful as the Slav temperament, no of barbaric and iterated force, now insinuating Oriental suggestion—a mus different from that with which in essen the Western World has been content the hundred years. The power of Borodin, t Russian, has its occasional kinship wi the power of Sibelius the Finn. To bo since they are rugged and strange a colorful, we Americans, being none of three, lend a willing and approving ear.

In a sense Reger had the lion's share of the rest of the concert; since not only had he written his own four tone-poems "after" familiar pictures by Boecklin; but he had scored for orchestra the three songs of Brahms that Miss Gerhardt sang. Perhaps Reger, being often heavy-handed and involved in his own scoring, is not exactly the man that most of us would choose to give songs light, clear and elastic instrumental vesture. Nor has he any very obvious kinship with the Brahms of the grave or playful, the homely or the introspective, the quietly longing or the glowingly contemplative lyrics that fill his song-books and disclose his most human side. Reger is self-contained and singular; he suffices unto himself; he does not overflow with diverse human sympathies and impulses. His feet are well-planted on this firm set earth and especially upon the terrain of musical knowledge and resource. Only in his capacity for "head-work" in the art of composition and in his devotion to "absolute" music is he to be likened to Brahms. By "head-work" and a hand that the broadening and the softening years seem to be making lighter and more elastic, he scored these songs and only once and again did he lay upon them a heavier and a more intricate orchestral garment than they can fittingly and persuasively bear. He is even capable of the finely attuned violin part that he devises for "Wir Wandelten." Yet Mr. Nikisch doing likewise for three of Beethoven's songs that Miss Gerhardt also sang considerably excelled him.

In all these pieces the singer did not always rise to her best capabilities; but she was nearer to them than she was in much of her singing in her concert in Boston with Miss Harrison a few weeks ago Clearly Miss Gerhardt is not at the top of her vocal form; she failed once and again to fulfil her clear intent with her tones; and not always did wisdom guide that will. Perhaps much journeying and one or another intimate irritation have dimmed her spirit and clouded her powers. Her upper notes were sometimes neither steady nor full; and some of her intervals were hardly clean and sure progression from tone to tone. On the other hand, her middle voice often regained its old limidity, radiance and melting softness and more than once she proved anew her warmth and lusciousness of phrase after phrase as they flowed into the long, unbroken and artfully curving line of her sustained song. Then, as in Beethoven's "Wonne der Wehmut" and in Brahms's "Wir Wandelten," she was the Gerhardt of rare tonal beauty and of rare fineness of feeling in songs of contemplative and introspective sentiment. Singer, song and sensation were as one. She brought unexpected sweep of line and breadth of phrase to Beethoven's stark and far-flung song of the universe praising its Maker; but she was not so fortunate, perhaps because of the blows of Reger's orchestra, in Brahms's storm-tossed song of the churchyard. No more did "Freudvoll and Leidvoll" quite sparkle out of itself; but the poignant and foredoomed longing of Brahms's "Immer Leister"—a bitter and ironic little tragedy of suggestion—spoke out of her tones. Yesterday Miss Gerhardt neared justice to herself and the full pleasure that her audiences expect from her. This evening she may quite achieve them.

Reger's four tone-poems were most interesting as the first hint that we in Boston have received of the new spirit, method and manner in his music. We have still to hear his "Ballet Suite" which does not lack charm, fancy or lightness of workmanship; and we know not as yet the warm imagination and the free and ardent procedure of his "Romantic Suite." But the tone-poems of yesterday plainly suggested the change that impulse from without or within has wrought. In his earlier fashion he overdoes the expression of the mood of passionate lamentation that Boecklin's picture, "The Isle of the Dead," seems with a strange insistence to stir in him: "Bacchanal," suggested by the picture of fat, drunken and sprawling Romans, necessarily implies a robustious, coarse-fibred and similarly sprawling music and Reger has done more than fulfill graphically enough the prescription that the choice of the canvas and the theory and practice of musical contrast laid upon him. On the other hand, he is sportive, light, quick-witted and even flashing with his gay, bright and playful response in tones to "The Frolic of the Waves" and he charms by the play of a shrewd and smiling scholarship through the ecclesiastical voice and the aerated sentiment of "The Fiddling Hermit."

In all four pieces Reger is neither involved nor acrid, and no heavier than "Bacchanal" in itself and his own notion of "The Isle of the Dead" required. Especially in the two lighter pieces he is almost graceful of melody and mood; sprightly of invention; clear, pliant and fanciful in coloring; adept with his rhythms, transmitting a vivid impression in clear and free unity of mood, method and material. Neither "The Fiddling Hermit" nor "The Sport of the Waves" is a remarkable piece except as it shows the new spirit that has entered into Reger and the new manner that gives it voice; and the music suggests little of the pictures whence Reger borrows his titles. "The Sport of the Waves" is a fancifully invented and fancifully developed scherzo, light, limpid and frolicsome. "The Fiddling Hermit" transforms ecclesiastical modes dashed with sentiment into tonal folk-tale. "Bacchanal" is music after the kind of Boecklin's picture or the Sunday sprees of the big-bodied Bavarian peasants who in their cups are not so far from these pictured Romans. It is of Reger flinging tone and progression about to boisterous rhythm and with the amplest of ready means. Curiously, his music from "The Isle of the Dead" affords hardly a hint of the tone-painting to which it has stirred other composers. Reger lifts only the voice of plangent lamentation and troubled longing, as though the quick as well as the dead dwelt within the isle. Yet it is a more human and a clearer voice than has often come into his older—or rather younger—music.

H. T. P.

SUNDAY HERALD,

APRIL 4, 1915.

SAN FRANCISCO PROGRAMS OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Muck has made a remarkable list of programs for the 12 subscription concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give at the Panama-Pacific international exposition at San Francisco from May 14 to May 26, inclusive. It will be seen at a glance that they should please the reverers of the classics and those more keenly interested in modern music. The catholicity of the programs is also to be noted. Seven French composers are represented, four Italians, four Russians and a Finn, besides German, Austrian, Bohemian and Hungarian composers.

No. 1.

Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"	Beethoven
Variations on a Theme by Haydn	Brahms
"Don Juan"	Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe"	Weber

No. 2.

Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage"	Mendelssohn
Symphony in G major, "Surprise"	Haydn
Suite No. 2, "Indian"	MacDowell
"Hungaria," Symphonic Poem	Liszt

No. 3—FRENCH PROGRAM.

Symphony in D minor	Cesar Franck
"L'Apprenti Sorcier"	Dukas
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1	Bizet
Rhapsody, "Espana"	Chabrier

No. 4.

Symphony No. 1	Brahms
Suite for Flute and Strings in B minor, No. 2 Solo Flute, Andre Maquarre.	Bach
Shepherds' Music from the "Christmas" Oratorio	Bach
Overture to "Egmont"	Beethoven

No. 5—WAGNER PROGRAM.

Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

No. 6.

Overture to "Der Freischuetz"	Weber
Symphony No. 8, in F major	Beethoven
Symphonic Sketches	Chadwick
"Karelia," Overture	Sibelius
"The Swan of Tuonela"	Sibelius
"Finlandia"	Sibelius

No. 7.

Symphony No. 2	Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"	Liszt
"Death and Transfiguration"	Strauss
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner

No. 8—ITALIAN PROGRAM.

Symphony No. 1	Sgambati
Overture to "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Intermezzi Goldoniani	Bossi
Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chizzote"	Sinigaglia

No. 9.

Symphony in G minor	Mozart
Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra (Solo violins, Messrs. Witek and Noack.)	Bach
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
"A Siegfried Idyl"	Wagner
Overture, "Carnival"	Dvorak

No. 10—FRENCH PROGRAM.

Symphony No. 3, for orchestra and organ	Saint-Saens
"The Afternoon of a Faun"	Debussy
Three Pieces from "The Damnation of Faust"	Berlioz
Overture to "Gwendoline"	Chabrier

No. 11.

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic,"	Tschaikowsky
Overture Solonelle	Glazounoff
On the Steppes of Central Asia	Borodin
Caprice on Spanish Themes	Rimsky-Korsakoff

No. 12.

Symphony No. 1	Sibelius
Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"	Strauss
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3	Beethoven

[139]

ADVERTISER.

APRIL 3

LISZT'S SYMPHONY CONCERT IN ITSELF

INTERPRETATION BOTH MEMORABLE AND INSPIRING

Dr. Muck Brings Out All the Subtleties and Scores Great Triumph

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME.

Liszt. "Faust" Symphony.
Klose. Prelude and Double Fugue for Organ, Trumpets and Trombones.

A short list but a long programme, for Liszt's Symphony is a concert in itself. It was given a short time ago when the present reviewer was absent from Boston, but echoes reached him of a phenomenal performance such as Boston had never heard before. These rumors were verified yesterday when an interpretation that was memorable and tremendously inspiring was given by the Symphony orchestra, the Apollo Club and Mr. Paul Draper, tenor soloist. The Liszt additions, changes and excisions in this revised version, are interesting but not of very great importance. Bass clarinette effects and the Marguerite touches in the movement devoted to Mephistopheles are the most striking, the latter a decided improvement.

Wagner has often been accused of borrowing from Liszt, but in this work one cannot help thinking that the boot was on the other leg and that Wagner might exclaim, with the ghost in "Hamlet,"—"Liszt, Liszt! O Liszt!"

Most Beautiful

The movement picturing "Marguerite" is the most beautiful of the work, a tender, pathetic picture in a vein that is totally absent from Wagner's treatment of "Faust" in his overture. It is not strange that this movement should often be given apart from the long symphony. The "Gretchen" (or "Marguerite") theme is deliciously presented in its first appearance, by the oboe, the instrument of innocent naivete, and the viola, the instrument of melancholy. The gradual change from limpid simplicity to the pasison of Love is almost psychologically given, the Faust theme being intertwined with the Gretchen one. The end of the movement, Gretchen alone and deserted, had infinite pathos. The movement owed much to the beauty of the obbligato playing. The shading here was very refined.

But the first and third movements were the great triumphs of Dr. Muck. The loftiness of the Faust movement which begins the symphony can never be described in cold leaden type. Of course, Liszt makes much more of "Faust" than Berlioz, who only uses him to damn him, or Gounod who serves him up in syrup and makes him a lover only, or Wagner who makes him a very discontented individual with unfulfilled longings, great ambitions and a fondness for the bass tuba. Liszt has caught the true idea of Goethe, the idea which is most faithfully pictured by Schumann in his great "Faust" work.

Greatest of Symphony

How poetically this idea is caught by Liszt may be seen in the movement which is the greatest and most remarkable of the symphony, and which was the orchestral triumph of yesterday afternoon—the "Mephistopheles" movement. Georg Henschel once said to the present writer: "One thing can never be pictured in Music, and that is Irony"—but Schumann's setting of Heine's poem disproves this. We translate it thus:—

A youth he loves a maiden,
  Another she doth prefer.
The other has chosen another
  And given his love to her.

The maid's love turns to anger,
  And then she takes in scorn,
The first man in her pathway.
  The youth is left to mourn.

It is an old, old story,
  Yet new it doth remain.
And he to whom it happens.
  His heart may rive in twain.

And the accompaniment of this is the most heartless jingle in the world. And Liszt gives bitter irony, in a much more extended manner, all through this movement. The very tempo mark—"Allegro Vivace Ironico,"—shows that Liszt did not share Mr. Henschel's opinion. And there is something more than mere Irony here, there is a metaphysical or ethical touch that is superb, for Mephistopheles is given no especial theme, but the destructive spirit, the soul of negation, the being that destroys but never creates, is portrayed by mocking at the themes of Faust, sneering at the aspirations and ambitions of the hero, yet, (a touch most purely ethical) the themes of Marguerite are beyond his power and escape unscathed amid the storm of destruction.

Subtleties of Picture

One can imagine how Dr. Muck would bring out all the subtleties of such a picture. The reading became one of the greatest triumphs he has achieved among us, and there is a long list to his credit, and every man in the orchestra, from first violinist to the player of the cymbals deserves praise.

The choral ending with its introduction of Goethe's pregnant words relative to "Das ewig Weibliche" is musically as great as what had preceded; we can imagine both Goethe and Liszt very much moved by "the eternal feminine." The chorus sang with steadiness, and to Mr. Paul Draper, after having sung the strange measures in Reznicek's "Schlemihl," the Liszt progressions must have seemed mere child's play, yet the tenor soloist betrayed effort in one or two phrases.

The words were sung in German and we can congratulate das Apollo-verein upon its clever pronunciation. In England it would be sufficient to cause them all to be imprisoned as Teutonic spies.

The final climaxes of orchestra and chorus were the grandest we have ever heard. Had not Liszt been so great a pianist the world would have recognized him sooner as a great composer. He stood in his own light—overshadowing himself.

There was wild enthusiasm at the end of the symphony, and the work and its performance certainly deserved it. The finale of the Faust symphony can scarcely be over-estimated.

Friedrich Klose is a modern, a teacher of composition in the Munich Academy, and this Prelude and Double Fugue is a 20th century composition. In this blessed century composers seem to choose one of two paths, each thorny enough. Either they write for a tremendous orchestra which runs from Celesta to Xyllophones, and give no melodies at all, but merely tonal grunts, or they become ascetically classical and scorn a single fugue or a direct canon as infantile, and aim at contrapuntal complexities that are the higher mathematics of music. Of the two evils the last is much the least, for in suc learned work we can always find coherency and logic.

The combination of organ and brasses in the final chorale was effective. It sounded well in the hall, the organ somehow being always acoustically more in synchronism with the auditorium than even the orchestra, while the masses of trumpets and trombones gave an incisive effect that was altogether out of the common. The final brass-playing was quite a new flavor and one which awakened even the jaded symphony auditor and caused him to sit up and take notice.

The organ solo, which formed the bulk of the composition, was excellently played by John P. Marshall, and the construction of the double fugue was as learned as anyone would expect from a Conservatory professor, yet it was not dry or tedious, and, as above intimated, infinitely above the free maunderings of the modern iconoclasts. Mr. Marshall was tasteful in his registration, too, and gave effective contrasts. But, like a wasp, the most important feature of this work was in its tail. There were, we think, 10 trumpets and 10 trombones, and when they let loose (like the German bands in a church belfry on Sylvesterabend) they could have been heard in Chelsea. It must have been something of this kind that was played a good many years ago before the walls of Jericho.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 27. 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FRESH MUSIC FROM REGER AND BORODIN

The Bavarian's Interesting Tone-Poems in His New Spirit and Manner — The Russian's Pictorial and Opera-Like Symphony—Miss Gerhardt Betters Her Singing—The Overture to "Oberon" and a Feat

PLEASURE of many sorts—and not one arduous—was plentiful at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, when as usual, after a fortnightly interval, the audience seemed especially warm toward Dr. Muck at his first coming to the stage. Orchestra and conductor were in form as, according to some ears, they are not always after their monthly journeys Southward and beyond questioning their playing of Weber's overture to his opera of "Oberon" was a feat of virtuosity that they only in American concert-rooms can achieve. The gossips say that the celebrated chord separating the introduction from the main body of the overture haunts the imagination of conductors. They hear in vision the perfect unanimity, precision, edgelessness and fire with which they would have their orchestras accomplish this tonal and dramatic stroke. Dr. Muck and the men came as near to these perfections as mortals may. In a single and instant flash, the chord clove the air and, familiar as it is, set the audience quivering, even as ninety years ago the first hearers of "Oberon" may have stirred to it. The horns may not be quite the best of the choirs of the orchestra, but their tone, through the long introduction, summoned the golden and suffused beauty of Weber's romantic song.

Orchestra and conductor struck tonal and rhythmic fire through the glowing and mounting course and the changeful and graphic eloquence of the rest of the overture. It remains still a masterpiece of romantic music; yet, with all the glories of the performance, it was good to have done for the season with Weber's three overtures and it is permissible to hope that for a year at least they may not return to the Symphony Concerts. Dr. Muck seems overdisposed to go an annual round of classic overtures for the closing number of his programmes as though they were a conventional and inevitable finale like the potpourri that usually closes an operetta. So doing, he overlooks more than one overture, ancient, modern and contemporary, that has gone too long unheard and unillumined by his hand.

In the overture to "Oberon," Dr. Muck was operatic conductor again, compassing atmosphere and mystery out of the song of the horns and filling the rest of the piece with the glow and the glamor, the diversity and the impetuosity of romantic action that the opera itself, unless so animated and transfigured, hardly yields. He was intrinsically operatic conductor again in Borodin's symphony in B minor that he has now revived, even as he first made it known to the public of the concerts. Not even Händel himself was more frugal with his music than these Russians—Borodin and Moussorgsky certainly and presumably not a few of an opera and then abandoned it; if they labored at a ballet only to have the producing theatre shy at it; if they so much as sketched a song and then laid it by, sooner or later they utilized the music for some new purpose. Like Händel they tempt the hearer to an unmitigated cynicism over the graphic power of music when they mate the same tones to very different words and use them to very different purpose. Yet the music of Borodin remains often as intrinsically pictorial in the symphony as it was destined to be in the opera for which it was composed. It has even its operatic kinships. Out of the finale rise the great forms of the barbaric boyards pompously feasting as they feast under their wooden and painted walls in a scene of Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina"; clarinet, harp and horn have no sooner begun the plaintive, exotic and quasi-oriental song of the slow movement than the eye sees the minstrels that hymn more than one prince in Rimsky-Korsakoff's operas; the recurring theme, the broad expansions, the rugged tonal pomps of the first movement recall one and another scene of stately ceremony in Russian music-drama. Only the scherzo seems quite self-contained, as becomes a movement in a symphony so formally continent as this of Borodin.

WORLD

The virtues and shortcomings of the music alike accord with its original pictorial purpose in an opera of old Russia like "Prince Igor" that we are to hear next autumn. The repetitions may emphasize the action upon the stage; the occasional thinness may be as veils lifted upon the course of the music-drama; the alternation of melodic material rather than the orthodox development and interweaving of it may be due in measure to the original dramatic purpose of the music as well as to the familiar abstentions—and also limitations—of the Russian nationalists. Per contra, the richness and diversity of Borodin's harmonic and instrumental color; the force of his rhythms, the saliency, the individuality and the atmospheric suggestion of his melodies may all have their source, not only in him but in the original operatic purpose of the music. Above all, it is a rugged and full-voiced symphon changeful as the Slav temperament, no of barbaric and iterated force, now insinuating Oriental suggestion—a mus different from that with which in essen the Western World has been content the hundred years. The power of Borodin, t Russian, has its occasional kinship wi the power of Sibelius the Finn. To bo since they are rugged and strange a colorful, we Americans, being none of three, lend a willing and approving ear.

In a sense Reger had the lion's share of the rest of the concert; since not only had he written his own four tone-poems "after" familiar pictures by Boecklin; but he had scored for orchestra the three songs of Brahms that Miss Gerhardt sang. Perhaps Reger, being often heavy-handed and involved in his own scoring, is not exactly the man that most of us would choose to give songs light, clear and elastic instrumental vesture. Nor has he any very obvious kinship with the Brahms of the grave or playful, the homely or the introspective, the quietly longing or the glowingly contemplative lyrics that fill his song-books and disclose his most human side. Reger is self-contained and singular; he suffices unto himself; he does not overflow with diverse human sympathies and impulses. His feet are well-planted on this firm set earth and especially upon the terrain of musical knowledge and resource. Only in his capacity for "head-work" in the art of composition and in his devotion to "absolute" music is he to be likened to Brahms. By "head-work" and a hand that the broadening and the softening years seem to be making lighter and more elastic, he scored these songs and only once and again did he lay upon them a heavier and a more intricate orchestral garment than they can fittingly and persuasively bear. He is even capable of the finely attuned violin part that he devises for "Wir Wandelten." Yet Mr. Nikisch doing likewise for three of Beethoven's songs that Miss Gerhardt also sang considerably excelled him.

In all these pieces the singer did not always rise to her best capabilities; but she was nearer to them than she was in much of her singing in her concert in Boston with Miss Harrison a few weeks ago Clearly Miss Gerhardt is not at the top of her vocal form; she failed once and again to fulfil her clear intent with her tones; and not always did wisdom guide that will. Perhaps much journeying and one or another intimate irritation have dimmed her spirit and clouded her powers. Her upper notes were sometimes neither steady nor full; and some of her intervals were hardly clean and sure progression from tone to tone. On the other hand, her middle voice often regained its old limidity, radiance and melting softness and more than once she proved anew her warmth and lusciousness of phrase after phrase as they flowed into the long, unbroken and artfully curving line of her sustained song. Then, as in Beethoven's "Wonne der Wehmut" and in Brahms's "Wir Wandelten," she was the Gerhardt of rare tonal beauty and of rare fineness of feeling in songs of contemplative and introspective sentiment. Singer, song and sensation were as one. She brought unexpected sweep of line and breadth of phrase to Beethoven's stark and far-flung song of the universe praising its Maker; but she was not so fortunate, perhaps because of the blows of Reger's orchestra, in Brahms's storm-tossed song of the churchyard. No more did "Freudvoll and Leidvoll" quite sparkle out of itself; but the poignant and foredoomed longing of Brahms's "Immer Leister"—a bitter and ironic little tragedy of suggestion—spoke out of her tones. Yesterday Miss Gerhardt neared justice to herself and the full pleasure that her audiences expect from her. This evening she may quite achieve them.

Reger's four tone-poems were most interesting as the first hint that we in Boston have received of the new spirit, method and manner in his music. We have still to hear his "Ballet Suite" which does not lack charm, fancy or lightness of workmanship; and we know not as yet the warm imagination and the free and ardent procedure of his "Romantic Suite." But the tone-poems of yesterday plainly suggested the change that impulse from without or within has wrought. In his earlier fashion he overdoes the expression of the mood of passionate lamentation that Boecklin's picture, "The Isle of the Dead," seems with a strange insistence to stir in him: "Bacchanal," suggested by the picture of fat, drunken and sprawling Romans, necessarily implies a robustious, coarse-fibred and similarly sprawling music and Reger has done more than fulfill graphically enough the prescription that the choice of the canvas and the theory and practice of musical contrast laid upon him. On the other hand, he is sportive, light, quick-witted and even flashing with his gay, bright and playful response in tones to "The Frolic of the Waves" and he charms by the play of a shrewd and smiling scholarship through the ecclesiastical voice and the aerated sentiment of "The Fiddling Hermit."

In all four pieces Reger is neither involved nor acrid, and no heavier than "Bacchanal" in itself and his own notion of "The Isle of the Dead" required. Especially in the two lighter pieces he is almost graceful of melody and mood; sprightly of invention; clear, pliant and fanciful in coloring; adept with his rhythms, transmitting a vivid impression in clear and free unity of mood, method and material. Neither "The Fiddling Hermit" nor "The Sport of the Waves" is a remarkable piece except as it shows the new spirit that has entered into Reger and the new manner that gives it voice; and the music suggests little of the pictures whence Reger borrows his titles. "The Sport of the Waves" is a fancifully invented and fancifully developed scherzo, light, limpid and frolicsome. "The Fiddling Hermit" transforms ecclesiastical modes dashed with sentiment into tonal folk-tale. "Bacchanal" is music after the kind of Boecklin's picture or the Sunday sprees of the big-bodied Bavarian peasants who in their cups are not so far from these pictured Romans. It is of Reger flinging tone and progression about to boisterous rhythm and with the amplest of ready means. Curiously, his music from "The Isle of the Dead" affords hardly a hint of the tone-painting to which it has stirred other composers. Reger lifts only the voice of plangent lamentation and troubled longing, as though the quick as well as the dead dwelt within the isle. Yet it is a more human and a clearer voice than has often come into his older—or rather younger—music.

H. T. P.

SUNDAY HERALD,

APRIL 4, 1915.

SAN FRANCISCO PROGRAMS OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Muck has made a remarkable list of programs for the 12 subscription concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give at the Panama-Pacific international exposition at San Francisco from May 11 to May 26, inclusive. It will be seen at a glance that they should please the reverers of the classics and those more keenly interested in modern music. The catholicity of the programs is also to be noted. Seven French composers are represented, four Italians, four Russians and a Finn, besides German, Austrian, Bohemian and Hungarian composers.

No. 1.
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"............Beethoven
Variations on a Theme by Haydn.......Brahms
"Don Juan"...........................Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe"................Weber

No. 2.
Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage"....................Mendelssohn
Symphony in G major, "Surprise"........Haydn
Suite No. 2, "Indian"..............MacDowell
"Hungaria," Symphonic Poem..............Liszt

No. 3—FRENCH PROGRAM.
Symphony in D minor...........Cesar Franck
"L'Apprenti Sorcier"...................Dukas
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1...........Bizet
Rhapsody, "Espana"..................Chabrier

No. 4.
Symphony No. 1........................Brahms
Suite for Flute and Strings in B minor, No. 2..............................Bach
Solo Flute, Andre Maquarre.
Shepherds' Music from the "Christmas" Oratorio...........................Bach
Overture to "Egmont"...............Beethoven

No. 5—WAGNER PROGRAM.
Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

No. 6
Overture to "Der Freischütz"...........Weber
Symphony No. 8, in F major.........Beethoven
Symphonic Sketches..................Chadwick
"Karelia," Overture..................Sibelius
"The Swan of Tuonela"...............Sibelius
"Finlandia"..........................Sibelius

No. 7
Symphony No. 2........................Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"..........Liszt
"Death and Transfiguration"...........Strauss
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"..........................Wagner

No. 8—ITALIAN PROGRAM.
Symphony No. 1......................Sgambati
Overture to "Anacreon"..............Cherubini
Intermezzi Goldoniani...................Bossi
Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chizzotte" Sinigaglia

No. 9.
Symphony in G minor....................Mozart
Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra.........................Bach
(Solo violins, Messrs. Witek and Noack.)
Overture to "Sakuntala"..............Goldmark
"A Siegfried Idyl"......................Wagner
Overture, "Carnival"....................Dvorak

No. 10—FRENCH PROGRAM.
Symphony No. 3, for orchestra and organ...Saint-Saens
"The Afternoon of a Faun"..............Debussy
Three Pieces from "The Damnation of Faust"...........................Berlioz
Overture to "Gwendoline"..............Chabrier

No. 11.
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic"......Tschaikowsky
Overture Solennelle..................Glazounoff
On the Steppes of Central Asia..........Borodin
Caprice on Spanish Themes...Rimsky-Korsakoff

No. 12
Symphony No. 1........................Sibelius
Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"....Strauss
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3..........Beethoven

ADVERTISER.

APRIL 3

LISZT'S SYMPHONY CONCERT IN ITSELF

INTERPRETATION BOTH MEMORABLE AND INSPIRING

Dr. Muck Brings Out All the Subtleties and Scores Great Triumph

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME.

Liszt. "Faust" Symphony.
Klose. Prelude and Double Fugue for Organ, Trumpets and Trombones.

A short list but a long programme, for Liszt's Symphony is a concert in itself. It was given a short time ago when the present reviewer was absent from Boston, but echoes reached him of a phenomenal performance such as Boston had never heard before. These rumors were verified yesterday when an interpretation that was memorable and tremendously inspiring was given by the Symphony orchestra, the Apollo Club and Mr. Paul Draper, tenor soloist. The Liszt additions, changes and excisions in this revised version, are interesting but not of very great importance. Bass clarinette effects and the Marguerite touches in the movement devoted to Mephistopheles are the most striking, the latter a decided improvement.

Wagner has often been accused of borrowing from Liszt, but in this work one cannot help thinking that the boot was on the other leg and that Wagner might exclaim, with the ghost in "Hamlet,"—"Liszt, Liszt! O Liszt!"

Most Beautiful

The movement picturing "Marguerite" is the most beautiful of the work, a tender, pathetic picture in a vein that is totally absent from Wagner's treatment of "Faust" in his overture. It is not strange that this movement should often be given apart from the long symphony. The "Gretchen" (or "Marguerite") theme is deliciously presented in its first appearance, by the oboe, the instrument of innocent naivete, and the viola, the instrument of melancholy. The gradual change from limpid simplicity to the pasison of Love is almost psychologically given, the Faust theme being intertwined with the Gretchen one. The end of the movement, Gretchen alone and deserted, had infinite pathos. The movement owed much to the beauty of the obbligato playing. The shading here was very refined.

But the first and third movements were the great triumphs of Dr. Muck. The loftiness of the Faust movement which begins the symphony can never be described in cold leaden type. Of course, Liszt makes much more of "Faust" than Berlioz, who only uses him to damn him, or Gounod who serves him up in syrup and makes him a lover only, or Wagner who makes him a very discontented individual with unfulfilled longings, great ambitions and a fondness for the bass tuba. Liszt has caught the true idea of Goethe, the idea which is most faithfully pictured by Schumann in his great "Faust" work.

Greatest of Symphony

How poetically this idea is caught by Liszt may be seen in the movement which is the greatest and most remarkable of the symphony, and which was the orchestral triumph of yesterday afternoon—the "Mephistopheles" movement. Georg Henschel once said to the present writer: "One thing can never be pictured in Music, and that is Irony"—but Schumann's setting of Heine's poem disproves this. We translate it thus:—

A youth he loves a maiden,
Another she doth prefer.
The other has chosen another
And given his love to her.

The maid's love turns to anger,
And then she takes in scorn,
The first man in her pathway.
The youth is left to mourn.

It is an old, old story,
Yet new it doth remain,
And he to whom it happens,
His heart may rive in twain.

And the accompaniment of this is the most heartless jingle in the world. And Liszt gives bitter irony, in a much more extended manner, all through this movement. The very tempo mark—"Allegro Vivace Ironico,"—shows that Liszt did not share Mr. Henschel's opinion. And there is something more than mere Irony here, there is a metaphysical or ethical touch that is superb, for Mephistopheles is given no especial theme, but the destructive spirit, the soul of negation, the being that destroys but never creates, is portrayed by mocking at the themes of Faust, sneering at the aspirations and ambitions of the hero, yet, (a touch most purely ethical) the themes of Marguerite are beyond his power and escape unscathed amid the storm of destruction.

Subtleties of Picture

One can imagine how Dr. Muck would bring out all the subtleties of such a picture. The reading became one of the greatest triumphs he has achieved among us, and there is a long list to his credit, and every man in the orchestra, from first violinist to the player of the cymbals deserves praise.

The choral ending with its introduction of Goethe's pregnant words relative to "Das ewig Weibliche" is musically as great as what had preceded; we can imagine both Goethe and Liszt very much moved by "the eternal feminine." The chorus sang with steadiness, and to Mr. Paul Draper, after having sung the strange measures in Reznicek's "Schlemihl," the Liszt progressions must have seemed mere child's play, yet the tenor soloist betrayed effort in one or two phrases.

The words were sung in German and we can congratulate das Apollo-verein upon its clever pronunciation. In England it would be sufficient to cause them all to be imprisoned as Teutonic spies.

The final climaxes of orchestra and chorus were the grandest we have ever heard. Had not Liszt been so great a pianist the world would have recognized him sooner as a great composer. He stood in his own light—overshadowing himself.

There was wild enthusiasm at the end of the symphony, and the work and its performance certainly deserved it. The finale of the Faust symphony can scarcely be over-estimated.

Friedrich Klose is a modern, a teacher of composition in the Munich Academy, and this Prelude and Double Fugue is a 20th century composition. In this blessed century composers seem to choose one of two paths, each thorny enough. Either they write for a tremendous orchestra which runs from Celesta to Xyllophones, and give no melodies at all, but merely tonal grunts, or they become ascetically classical and scorn a single fugue or a direct canon as infantile, and aim at contrapuntal complexities that are the higher mathematics of music. Of the two evils the last is much the least, for in suc learned work we can always find coherency and logic.

The combination of organ and brasses in the final chorale was effective. It sounded well in the hall, the organ somehow being always acoustically more in synchronism with the auditorium than even the orchestra, while the masses of trumpets and trombones gave an incisive effect that was altogether out of the common. The final brass-playing was quite a new flavor and one which awakened even the jaded symphony auditor and caused him to sit up and take notice.

The organ solo, which formed the bulk of the composition, was excellently played by John P. Marshall, and the construction of the double fugue was as learned as anyone would expect from a Conservatory professor, yet it was not dry or tedious, and, as above intimated, infinitely above the free maunderings of the modern iconoclasts. Mr. Marshall was tasteful in his registration, too, and gave effective contrasts. But, like a wasp, the most important feature of this work was in its tail. There were, we think, 10 trumpets and 10 trombones, and when they let loose (like the German bands in a church belfry on Sylvesterabend) they could have been heard in Chelsea. It must have been something of this kind that was played a good many years ago before the walls of Jericho.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 27. 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FRESH MUSIC FROM REGER AND BORODIN

The Bavarian's Interesting Tone-Poems in His New Spirit and Manner — The Russian's Pictorial and Opera-Like Symphony—Miss Gerhardt Betters Her Singing—The Overture to "Oberon" and a Feat

PLEASURE of many sorts—and not one arduous—was plentiful at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, when as usual, after a fortnightly interval, the audience seemed especially warm toward Dr. Muck at his first coming to the stage. Orchestra and conductor were in form as, according to some ears, they are not always after their monthly journeys Southward and beyond questioning their playing of Weber's overture to his opera of "Oberon" was a feat of virtuosity that they only in American concert-rooms can achieve. The gossips say that the celebrated chord separating the introduction from the main body of the overture haunts the imagination of conductors. They hear in vision the perfect unanimity, precision, edgelessness and fire with which they would have their orchestras accomplish this tonal and dramatic stroke. Dr. Muck and the men came as near to these perfections as mortals may. In a single and instant flash, the chord clove the air and, familiar as it is, set the audience quivering, even as ninety years ago the first hearers of "Oberon" may have stirred to it. The horns may not be quite the best of the choirs of the orchestra, but their tone, through the long introduction, summoned the golden and suffused beauty of Weber's romantic song.

Orchestra and conductor struck tonal and rhythmic fire through the glowing and mounting course and the changeful and graphic eloquence of the rest of the overture. It remains still a masterpiece of romantic music; yet, with all the glories of the performance, it was good to have done for the season with Weber's three overtures and it is permissible to hope that for a year at least they may not return to the Symphony Concerts. Dr. Muck seems overdisposed to go an annual round of classic overtures for the closing number of his programmes as though they were a conventional and inevitable finale like the potpourri that usually closes an operetta. So doing, he overlooks more than one overture, ancient, modern and contemporary, that has gone too long unheard and unillumined by his hand.

In the overture to "Oberon," Dr. Muck was operatic conductor again, compassing atmosphere and mystery out of the song of the horns and filling the rest of the piece with the glow and the glamor, the diversity and the impetuosity of romantic action that the opera itself, unless so animated and transfigured, hardly yields. He was intrinsically operatic conductor again in Borodin's symphony in B minor that he has now revived, even as he first made it known to the public of the concerts. Not even Händel himself was more frugal with his music than these Russians—Borodin and Moussorgsky certainly and presumably not a few of an opera and then abandoned it; if they labored at a ballet only to have the producing theatre shy at it; if they so much as sketched a song and then laid it by, sooner or later they utilized the music for some new purpose. Like Händel they tempt the hearer to an unmitigated cynicism over the graphic power of music when they mate the same tones to very different words and use them to very different purpose. Yet the music of Borodin remains often as intrinsically pictorial in the symphony as it was destined to be in the opera for which it was composed. It has even its operatic kinships. Out of the finale rise the great forms of the barbaric boyards pompously feasting as they feast under their wooden and painted walls in a scene of Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina"; clarinet, harp and horn have no sooner begun the plaintive, exotic and quasi-oriental song of the slow movement than the eye sees the minstrels that hymn more than one prince in Rimsky-Korsakoff's operas; the recurring theme, the broad expansions, the rugged tonal pomps of the first movement recall one and another scene of stately ceremony in Russian music-drama. Only the scherzo seems quite self-contained, as becomes a movement in a symphony so formally continent as this of Borodin.

The virtues and shortcomings of the music alike accord with its original pictorial purpose in an opera of old Russia like "Prince Igor" that we are to hear next autumn. The repetitions may emphasize the action upon the stage; the occasional thinness may be as veils lifted upon the course of the music-drama; the alternation of melodic material rather than the orthodox development and interweaving of it may be due in measure to the original dramatic purpose of the music as well as to the familiar abstentions—and also limitations—of the Russian nationalists. Per contra, the richness and diversity of Borodin's harmonic and instrumental color; the force of his rhythms, the saliency, the individuality and the atmospheric suggestion of his melodies may all have their source, not only in him but in the original operatic purpose of the music. Above all, it is a rugged and full-voiced symphony, changeful as the Slav temperament, now of barbaric and iterated force, now of insinuating Oriental suggestion—a music different from that with which in essence the Western World has been content these hundred years. The power of Borodin, the Russian, has its occasional kinship with the power of Sibelius the Finn. To both, since they are rugged and strange and colorful, we Americans, being none of the three, lend a willing and approving ear.

In a sense Reger had the lion's share of the rest of the concert; since not only had he written his own four tone-poems "after" familiar pictures by Boecklin; but he had scored for orchestra the three songs of Brahms that Miss Gerhardt sang. Perhaps Reger, being often heavy-handed and involved in his own scoring, is not exactly the man that most of us would choose to give songs light, clear and elastic instrumental vesture. Nor has he any very obvious kinship with the Brahms of the grave or playful, the homely or the introspective, the quietly longing or the glowingly contemplative lyrics that fill his song-books and disclose his most human side. Reger is self-contained and singular; he suffices unto himself; he does not overflow with diverse human sympathies and impulses. His feet are well-planted on this firm set earth and especially upon the terrain of musical knowledge and resource. Only in his capacity for "head-work" in the art of composition and in his devotion to "absolute" music is he to be likened to Brahms. By "head-work" and a hand that the broadening and the softening years seem to be making lighter and more elastic, he scored these songs and only once and again did he lay upon them a heavier and a more intricate orchestral garment than they can fittingly and persuasively bear. He is even capable of the finely attuned violin part that he devises for "Wir Wandelten." Yet Mr. Nikisch doing likewise for three of Beethoven's songs that Miss Gerhardt also sang considerably excelled him.

In all these pieces the singer did not always rise to her best capabilities; but she was nearer to them than she was in much of her singing in her concert in Boston with Miss Harrison a few weeks ago Clearly Miss Gerhardt is not at the top of her vocal form; she failed once and again to fulfil her clear intent with her tones; and not always did wisdom guide that will. Perhaps much journeying and one or another intimate irritation have dimmed her spirit and clouded her powers. Her upper notes were sometimes neither steady nor full; and some of her intervals were hardly clean and sure progression from tone to tone. On the other hand, her middle voice often regained its old limidity, radiance and melting softness and more than once she proved anew her warmth and lusciousness of phrase after phrase as they flowed into the long, unbroken and artfully curving line of her sustained song. Then, as in Beethoven's "Wonne der Wehmut" and in Brahms's "Wir Wandelten," she was the Gerhardt of rare tonal beauty and of rare fineness of feeling in songs of contemplative and introspective sentiment. Singer, song and sensation were as one. She brought unexpected sweep of line and breadth of phrase to Beethoven's stark and far-flung song of the universe praising its Maker; but she was not so fortunate, perhaps because of the blows of Reger's orchestra, in Brahms's storm-tossed song of the churchyard. No more did "Freudvoll and Leidvoll" quite sparkle out of itself; but the poignant and foredoomed longing of Brahms's "Immer Leister"—a bitter and ironic little tragedy of suggestion—spoke out of her tones. Yesterday Miss Gerhardt neared justice to herself and the full pleasure that her audiences expect from her. This evening she may quite achieve them.

Reger's four tone-poems were most interesting as the first hint that we in Boston have received of the new spirit, method and manner in his music. We have still to hear his "Ballet Suite" which does not lack charm, fancy or lightness of workmanship; and we know not as yet the warm imagination and the free and ardent procedure of his "Romantic Suite." But the tone-poems of yesterday plainly suggested the change that impulse from without or within has wrought. In his earlier fashion he overdoes the expression of the mood of passionate lamentation that Boecklin's picture, "The Isle of the Dead," seems with a strange insistence to stir in him: "Bacchanal," suggested by the picture of fat, drunken and sprawling Romans, necessarily implies a robustious, coarse-fibred and similarly sprawling music and Reger has done more than fulfill graphically enough the prescription that the choice of the canvas and the theory and practice of musical contrast laid upon him. On the other hand, he is sportive, light, quick-witted and even flashing with his gay, bright and playful response in tones to "The Frolic of the Waves" and he charms by the play of a shrewd and smiling scholarship through the ecclesiastical voice and the aerated sentiment of "The Fiddling Hermit."

In all four pieces Reger is neither involved nor acrid, and no heavier than "Bacchanal" in itself and his own notion of "The Isle of the Dead" required. Especially in the two lighter pieces he is almost graceful of melody and mood; sprightly of invention; clear, pliant and fanciful in coloring; adept with his rhythms, transmitting a vivid impression in clear and free unity of mood, method and material. Neither "The Fiddling Hermit" nor "The Sport of the Waves" is a remarkable piece except as it shows the new spirit that has entered into Reger and the new manner that gives it voice; and the music suggests little of the pictures whence Reger borrows his titles. "The Sport of the Waves" is a fancifully invented and fancifully developed scherzo, light, limpid and frolicsome. "The Fiddling Hermit" transforms ecclesiastical modes dashed with sentiment into tonal folk-tale. "Bacchanal" is music after the kind of Boecklin's picture or the Sunday sprees of the big-bodied Bavarian peasants who in their cups are not so far from these pictured Romans. It is of Reger flinging tone and progression about to boisterous rhythm nd with the amplest of ready means. Cu- ly, his music from "The Isle of the affords hardly a hint of the tone- to which it has stirred other com- eger lifts only the voice of plan- ation and troubled longing, as ick as well as the dead dwelt Yet it is a more human oice than has often come —or rather younger—music.

H. T. P.

SUNDAY HERALD,

APRIL 4, 1915.

SAN FRANCISCO PROGRAMS OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Muck has made a remarkable list of programs for the 12 subscription concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give at the Panama-Pacific international exposition at San Francisco from May 11 to May 26, inclusive. It will be seen at a glance that they should please the reverers of the classics and those more keenly interested in modern music. The catholicity of the programs is also to be noted. Seven French composers are represented, four Italians, four Russians and a Finn, besides German, Austrian, Bohemian and Hungarian composers.

No. 1.
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" .... Beethoven
Variations on a Theme by Haydn .... Brahms
"Don Juan" .... Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe" .... Weber

No. 2.
Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" .... Mendelssohn
Symphony in G major, "Surprise" .... Haydn
Suite No. 2, "Indian" .... MacDowell
"Hungaria," Symphonic Poem .... Liszt

No. 3—FRENCH PROGRAM.
Symphony in D minor .... Cesar Franck
"L'Apprenti Sorcier" .... Dukas
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1 .... Bizet
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier

No. 4.
Symphony No. 1 .... Brahms
Suite for Flute and Strings in B minor, No. 2 .... Bach
Solo Flute, Andre Maquarre.
Shepherds' Music from the "Christmas" Oratorio .... Bach
Overture to "Egmont" .... Beethoven

No. 5—WAGNER PROGRAM.
Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

No. 6.
Overture to "Der Freischuetz" .... Weber
Symphony No. 8, in F major .... Beethoven
Symphonic Sketches .... Chadwick
"Karelia," Overture .... Sibelius
"The Swan of Tuonela" .... Sibelius
"Finlandia" .... Sibelius

No. 7.
Symphony No. 2 .... Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes" .... Liszt
"Death and Transfiguration" .... Strauss
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner

No. 8—ITALIAN PROGRAM.
Symphony No. 1 .... Sgambati
Overture to "Anacreon" .... Cherubini
Intermezzi Goldoniani .... Bossi
Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chizzote" Sinigaglia

No. 9.
Symphony in G minor .... Mozart
Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra .... Bach
(Solo violins, Messrs. Witek and Noack.)
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
"A Siegfried Idyl" .... Wagner
Overture, "Carnival" .... Dvorak

No. 10—FRENCH PROGRAM.
Symphony No. 3, for orchestra and organ, Saint-Saens
"The Afternoon of a Faun" .... Debussy
Three Pieces from "The Damnation of Faust" .... Berlioz
Overture to "Gwendoline" .... Chabrier

No. 11.
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic," Tschaikowsky
Overture Solonelle .... Glazounoff
On the Steppes of Central Asia .... Borodin
Caprice on Spanish Themes ... Rimsky-Korsakoff

No. 12.
Symphony No. 1 .... Sibelius
Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" ... Strauss
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3 .... Beethoven

TRANSCRIPT.

MARCH 30, 1915

FOR SAN FRANCISCO

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES FOR THE WORLD'S FAIR

A Remarkable Array of Music That Ranges Through Ancient and Modern Classics of Many Schools and Nationalities—Five Specialized Programmes—The Orchestra to Be Unassisted—A Difficult Job Notably Done

FOR a fortnight past, Dr. Muck has been working at the programmes for the twelve concerts that he and the Symphony Orchestra will undertake at the Panama-Pacific exhibition at San Francisco in May. At last he has finished a difficult job and the twelve programmes traversing some sixty pieces, all to be played within a fortnight and on consecutive days, follow hereunder. Five of them are specialized programmes: that is to say, two concerts are to fall wholly to music by French composers; one to music wholly from Italian hands; one to Russian pieces; and a fifth to preludes, overtures and other fragments of Wagner's operas and music-dramas. Dr. Muck has preferred to make no "American programme," that should isolate native composers in a class by themselves. Rather, he has taken a piece from MacDowell and a piece from Chadwick and placed both in miscellaneous programmes as he would the music of any established, interesting and well-reputed composer whatever his nationality. So has he treated Sibelius, the Finn; or Liszt, the Hungarian; or Dvoràk, the Bohemian.

In time and scope, the chosen music ranges from Bach, Mozart and Haydn, through Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Brahms, Liszt, Wagner, Saint-Saëns, Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff down to Strauss, Debussy and Sibelius. Beyond these composers into the ranks of the controverted ultra-moderns, Dr. Muck has prudently decided that it were unwise to go. Until their day, almost every composer of the first rank—Schubert, Schumann and Händel aside, all of whom were symphonists by exception—has his place upon the programmes. They preserve as carefully the balance between ancient and modern music; between the classic, the romantic, and the impressionistic fashion of composition; between the formal symphony and overture and the freer-handed tone-poem and tone-picture; they make choice of composers by their established worth and not by nationality; and they make choice, without fear or favor, of pieces by their established place in symphony concerts; their intrinsic interest, and their suitability to a comprehensive scheme to be accomplished in unusual circumstance.

The range and the nature of the programmes bid fair also to disclose the many-sided qualities that make the Symphony Orchestra the unique orchestra of the present world, and, as it should be, Dr. Muck and the men, unhampered by intruding singers and virtuosi, will have the twelve concerts wholly to themselves. No such series of programmes for such concerts has been made in the United States since Theodore Thomas's day at the World's Fair in Chicago and in them Dr. Muck has proved—beyond his usual wont as they would say in New York—his virtues as a programme-maker. Strange as it seems, to some that lightly and hastily find fault with his programmes, he gives pains, thought and imagination to the making of them. Here are the twelve for San Francisco:

I.

Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat, "Eroica".... Beethoven
Variations on a Theme by Haydn (Chorale Sancti Antoni) ....Brahms Tone Poem, "Don Juan"................Strauss
Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe".....Weber

II.

Concert Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage"......................Mendelssohn
Symphony, No. 6, in G Major, "Surprise"..Haydn
Suite, No. 2, in E Minor, "Indian"....MacDowell
Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria".............Liszt

III.

(French Programme)

Symphony in D Minor.....................Franck
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"......Dukas
Suite, "L'Arlésienne," No. 1................Bizet
Rhapsody, "España" ....Chabrier

IV.

Symphony, No. 1, in C Minor.............Brahms
Suite for Flue and Strings in B Minor.......Bach Solo flute, Mr. Maquarre.
"Shepherds' Music," from the Christmas Oratorio...................................Bach
Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont"..Beethoven

V.

(Wagner Programme)

Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

VI.

Overture to the opera, "Der Freischütz"...Weber
Symphony, No. 8, in F Major...........Beethoven
Symphonic Sketches ....Chadwick
Karelia.—The Swan of Tuonela.—Finlandia. Sibelius

VII.

Symphony, No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73....Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes".........Liszt
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration" .... Strauss
Prelude to the opera, "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg".......................Wagner

VIII.

(Italian Programme)

Symphony, No. 1, in D Major...........Sgambati
Overture to the opera, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Intermezzi Goldoniani, Op 127.............Bossi
Overture to Goldoni's comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzete," .... Sinigaglia

IX.

Symphony, No. 2, in G Minor............Mozart
Concerto in D Minor, for Two Violins and Orchestra of Strings.......................Bach
(Solo Violins: Messrs. Witek and Noack.)
Overture to the Play, "Sakuntala," Op. 13 Goldmark
"A Siegfried Id" ....Wagner
Concert Overture, "Carnival"............Dvorak

X.

(French Programme)

Symphony, No. 3, in C Minor, for Orchestra and Organ .... Saint-Saëns
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"......................Debussy
Three Pieces from "The Damnation of Faust" ....Berlioz
Overture to the Opera, "Gwendoline"...Chabrier

XI.

(Russian Programme)

Symphony, No 6, in B Minor, "Pathetic"... Tschaikowsky
Solemn Overture ....Glazounoff
On the Steppes of Central Asia...........Borodin
Caprice on Spanish Themes....Rimsky-Korsakoff

XII.

Symphony, No. 1, in E Minor.............Sibelius
Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"...Strauss
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3............Beethoven

BOSTON HERALD.

APRIL 3. 1915.

19TH REHEARSAL BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony Enjoyed—Klose Composition Also Played.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program consisted of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, in which the orchestra was assisted by a male chorus from the Apollo Club and Mr. Paul Draper, tenor; and Klose's Prelude and Double Fugue for organ (Chorale at the end with trumpets and trombone). Mr. John P. Marshall was the organist.

Friedrich Klose has been only a name in Boston. His organ piece was played here for the first time and it is not fair to judge him from it. He has written various works of long breath, among them are important compositions—important as far as the general scheme is concerned—in which the organ is used with the orchestra. Born at Carlsruhe in 1862, having taught at Geneva and Basle, he is now teacher of composition at the Academy of Music in Munich.

How he was led to write the Prelude and Fugue is told in his preface to the score. At Bayreuth in 1882 he met Anton Bruckner, whose "Romantic" symphony had impressed him, and there he talked and drank with him. Bruckner played the organ for him and improvised a fugue on a "wild ascending theme." Some years later Klose studied with Bruckner. In grateful remembrance of his teacher he wrote this Prelude and Fugue, using as a motto the "wild ascending" theme, which also serves as the beginning of his first fugal subject.

The composition is more interesting to the student of fugue and of the organ than to the public. It is often said of respectable and unemotional music that it is "well made." This compliment is too often a reproach, if it is not a sneer. Klose's Prelude is not impressive, nor is his Fugue as a whole engrossing or dramatic. There are awkward passages for the organist; passages that do not lie well for hands or feet. The quotation itself from Bruckner is not a striking one, nor is it well adapted always to contrapuntal employment. One of the better portions is the long pedal point which brings the climax. Klose introduces four trumpets and four trombones in the final chorale. Dr. Muck doubled these instruments and added a tuba; but even then the choral with the full organ had little real effect.

The audience listened respectfully at first, but at last—for the composition is very long—many by their attitude recalled to our mind an entry in Grant Duff's Diary: "Congreve, the Positivist hierophant, begins his Conciones ad populum, in an upper room of the Sussex Hotel, in Bouverie street. Some one said, describing the scene, 'And there was Lord Houghton sleeping exactly as if he had been in church.' "

The performance of the "Faust" symphony in last January made a profound impression. It is not surprising that Dr. Muck wished to repeat the performance this season. It is not necessary to speak again in detail of the symphony or the manner in which it was played. It is enough is say that the music seemed even more poetic, dramatic, imaginative, imposing. Perhaps in the first movement there are a few passages that might be cut out or condensed, but no one would wish the movement "Gretchen" to be changed in any way. Of all the music that is associated with the innocent maiden of Goethe's poem, this is surely the most expressive, the most beautiful. The remorseful, crazed Gretchen is not in Liszt's picture. We find her in the prison music of Boito. And how paltry does the music of Mephistopheles conceived by Gounod seem in comparison with the ironical fiend of Liszt, mocking the doubts and the aspirations of the disillusionized philosopher!

It is the fashion for some to admit the genius of Liszt in shaping the symphonic poem, in enlarging the scope of the symphony; to admit, though grudgingly, his influence on contemporaries and followers even to this day; but they deny his creative power, as there are some who find no "ideas" in the music of Berlioz, no skill in thematic treatment, only an unusual sense of orchestral color and an inexplicable ability in orchestration. Argument is out of the question with these men. They have ears and they do not hear; they will not hear. Berlioz and Liszt are not thus to be idly dismissed. It is not possible to think of modern music [illegible] their glorious names and remembering their music. It is pleasant to think that in this city they have long been ranked among the immortals. The music of Berlioz has been heard here since 1851 and often with passionate admiration. The programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra show the prominence given to the Hungarian abbe, as it was given here by Theodore Thomas before the Boston Orchestra was established.

The performance of the "Faust" symphony yesterday should have turned the most prejudiced, the most "conservative" from the error of his ways. Not only Mr. Longy was eloquent in the oboe solos; the whole orchestra was dramatically emotional. No wonder that an unusual tribute was paid to Dr. Muck and the players.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Korngold, Sinfonietta (first time here); Beethoven, concerto in E flat major for piano (Mr. Leonard Borwick, pianist); Sinigaglia, overture to "Le Baruffe Chiozzote." Mr. Borwick has not visited Boston since December, 1911.

BOSTON GLOBE

APRIL 3

LISZT'S "FAUST."

Great Symphony Repeated in Fine Performance.

Dr Muck, Apollo Club and Orchestra Win Praise—Stupid Novelty Added.

For the second time this season the huge "Faust" symphony of Liszt, given with the assistance of the Apollo Club in the final chorus, occupied the chief place on Dr Muck's program yesterday. It was the 19th symphony rehearsal. Technically there has been special interest to Boston in these performances because of Dr Muck's access last Summer, through Siegfried Wagner's permission, to a score of the symphony found at Wahnfried, Wagner's home at Bayreuth, in which Liszt, about 1883, had made changes and additions, a version which in these two pairs of concerts in Boston has been produced for the first times anywhere.

Outside of the substitution of the bass clarinet, an instrument not in Liszt's original score, for the bassoon in the opening measures of the "Faust" or first movement, the general patron of concerts might not detect differences in the revision. But it is the music itself and this superb performance that make it a matter of moment. Dr Muck was recalled again after the players had left their places for the intermission and rewarded with applause not common at the Friday afternoon rehearsal.

The psychology of the relation of the three chief characters, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, as Liszt has seen it in the choice and use of thematic material, is engrossing, but not essential to a deep appreciation of a vividity of feeling and a dramatic expression which seems revolutionary as associated with the year 1853. Liszt had observed well his predecessor Berlioz. Less given to extravagance and theatricalism than he, Liszt noted his methods as an orcheerful colorist, as a painter of moods.

Courageous Composer.

That portions of this "symphony" are prolix; that there is to be found overuse of sequence, without sufficient development to repay a modern ear for the restatement of an idea; that there is padding and monotony of color, particularly in the "Gretchen" movement, is as apparent as the needless length of it.

But the orchestral technic displayed the inspiration and poetic truth to be found in the conception of the characters, and the emotional intensity with which they are embodied, particularly the dual nature of Faust and the sinister love of destruction in his adversary, all speak of a state of romantic thought and feeling far beyond the time.

Weber had died but 27 years before. A few years later Wagner's "Tristan" was to be abandoned at the Vienna opera after 57 rehearsals because it would be considered unsingable. The courage and conviction of a composer, who was the darling of the world as a pianist, to put on paper music such as this in the middle of the last century, commands respect and wonder.

Notable Performance.

The performance bids fair to rank as the notable one of the Symphony year. There were noble and inspired moments in the "Faust" music, while that of Mephistopheles was given with marvelous appreciation of its sardonic vein. There was momentary unsteadiness of pitch in one of the woodwinds at the beginning of the second movement, but later the sustained beauty of the song returned.

The Apollo Club took its part with fine precision and sonority. Paul Draper, a singer possessing subtlety of interpretation essential to lieder, pathetically lacks the voice imperative in this solo part. The duration of the symphony was an hour and 15 minutes.

The other number on the program was a prelude and double fugue for organ with choral for trumpets and trombones. There were eight each of the latter, composed of the orchestral brasses and their pupils. John Marshall was the organist.

The composer, one Friedrich Klose, is probably an honest, learned and God-fearing man. His music was tedious when it was not noisy. A brass choir is not necessarily made for din. The score would do well for Boston Common on the Fourth of July.

BOSTON JOURNAL

APRIL 3, 1915.

LISZT'S "FAUST" MAKES RECORDS

Evokes Biggest Enthusiasm of the Symphony Season.

Liszt's "Faust" symphony, featured for the second time this season on Dr. Muck's programs, drew the biggest crowd of the Symphony season yesterday afternoon and capped this record by arousing the biggest outburst of enthusiasm witnessed at a Symphony concert for a long, long time.

Hundreds of enthusiasts couldn't get into the hall at all. Moreover, for the benefit of those who may be ruminating on the probability of attending tonight's concert, it should be said that the house is well-nigh sold out already. There has been nothing like this intense interest over a symphony in Boston in recent years except at one or two special performances of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

The "Faust" symphony is gradually forcing its way into recognition as the most impressive musical translation of Goethe's drama. It is wonderfully rich both in lyrical and dramatic qualities. The three movements, entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," are in reality nothing more or less than three masterly tone poems. The "Chorus mysticus," at the end, is the least effective part of the work. The forte measures demand a somewhat larger chorus than that of the Apollo Club, which is assisting the orchestra again, with Paul Draper as tenor soloist.

But the performance yesterday was, on the whole, extremely eloquent, and when it was over the audience not only gave the orchestra the well-deserved ovation, but it recalled Dr. Muck again and again.

An ecclesiastical offering, in German style, is Friedrich Klose's prelude and double fugue for organ, played by John P. Marshall, with trumpets and trombones taking part in the choral at the finale. This novelty might perhaps be regarded as appropriate to the Lenten season. It assuredly furnished a radical contrast to the dramatic Liszt work.

Next week's program will be made up of a new "Sinfonietta" by Eric Korngold, Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, with piano solo by Leonard Borwick, and the Sinigaglia overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote."

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 3.

ORGAN AND VOICES AID SYMPHONY

New Work by Klose Played and Liszt's Great "Faust"

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck repeated one of the most impressive performances he has ever given in Boston—the Faust symphony of Liszt, with the Apollo Club, including Paul Draper, tenor soloist, assisting.

The only other music on the programme was Friedrich Klose's Prelude and Double Fugue for Organ (John P. Marshall organist), with a chorale for organ, trumpets and trombones. This fugue and chorale was heard for the first time in Boston.

UNCOMMONLY INTERESTING

Klose, now in his 53rd year, teaches at Munich. The production of his opera, or, as it is called, "dramatic symphony, Ilsebill," after the tale of the fisherman's wife who could never be content with the good that fortune bestowed, established his reputation in Germany. It is an uncommonly interesting work. The prelude, fugue and chorale played yesterday are also interesting. The contrapuntal structure is elaborate, but free.

The chorale, for numerous instruments of brass, is a fitting climax to the work. The course of the fugue is interrupted by rich departures from the beaten track. Rhythmically the work is very intricate and scholarly. Technically it is a tour de force. As for its ultimate value, that is not easily determined at first hearing. Klose is not wearing his heart on his sleeve. His themes are not over grateful in themselves. Take the somewhat unwieldy fugue subject. What if it does serve to display anew the composer's skill in its treatment? There is more than that in music. The composition might be called "Homage to Bruckner," since the theme of the chorale is Bruckner's, taken down by Klose during Bruckner's improvisation on an organ in Bayreuth. It is no better than many chorale themes and not as good as some.

Of Extreme Difficulty

The work is worth repeating. It is extremely ungrateful for the organist. Not only is it without doubt one of the most difficult pieces in the literature of the organ, but it is also true that in many cases the passages hardly bring their reward, once mastered. Mr. Marshall did what he could do to give Klose's message to the audience, but a piece like this should be heard more than once to show at its true colors.

The most accomplished virtuoso on the organ, the most attentive audience, would welcome opportunity of the better acquaintance with repetition brings.

Still Music of the Future

Liszt's symphony was as impressive yesterday as it was last January. When it was first produced, back in the 40s, the catch sneer was "music of the future." Music of the future it not only was, but is! The Mephistofeles movement alone would be enough to place Liszt in the first rank among the composers of the later 19th century. One then goes back, and is hardly less impressed with the beauty and the truthfulness of characterization in the music of Gretchen. Finally the first movement, "Faust."

Two men have portrayed Faust in tones, Wagner and Liszt. Liszt's conception is the more mature, the more complete. Faust from every angle of the complex personality of Goethe is heard in this movement—Faust's pride, aspirations, love self-torture, his vain speculations, his ceaseless strivings for the truth—all this is found in Liszt's music. Liszt and Wagner, with a possible third, namely, the Boito of the opera, "Mefistofele," all intellectuals, are the only composers who have yet understood the hero of the poem.

This symphony has been revealed by Dr. Muck and none other. So far as this city is concerned it would have been respectfully exhumed from the shelves every five or six years and dished up as a sort of burnt offering to the god Liszt. Then it would have been tucked away again with a sigh of relief. Lo and behond! Symphony Hall could not yesterday and cannot tonight contain the people who want to hear music that was the very crown of madness in the 40s—the "Faust" symphony.

The performance was again worthy of the work, and Dr. Muck returned to the stage repeatedly to acknowledge applause. The orchestra stood with him. Those who attended were fortunate. They listened to one of the greatest achievements in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

APRIL 3, 1915

LISZT'S GREAT "FAUST" WORK HAS RENDERING

Repeated on Program of Boston Symphony Orchestra Popular Interest Increases — Organ Piece by Klose First Time

SYMPHONY HALL—Nineteenth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 2. The program: Liszt, "Faust" symphony, with male chorus from the Apollo Club and Paul Draper, tenor, assisting; Klose, prelude and double fugue for organ, with choral ending for choirs of trumpets and trombones, John P. Marshall, organist (first Boston performance).

The freshest music the orchestra plays is that which was composed from 40 to 60 years ago. Last week the Borodin symphony in B minor, dating from 1877, proved one of the real novelties of the season, more original in feeling than pieces dating within the present decade have been. This week the "Faust" symphony, dating from 1857, proves the most recent thing of all, both in thematic plan and in instrumental method.

Scholars have long known how the Liszt case stood. They have told the world that Liszt taught Wagner and Strauss all there was to teach about the building of music on theme development and theme transformation. But the world has paid little heed to its musical scholars. It cared little as to who was the first architect in the modern symphonic style. It selected its favorites by the external charm of their product, not by the fundamental appeal of their line, form and balance. It preferred Wagner to Liszt, because the Wagnerian facades are so ornate and pretty. It prefrred Strauss to Liszt, because the Straussian roofs make such smart and saucy silhouettes against the sky.

Listeners have favored Wagner and Strauss, believing that these composers were the master-thinkers; believing that these two had the genius to apply ideas which Liszt only groped for and which he but feebly succeeded in formulating. But listeners based their choice on a wrong supposition. The actual reason why they liked Wagner and Strauss was because these orchestral writers struck a manner of expression that was more obvious than Liszt's. And in making their preference as they did, they overlooked the most vital musical message the nineteenth century records after Beethoven.

Now that Wagner and Strauss have had their say, Liszt is beginning to have a chance of serious hearing. Listeners today are finding in his scores a larger statement of nineteenth century ideals than they have found elsewhere. They are in a position to judge fairly between the composers who have made preeminent use of the theme transformation plan of writing. And they cannot but admit that Liszt, the composer who invented the idea, was the one who also best applied it.

To go back to the days of the Wagner and Strauss enthusiasm, plainly listeners had much reason for choosing as they did. If Wagner and Strauss seemed plausible to them, while Liszt seemed aimless and confused, there was excuse for the situation. For the fact is that nineteenth century listeners could seldom have heard Liszt adequately performed and interpreted. For verification of this point, we cannot advantageously consult symphony conductors or orchestral players. They will not easily remember the time when they could not present their Liszt just as well as they can today.

More instructive will be old reviews of concerts in the leading musical cities of the world, for these record the effect of the playing of Liszt's music on the public ear. And what the public hears is the measure of the artistic quality of concerts, not what the players hope it hears. Now a review of any nineteenth century performance of the "Faust" symphony that refers to an audience taking pleasure in any portion but the second movement, is a rare document to find. We can only conclude that Wagner and Strauss as imitators, or at best followers of Liszt, were easier to play; and being better played, were more readily comprehended by the public.

At the present time orchestral players are with musical scholars in their appreciation of Liszt, and the "Faust" symphony gets presented in the fulness of its meaning. On Friday afternoon when the work was repeated because of its success on a program of the midseason, not only the second movement, but the first and third, and the choral ending, made a profound impression. Every phrase of the music was in the conductor's control. The work became as clear as a symphony of Beethoven. It was nowhere aimless or confused, because it was commandingly interpreted. Especially brilliant was the playing of the strings, on which everything in the difficult first movement, dealing with the character of Faust, depends. The themes were sharply outlined in all their transformations, and the portrait of the philosopher and cavalier was clear to the last lineament. The concertmaster, absent a week ago, was fortunately back at his desk. The first movement of the symphony could not have had its vivacity and intellectual drive without Mr. Witek leading the first violins.

The second movement, in nineteenth century reviews again and again referred to as the only engrossing part of the work, was extraordinarily beautiful at this performance. The solo oboe, which is the voice of Gretchen, was played in Mr. Longy's most poetic manner. The third movement was a challenge to Dr. Muck's talents as a reader of musical satire and it got his shrewdest attention. Remarkable was the characterization of Mephistopheles taken up here and there by the first bassoon. Mr. Sadony is always ready when he has an especial interpretative opportunity, but he surpassed himself at this performance.

The ending for the male chorus was read with dignity and the solo tenor part sung with pathos and persuasion. If there ever was an excuse for introducing voices into a symphony, it is in this great work of Liszt, and if there ever was excuse for the repetition of words, it is in the chorus and solo here.

The organ piece which was played after the intermission hardly belonged to the same program with the "Faust" symphony. It was, however, an attractive piece, considered by itself. But its attractiveness cannot be said to have been in the trumpet and trombone chorus with which it noisily ended. The charm of the work was in its elegance as writing for the organ and in the blending of ancient and modern sentiment in prelude, fugue and chorale. The joining in of so much brass at the close is an artificial climax, out of keeping with the general calm of the piece. It is a dramatic idea awkwardly handled, or so it seems in concert performance. Mr. Marshall played the organ part admirably, ordering his registration in such a way that technical display was subordinated to the presentation of idea. If this new work by Klose had no very clear program relation with the "Faust" symphony, it nevertheless has a rightful place in the program scheme of the year. The Symphony hall organ is rightly coming into use not only as an instrument to supplement the orchestra but as one on which to produce works of solo interest.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

APRIL 3, 1915.

LISZT "FAUST" SYMPHONY AGAIN

Second Hearing Arouses Exceptional Enthusiasm—Apollo Club Assists.

The second hearing of the Liszt "Faust" Symphony, as afforded yesterday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra, serves to strengthen one's regard for the great work, for Dr. Muck and the players. It gave even more satisfaction than when played earlier in the year, and aroused even more enthusiasm. The wonderfully beautiful Gretchen movement retains its place as the gem of the symphony, with the Mephistopheles movement affording Dr. Muck and the players an opportunity to display their peerless artistry as is seldom afforded. As at the earlier presentation, the orchestra was assisted by the Apollo Club and Paul Draper, tenor soloist. The vocal part was in keeping with the high standard of the orchestral, but still one could well wish for a better voice than Mr. Draper's in the solo work.

There was only one other number on the program, owing to the length of the symphony, that being a Prelude and Double Fugue for Organ, with a Choral at the end with trumpets and trombones, by Klose. Mr. Marshall was of course at the organ. The number, save in the choral, was not particularly interesting, although Mr. Marshall did some excellent work on the organ.

Chicago

SUNDAY TRIBUNE:

MARCH 28. 1915.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concluded its season with the concerts of Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The only unfamiliar composition was the fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk tunes by Vincent d'Indy. It is, naturally, not an important work, using the word important in two senses—that of the critics of painting as well as the common one. But it is pretty music and pleasing to the ear, somewhat wearied in these troublous times with listening to complicated endeavors to prove that out of nothing something can be made. The performer of the solo part was, of course, George Longy, the first oboist of the orchestra, an artist of the foremost rank and a musician of such fastidious taste that he invariably gives delight to the cultivated listener.

Thursday evening Dr. Muck bathed his gloomy soul in the Elysian raptures of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." He gave us a cool and highly polished performance of the composition, and Emil Ferir, the violinist, played the obbligato commendably. When it was all over, those who for years have failed to discover the might of this music were just where they had always been, and those who have always seen in the symphony wonders and splendors far beyond those of the original Byronic poem were beatified. At the matinée concert the orchestral numbers were Schubert's C major symphony and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Curiously enough, precisely these same works had been performed by the Philharmonic under Mr. Stansky only eight days earlier. Probably Chicago, being blessed with one great orchestra of her own, escapes this sort of thing. In New York it is inevitable that if one conductor gives a certain symphony or overture in the first week in March, another will play the same thing in the third week. Of course, the one never knows that the other is going to do it or has done it, or may, can, or must do it. The general public does not care, but the poor slaves of the concert hall treadmill, the critics, have to hear all these repetitions and try to refrain from making the comparisons which the conductors challenge them to make. If one of the local critics, for instance, should openly declare that the Boston Symphony orchestra's performance of the Schubert symphony made that of the Philharmonic sound like an echo, the old familiar battle would begin once more, and people with tremendous power in the financial and social world would set out to capture that critic's scalp.

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 3.

ORGAN AND VOICES AID SYMPHONY

New Work by Klose Played and Liszt's Great "Faust"

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck repeated one of the most impressive performances he has ever given in Boston—the Faust symphony of Liszt, with the Apollo Club, including Paul Draper, tenor soloist, assisting.

The only other music on the programme was Friedrich Klose's Prelude and Double Fugue for Organ (John P. Marshall organist), with a chorale for organ, trumpets and trombones. This fugue and chorale was heard for the first time in Boston.

UNCOMMONLY INTERESTING

Klose, now in his 53rd year, teaches at Munich. The production of his opera, or, as it is called, "dramatic symphony, Ilsebill," after the tale of the fisherman's wife who could never be content with the good that fortune bestowed, established his reputation in Germany. It is an uncommonly interesting work. The prelude, fugue and chorale played yesterday are also interesting. The contrapuntal structure is elaborate, but free.

The chorale, for numerous instruments of brass, is a fitting climax to the work. The course of the fugue is interrupted by rich departures from the beaten track. Rhythmically the work is very intricate and scholarly. Technically it is a tour de force. As for its ultimate value, that is not easily determined at first hearing. Klose is not wearing his heart on his sleeve. His themes are not over grateful in themselves. Take the somewhat unwieldy fugue subject. What if it does serve to display anew the composer's skill in its treatment? There is more than that in music. The composition might be called "Homage to Bruckner," since the theme of the chorale is Bruckner's, taken down by Klose during Bruckner's improvisation on an organ in Bayreuth. It is no better than many chorale themes and not as good as some.

Of Extreme Difficulty

The work is worth repeating. It is extremely ungrateful for the organist. Not only is it without doubt one of the most difficult pieces in the literature of the organ, but it is also true that in many cases the passages hardly bring their reward, once mastered. Mr. Marshall did what he could do to give Klose's message to the audience, but a piece like this should be heard more than once to show at its true colors.

The most accomplished virtuoso on the organ, the most attentive audience, would welcome opportunity of the better acquaintance with repetition brings.

Still Music of the Future

Liszt's symphony was as impressive yesterday as it was last January. When it was first produced, back in the 40s, the catch sneer was "music of the future." Music of the future it not only was, but is! The Mephistofeles movement alone would be enough to place Liszt in the first rank among the composers of the later 19th century. One then goes back, and is hardly less impressed with the beauty and the truthfulness of characterization in the music of Gretchen. Finally the first movement, "Faust."

Two men have portrayed Faust in tones, Wagner and Liszt. Liszt's conception is the more mature, the more complete. Faust from every angle of the complex personality of Goethe is heard in this movement—Faust's pride, aspirations, love self-torture, his vain speculations, his ceaseless strivings for the truth—all this is found in Liszt's music. Liszt and Wagner, with a possible third, namely, the Boito of the opera, "Mefistofele," all intellectuals, are the only composers who have yet understood the hero of the poem.

This symphony has been revealed by Dr. Muck and none other. So far as this city is concerned it would have been respectfully exhumed from the shelves every five or six years and dished up as a sort of burnt offering to the god Liszt. Then it would have been tucked away again with a sigh of relief. Lo and behond! Symphony Hall could not yesterday and cannot tonight contain the people who want to hear music that was the very crown of madness in the 40s—the "Faust" symphony.

The performance was again worthy of the work, and Dr. Muck returned to the stage repeatedly to acknowledge applause. The orchestra stood with him. Those who attended were fortunate. They listened to one of the greatest achievements in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

APRIL 3, 1915

LISZT'S GREAT "FAUST" WORK HAS RENDERING

Repeated on Program of Boston Symphony Orchestra Popular Interest Increases — Organ Piece by Klose First Time

SYMPHONY HALL—Nineteenth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 2. The program: Liszt, "Faust" symphony, with male chorus from the Apollo Club and Paul Draper, tenor, assisting; Klose, prelude and double fugue for organ, with choral ending for choirs of trumpets and trombones, John P. Marshall, organist (first Boston performance).

The freshest music the orchestra plays is that which was composed from 40 to 60 years ago. Last week the Borodin symphony in B minor, dating from 1877, proved one of the real novelties of the season, more original in feeling than pieces dating within the present decade have been. This week the "Faust" symphony, dating from 1857, proves the most recent thing of all, both in thematic plan and in instrumental method.

Scholars have long known how the Liszt case stood. They have told the world that Liszt taught Wagner and Strauss all there was to teach about the building of music on theme development and theme transformation. But the world has paid little heed to its musical scholars. It cared little as to who was the first architect in the modern symphonic style. It selected its favorites by the external charm of their product, not by the fundamental appeal of their line, form and balance. It preferred Wagner to Liszt, because the Wagnerian facades are so ornate and pretty. It prefrred Strauss to Liszt, because the Straussian roofs make such smart and saucy silhouettes against the sky.

Listeners have favored Wagner and Strauss, believing that these composers were the master-thinkers; believing that these two had the genius to apply ideas which Liszt only groped for and which he but feebly succeeded in formulating. But listeners based their choice on a wrong supposition. The actual reason why they liked Wagner and Strauss was because these orchestral writers struck a manner of expression that was more obvious than Liszt's. And in making their preference as they did, they overlooked the most vital musical message the nineteenth century records after Beethoven.

Now that Wagner and Strauss have had their say, Liszt is beginning to have a chance of serious hearing. Listeners today are finding in his scores a larger statement of nineteenth century ideals than they have found elsewhere. They are in a position to judge fairly between the composers who have made preeminent use of the theme transformation plan of writing. And they cannot but admit that Liszt, the composer who invented the idea, was the one who also best applied it.

To go back to the days of the Wagner and Strauss enthusiasm, plainly listeners had much reason for choosing as they did. If Wagner and Strauss seemed plausible to them, while Liszt seemed aimless and confused, there was excuse for the situation. For the fact is that nineteenth century listeners could seldom have heard Liszt adequately performed and interpreted. For verification of this point, we cannot advantageously consult symphony conductors or orchestral players. They will not easily remember the time when they could not present their Liszt just as well as they can today.

More instructive will be old reviews of concerts in the leading musical cities of the world, for these record the effect of the playing of Liszt's music on the public ear. And what the public hears is the measure of the artistic quality of concerts, not what the players hope it hears. Now a review of any nineteenth century performance of the "Faust" symphony that refers to an audience taking pleasure in any portion but the second movement, is a rare document to find. We can only conclude that Wagner and Strauss as imitators, or at best followers of Liszt, were easier to play; and being better played, were more readily comprehended by the public.

At the present time orchestral players are with musical scholars in their appreciation of Liszt, and the "Faust" symphony gets presented in the fulness of its meaning. On Friday afternoon when the work was repeated because of its success on a program of the mid-season, not only the second movement, but the first and third, and the choral ending, made a profound impression. Every phrase of the music was in the conductor's control. The work became as clear as a symphony of Beethoven. It was nowhere aimless or confused, because it was commandingly interpreted. Especially brilliant was the playing of the strings, on which everything in the difficult first movement, dealing with the character of Faust, depends. The themes were sharply outlined in all their transformations, and the portrait of the philosopher and cavalier was clear to the last lineament. The concertmaster, absent a week ago, was fortunately back at his desk. The first movement of the symphony could not have had its vivacity and intellectual drive without Mr. Witek leading the first violins.

The second movement, in nineteenth century reviews again and again referred to as the only engrossing part of the work, was extraordinarily beautiful at this performance. The solo oboe, which is the voice of Gretchen, was played in Mr. Longy's most poetic manner. The third movement was a challenge to Dr. Muck's talents as a reader of musical satire and it got his shrewdest attention. Remarkable was the characterization of Mephistopheles taken up here and there by the first bassoon. Mr. Sadony is always ready when he has an especial interpretative opportunity, but he surpassed himself at this performance.

The ending for the male chorus was read with dignity and the solo tenor part sung with pathos and persuasion. If there ever was an excuse for introducing voices into a symphony, it is in this great work of Liszt, and if there ever was excuse for the repetition of words, it is in the chorus and solo here.

The organ piece which was played after the intermission hardly belonged to the same program with the "Faust" symphony. It was, however, an attractive piece, considered by itself. But its attractiveness cannot be said to have been in the trumpet and trombone chorus with which it noisily ended. The charm of the work was in its elegance as writing for the organ and in the blending of ancient and modern sentiment in prelude, fugue and chorale. The joining in of so much brass at the close is an artificial climax, out of keeping with the general calm of the piece. It is a dramatic idea awkwardly handled, or so it seems in concert performance. Mr. Marshall played the organ part admirably, ordering his registration in such a way that technical display was subordinated to the presentation of idea. If this new work by Klose had no very clear program relation with the "Faust" symphony, it nevertheless has a rightful place in the program scheme of the year. The Symphony hall organ is rightly coming into use not only as an instrument to supplement the orchestra but as one on which to produce works of solo interest.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

APRIL 3, 1915.

LISZT "FAUST" SYMPHONY AGAIN

Second Hearing Arouses Exceptional Enthusiasm—Apollo Club Assists.

The second hearing of the Liszt "Faust" Symphony, as afforded yesterday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra, serves to strengthen one's regard for the great work, for Dr. Muck and the players. It gave even more satisfaction than when played earlier in the year, and aroused even more enthusiasm. The wonderfully beautiful Gretchen movement retains its place as the gem of the symphony, with the Mephistopheles movement affording Dr. Muck and the players an opportunity to display their peerless artistry as is seldom afforded. As at the earlier presentation, the orchestra was assisted by the Apollo Club and Paul Draper, tenor soloist. The vocal part was in keeping with the high standard of the orchestral, but still one could well wish for a better voice than Mr. Draper's in the solo work.

There was only one other number on the program, owing to the length of the symphony, that being a Prelude and Double Fugue for Organ, with a Choral at the end with trumpets and trombones, by Klose. Mr. Marshall was of course at the organ. The number, save in the choral, was not particularly interesting, although Mr. Marshall did some excellent work on the organ.

Chicago —

SUNDAY TRIBUNE:

MARCH 28. 1915.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concluded its season with the concerts of Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The only unfamiliar composition was the fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk tunes by Vincent d'Indy. It is, naturally, not an important work, using the word important in two senses—that of the critics of painting as well as the common one. But it is pretty music and pleasing to the ear, somewhat wearied in these troublous times with listening to complicated endeavors to prove that out of nothing something can be made. The performer of the solo part was, of course, George Longy, the first oboist of the orchestra, an artist of the foremost rank and a musician of such fastidious taste that he invariably gives delight to the cultivated listener.

Thursday evening Dr. Muck bathed his gloomy soul in the Elysian raptures of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." He gave us a cool and highly polished performance of the composition, and Emil Ferir, the violinist, played the obbligato commendably. When it was all over, those who for years have failed to discover the might of this music were just where they had always been, and those who have always seen in the symphony wonders and splendors far beyond those of the original Byronic poem were beatified. At the matinée concert the orchestral numbers were Schubert's C major symphony and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Curiously enough, precisely these same works had been performed by the Philharmonic under Mr. Stansky only eight days earlier. Probably Chicago, being blessed with one great orchestra of her own, escapes this sort of thing. In New York it is inevitable that if one conductor gives a certain symphony or overture in the first week in March, another will play the same thing in the third week. Of course, the one never knows that the other is going to do it or has done it, or may, can, or must do it. The general public does not care, but the poor slaves of the concert hall treadmill, the critics, have to hear all these repetitions and try to refrain from making the comparisons which the conductors challenge them to make. If one of the local critics, for instance, should openly declare that the Boston Symphony orchestra's performance of the Schubert symphony made that of the Philharmonic sound like an echo, the old familiar battle would begin once more, and people with tremendous power in the financial and social world would set out to capture that critic's scalp.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRANSCRIPT.

APRIL 1, 1915

The New Clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra

Horner Photo

Albert Sand

No newcomer to the Symphony Orchestra this year has made so distinctive a place for himself within it and with the audiences of the Symphony Concerts as has Mr. Sand, the successor to Mr. Grisez as first clarinet. The quick-eared to the various choirs and instruments of the band soon discovered that he was a master not only of the technique of the clarinet but of an exceptionally full, round, rich and warm tone throughout all its range. A little experience of Mr. Sand proved that he was not only a remarkable virtuoso but a musician of exceptionally fine feeling for the expressive quality of his instrument and its song and of exceeding sensibility in the modulation and the shading of it.

Often it is the privilege of the clarinet to sing a distinctive melody in a symphony or other piece, so that all that hear shall know and feel it; often, again, it is the penetrating color of its voice that gives to a whole passage individual quality and illusion. In these opportunities, as well as in the ordinary course of a first clarinet, Mr. Sand has shown himself a virtuoso and a musician worthy of the best standards of the orchestra in its renowned wind choir. So—and especially in the music of Brahms and the music of Wagner—the audiences have come to know him.

In occasional chamber concerts, where the scrutiny of his hearers was closer and more expert, Mr. Sand has seemed no less a master of his instrument and his music and his presence bids fair to bring back into them pieces like Brahms's quintet for clarinet and strings, that have long been overlooked. Fortunately, too, Mr. Sand is still a young man—a Russian by birth; a musician by equal talent, inclination and training; who made his way from studies in Moscow to achievement and reputation in Berlin; and now to new distinctions in his new post in Boston.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 26 1915

TO ORGANIZE CHORUS AS AID TO ORCHESTRA

1884

Plans Under Way for Organization of 400 Trained Singing Voices—Applications Now Being Received.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, in future seasons, is to be augmented by a permanent chorus of 400 voices, to be used in interpretations of such masterpieces as Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and the choral symphonies of Mendelssohn, Bruckner, Liszt, Sibelius and Mahler. Announcement to his effect was made yesterday by Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the orchestra. Organization of the great chorus will begin immediately. Already scores of applications for membership have been received. And notices, with application blanks, have been sent to every chorus in the city.

In the past, the orchestra has given several symphonic choral works, with the aid of local singing organizations. But never before has there been a permanent Philadelphia Orchestra chorus. With the exception of an attempt made in Boston when Max Fiedler directed the orchestra there, some years ago, no similar chorus ever has been organized in America.

The new chorus will be put on an artistic plane equal to that of the orchestra. And its rehearsals will be directed by Mr. Stokowski. It is planned to perform at least two choral works each season. For next year it has been decided to give Mahler's great Symphony No. 8. It was the score of this composition which Director Stokowski carried with him in his ight from Munich last summer at the outbreak of the war. All his baggage was lost, but he clung to the symphony, no other copy of which was obtainable in America.

The organization of a permanent chorus, Mr. Stokowski pointed out, would facilitate the performance of many great works which are now seldom, if ever, heard because of the lack of adequate choral resources for symphony societies.

The Mahler symphony requires two separate and distinct choruses of 400 voices each, a chorus of 100 children's voices, an orchestra of 125 musicians and eight soloists. It will be performed in March, 1916. And as this will be its first performance in America, the event will be one of the most significant in the musical history of Philadelphia.

For this occasion the chorus will be augmented to 800 singers. Rehearsals will begin in October, 1915, and during the months of October, November and December the women will rehearse one week and the men the next. Thus for those months each singer will be required to attend rehearsals only once every two weeks. But, commencing the first week in January, the four parts will be rehearsed together, making weekly attendance necessary.

The two different choruses to take part in the symphony will rehearse on Wednesday and Thursday evenings. Those who join early will be able to choose the night which suits them best.

Any one is eligible to join the permanent chorus of 400 for the orchestra who can qualify vocally and who will agree to attend, at the most, one rehearsal a week.

Applications should be made on a form issued by the Orchestra Association and mailed to the office, 1314 Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia. Later applicants will be advised where and when to appear for an examination, which will consist of singing a few scales and a simple test of sight reading. The chorus will not be asked to participate with the orchestra in any but symphonic works. It is not Mr. Stokowski's intention to take up oratorios and cantatas.

Eugen Klee, well known in musical circles of this city and formerly director of the Junger Maennerchor, has accepted the post of assistant director of the new orchestral chorus.

From ~~PUBLIC LEDGER~~ Press
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 26 1915

NEW PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA CHORUS

1884

Conductor Stokowski Will Form a Singing Society to Assist in Big Choral Symphonies.

Conductor Leopold Stokowski, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, announced yesterday a new department to be connected hereafter with the orchestra, and to be known as the Philadelphia Orchestra Chorus. Mr. Stokowski has had the scheme long in contemplation and by this singing body, which will be rehearsed personally by him, it will be possible for the orchestra to present a number of choral symphonies, which heretofore it has been impossible to give.

The recent success of the orchestra in the presentation of Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 2 in B flat, "Lobgesang," in which members of sixteen of the most prominent singing societies of this city assisted, no doubt hurried the conductor in his plans to have a big singing chorus connected with the orchestra.

This Orchestra Chorus will start rehearsals early in the Fall, and in the meantime there will be sufficient opportunity to organize it thoroughly, to prepare for the presentation of Mahler's Eighth Symphony, in March, 1916. It will be the first performance of this colossal work in America, and two separate and distinct choruses of 400 voices each will be required. A chorus of 100 children also will be trained, and the orchestra will be augmented to 125 members, and there will be eight soloists.

It is Conductor Stokowski's plan to have the Orchestra Chorus number 400 voices as the regular chorus, to be augmented when necessity requires. Aside from the Mahler Symphony only one other choral symphony will be given next season, owing to the difficulties to be overcome in the presentation of the big composition by the German composer and conductor.

The best known of the choral symphonies is Beethoven's No. 9. Among others may be mentioned those of Mendelssohn, Bruckner, Liszt and Sibelius, all of which will be prepared and presented from time to time. The new chorus will begin rehearsals in the coming October. During October, November and December the women will rehearse one week and the men the next, and thus for those months each singer will be required to attend rehearsals only every other week. Commencing the first week in January there will be weekly rehearsals.

Every one will be eligible for membership to the new Philadelphia Orchestra Chorus who can qualify vocally, and they will not be put to a very severe test. All that will be required of them is that they have pleasing voices and are able to read music fairly well. A circular setting forth the aims of this new chorus will be mailed by the Philadelphia Orchestra Association to all the known singers in this city, which will be accompanied by an application blank, to be signed and returned. No fee will be exacted, and the chorus will be free of any expense, and without cost will have the training of so admirable a master as Conductor Stokowski. Mr. Stokowski will conduct virtually all of the chorus rehearsals, and Eugen Klee will be assistant conductor. He is well known in musical circles in this city, and is the present conductor of the Arion Society of New York.

The opportunity to hear the great choral symphonies will be the means of providing a much further scope for the work of the Philadelphia Orchestra and singers should respond readily, as it will be an unusual opportunity for them to gain knowledge of choral singing. This will be only the second effort on the part of a conductor in this country to organize such a chorus, the first being when Max Fielder was at the head of the Boston Symphony. The chorus was kept together only one season, for some reason or other. Mr. Stokowski is entering into the new work with enthusiasm, as he has always been desirous of having his orchestra play these big choral symphonies.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAR 22 1915
Es , 1884

WHOLE WORLD CONTRIBUTING TO FAIR MUSIC

With nearly all the world at war, America is the Mecca toward which streams a steady tide of harmony-lovers from all over the earth. The Panama-Pacific International Exposition, peculiarly adapted to the gathering together of all that is beautiful out of the wreck and ruin now devastating other lands, is resolving itself into one vast Temple of Harmony. Centering at Festival Hall, music envelops the Exposition, and one walks in the grand inspiration of it and is proud to be an American.

Out of the smoke of battle has come Pares, the great French musician, and his band of sixty-five musicians, the best that Europe has produced, to play an engagement of eleven weeks. France responded to the Exposition's call by releasing this magnificent organization from the army. And when George W. Stewart, director of music, cabled for the best orchestra conductor in France the government immediately released from army service Auguste Bosc, the idol of the French people, who love the Bal Tarabin, and to whom the Monmartre is more than a name.

After their engagement at the Exposition is over all these Frenchmen will return to the scene of the struggle oversea, and perhaps they will find an end in the trench, under the trampled mud of some torn battlefield.

FAMED BANDS COMING.

Patrick Conway, said by many to be the logical successor to Patrick Gilmore, brings fifty performers to play through eight weeks, beginning May 18. Conway loves the rollicking, joyous music, the sort that starts the college man wanting to give his own particular yell. The programs nearly always carry Celtic music.

From Boston will come the famous Boston Band, under Emil Mollenhauer, one of the greatest living conductors of open-air choruses. The Boston Band of sixty-five performers will appear for a term of eleven weeks, beginning July 17. John Philip Sousa, who has been whistled and sung into popular favor for years, will justify his reputation as the march king through a nine-weeks' engagement, beginning May 22.

Three massed band concerts will be given. On May 22 the combined bands of Cassasa, Sousa and Pares will play in Festival Hall; June 17 the combined bands of Cassasa, Conway and Sousa, at the Band Concourse; July 24, the combined bands of Sousa, Mollehauer and Cassasa, in Festival Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Looming high on the program of giants is the coming for two weeks of the unsurpassed Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 eminent instrumetalists, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck. Dr. Muck, for many years conductor of Kaiser Wilhelm's Royal Opera, Berlin, was loaned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra eight years ago for a term of two years. After that period, only when his contract with the Kaiser had expired was he permitted to return. The coming of this great German, with the dignified organization, will make of the two weeks' engagement, beginning May 15, the center of musical interest of the world.

Under Auguste Bosc and the American conductor, Max Bendix, the already beloved Exposition orchestra will give a series of twenty symphony concerts in Festival Hall.

A beautiful and unique attraction will be the dancing of Loie Fuller at Festival Hall twice a month, with an afternoon performance each month at the Stadium, accompanied by the Exposition Orchestra or a military band.

[142]

(Over)

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRANSCRIPT.

APRIL 1, 1915

The New Clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra

Horner Photo

Albert Sand

No newcomer to the Symphony Orchestra this year has made so distinctive a place for himself within it and with the audiences of the Symphony Concerts as has Mr. Sand, the successor to Mr. Grisez as first clarinet. The quick-eared to the various choirs and instruments of the band soon discovered that he was a master not only of the technique of the clarinet but of an exceptionally full, round, rich and warm tone throughout all its range. A little experience of Mr. Sand proved that he was not only a remarkable virtuoso but a musician of exceptionally fine feeling for the expressive quality of his instrument and its song and of exceeding sensibility in the modulation and the shading of it.

Often it is the privilege of the clarinet to sing a distinctive melody in a symphony or other piece, so that all that hear shall know and feel it; often, again, it is the penetrating color of its voice that gives to a whole passage individual quality and illusion. In these opportunities, as well as in the ordinary course of a first clarinet, Mr. Sand has shown himself a virtuoso and a musician worthy of the best standards of the orchestra in its renowned wind choir. So—and especially in the music of Brahms and the music of Wagner—the audiences have come to know him.

In occasional chamber concerts, where the scrutiny of his hearers was closer and more expert, Mr. Sand has seemed no less a master of his instrument and his music and his presence bids fair to bring back into them pieces like Brahms's quintet for clarinet and strings, that have long been overlooked. Fortunately, too, Mr. Sand is still a young man—a Russian by birth; a musician by equal talent, inclination and training; who made his way from studies in Moscow to achievement and reputation in Berlin; and now to new distinctions in his new post in Boston.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date________________

TO ORGANIZE CHORUS AS AID TO ORCHESTRA

, 1884

Plans Under Way for Organization of 400 Trained Singing Voices—Applications Now Being Received.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, in future seasons, is to be augmented by a permanent chorus of 400 voices, to be used in interpretations of such masterpieces as Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and the choral symphonies of Mendelssohn, Bruckner, Liszt, Sibelius and Mahler. Announcement to his effect was made yesterday by Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the orchestra. Organization of the great chorus will begin immediately. Already scores of applications for membership have been received. And notices, with application blanks, have been sent to every chorus in the city.

In the past, the orchestra has given several symphonic choral works, with the aid of local singing organizations. But never before has there been a permanent Philadelphia Orchestra chorus. With the exception of an attempt made in Boston when Max Fiedler directed the orchestra there, some years ago, no similar chorus ever has been organized in America.

The new chorus will be put on an artistic plane equal to that of the orchestra. And its rehearsals will be directed by Mr. Stokowski. It is planned to perform at least two choral works each season. For next year it has been decided to give Mahler's great Symphony No. 8. It was the score of this composition which Director Stokowski carried with him in his flight from Munich last summer at the outbreak of the war. All his baggage was lost, but he clung to the symphony, no other copy of which was obtainable in America.

The organization of a permanent chorus, Mr. Stokowski pointed out, would facilitate the performance of many great works which are now seldom, if ever, heard because of the lack of adequate choral resources for symphony societies.

The Mahler symphony requires two separate and distinct choruses of 400 voices each, a chorus of 100 children's voices, an orchestra of 125 musicians and eight soloists. It will be performed in March, 1916. And as this will be its first performance in America, the event will be one of the most significant in the musical history of Philadelphia.

For this occasion the chorus will be augmented to 800 singers. Rehearsals will begin in October, 1915, and during the months of October, November and December the women will rehearse one week and the men the next. Thus for those months each singer will be required to attend rehearsals only once every two weeks. But, commencing the first week in January, the four parts will be rehearsed together, making weekly attendance necessary.

The two different choruses to take part in the symphony will rehearse on Wednesday and Thursday evenings. Those who join early will be able to choose the night which suits them best.

Any one is eligible to join the permanent chorus of 400 for the orchestra who can qualify vocally and who will agree to attend, at the most, one rehearsal a week.

Applications should be made on a form issued by the Orchestra Association and mailed to the office, 1314 Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia. Later applicants will be advised where and when to appear for an examination, which will consist of singing a few scales and a simple test of sight reading. The chorus will not be asked to participate with the orchestra in any but symphonic works. It is not Mr. Stokowski's intention to take up oratorios and cantatas.

Eugen Klee, well known in musical circles of this city and formerly director of the Junger Maennerchor, has accepted the post of assistant director of the new orchestral chorus.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date________________

NEW PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA CHORUS

, 1884

Conductor Stokowski Will Form a Singing Society to Assist in Big Choral Symphonies.

Conductor Leopold Stokowski, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, announced yesterday a new department to be connected hereafter with the orchestra, and to be known as the Philadelphia Orchestra Chorus. Mr. Stokowski has had the scheme long in contemplation and by this singing body, which will be rehearsed personally by him, it will be possible for the orchestra to present a number of choral symphonies, which heretofore it has been impossible to give.

The recent success of the orchestra in the presentation of Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 2 in B flat, "Lobgesang," in which members of sixteen of the most prominent singing societies of this city assisted, no doubt hurried the conductor in his plans to have a big singing chorus connected with the orchestra.

This Orchestra Chorus will start rehearsals early in the Fall, and in the meantime there will be sufficient opportunity to organize it thoroughly, to prepare for the presentation of Mahler's Eighth Symphony, in March, 1916. It will be the first performance of this colossal work in America, and two separate and distinct choruses of 400 voices each will be required. A chorus of 100 children also will be trained, and the orchestra will be augmented to 125 members, and there will be eight soloists.

It is Conductor Stokowski's plan to have the Orchestra Chorus number 400 voices as the regular chorus, to be augmented when necessity requires. Aside from the Mahler Symphony only one other choral symphony will be given next season, owing to the difficulties to be overcome in the presentation of the big composition by the German composer and conductor.

The best known of the choral symphonies is Beethoven's No. 9. Among others may be mentioned those of Mendelssohn, Bruckner, Liszt and Sibelius, all of which will be prepared and presented from time to time. The new chorus will begin rehearsals in the coming October. During October, November and December the women will rehearse one week and the men the next, and thus for those months each singer will be required to attend rehearsals only every other week. Commencing the first week in January there will be weekly rehearsals.

Every one will be eligible for membership to the new Philadelphia Orchestra Chorus who can qualify vocally, and they will not be put to a very severe test. All that will be required of them is that they have pleasing voices and are able to read music fairly well. A circular setting forth the aims of this new chorus will be mailed by the Philadelphia Orchestra Association to all the known singers in this city, which will be accompanied by an application blank, to be signed and returned. No fee will be exacted, and the chorus will be free of any expense, and without cost will have the training of so admirable a master as Conductor Stokowski. Mr. Stokowski will conduct virtually all of the chorus rehearsals, and Eugen Klee will be assistant conductor. He is well known in musical circles in this city, and is the present conductor of the Arion Society of New York.

The opportunity to hear the great choral symphonies will be the means of providing a much further scope for the work of the Philadelphia Orchestra and singers should respond readily, as it will be an unusual opportunity for them to gain knowledge of choral singing. This will be only the second effort on the part of a conductor in this country to organize such a chorus, the first being when Max Fielder was at the head of the Boston Symphony. The chorus was kept together only one season, for some reason or other. Mr. Stokowski is entering into the new work with enthusiasm, as he has always been desirous of having his orchestra play these big choral symphonies.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date________________

WHOLE WORLD CONTRIBUTING TO FAIR MUSIC

Es   , 1884

With nearly all the world at war, America is the Mecca toward which streams a steady tide of harmony-lovers from all over the earth. The Panama-Pacific International Exposition, peculiarly adapted to the gathering together of all that is beautiful out of the wreck and ruin now devastating other lands, is resolving itself into one vast Temple of Harmony. Centering at Festival Hall, music envelops the Exposition, and one walks in the grand inspiration of it and is proud to be an American.

Out of the smoke of battle has come Pares, the great French musician, and his band of sixty-five musicians, the best that Europe has produced, to play an engagement of eleven weeks. France responded to the Exposition's call by releasing this magnificent organization from the army. And when George W. Stewart, director of music, cabled for the best orchestra conductor in France the government immediately released from army service Auguste Bosc, the idol of the French people, who love the Bal Tarabin, and to whom the Monmartre is more than a name.

After their engagement at the Exposition is over all these Frenchmen will return to the scene of the struggle oversea, and perhaps they will find an end in the trench, under the trampled mud of some torn battlefield.

FAMED BANDS COMING.

Patrick Conway, said by many to be the logical successor to Patrick Gilmore, brings fifty performers to play through eight weeks, beginning May 18. Conway loves the rollicking, joyous music, the sort that starts the college man wanting to give his own particular yell. The programs nearly always carry Celtic music.

From Boston will come the famous Boston Band, under Emil Mollenhauer, one of the greatest living conductors of open-air choruses. The Boston Band of sixty-five performers will appear for a term of eleven weeks, beginning July 17. John Philip Sousa, who has been whistled and sung into popular favor for years, will justify his reputation as the march king through a nine-weeks' engagement, beginning May 22.

Three massed band concerts will be given. On May 22 the combined bands of Cassasa, Sousa and Pares will play in Festival Hall; June 17 the combined bands of Cassasa, Conway and Sousa, at the Band Concourse; July 24, the combined bands of Sousa, Mollehauer and Cassasa, in Festival Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Looming high on the program of giants is the coming for two weeks of the unsurpassed Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 eminent instrumetalists, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck. Dr. Muck, for many years conductor of Kaiser Wilhelm's Royal Opera, Berlin, was loaned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra eight years ago for a term of two years. After that period, only when his contract with the Kaiser had expired was he permitted to return. The coming of this great German, with the dignified organization, will make of the two weeks' engagement, beginning May 15, the center of musical interest of the world.

Under Auguste Bosc and the American conductor, Max Bendix, the already beloved Exposition orchestra will give a series of twenty symphony concerts in Festival Hall.

A beautiful and unique attraction will be the dancing of Loie Fuller at Festival Hall twice a month, with an afternoon performance each month at the Stadium, accompanied by the Exposition Orchestra or a military band.

[142]

(Over)

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 28 1915

Two Letters Complaining of Opinions Expressed in "The Sun" and the Real Facts in the Case---

By W. J. HENDERSON.

LAST Sunday the musical chronicler of THE SUN had occasion to refer to the anger with which the inevitable praises of the Boston orchestra were received by persons committed to the theory that it is the duty of New York newspapers to uphold the home orchestras without regard for critical truth. Regret was expressed that the best article of orchestral peformance had to come from visitors. Then the writer continued:

"It is indeed a sorry tale. Those who report musical doings dislike the telling of this tale. It brings them nothing but campaigns of slander, intimidation and epistolary vituperation." One of those errors which are inevitable in the hasty making of a morning newspaper resulted in the conversion of the word "report" into "support."

THE SUN's musical editor apologizes for having unintentionally made the liberal supporters of music in this town appear to be victims of the intrigue, wire pulling, innuendo, threat and personal abuse by which those interested in some musical enterprises continually strive to throttle honest critical reporting. At the same moment, in passing, we may express regret that so much vigorous effort should be expended in futility.

Following upon the very shadow of the writing of the above came a perfect illustration of the tactics followed by the practitioners of musical chauvinism. The letter is herewith given an airing, which it greatly needs. At the same moment the musical editor of THE SUN wishes it known that Mr. Stransky cannot and must not be accounted responsible for the manner in which he is upheld. His relations with the editor of this department of THE SUN are and always have been entirely amicable. Mr. Stransky as a public performer and interpreter of music is open to criticism, which he has always accepted with the dignity becoming an artist and a gentleman.

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 21, 1915.

MR. W. J. HENDERSON,

DEAR SIR: On many occasions in the past have you gone considerably out of your way to praise the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the expense of the New York Philharmonic. Once this winter in a Sunday article you went so far as to insult one of your colleagues—a man who has the courage to tell the truth about the Boston orchestra when it plays badly, which is not infrequently—because he stands up for the sterling achievements of Mr. Josef Stransky and the New York Philharmonic.

Your criticism in to-day's SUN of the concert of the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall proves that you are to be pitied quite as much as scorned. If you can call the performance of the Schubert Symphony yesterday a better one than Mr. Stransky's on March 12, then you know nothing about orchestral playing. Yesterday the woodwinds were out of tune in the first movement, the tempo of the andante was ridiculously fast, the final statement of the main theme at the close of the first movement lost its majesty through Dr. Muck's metronomic conducting—he seems not yet to have made the acquaintance of rubato—and there were other details which might be added, too. If you heard these you have to be censured for not mentioning them; for whenever the Philharmonic can be called to account you make it your business to do so. Why not treat all public performers alike? As for the overture: Dr. Muck has no idea of the "Carneval" of Dvorak. This is Bohemian music, music that is racy, that can be done characteristically only by one who is sensitive to the spirit of its materials. Mr. Stransky's performance of it on March 12 was one that made the blood tingle—Dr. Muck's yesterday was a conventionally brilliant one.

Had you fulfilled your duties as a critic to-day instead of acting as a propagandist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra you would have pointed out in your review that Dr. Muck should exercise a little courtesy in the future and refrain from such tactless and indiscreet doings as comnig into New York and playing within a week's time the programme of a local orchestra. If Dr. Muck wishes to show us how to play things he should be advised not to try and show Mr. Stransky and the New York Philharmonic how to play Schubert and Dvorak! I do not doubt that he might give the Philharmonic conductor points on Reznicek's symphonic biography "Schlemil" or some other equally uninteresting novelty, such as the general of the Boston band offers his New York devotees.

FAIR PLAY.

Because this letter follows lines pursued for the last five years in public and private calumniation of the musical editor of THE SUN, with no other discoverable purpose than to put an end to the hearty praises of the Boston orchestra, a few words may be said in rejoinder to it without derogation of the dignity of this department.

The "insulted" colleague apparently does not know that he is insulted, since, despite the fact that he and this writer disagree upon almost every topic in the entire art of music and mutually enjoy aiming a mud shaft of humor or sarcasm at one another, they have only the kindest feelings for each other. This is doubtless because neither one of them regards it as an offence against good manners or good morals for one to entertain opinions different from the other. In this decent disposition they have a considerable advantage over the writer of the letter.

The comments on the Boston orchestra's performance of the Schubert symphony printed in this paper were correct in whole and in detail and no omissions were made.

The statement that the Boston orchestra plays badly "not infrequently" is untrue. It never plays badly; but it is sometimes below its own standard, and when it is so the fact is recorded in this newspaper.

The Philharmonic Society is never "called to account" unless such a drastic proceeding seems imperatively demanded, which is indeed rare. The society and Mr. Stransky have received much praise in these columns, much more praise than censure, as will presently be conclusively proved.

This writer is not a propagandist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra nor for any other musical performer, collective or individual. He is a propagandist for that which he believes to be the best in musical art. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the best orchestra in the world. THE SUN did not make it so and cannot help its being so. This writer wishes with all his heart that he could declare that the best orchestra in the world belonged to New York. He cannot say this, as Josh Billings remarked of another matter, "without lying."

The present writer does not know who made his recent programme first, but if Dr. Muck did what the letter writer says he did then he was guilty of a petty trick, to which many orchestra conductors resort from time to time. THE SUN has frequently complained of the practice.

As for Dr. Muck's uninteresting programmes this season THE SUN fully agrees with "Fair Play." The writer of the letter would have made some slight approach toward a justification of his signature if he had acknowledged that THE SUN had published some severe strictures on these programmes and especially the one containing the dismal "Schlemil."

It is a pity that some readers of newspapers cannot believe that any expression of opinion is honest except their own. It is unfortunate for these people that they undertake such a hopeless task as that of bullyragging an editor into burying his honest convictions and seeking to be all things unto all men.

Is it not possible for such readers at any rate to reach at least a suspicion of the flaming truth that the newspapers which, as has recently been shown, are not to be frightened or coerced even by the awful threats of a national administration, are not at all likely to abandon their editorial policies because readers write abusive letters and charge them with dishonest motives?

It must be obvious to any disinterested reader that the writer of this letter charges the musical editor of THE SUN with dishonesty when he calls him a propagandist for the Boston orchestra. His other declarations, such as that this writer knows nothing about orchestral playing, belong to the common clatter of the correspondent's kind. "If the critic does not think as I think he is an ignoramus."

The serious phase of this matter is the accusation of dishonesty, brought by a person who is fully aware that he is free from legal responsibility. The only reason for publishing his letter is the long persistence of this line of activity by some admirers of the Philharmonic Society. It gives the musical editor of THE SUN the welcome opportunity to say that utterances of this kind, whether in letters or in private slander, will not in any smallest detail affect the conduct of this department.

Following is the record of THE SUN's pronouncements on the Philharmonic concerts of the season of 1914-1915 up to March 21. It is compiled from the printed columns of the paper and can be verified by any one sufficiently interested in the matter to make the examination. The dates given are those of the concerts. The comments appeared in each case on the following day:

October 29—Praise, with some qualification.

November 12—Only praise, especially for the conductor.

November 15—No comment except on the soloist.

November 19—Only praise.

November 27—No comment except on new composition.

November 29—Only praise.

December 6—Only praise.

December 10—Only praise.

December 17—Only praise.

December 30—Praise for programme. No comment on perform-season, not only the second

January 3—Only praise.

January 10—Strictures made on tempi in symphony.

January 14—Qualified praise, but no censure.

January 16—Only praise.

January 21—Praise, especially for interpretation of symphony.

January 23—Only praise.

January 28—Comment only on soloist.

January 31—Comment only on the music.

February 5—Only praise.

February 7—Comment only on the music.

February 21—Only praise.

February 24—Only praise.

February 28—Only praise.

March 4—Only praise.

March 12—Only praise.

March 21—Only praise.

The cause of wrath must be sought in the comments on the Boston orchestra. Three out of its first four concerts this season were censured for their badly made programmes. The second concert was highly praised.

So were the fifth, sixth and seventh. The eighth and ninth received only moderate praise and of these two the second was pronounced "dull." The last concert was warmly praised and the comments on the attitude of the slander mongers, intimidators and writers of abusive letters were then made. These seem to have evoked the epistle which so bitterly condemned the habitual calling to account of the Philharmonic. The honesty of this complaint may be measured by the above record.

Another letter of equally honorable character but dealing with another subject was also received lately and is herewith made public for reasons to be found in its text:

NEW YORK, March 19, 1915.

I was so genuinely amused by your comment this morning on yesterday's performance of "Carmen" that I am going to share with you a bit of information which, owing to your hearty and unconcealed distaste for Caruso and all his works and ways, I can safely rely upon you not to use. A member of the Metropolitan Opera House staff told me last night that the sale of seats for the "Carmen" performance had proved so disappointing that the management had had to paper the house thoroughly both upstairs and down and that every member of the staff whose duties permitted, even to the office boys, had been summoned to aid in impressing the critical fraternity with the enthusiasm and size of the assembly. I need scarcely comment on the brilliant success of the effort.

Again, not long since a recital was given by a certain distinguished artist in Carnegie Hall, after which occasion you drew equally interesting deductions from the apparent size of the audience. As a matter of fact over 200 free and unsolicited tickets to that recital had been sent to a single organization with which I happen to be connected, and moreover this organization was in no way especially entitled to such a donation.

What difference does all this make? None, perhaps, but these two cases, which I know of my own knowledge, indicate many others. This is a season of unprecedentedly stringent spending, yet you will find that nearly every review of opera performance or recital mentions a large audience as present, and I more than suspect that you critics have little conception of the harmful effect of just such optimistic reports in the way of persuading the unprepared fledgling to try his wings prematurely. It is not the mere size of the audience which really counts, you know. It is the effort and expense to which individuals are willing to go in order to hear an artist that form the true measure of his success. Any one can draw a free crowd.

Although purely an amateur, my sympathies have brought me in touch with a very great number of music students and I sometimes wonder whether the best intentioned of critics has any idea of the effect produced by the almost exclusively box office evaluations of contemporary musical criticism. Caruso, for instance, is never discussed as an artist—by the English papers at any rate. He is merely a more or less successful drawing card and his work is valued by you solely from that standpoint. In the critical comment concerning his recent departure the question of his vocal art or his artistic value to the institution was not once raised by a single critic. He is a box office asset, that is all. The question of prime importance was evidently—would the people come in equal numbers to the opera house when Martin, Martinelli or Botta happened to be singing; never—are they as well worth hearing as Caruso.

It is the same with Farrar. The critic may tell us nothing else about the performance, but we may always rely upon him not to omit full details as to the size of the audience. And the two examples cited are quite illuminating as to their trustworthiness in that regard. We have a lot to learn from the Germans in regard to the legitimate content of critical commentary. At least they make a distinction between the art and its commercial value.

A short time ago I heard a musical litterateur of wide influence advise an audience of music students never to read the musical criticisms in the daily press, as they are no longer of any real value. Is it not a pity that any one there only too much excuse for such a recommendation?

Possibly our national temperament and ideals ill fit us for the expression of critical appreciation. Of our fine talent for whole souled and cynical depreciation, however, nobody can doubt.

BERNARD HARROLD.

It is unnecessary for this high-minded gentleman to communicate information confidentially imparted to him by an employee of the Metropolitan Opera Company and at the same time defy THE SUN to publish it. THE SUN would have been delighted to print the letter had it contained nothing more spectacular than the audacious and foolish falsehoods about the attitude of the paper toward Mr. Caruso and his art.

These falsehoods are audacious because it requires a singularly dense and reckless kind of bravado to send a ridiculous untruth to the one place in which its mendacity must instantly be known. They are foolish because to every musical reader of THE SUN their attempt to contradict incontrovertible facts will be at once apparent. And so while THE SUN's comment on the recent "Carmen" performance amused Mr. Harrold, his strictures on that comment will be more fortunate since they are permitted to amuse some thousands of honest people.

BOSTON GLOBE-
APRIL 10,

KORNGOLD'S MUSIC.

Amazing Artistic Output for Youth of 16.

Leonard Borwick Plays Beethoven Concerto With Fine Art.

Erich Wolfgang Korngold—what will this name signify in music 10 years hence, better still, 50? Did the parents of this precocious boy divine his greatness when they gave him the middle member of the name, for he has been compared to Johannes Chrysostum Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart as he has to Handel.

The word "sinfonietta" generally is taken to mean a little symphony. Young Korngold's composition bearing this name, and played yesterday by Dr Muck at the 20th Symphony rehearsal, is in no sense a diminutive work, in length of time consumed, in the demands of virtuosity made on the orchestra or in the maturity of sense of form and style.

In the music by Korngold already played publicly in Boston—the overture to a drama for orchestra and two movements from the violin and piano sonato—there has been evident an uncanny facility of invention and an amazingly complex and intricate style, but beneath there was often confusion, incoherence or insignificance of thought, brilliant flashes alternating with passages both prolix and empty in a manner common to youth.

The score played yesterday is an extraordinary one. The product of a boy at most 16 years old when he wrote it is breath taking, miraculous. That a youth of this age should be expected to reflect in an art the knowledge of life, the maturity of understanding and experience which reasonably comes in the following score of years is naturally absurd. The overture to a drama, employing a large orchestra industriously, was callow in thought.

This "little symphony" shows a ripening intellect and imagination, a freshness, spontaneity and native force which marks a wholly new epoch in the boy's career. The hearer is amazed to realize from time to time during the first two movements how his attention is fixed and held by the variety and vigor of the ideas brought forward, and the contrast, resourcefulness, dramatic sense and musical taste with which they are treated.

The first two movements are better sustained than the third. The fourth rises to a brilliant conclusion. The spirit of the motto of the work—"Motive of the joyful heart"—is well followed. A great advance upon the preceding composition for orchestra, this "Sinfonietta" arouses anticipation of others to follow, music in which it is to be hoped the youthful Korngold will cultivate further simplicity and directness.

Leonard Borwick, the English pianist, justly admired in a recital he gave several seasons ago for the fine qualities of musicianship he displayed, gave a beautiful performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto No. 5 in E-flat.

Mr Borwick retained a continence and serenity of style in passages where some might have been tempted to a more obvious heroism. He established the sense of quiet grandeur and majesty and did not confound these with mere pomp. In beauty of tone, purity of phrasing and general clarity and sense of proportion, his playing commended him.

A brilliant performance of Sinigaglia's picturesque overture to Goldoni's comedy, "The Chioggian Brawls," closed the program.

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 10, 1915

BOY'S WORK PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

"Sinfonietta," From Pen of Lad of 15, Given Hearing

BY OLIN DOWNES

The "Sinfonietta for Full Orchestra," op. 5, of Erich Korngold, the Viennese boy wonder of the day, was played for the first time in Boston at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

This was the first orchestral composition of Korngold to be played at the Symphony concerts. Korngold's "Overture to a Drama," played in Boston by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conductor, on Feb. 15, 1914, was not so interesting a work as the music heard yesterday.

IS SON OF A CRITIC

The Boston Symphony programme books recount the chief facts of Korngold's career up to date. He was born at Brunn, May 29, 1897. He is the son of Dr. Erich Korngold, the music critic of the Vienna Neue Freie Presse. He commenced to compose little pieces when he was 5, and in 1910 Dr. Korngold sent privately printed compositions of Erich to Richard Strauss, who, with other famous musicians, heaped eulogy upon them. Korngold studied the piano and composition with Alexander von Zemlimsky, and counterpoint with Robert Fuchs. He composed the Sinfonietta heard yesterday, in 1912 or 1913, in his 15th or 16th year. The work was first performed Nov. 28, 1913, at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna.

This music, of incredible maturity as regards workmanship, is surcharged with all the characteristic faults of the modern German school of composition—bombast, pretence, much ado over little. But that should not be laid down as a conclusive verdict in the talent of a young composer of unquestionable gifts. In spite of imitation, probably unconscious of models about him which no young man could help imitating, this music, especially in the first two movements, has real youth and vigor, humor, optimism—life. That the slow movement is a piece of tortured mechanism, consisting principally of "stunts" that the composer does with a leading theme which is not worth the trouble, and would not be worth the trouble if the variants were more valuable than they are, is self-evident. Nor is the finale more than an elaborate mosaic, although there is a masterly introduction, and there are admirable moments in it.

Even the Great Imitate

But if, in these days, we look indulgently upon the early compositions of great composers who have gone before should we not be equally indulgent of a talent in course of development? We discover Beethoven imitating Haydn, or Strauss imitating Wagner. In the light of history, we marvel at the comparative lack of originality in the early scores of even great masters. As for Wagner——! Who would by the wildest flight of imagination see the composer of "Tristan" and "Die Feen" produced at a later period in Wagner's life than this music in Korngold's career, or even in "Rienzi"? The impulse to compose, or, as in Strauss, the indomitable will to compose, are in early pages of such masters the surest and only indication of future possibilities.

In this country at least it is not to Korngold's credit that he is a "wunderkind." We are grown tired and mistrustful of the infant prodigy, but there is more than precocity in the music heard yesterday. Admitted that it is overladen with all the vices and few of the virtues of a certain school. How could it be otherwise? If Beethoven could not escape Haydn, how can Korngold be expected to escape Strauss, in particular, and Puccini and other composers in general? The Sinfonietta is in part at least musical flesh and blood. It has distinct musical promise, as well as startling technical facility. Let us wish well to a composer who labors under the worst possible disadvantage—early success.

Borwick the Soloist

Leonard Borwick, pianist, was the soloist at this concert. He played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, which, on the whole, is neither so distinguished nor so pianistic a work as the much smaller concerto in G major. Mr. Borwick's performance was conspicuous for its breadth and authority, its symphonic character, its technical sureness, the bigness of the tone, the grasp of the structure. Some might

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 28 191

Two Letters Complaining of Opinions Expressed in "The Sun" and the Real Facts in the Case---

By W. J. HENDERSON.

LAST Sunday the musical chronicler of The Sun had occasion to refer to the anger with which the inevitable praises of the Boston orchestra were received by persons committed to the theory that it is the duty of New York newspapers to uphold the home orchestras without regard for critical truth. Regret was expressed that the best article of orchestral peformance had to come from visitors. Then the writer continued:

"It is indeed a sorry tale. Those who report musical doings dislike the telling of this tale. It brings them nothing but campaigns of slander, intimidation and epistolary vituperation." One of those errors which are inevitable in the hasty making of a morning newspaper resulted in the conversion of the word "report" into "support."

The Sun's musical editor apologizes for having unintentionally made the liberal supporters of music in this town appear to be victims of the intrigue, wire pulling, innuendo, threat and personal abuse by which those interested in some musical enterprises continually strive to throttle honest critical reporting. At the same moment, in passing, we may express regret that so much vigorous effort should be expended in futility.

Following upon the very shadow of the writing of the above came a perfect illustration of the tactics followed by the practitioners of musical chauvinism. The letter is herewith given an airing, which it greatly needs. At the same moment the musical editor of The Sun wishes it known that Mr. Stransky cannot and must not be accounted responsible for the manner in which he is upheld. His relations with the editor of this department of The Sun are and always have been entirely amicable. Mr. Stransky as a public performer and interpreter of music is open to criticism, which he has always accepted with the dignity becoming an artist and a gentleman.

New York, N. Y., March 21, 1915.

Mr. W. J. Henderson,

Dear Sir: On many occasions in the past have you gone considerably out of your way to praise the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the expense of the New York Philharmonic. Once this winter in a Sunday article you went so far as to insult one of your colleagues—a man who has the courage to tell the truth about the Boston orchestra when it plays badly, which is not infrequently—because he stands up for the sterling achievements of Mr. Josef Stransky and the New York Philharmonic.

Your criticism in to-day's Sun of the concert of the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall proves that you are to be pitied quite as much as scorned. If you can call the performance of the Schubert Symphony yesterday a better one than Mr. Stransky's on March 12, then you know nothing about orchestral playing. Yesterday the woodwinds were out of tune in the first movement, the tempo of the andante was ridiculously fast, the final statement of the main theme at the close of the first movement lost its majesty through Dr. Muck's metronomic conducting—he seems not yet to have made the acquaintance of rubato—and there were other details which might be added, too. If you heard these you have to be censured for not mentioning them; for whenever the Philharmonic can be called to account you make it your business to do so. Why not treat all public performers alike? As for the overture: Dr. Muck has no idea of the "Carneval" of Dvorak. This is Bohemian music, music that is racy, that can be done characteristically only by one who is sensitive to the spirit of its materials. Mr. Stransky's performance of it on March 12 was one that made the blood tingle—Dr. Muck's yesterday was a conventionally brilliant one.

Had you fulfilled your duties as a critic to-day instead of acting as a propagandist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra you would have pointed out in your review that Dr. Muck should exercise a little courtesy in the future and refrain from such tactless and indiscreet doings as comnig into New York and playing within a week's time the programme of a local orchestra. If Dr. Muck wishes to show us how to play things he should be advised not to try and show Mr. Stransky and the New York Philharmonic how to play Schubert and Dvorak! I do not doubt that he might give the Philharmonic conductor points on Reznicek's symphonic biography "Schlemil" or some other equally uninteresting novelty, such as the general of the Boston band offers his New York devotees.

Fair Play.

Because this letter follows lines pursued for the last five years in public and private calumniation of the musical editor of The Sun, with no other discoverable purpose than to put an end to the hearty praises of the Boston orchestra, a few words may be said in rejoinder to it without derogation of the dignity of this department.

The "insulted" colleague apparently does not know that he is insulted, since, despite the fact that he and this writer disagree upon almost every pic in the entire art of music and nally enjoy aiming a mild shaft of humor or sarcasm at one another, they have only the kindest feelings for each other. This is doubtless because neither one of them regards it as an offence against good manners or good morals for one to entertain opinions different from the other. In this decent disposition they have a considerable advantage over the writer of the letter.

The comments on the Boston orchestra's performance of the Schubert symphony printed in this paper were correct in whole and in detail and no omissions were made.

The statement that the Boston orchestra plays badly "not infrequently" is untrue. It never plays badly; but it is sometimes below its own standard, and when it is so the fact is recorded in this newspaper.

The Philharmonic Society is never "called to account" unless such a drastic proceeding seems imperatively demanded, which is indeed rare. The society and Mr. Stransky have received much praise in these columns, much more praise than censure, as will presently be conclusively proved.

This writer is not a propagandist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra nor for any other musical performer, collective or individual. He is a propagandist for that which he believes to be the best in musical art. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the best orchestra in the world. The Sun did not make it so and cannot help its being so. This writer wishes with all his heart that he could declare that the best orchestra in the world belonged to New York. He cannot say this, as Josh Billings remarked of another matter, "without lying."

The present writer does not know who made his recent programme first, but if Dr. Muck did what the letter writer says he did then he was guilty of a petty trick, to which many orchestra conductors resort from time to time. The Sun has frequently complained of the practice.

As for Dr. Muck's uninteresting programmes this season The Sun fully agrees with "Fair Play." The writer of the letter would have made some slight approach toward a justification of his signature if he had acknowledged that The Sun had published some severe strictures on these programmes and especially the one containing the dismal "Schlemil."

It is a pity that some readers of newspapers cannot believe that any expression of opinion is honest except their own. It is unfortunate for these people that they undertake such a hopeless task as that of bullyragging an editor into burying his honest convictions and seeking to be all things unto all men.

Is it not possible for such readers at any rate to reach at least a suspicion of the flaming truth that the newspapers which, as has recently been shown, are not to be frightened or coerced even by the awful threats of a national administration, are not at all likely to abandon their editorial policies because readers write abusive letters and charge them with dishonest motives?

It must be obvious to any disinterested reader that the writer of this letter charges the musical editor of The Sun with dishonesty when he calls him a propagandist for the Boston orchestra. His other declarations, such as that this writer knows nothing about orchestral playing, belong to the common clatter of the correspondent's kind. "If the critic does not think as I think he is an ignoramus."

The serious phase of this matter is the accusation of dishonesty, brought by a person who is fully aware that he is free from legal responsibility. The only reason for publishing his letter is the long persistence of this line of activity by some admirers of the Philharmonic Society. It gives the musical editor of The Sun the welcome opportunity to say that utterances of this kind, whether in letters or in private slander, will not in any smallest detail affect the conduct of this department.

Following is the record of The Sun's pronouncements on the Philharmonic concerts of the season of 1914-1915 up to March 21. It is compiled from the printed columns of the paper and can be verified by any one sufficiently interested in the matter to make the examination. The dates given are those of the concerts. The comments appeared in each case on the following day:

October 29—Praise, with some qualification.

November 12—Only praise, especially for the conductor.

November 15—No comment except on the soloist.

November 19—Only praise.

November 27—No comment except on new composition.

November 29—Only praise.

December 6—Only praise.

December 10—Only praise.

December 17—Only praise.

December 30—Praise for programme. No comment on perform-

January 3—Only praise.

January 10—Strictures made on tempi in symphony.

January 14—Qualified praise, but no censure.

January 16—Only praise.

January 21—Praise, especially for interpretation of symphony.

January 23—Only praise.

January 28—Comment only on soloist.

January 31—Comment only on the music.

February 5—Only praise.

February 7—Comment only on the music.

February 21—Only praise.

February 24—Only praise.

February 28—Only praise.

March 4—Only praise.

March 12—Only praise.

March 21—Only praise.

The cause of wrath must be sought in the comments on the Boston orchestra. Three out of its first four concerts this season were censured for their badly made programmes. The second concert was highly praised.

So were the fifth, sixth and seventh. The eighth and ninth received only moderate praise and of these two the second was pronounced "dull." The last concert was warmly praised and the comments on the attitude of the slander mongers, intimidators and writers of abusive letters were then made. These seem to have evoked the epistle which so bitterly condemned the habitual calling to account of the Philharmonic. The honesty of this complaint may be measured by the above record.

Another letter of equally honorable character but dealing with another subject was also received lately and is herewith made public for reasons to be found in its text:

New York, March 19, 1915.

I was so genuinely amused by your comment this morning on yesterday's performance of "Carmen" that I am going to share with you a bit of information which, owing to your hearty and unconcealed distaste for Caruso and all his works and ways, I can safely rely upon you not to use. A member of the Metropolitan Opera House staff told me last night that the sale of seats for the "Carmen" performance had proved so disappointing that the management had had to paper the house thoroughly both upstairs and down and that every member of the staff whose duties permitted, even to the office boys, had been summoned to aid in impressing the critical fraternity with the enthusiasm and size of the assembly. I need scarcely comment on the brilliant success of the effort.

Again, not long since a recital was given by a certain distinguished artist in Carnegie Hall, after which occasion you drew equally interesting deductions from the apparent size of the audience. As a matter of fact over 200 free and unsolicited tickets to that recital had been sent to a single organization with which I happen to be connected, and moreover this organization was in no way especially entitled to such a donation.

What difference does all this make? None, perhaps, but these two cases, which I know of my own knowledge, indicate many others. This is a season of unprecedentedly stringent spending, yet you will find that nearly every review of opera performance or recital mentions a large audience as present, and I more than suspect that you critics have little conception of the harmful effect of just such optimistic reports in the way of persuading the unprepared fledgling to try his wings prematurely. It is not the mere size of the audience which really counts, you know. It is the effort and expense to which individuals are willing to go in order to hear an artist that form the true measure of his success. Any one can draw a free crowd.

Although purely an amateur, my sympathies have brought me in touch with a very great number of music students and I sometimes wonder whether the best intentioned of critics has any idea of the effect produced by the almost exclusively box office evaluations of contemporary musical criticism. Caruso, for instance, is never discussed as an artist—by the English papers at any rate. He is merely a more or less successful drawing card and his work is valued by you solely from that standpoint. In the critical comment concerning his recent departure the question of his vocal art or his artistic value to the institution was not once raised by a single critic. He is a box office asset, that is all. The question of prime importance was evidently—would the people come in equal numbers to the opera house when Martin, Martinelli or Botta happened to be singing; never—are they as well worth hearing as Caruso.

It is the same with Farrar. The critic may tell us nothing else about the performance, but we may always rely upon him not to omit full details as to the size of the audience. And the two examples cited are quite illuminating as to their trustworthiness in that regard. We have a lot to learn from the Germans in regard to the legitimate content of critical commentary. At least they make a distinction between the art and its commercial value.

A short time ago I heard a musical litterateur of wide influence advise an audience of music students never to read the musical criticisms in the daily press, as they are no longer of any real value. Is it not a pity that any one there only too much excuse for such a recommendation?

Possibly our national temperament and ideals ill fit us for the expression of critical appreciation. Of our fine talent for whole souled and cynical depreciation, however, nobody can doubt.

Bernard Harrold.

It is unnecessary for this high-minded gentleman to communicate information confidentially imparted to him by an employee of the Metropolitan Opera Company and at the same time defy The Sun to publish it. The Sun would have been delighted to print the letter had it contained nothing more spectacular than the audacious and foolish falsehoods about the attitude of the paper toward Mr. Caruso and his art.

These falsehoods are audacious because it requires a singularly dense and reckless kind of bravado to send a ridiculous untruth to the one place in which its mendacity must instantly be known. They are foolish because to every musical reader of The Sun their attempt to contradict incontrovertible facts will be at once apparent. And so while The Sun's comment on the recent "Carmen" performance amused Mr. Harrold, his strictures on that comment will be more fortunate since they are permitted to amuse some thousands of honest people.

season, not only the second movem

BOSTON GLOBE-
APRIL 10,

KORNGOLD'S MUSIC.

Amazing Artistic Output for Youth of 16.

Leonard Borwick Plays Beethoven Concerto With Fine Art.

Erich Wolfgang Korngold—what will this name signify in music 10 years hence, better still, 50? Did the parents of this precocious boy divine his greatness when they gave him the middle member of the name, for he has been compared to Johannes Chrysostum Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart as he has to Handel.

The word "sinfonietta" generally is taken to mean a little symphony. Young Korngold's composition bearing this name, and played yesterday by Dr Muck at the 20th Symphony rehearsal, is in no sense a diminutive work, in length of time consumed, in the demands of virtuosity made on the orchestra or in the maturity of sense of form and style.

In the music by Korngold already played publicly in Boston—the overture to a drama for orchestra and two movements from the violin and piano sonato—there has been evident an uncanny facility of invention and an amazingly complex and intricate style, but beneath there was often confusion, incoherence or insignificance of thought, brilliant flashes alternating with passages both prolix and empty in a manner common to youth.

The score played yesterday is an extraordinary one. The product of a boy at most 16 years old when he wrote it is breath taking, miraculous. That a youth of this age should be expected to reflect in an art the knowledge of life, the maturity of understanding and experience which reasonably comes in the following score of years is naturally absurd. The overture to a drama, employing a large orchestra industriously, was callow in thought.

This "little symphony" shows a ripening intellect and imagination, a freshness, spontaneity and native force which marks a wholly new epoch in the boy's career. The hearer is amazed to realize from time to time during the first two movements how his attention is fixed and held by the variety and vigor of the ideas brought forward, and the contrast, resourcefulness, dramatic sense and musical taste with which they are treated.

The first two movements are better sustained than the third. The fourth rises to a brilliant conclusion. The spirit of the motto of the work—"Motive of the joyful heart"—is well followed. A great advance upon the preceding composition for orchestra, this "Sinfonietta" arouses anticipation of others to follow, music in which it is to be hoped the youthful Korngold will cultivate further simplicity and directness.

Leonard Borwick, the English pianist, justly admired in a recital he gave several seasons ago for the fine qualities of musicianship he displayed, gave a beautiful performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto No. 5 in E-flat.

Mr Borwick retained a continence and serenity of style in passages where some might have been tempted to a more obvious heroism. He established the sense of quiet grandeur and majesty and did not confound these with mere pomp. In beauty of tone, purity of phrasing and general clarity and sense of proportion, his playing commended him.

A brilliant performance of Sinigaglia's picturesque overture to Goldoni's comedy, "The Chioggian Brawls," closed the program.

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 10, 1915

BOY'S WORK PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

"Sinfonietta," From Pen of Lad of 15, Given Hearing

BY OLIN DOWNES

The "Sinfonietta for Full Orchestra," op. 5, of Erich Korngold, the Viennese boy wonder of the day, was played for the first time in Boston at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

This was the first orchestral composition of Korngold to be played at the Symphony concerts. Korngold's "Overture to a Drama," played in Boston by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conductor, on Feb. 15, 1914, was not so interesting a work as the music heard yesterday.

IS SON OF A CRITIC

The Boston Symphony programme books recount the chief facts of Korngold's career up to date. He was born at Brunn, May 29, 1897. He is the son of Dr. Erich Korngold, the music critic of the Vienna Neue Freie Presse. He commenced to compose little pieces when he was 5, and in 1910 Dr. Korngold sent privately printed compositions of Erich to Richard Strauss, who, with other famous musicians, heaped eulogy upon them. Korngold studied the piano and composition with Alexander von Zemlimsky, and counterpoint with Robert Fuchs. He composed the Sinfonietta heard yesterday, in 1912 or 1913, in his 15th or 16th year. The work was first performed Nov. 28, 1913, at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna.

This music, of incredible maturity as regards workmanship, is surcharged with all the characteristic faults of the modern German school of composition—bombast, pretence, much ado over little. But that should not be laid down as a conclusive verdict in the talent of a young composer of unquestionable gifts. In spite of imitation, probably unconscious of models about him which no young man could help imitating, this music, especially in the first two movements, has real youth and vigor, humor, optimism—life. That the slow movement is a piece of tortured mechanism, consisting principally of "stunts" that the composer does with a leading theme which is not worth the trouble, and would not be worth the trouble if the variants were more valuable than they are, is self-evident. Nor is the finale more than an elaborate mosaic, although there is a masterly introduction, and there are admirable moments in it.

Even the Great Imitate

But if, in these days, we look indulgently upon the early compositions of great composers who have gone before should we not be equally indulgent of a talent in course of development? We discover Beethoven imitating Haydn, or Strauss imitating Wagner. In the light of history, we marvel at the comparative lack of originality in the early scores of even great masters. As for Wagner—! Who would by the wildest flight of imagination see the composer of "Tristan" and "Die Feen" produced at a later period in Wagner's life than this music in Korngold's career, or even in "Rienzi"? The impulse to compose, or, as in Strauss, the indomitable will to compose, are in early pages of such masters the surest and only indication of future possibilities.

In this country at least it is not to Korngold's credit that he is a "wunderkind." We are grown tired and mistrustful of the infant prodigy, but there is more than precocity in the music heard yesterday. Admitted that it is overladen with all the vices and few of the virtues of a certain school. How could it be otherwise? If Beethoven could not escape Haydn, how can Korngold be expected to escape Strauss, in particular, and Puccini and other composers in general? The Sinfonietta is in part at least musical flesh and blood. It has distinct musical promise, as well as startling technical facility. Let us wish well to a composer who labors under the worst possible disadvantage—early success.

Borwick the Soloist

Leonard Borwick, pianist, was the soloist at this concert. He played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, which, on the whole, is neither so distinguished nor so pianistic a work as the much smaller concerto in G major. Mr. Borwick's performance was conspicuous for its breadth and authority, its symphonic character, its technical sureness, the bigness of the tone, the grasp of the structure. Some might have [illegible] a more [illegible] of the slow movement, but the playing was throughout authoritative, full-blooded and convincing. An experienced and sincere musician, a well-equipped virtuoso, Mr. Borwick was justly applauded and recalled.

As a curtain piece the noisy and superficial overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozote" of Singaglia was played. Dr. Muck gave a brilliant performance of this work, and undoubtedly the virtuoso performance of Korngold's music placed the composition in the best possible light.

ADVE[illegible]SER,
APRIL 10 1915

SYMPHONY CONCERT REVEALS GENIUS

AN ARTISTIC YOUNG ENGLISH PIANIST

Programme Includes Korngold, Beethoven and Sinigaglia—Borwick Sololist

By Louis C. Elson.

Eric Korngold—Sinfonietta.
Beethoven—Piano Concerto, No. 5.
Soloist, Mr. Leonard Borwick.
Sinigaglia—Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozotte."

When Schumann long ago reviewed a new work (it was a set of variations for piano, Op. 2) by an unknown young man named Chopin, he began his review with the words—"Hats off, gentlemen! A Genius!" In reviewing the Sinfonietta, given at the Symphony Rehearsal yesterday afternoon, for the first time in Boston, we feel tempted to begin with a similar outburst. The composer is one of those strange prodigies which are typical of the present musical epoch. It was once considered a marvellous thing that Mozart should have written a Minuet when he was five years old, and a concerto when he was seven, but the musical prodigies of the present do much more than this. Willy Ferrero, for example, born in 1906, knew many orchestral scores by heart at seven years of age, and conducted a symphony orchestra before he was eight.

Eric Korngold is much older, for he was born away back in May, 1897, and is now therefore of the venerable age of nearly eighteen. But he has composed piano works at twelve years of age which were decidedly modern in style and modulation. If this goes on we may yet expect the infants of the future to compose their own cradle songs, for full orchestra and chorus, and direct them too!

Bold and Restless

The Sinfonietta that we heard yesterday is about as bold in its modulations and restless in its rhythms as any musical radical would desire, but it has logic in its measures and is not without moments of great beauty. The unfortunate point in this extreme school is that it allows a great many quacks and frauds to impose meaningless works upon the public, declaring that they are of the "new school," and still more unfortunate is it that there are always some weaklings who are ready to idolize the music that they cannot understand, deeming it great because incomprehensible. The young Korngold is not of this class. We have examined some of his earlier works and found them entirely logical even if they were not in a school which we admire; and this symphony, amid all its rhythmic dislocations, bears the imprint of sincerity and knowledge, it received an interpretation that does honor to Dr. Muck and his orchestra and it aroused very great enthusiasm.

Great Britain is beginning to assert herself in the domain of Beethoven. In 1868 two Britons were born who both achieved renown in the classical German school of piano-playing. A few years ago we heard the one (Frederick Lamond), and yesterday we listened to the other,—Leonard Borwick. England, both by her performers and her recent composers, is dispelling the old Rubinstein doubt about anything good ever coming out of that Nazareth.

E Flat Concerto

The E-flat concerto is undoubtedly the most masculine of Beethoven's concertos, and he was sufficiently in earnest in it to abolish that excrescence on Art,—the solo Cadenza. Yet we prefer the more delicate and less pompous G major concerto, the fourth, to this "Emperor"; or, perhaps, after the broad interpretation of yesterday, we might call it the "Czar" concerto.

Naturally it deals with a very large orchestra, even if it is a "Sinfonietta." Your true modern would not compose a slumber-song with less forces than double the grand orchestra used by Beethoven or quadruple the forces employed by Bach. Even the piano is brought in as a tone-color, and Mr. De Voto did wonderfully well with a part that was by no means a bed of roses.

Striking Figure

From the very beginning there was artistic development of a striking figure which permeated the entire four movements. There was something of bombast in the first and last movements, a quality quite natural in so young a composer, and in the Scherzo, too, the trumpeters almost blew their lips off, while the energetic kettle-drummer earnestly endeavored to give his instrument a knock-out blow.

For all that we liked the Scherzo best of the work, and it was in clear and symmetrical shape, too. The adagio was longer and less impressive than the Scherzo, but the Finale gave a noble and triumphant ending to the work. The Sinfonietta was actually epoch-making. Never in the whole course of musical history has a boy of 17 achieved anything so powerful as this, and in making this statement we do not forget what has been done by Mozart, Handel, Mendelssohn, or Richard Strauss.

This boy may yet become the real leader of the modern school. He holds himself far aloof from its nonsense, its [illegible] and its foolish experiments. Let us hope that Dr. Muck will give this work again before the end of the season. The mastery of modern tone coloring was not the least wonderful part of the work. And this is a Sinfonietta!! What will happen when the young Korngold composes a Symphony!!

Mr. Borwick gave an artistic and musicianly interpretation. There was a trace of unclearness at the first, but the blurring soon vanished and we had a true Beethoven reading both by conductor and soloist. The great cadenza for piano and orchestra combined, in the coda of the first movement, was excellent; the Adagio most expressive and with that rubato for which Paderewski contends in Beethoven-playing, and the finale was crisp and fiery. There never was a trace of pounding, yet Mr. Borwick gave force enough to every forzando.

The work, however, was badly placed, for after the thunderous effects of the Sinfonietta the scoring was bound to sound ultra-gentle. But Mr. Borwick was recalled many times and deserved this recognition.

Sinigaglia's overture to "Le Baruffe Chiozotte" deserves attention if only for the fact that so few Italians do anything in purely orchestral writing. For a long time the recently deceased Sgambati was as lonely in this field, in Italy, as a white blackbird. Chiozza is a village not far from Venice. They speak a dialect there that is about as much of a throat gargle as the dialect of Genoa. They are not total abstainers or ascetics. They are convivial, bacchanalian and extremely sociable. All this is portrayed in the overture which is as chattering, if not as contrapuntal, as the Wolf-Ferrari overture to "Suzanne's Secret." We are cordially in favor of importing this folk-music vein into the symphonic school; it is giving a new life and vigor to modern music. One might say that this overture was simply a light-opera work translated to the symphonic sphere, but we hope that the symphonic music of the future will lean more towards this genial style of melody, and we must bear in mind that the melodies are well-developed by figure treatment and the learned devices of classical music. Some of our modern music is tending too much toward the intellectual; let us hope that through Wolf-Ferrari, Sinigaglia, Humperdinck, and others, it may be led also into the paths of pleasant melody again.

The hurly-burly of the brawling parts of the overture was made the most of, and altogether it was a virile reading of a virile work, and formed a proper close to a remarkably interesting programme.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,
APRIL 10, 1915.

TRIBUTE PAID TO YOUNG COMPOSER

Korngold's "Sinfonietta" Impresses Symphony Audience.

Yesterday's Symphony audience paid flattering tribute to the precocious talent of Eric Wolfgang Korngold, the 16-year-old Vienna composer, who was represented on a Symphony program for the first time by his "Sinfonietta." This stands number five among his cataloged compositions, and it was brought out two years ago, when Korngold was only 14. For a boy of that age to have composed this elaborate piece of orchestral music, designing it in ultra-modern style for the most part and enriching it here and there with fine lyric qualities and alterating this gift with uncommon skill and ingenuity in the matter of harmony, must be set down as one of the most sensational musical feats of the century.

It might be said that the composition lacks high poetic tone, but the imaginative character of the third movement—the "Dream" movement—evoked much applause yesterday, and the lyric worth of parts of the second and fourth movements was patient to all. The structure of the "Sinfonietta" of itself betrays the poet and dreamer, and not the forced product of the academy. Generally speaking, the work would do credit to any grown-up composer.

Though termed a "Little Symphony," it occupied fully three-quarters of an hour. When it was over the applause continued until the orchestra stood up. Dr. Muck and his men, by their sympathetic performance, shared the honors with the young composer far away on the bank of the beautiful blue Danube.

The soloist this week is Leonard Borwick, who stands in the front rank of the English pianists, and whose performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto yesterday was highly creditable. Fluent technic, musicianly feeling and artistic moderation characterized Mr. Borwick's playing. The work of the orchestra in this number was a splendid display of virtuosity by itself. Prolonged applause rewarded the soloist.

Sinigaglia's spirited overture to Goldoni's "Chioggian Brawls," one of the famous 18th century Italian comedies, is the final number on this week's program.

At next week's concerts the orchestra will play Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture, Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani" and Haydn's 13th symphony. Sylvain Noack, second concert master of the orchestra, will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole."

[144]

MONITOR, BOSTON,
APRIL 10,

PROGRAM FULL OF CONTRAST IN 20TH SYMPHONY

Leonard Borwick, Soloist, Plays Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto and Korngold Sinfonietta Is Relieved by Sinigaglia

SYMPHONY HALL—Twentieth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 9. The program: Korngold, sinfonietta, op. 5 (first performance in Boston); Beethoven, piano concerto No. 5 in E-flat major, op. 73 (Leonard Borwick, soloist); Sinigaglia, overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," op. 32.

The program had the contrast of modern music and classic, in the sinfonietta and the concerto. It had the further contrast of heavy music in these two pieces and light music in the over ture of the Italian composer, Sinigaglia. It furnished by way of change from a week ago, a visiting artist, who brought an idea of interpretation from the outside world. So the variety that all Symphony hearers like, both on the day and in the succession of concert days, was found.

The three selections were interesting in combination and they were all well executed. The new piece by the youthful Korngold was presented in the orchestra's best manner; not, of course, in the way of the "Faust" symphony of Liszt last week, for such command is not possible in unfamiliar music; but in the way of the Sibelius fourth symphony and of the Reznicek "Schlemihl," played early in the year. Strong, vivid exposition is what is desirable in the playing of recently written orchestral music, and it is about all that can be expected. Performers, and listeners too, have to ripen to interpretation.

The piano piece had a delightfully poetic reading under the hands of Mr. Borwick. A more sociable Beethoven spoke in the solo passages of the "Emperor" concerto than has been heard before. The Sinigaglia overture is conceived in the mood of a scherzo. It is full of satiric comment and of comedy situation. Everybody knows that music of such sort gets complete and satisfactory statement under the baton of Dr. Muck.

The most important questions of all about a new symphony, those touching its fundamental message, its nationalistic aspiration, its setting forth of the ideals of its epoch, are next to impossible to find answers for. The message of music seldom finds elucidation until it has been much heard. Analysts need to know what happened after it was written to tell what it meant. For music is usually regarded as interpreting the times forward rather than backward. As an idealistic form of expression, it is supposed to look into the future, not to explain the past. This view may not be philosophically tenable, but nobody seems ever seriously to have doubted it.

The forward leaning of music is one of the things that criticism takes for granted, because the public takes it for granted. Listeners, if searchingly asked, will in some way or other admit that they are hoping for light on society as it is to be in their study of new composers and their works. So what we want to know most about the sinfonietta of Korngold, its message, we have to leave to speculation. Meantime certain points are open to discussion, such as the Korngold style of writing and the Korngold method of orchestration.

As to the group of composers to which Korngold belongs, there can be little argument that it is the one which formerlyMahler and that now Weingartner leads. The chief respect in which Korngold follows these two is in his complete disregard of the old scherzo and andante moods. He writes a scherzo for his sinfonietta which answers to all the external requirements of the form. But it makes no pretense to being a chapter of humor. And in the same way he writes an andante which corresponds formally to the old type of slow movement; but it is in no sense a chapter devoted to the expression of tender sentiment. Here Korngold is Mahler and Weingartner in precise copy. He puts himself right in their school, as opposed to the school of Richard Strauss.

Superficial listeners might make haste to attribute this ignoring of the humorous and the sentimental to Korngold's youth. They might hold that the young composer tried for a traditional scherzo and andante and failed on account of inexperience. But there is no likelihood of this. Such a master of form as Korngold proves himself to be must also be a master of mood. And there are his plain models in Mahler and Weingartner. It is far more probable that he wrote his third and fourth movements in their manner as a result of intention rather than as a result of limitation.

In orchestration the composer of the sinfonietta is not unlike Mahler. He has the Mahler sonority and the Mahler persistence in full orchestral tone unrelieved by solo playing. He has the Mahler splendor of brass tone and the Mahler contrast of string with brass tone, with wood tone submerged. But his effects are new with all their resemblance to those of another writer. And they are so because of his individual manner of handling his themes and of his own harmonic plan. He has great constructive originality, and this gives his instrumentation a freshness that is of no school but Korngold's.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 10.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE "SINFONIETTA" OF ERICH KORNGOLD

Masterful and Revealing Performance, Interest and Pleasure—The Young Virtues and Shortcomings of the Music—Individual Traits and Viennese Savor—The Quiet Perfections of Mr. Borwick in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto—A Gay Italian Overture

CLOSET study of music brings pleasure and profit to the studious listener; but no piece is really itself until it is heard through the means that the composer designed for it and with those means in able hands. Erich Korngold's Sinfonietta, disclosed yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert for the first time in Boston, seemed one thing on the engraved page, which has been open for a full year, and another as Dr. Muck and the orchestra illuminatingly and enrichingly played it. Indeed, as some said, who had heard the piece elsewhere, never before had it been so releasingly and eloquently performed. Korngold hardly raises artificial difficulties in the score—a familiar temptation to such fertile youth—but he writes like a true ultra-modern, saying his say in his own fashion regardless of the requirements he lays thus upon those who must transmit and open it. Dr. Muck has kept the Sinfonietta by him these many months and he has spared not in either his own study of it or in many and long rehearsals with the men.

As usual, the orchestra fulfilled all that conductor and composer enjoined upon them and the outcome was a performance that seemed to transform the piece. Not only did each stroke of harmonic and instrumental color stand forth clear; not only did the incessant modulation gain free and full play; not only did thematic profiles outline themselves upon the ear and rhythms, contrasts, climaxes, transitions and sustained song tell, but the whole Sinfonietta had kept the young vigor and vitality, the young ardor and the young excess that are the pleasure and the distinction of it. It kept also its recurring voice of Vienna and of no other place and temperament. So to play the Sinfonietta through such technical mastery, tone and expressiveness as the Symphony Orchestra can command was to give it, perhaps as never before, its full and true voice and to prove again two of Dr. Muck's finest virtues—his devotion to the piece in hand and his sense of illuminating and individualizing style.

Youth has oftener served Korngold well than ill in the sinfonietta. No youngster of sixteen, however abnormally ripened, has undergone either in living or in imagination—which usually is better—the mental, emotional and spiritual experiences out of which, plus musical invention and expressive ability, slow symphonic movements of deep beauty and penetrating power spring. For his Andante, Korngold could do no more than fashion a songful melody of quiet charm and carry it through various modulations and moods with as quiet skill, here and there a hint of beauty, especially in the coloring, and hardly a trace of hardness. No youngster of sixteen, with such imagination and resource in timbres and harmonies and in the whole range of symphonic technique as is Korngold's can escape the excess of these rare virtues. Now and then he does modulate out of mere eagerness and restlessness, or lay on instrumental and harmonic strokes for the pleasure of making them. Inevitably and spontaneously he likes to hear the full orchestra going and to strike hard with transition, contrast or climax. He was bound to be occasionally clumsy, heavy-handed or vague as he was bound to recall once and again his recollections of Strauss, of Puccini, of Wagner and of other composers that have filled his young ears. Of course he still rejoices in his medium and his means and his large command of them rather than in the melodic thoughts, the moods, the pictures and vision, the whole imaginative and emotional fabric of which they are the instruments. Korngold is inevitably such because he is young and unashamedly glad of his youth.

On the other hand, that youth has given him much that is precious in itself and that is rare enough in our music. Before fifty measures of the Sinfonietta have come and gone, the vitality and the vivacity of the music, its spirited flow and its propulsive swing win the ear and quicken answering mood and fancy. Not once in the whole have preferred a more intimate [illegible] of the slow movement, but the playing was throughout authoritative, full-blooded and convincing. An experienced and sincere musician, a well-equipped virtuoso, Mr. Borwick was justly applauded and recalled.

(over)

As a curtain piece the noisy and superficial overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozote" of Singaglia was played. Dr. Muck gave a brilliant performance of this work, and undoubtedly the virtuoso performance of Korngold's music placed the composition in the best possible light.

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 10 1915

SYMPHONY CONCERT REVEALS GENIUS

AN ARTISTIC YOUNG ENGLISH PIANIST

Programme Includes Korngold, Beethoven and Sinigaglia—Borwick Sololist

By Louis C. Elson.

Eric Korngold—Sinfonietta.
Beethoven—Piano Concerto, No. 5.
Soloist, Mr. Leonard Borwick.
Sinigaglia—Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozotte."

When Schumann long ago reviewed a new work (it was a set of variations for piano, Op. 2) by an unknown young man named Chopin, he began his review with the words—"Hats off, gentlemen! A Genius!" In reviewing the Sinfonietta, given at the Symphony Rehearsal yesterday afternoon, for the first time in Boston, we feel tempted to begin with a similar outburst. The composer is one of those strange prodigies which are typical of the present musical epoch. It was once considered a marvellous thing that Mozart should have written a Minuet when he was five years old, and a concerto when he was seven, but the musical prodigies of the present do much more than this. Willy Ferrero, for example, born in 1906, knew many orchestral scores by heart at seven years of age, and conducted a symphony orchestra before he was eight.

Eric Korngold is much older, for he was born away back in May, 1897, and is now therefore of the venerable age of nearly eighteen. But he has composed piano works at twelve years of age which were decidedly modern in style and modulation. If this goes on we may yet expect the infants of the future to compose their own cradle songs, for full orchestra and chorus, and direct them too!

Bold and Restless

The Sinfonietta that we heard yesterday is about as bold in its modulations and restless in its rhythms as any musical radical would desire, but it has logic in its measures and is not without moments of great beauty. The unfortunate point in this extreme school is that it allows a great many quacks and frauds to impose meaningless works upon the public, declaring that they are of the "new school," and still more unfortunate is it that there are always some weaklings who are ready to idolize the music that they cannot understand, deeming it great because incomprehensible. The young Korngold is not of this class. We have examined some of his earlier works and found them entirely logical even if they were not in a school which we admire; and this symphony, amid all its rhythmic dislocations, bears the imprint of sincerity and knowledge, it received an interpretation that does honor to Dr. Muck and his orchestra and it aroused very great enthusiasm.

Great Britain is beginning to assert herself in the domain of Beethoven. In 1868 two Britons were born who both achieved renown in the classical German school of piano-playing. A few years ago we heard the one (Frederick Lamond), and yesterday we listened to the other,—Leonard Borwick. England, both by her performers and her recent composers, is dispelling the old Rubinstein doubt about anything good ever coming out of that Nazareth.

E Flat Concerto

The E-flat concerto is undoubtedly the most masculine of Beethoven's concertos, and he was sufficiently in earnest in it to abolish that excrescence on Art,—the solo Cadenza. Yet we prefer the more delicate and less pompous G major concerto, the fourth, to this "Emperor"; or, perhaps, after the broad interpretation of yesterday, we might call it the "Czar" concerto.

Naturally it deals with a very large orchestra, even if it is a "Sinfonietta." Your true modern would not compose a slumber-song with less forces than double the grand orchestra used by Beethoven or quadruple the forces employed by Bach. Even the piano is brought in as a tone-color, and Mr. De Voto did wonderfully well with a part that was by no means a bed of roses.

Striking Figure

From the very beginning there was artistic development of a striking figure which permeated the entire four movements. There was something of bombast in the first and last movements, a quality quite natural in so young a composer, and in the Scherzo, too, the trumpeters almost blew their lips off, while the energetic kettle-drummer earnestly endeavored to give his instrument a knock-out blow.

For all that we liked the Scherzo best of the work, and it was in clear and symmetrical shape, too. The adagio was longer and less impressive than the Scherzo, but the Finale gave a noble and triumphant ending to the work. The Sinfonietta was actually epoch-making. Never in the whole course of musical history has a boy of 17 achieved anything so powerful as this, and in making this statement we do not forget what has been done by Mozart, Handel, Mendelssohn, or Richard Strauss.

This boy may yet become the real leader of the modern school. He holds himself far aloof from its nonsense, its [illegible] and its foolish experiments. Let us hope that Dr. Muck will give this work again before the end of the season. The mastery of modern tone coloring was not the least wonderful part of the work. And this is a Sinfonietta!! What will happen when the young Korngold composes a Symphony!!

Mr. Borwick gave an artistic and musicianly interpretation. There was a trace of unclearness at the first, but the blurring soon vanished and we had a true Beethoven reading both by conductor and soloist. The great cadenza for piano and orchestra combined, in the coda of the first movement, was excellent; the Adagio most expressive and with that rubato for which Paderewski contends in Beethoven-playing, and the finale was crisp and fiery. There never was a trace of pounding, yet Mr. Borwick gave force enough to every forzando.

The work, however, was badly placed, for after the thunderous effects of the Sinfonietta the scoring was bound to sound ultra-gentle. But Mr. Borwick was recalled many times and deserved this recognition.

Sinigaglia's overture to "Le Baruffe Chiozotte" deserves attention if only for the fact that so few Italians do anything in purely orchestral writing. For a long time the recently deceased Sgambati was as lonely in this field, in Italy, as a white blackbird. Chiozza is a village not far from Venice. They speak a dialect there that is about as much of a throat gargle as the dialect of Genoa. They are not total abstainers or ascetics. They are convivial, bacchanalian and extremely sociable. All this is portrayed in the overture which is as chattering, if not as contrapuntal, as the Wolf-Ferrari overture to "Suzanne's Secret." We are cordially in favor of importing this folk-music vein into the symphonic school; it is giving a new life and vigor to modern music. One might say that this overture was simply a light-opera work translated to the symphonic sphere, but we hope that the symphonic music of the future will lean more towards this genial style of melody, and we must bear in mind that the melodies are well-developed by figure treatment and the learned devices of classical music. Some of our modern music is tending too much toward the intellectual; let us hope that through Wolf-Ferrari, Sinigaglia, Humperdinck, and others, it may be led also into the paths of pleasant melody again.

The hurly-burly of the brawling parts of the overture was made the most of, and altogether it was a virile reading of a virile work, and formed a proper close to a remarkably interesting programme.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,

APRIL 10, 1915.

TRIBUTE PAID TO YOUNG COMPOSER

Korngold's "Sinfonietta" Impresses Symphony Audience.

Yesterday's Symphony audience paid flattering tribute to the precocious talent of Eric Wolfgang Korngold, the 16-year-old Vienna composer, who was represented on a Symphony program for the first time by his "Sinfonietta." This stands number five among his cataloged compositions, and it was brought out two years ago, when Korngold was only 14. For a boy of that age to have composed this elaborate piece of orchestral music, designing it in ultra-modern style for the most part and enriching it here and there with fine lyric qualities and alterating this gift with uncommon skill and ingenuity in the matter of harmony, must be set down as one of the most sensational musical feats of the century.

It might be said that the composition lacks high poetic tone, but the imaginative character of the third movement—the "Dream" movement—evoked much applause yesterday, and the lyric worth of parts of the second and fourth movements was patient to all. The structure of the "Sinfonietta" of itself betrays the poet and dreamer, and not the forced product of the academy. Generally speaking, the work would do credit to any grown-up composer.

Though termed a "Little Symphony," it occupied fully three-quarters of an hour. When it was over the applause continued until the orchestra stood up. Dr. Muck and his men, by their sympathetic performance, shared the honors with the young composer far away on the bank of the beautiful blue Danube.

The soloist this week is Leonard Borwick, who stands in the front rank of the English pianists, and whose performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto yesterday was highly creditable. Fluent technic, musicianly feeling and artistic moderation characterized Mr. Borwick's playing. The work of the orchestra in this number was a splendid display of virtuosity by itself. Prolonged applause rewarded the soloist.

Sinigaglia's spirited overture to Goldoni's "Chioggian Brawls," one of the famous 18th century Italian comedies, is the final number on this week's program.

At next week's concerts the orchestra will play Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture, Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani" and Haydn's 13th symphony. Sylvain Noack, second concert master of the orchestra, will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole."

MONITOR, BOSTON,

APRIL 10,

PROGRAM FULL OF CONTRAST IN 20TH SYMPHONY

Leonard Borwick, Soloist, Plays Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto and Korngold Sinfonietta Is Relieved by Sinigaglia

SYMPHONY HALL—Twentieth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 9. The program: Korngold, sinfonietta, op. 5 (first performance in Boston); Beethoven, piano concerto No. 5 in E-flat major, op. 73 (Leonard Borwick, soloist); Sinigaglia, overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," op. 32.

The program had the contrast of modern music and classic, in the sinfonietta and the concerto. It had the further contrast of heavy music in these two pieces and light music in the over ture of the Italian composer, Sinigaglia. It furnished by way of change from a week ago, a visiting artist, who brought an idea of interpretation from the outside world. So the variety that all Symphony hearers like, both on the day and in the succession of concert days, was found.

The three selections were interesting in combination and they were all well executed. The new piece by the youthful Korngold was presented in the orchestra's best manner; not, of course, in the way of the "Faust" symphony of Liszt last week, for such command is not possible in unfamiliar music; but in the way of the Sibelius fourth symphony and of the Reznicek "Schlemihl," played early in the year. Strong, vivid exposition is what is desirable in the playing of recently written orchestral music, and it is about all that can be expected. Performers, and listeners too, have to ripen to interpretation.

The piano piece had a delightfully poetic reading under the hands of Mr. Borwick. A more sociable Beethoven spoke in the solo passages of the "Emperor" concerto than has been heard before. The Sinigaglia overture is conceived in the mood of a scherzo. It is full of satiric comment and of comedy situation. Everybody knows that music of such sort gets complete and satisfactory statement under the baton of Dr. Muck.

The most important questions of all about a new symphony, those touching its fundamental message, its nationalistic aspiration, its setting forth of the ideals of its epoch, are next to impossible to find answers for. The message of music seldom finds elucidation until it has been much heard. Analysts need to know what happened after it was written to tell what it meant. For music is usually regarded as interpreting the times forward rather than backward. As an idealistic form of expression, it is supposed to look into the future, not to explain the past. This view may not be philosophically tenable, but nobody seems ever seriously to have doubted it.

The forward leaning of music is one of the things that criticism takes for granted, because the public takes it for granted. Listeners, if searchingly asked, will in some way or other admit that they are hoping for light on society as it is to be in their study of new composers and their works. So what we want to know most about the sinfonietta of Korngold, its message, we have to leave to speculation. Meantime certain points are open to discussion, such as the Korngold style of writing and the Korngold method of orchestration.

As to the group of composers to which Korngold belongs, there can be little argument that it is the one which formerly Mahler and that now Weingartner leads. The chief respect in which Korngold follows these two is in his complete disregard of the old scherzo and andante moods. He writes a scherzo for his sinfonietta which answers to all the external requirements of the form. But it makes no pretense to being a chapter of humor. And in the same way he writes an andante which corresponds formally to the old type of slow movement; but it is in no sense a chapter devoted to the expression of tender sentiment. Here Korngold is Mahler and Weingartner in precise copy. He puts himself right in their school, as opposed to the school of Richard Strauss.

Superficial listeners might make haste to attribute this ignoring of the humorous and the sentimental to Korngold's youth. They might hold that the young composer tried for a traditional scherzo and andante and failed on account of inexperience. But there is no likelihood of this. Such a master of form as Korngold proves himself to be must also be a master of mood. And there are his plain models in Mahler and Weingartner. It is far more probable that he wrote his third and fourth movements in their manner as a result of intention rather than as a result of limitation.

In orchestration the composer of the sinfonietta is not unlike Mahler. He has the Mahler sonority and the Mahler persistence in full orchestral tone unrelieved by solo playing. He has the Mahler splendor of brass tone and the Mahler contrast of string with brass tone, with wood tone submerged. But his effects are new with all their resemblance to those of another writer. And they are so because of his individual manner of handling his themes and of his own harmonic plan. He has great constructive originality, and this gives his instrumentation a freshness that is of no school but Korngold's.

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 10.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE "SINFONIETTA" OF ERICH KORNGOLD

Masterful and Revealing Performance, Interest and Pleasure—The Young Virtues and Shortcomings of the Music—Individual Traits and Viennese Savor—The Quiet Perfections of Mr. Borwick in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto—A Gay Italian Overture

CLOSET study of music brings pleasure and profit to the studious listener; but no piece is really itself until it is heard through the means that the composer designed for it and with those means in able hands. Erich Korngold's Sinfonietta, disclosed yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert for the first time in Boston, seemed one thing on the engraved page, which has been open for a full year, and another as Dr. Muck and the orchestra illuminatingly and enrichingly played it. Indeed, as some said, who had heard the piece elsewhere, never before had it been so releasingly and eloquently performed. Korngold hardly raises artificial difficulties in the score—a familiar temptation to such fertile youth—but he writes like a true ultra-modern, saying his say in his own fashion regardless of the requirements he lays thus upon those who must transmit and open it. Dr. Muck has kept the Sinfonietta by him these many months and he has spared not in either his own study of it or in many and long rehearsals with the men.

As usual, the orchestra fulfilled all that conductor and composer enjoined upon them and the outcome was a performance that seemed to transform the piece. Not only did each stroke of harmonic and instrumental color stand forth clear; not only did the incessant modulation gain free and full play; not only did thematic profiles outline themselves upon the ear and rhythms, contrasts, climaxes, transitions and sustained song tell, but the whole Sinfonietta had kept the young vigor and vitality, the young ardor and the young excess that are the pleasure and the distinction of it. It kept also its recurring voice of Vienna and of no other place and temperament. So to play the Sinfonietta through such technical mastery, tone and expressiveness as the Symphony Orchestra can command was to give it, perhaps as never before, its full and true voice and to prove again two of Dr. Muck's finest virtues—his devotion to the piece in hand and his sense of illuminating and individualizing style.

Youth has oftener served Korngold well than ill in the sinfonietta. No youngster of sixteen, however abnormally ripened, has undergone either in living or in imagination—which usually is better—the mental, emotional and spiritual experiences out of which, plus musical invention and expressive ability, slow symphonic movements of deep beauty and penetrating power spring. For his Andante, Korngold could do no more than fashion a songful melody of quiet charm and carry it through various modulations and moods with as quiet skill, here and there a hint of beauty, especially in the coloring, and hardly a trace of hardness. No youngster of sixteen, with such imagination and resource in timbres and harmonies and in the whole range of symphonic technique as is Korngold's can escape the excess of these rare virtues. Now and then he does modulate out of mere eagerness and restlessness, or lay on instrumental and harmonic strokes for the pleasure of making them. Inevitably and spontaneously he likes to hear the full orchestra going and to strike hard with transition, contrast or climax. He was bound to be occasionally clumsy, heavy-handed or vague as he was bound to recall once and again his recollections of Strauss, of Puccini, of Wagner and of other composers that have filled his young ears. Of course he still rejoices in his medium and his means and his large command of them rather than in the melodic thoughts, the moods, the pictures and vision, the whole imaginative and emotional fabric of which they are the instruments. Korngold is inevitably such because he is young and unashamedly glad of his youth.

On the other hand, that youth has given him much that is precious in itself and that is rare enough in our music. Before fifty measures of the Sinfonietta have come and gone, the vitality and the vivacity of the music, its spirited flow and its propulsive swing win the ear and quicken answering mood and fancy. Not once in the whole

(over)

[illegible]al March which forms the orchestra has given an have preferred a more [illegible] of the slow movement, but the playing was throughout authoritative, full-blooded and convincing. An experienced and sincere musician, a well-equipped virtuoso, Mr. Borwick was justly applauded and recalled.

As a curtain piece the noisy and superficial overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozote" of Singaglia was played. Dr. Muck gave a brilliant performance of this work, and undoubtedly the virtuoso performance of Korngold's music placed the composition in the best possible light.

ADVER[illegible]SER,
APRIL 10 1915

SYMPHONY CONCERT REVEALS GENIUS

AN ARTISTIC YOUNG ENGLISH PIANIST

Programme Includes Korngold, Beethoven and Sinigaglia—Borwick Sololist

By Louis C. Elson.

Eric Korngold—Sinfonietta.
Beethoven—Piano Concerto, No. 5.
Soloist, Mr. Leonard Borwick.
Sinigaglia—Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozotte."

When Schumann long ago reviewed a new work (it was a set of variations for piano, Op. 2) by an unknown young man named Chopin, he began his review with the words—"Hats off, gentlemen! A Genius!" In reviewing the Sinfonietta, given at the Symphony Rehearsal yesterday afternoon, for the first time in Boston, we feel tempted to begin with a similar outburst. The composer is one of those strange prodigies which are typical of the present musical epoch. It was once considered a marvellous thing that Mozart should have written a Minuet when he was five years old, and a concerto when he was seven, but the musical prodigies of the present do much more than this. Willy Ferrero, for example, born in 1906, knew many orchestral scores by heart at seven years of age, and conducted a symphony orchestra before he was eight.

Eric Korngold is much older, for he was born away back in May, 1897, and is now therefore of the venerable age of nearly eighteen. But he has composed piano works at twelve years of age which were decidedly modern in style and modulation. If this goes on we may yet expect the infants of the future to compose their own cradle songs, for full orchestra and chorus, and direct them too!

Bold and Restless

The Sinfonietta that we heard yesterday is about as bold in its modulations and restless in its rhythms as any musical radical would desire, but it has logic in its measures and is not without moments of great beauty. The unfortunate point in this extreme school is that it allows a great many quacks and frauds to impose meaningless works upon the public, declaring that they are of the "new school," and still more unfortunate is it that there are always some weaklings who are ready to idolize the music that they cannot understand, deeming it great because incomprehensible. The young Korngold is not of this class. We have examined some of his earlier works and found them entirely logical even if they were not in a school which we admire; and this symphony, amid all its rhythmic dislocations, bears the imprint of sincerity and knowledge, it received an interpretation that does honor to Dr. Muck and his orchestra and it aroused very great enthusiasm.

Great Britain is beginning to assert herself in the domain of Beethoven. In 1868 two Britons were born who both achieved renown in the classical German school of piano-playing. A few years ago we heard the one (Frederick Lamond), and yesterday we listened to the other,—Leonard Borwick. England, both by her performers and her recent composers, is dispelling the old Rubinstein doubt about anything good ever coming out of that Nazareth.

E Flat Concerto

The E-flat concerto is undoubtedly the most masculine of Beethoven's concertos, and he was sufficiently in earnest in it to abolish that excrescence on Art,—the solo Cadenza. Yet we prefer the more delicate and less pompous G major concerto, the fourth, to this "Emperor"; or, perhaps, after the broad interpretation of yesterday, we might call it the "Czar" concerto.

Naturally it deals with a very large orchestra, even if it is a "Sinfonietta." Your true modern would not compose a slumber-song with less forces than double the grand orchestra used by Beethoven or quadruple the forces employed by Bach. Even the piano is brought in as a tone-color, and Mr. De Voto did wonderfully well with a part that was by no means a bed of roses.

Striking Figure

From the very beginning there was artistic development of a striking figure which permeated the entire four movements. There was something of bombast in the first and last movements, a quality quite natural in so young a composer, and in the Scherzo, too, the trumpeters almost blew their lips off, while the energetic kettle-drummer earnestly endeavored to give his instrument a knock-out blow.

For all that we liked the Scherzo best of the work, and it was in clear and symmetrical shape, too. The adagio was longer and less impressive than the Scherzo, but the Finale gave a noble and triumphant ending to the work. The Sinfonietta was actually epoch-making. Never in the whol[illegible] course of musical history has a boy of [illegible] achieved anything so powerful as thi[illegible] and in making this statement we do n[illegible] forget what has been done by Moza[illegible] Handel, Mendelssohn, or Richard Straus[illegible]

This boy may yet become the real le[illegible] of the modern school. He holds himse[illegible]

[illegible] March which forms the [illegible] orchestra has given an aloof from its nonsense, its eccentricities and its foolish experiments. Let us hope that Dr. Muck will give this work again before the end of the season. The mastery of modern tone coloring was not the least wonderful part of the work. And this is a Sinfonietta!! What will happen when the young Korngold composes a Symphony!!

Mr. Borwick gave an artistic and musicianly interpretation. There was a trace of unclearness at the first, but the blurring soon vanished and we had a true Beethoven reading both by conductor and soloist. The great cadenza for piano and orchestra combined, in the coda of the first movement, was excellent; the Adagio most expressive and with that rubato for which Paderewski contends in Beethoven-playing, and the finale was crisp and fiery. There never was a trace of pounding, yet Mr. Borwick gave force enough to every forzando.

The work, however, was badly placed, for after the thunderous effects of the Sinfonietta the scoring was bound to sound ultra-gentle. But Mr. Borwick was recalled many times and deserved this recognition.

Sinigaglia's overture to "Le Baruffe Chiozotte" deserves attention if only for the fact that so few Italians do anything in purely orchestral writing. For a long time the recently deceased Sgambati was as lonely in this field, in Italy, as a white blackbird. Chiozza is a village not far from Venice. They speak a dialect there that is about as much of a throat gargle as the dialect of Genoa. They are not total abstainers or ascetics. They are convivial, bacchanalian and extremely sociable. All this is portrayed in the overture which is as chattering, if not as contrapuntal, as the Wolf-Ferrari overture to "Suzanne's Secret." We are cordially in favor of importing this folk-music vein into the symphonic school; it is giving a new life and vigor to modern music. One might say that this overture was simply a light-opera work translated to the symphonic sphere, but we hope that the symphonic music of the future will lean more towards this genial style of melody, and we must bear in mind that the melodies are well-developed by figure treatment and the learned devices of classical music. Some of our modern music is tending too much toward the intellectual; let us hope that through Wolf-Ferrari, Sinigaglia, Humperdinck, and others, it may be led also into the paths of pleasant melody again.

The hurly-burly of the brawling parts of the overture was made the most of, and altogether it was a virile reading of a virile work, and formed a proper close to a remarkably interesting programme.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,
APRIL 10, 1915.

TRIBUTE PAID TO YOUNG COMPOSER

Korngold's "Sinfonietta" Impresses Symphony Audience.

Yesterday's Symphony audience paid flattering tribute to the precocious talent of Eric Wolfgang Korngold, the 16-year-old Vienna composer, who was represented on a Symphony program for the first time by his "Sinfonietta." This stands number five among his cataloged compositions, and it was brought out two years ago, when Korngold was only 14. For a boy of that age to have composed this elaborate piece of orchestral music, designing it in ultra-modern style for the most part and enriching it here and there with fine lyric qualities and alterating this gift with uncommon skill and ingenuity in the matter of harmony, must be set down as one of the most sensational musical feats of the century.

It might be said that the composition lacks high poetic tone, but the imaginative character of the third movement—the "Dream" movement—evoked much applause yesterday, and the lyric worth of parts of the second and fourth movements was patient to all. The structure of the "Sinfonietta" of itself betrays the poet and dreamer, and not the forced product of the academy. Generally speaking, the work would do credit to any grown-up composer.

Though termed a "Little Symphony," it occupied fully three-quarters of an hour. When it was over the applause continued until the orchestra stood up. Dr. Muck and his men, by their sympathetic performance, shared the honors with the young composer far away on the bank of the beautiful blue Danube.

The soloist this week is Leonard Borwick, who stands in the front rank of the English pianists, and whose performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto yesterday was highly creditable. Fluent technic, musicianly feeling and artistic moderation characterized Mr. Borwick's playing. The work of the orchestra in this number was a splendid display of virtuosity by itself. Prolonged applause rewarded the soloist.

Sinigaglia's spirited overture to Goldoni's "Chioggian Brawls," one of the famous 18th century Italian comedies, is the final number on this week's program.

At next week's concerts the orchestra will play Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture, Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani" and Haydn's 13th symphony. Sylvain Noack, second concert master of the orchestra, will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole."

MONITOR, BOSTON,
APRIL 10,

PROGRAM FULL OF CONTRAST IN 20TH SYMPHONY

Leonard Borwick, Soloist, Plays Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto and Korngold Sinfonietta Is Relieved by Sinigaglia

SYMPHONY HALL—Twentieth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 9. The program: Korngold, sinfonietta, op. 5 (first performance in Boston); Beethoven, piano concerto No. 5 in E-flat major, op. 73 (Leonard Borwick, soloist); Sinigaglia, overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," op. 32.

The program had the contrast of modern music and classic, in the sinfonietta and the concerto. It had the further contrast of heavy music in these two pieces and light music in the over ture of the Italian composer, Sinigaglia. It furnished by way of change from a week ago, a visiting artist, who brought an idea of interpretation from the outside world. So the variety that all Symphony hearers like, both on the day and in the succession of concert days, was found.

The three selections were interesting in combination and they were all well executed. The new piece by the youthful Korngold was presented in the orchestra's best manner; not, of course, in the way of the "Faust" symphony of Liszt last week, for such command is not possible in unfamiliar music; but in the way of the Sibelius fourth symphony and of the Reznicek "Schlemihl," played early in the year. Strong, vivid exposition is what is desirable in the playing of recently written orchestral music, and it is about all that can be expected. Performers, and listeners too, have to ripen to interpretation.

The piano piece had a delightfully poetic reading under the hands of Mr. Borwick. A more sociable Beethoven spoke in the solo passages of the "Emperor" concerto than has been heard before. The Sinigaglia overture is conceived in the mood of a scherzo. It is full of satiric comment and of comedy situation. Everybody knows that music of such sort gets complete and satisfactory statement under the baton of Dr. Muck.

The most important questions of all about a new symphony, those touching its fundamental message, its nationalistic aspiration, its setting forth of the ideals of its epoch, are next to impossible to find answers for. The message of music seldom finds elucidation until it has been much heard. Analysts need to know what happened after it was written to tell what it meant. For music is usually regarded as interpreting the times forward rather than backward. As an idealistic form of expression, it is supposed to look into the future, not to explain the past. This view may not be philosophically tenable, but nobody seems ever seriously to have doubted it.

The forward leaning of music is one of the things that criticism takes for granted, because the public takes it for granted. Listeners, if searchingly asked, will in some way or other admit that they are hoping for light on society as it is to be in their study of new composers and their works. So what we want to know most about the sinfonietta of Korngold, its message, we have to leave to speculation. Meantime certain points are open to discussion, such as the Korngold style of writing and the Korngold method of orchestration.

As to the group of composers to which Korngold belongs, there can be little argument that it is the one which formerly Mahler and that now Weingartner leads. The chief respect in which Korngold follows these two is in his complete disregard of the old scherzo and andante moods. He writes a scherzo for his sinfonietta which answers to all the external requirements of the form. But it makes no pretense to being a chapter of humor. And in the same way he writes an andante which corresponds formally to the old type of slow movement; but it is in no sense a chapter devoted to the expression of tender sentiment. Here Korngold is Mahler and Weingartner in precise copy. He puts himself right in their school, as opposed to the school of Richard Strauss.

Superficial listeners might make haste to attribute this ignoring of the humorous and the sentimental to Korngold's youth. They might hold that the young composer tried for a traditional scherzo and andante and failed on account of inexperience. But there is no likelihood of this. Such a master of form as Korngold proves himself to be must also be a master of mood. And there are his plain models in Mahler and Weingartner. It is far more probable that he wrote his third and fourth movements in their manner as a result of intention rather than as a result of limitation.

In orchestration the composer of the sinfonietta is not unlike Mahler. He has the Mahler sonority and the Mahler persistence in full orchestral tone unrelieved by solo playing. He has the Mahler splendor of brass tone and the Mahler contrast of string with brass tone, with wood tone submerged. But his effects are new with all their resemblance to those of another writer. And they are so because of his individual manner of handling his themes and of his own harmonic plan. He has great constructive originality, and this gives his instrumentation a freshness that is of no school but Korngold's.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 10.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE "SINFONIETTA" OF ERICH KORNGOLD

Masterful and Revealing Performance, Interest and Pleasure—The Young Virtues and Shortcomings of the Music—Individual Traits and Viennese Savor—The Quiet Perfections of Mr. Borwick in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto—A Gay Italian Overture

CLOSET study of music brings pleasure and profit to the studious listener; but no piece is really itself until it is heard through the means that the composer designed for it and with those means in able hands. Erich Korngold's Sinfonietta, disclosed yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert for the first time in Boston, seemed one thing on the engraved page, which has been open for a full year, and another as Dr. Muck and the orchestra illuminatingly and enrichingly played it. Indeed, as some said, who had heard the piece elsewhere, never before had it been so releasingly and eloquently performed. Korngold hardly raises artificial difficulties in the score—a familiar temptation to such fertile youth—but he writes like a true ultra-modern, saying his say in his own fashion regardless of the requirements he lays thus upon those who must transmit and open it. Dr. Muck has kept the Sinfonietta by him these many months and he has spared not in either his own study of it or in many and long rehearsals with the men.

As usual, the orchestra fulfilled all that conductor and composer enjoined upon them and the outcome was a performance that seemed to transform the piece. Not only did each stroke of harmonic and instrumental color stand forth clear; not only did the incessant modulation gain free and full play; not only did thematic profiles outline themselves upon the ear and rhythms, contrasts, climaxes, transitions and sustained song tell, but the whole Sinfonietta had kept the young vigor and vitality, the young ardor and the young excess that are the pleasure and the distinction of it. It kept also its recurring voice of Vienna and of no other place and temperament. So to play the Sinfonietta through such technical mastery, tone and expressiveness as the Symphony Orchestra can command was to give it, perhaps as never before, its full and true voice and to prove again two of Dr. Muck's finest virtues—his devotion to the piece in hand and his sense of illuminating and individualizing style.

Youth has oftener served Korngold well than ill in the sinfonietta. No youngster of sixteen, however abnormally ripened, has undergone either in living or in imagination—which usually is better—the mental, emotional and spiritual experiences out of which, plus musical invention and expressive ability, slow symphonic movements of deep beauty and penetrating power spring. For his Andante, Korngold could do no more than fashion a songful melody of quiet charm and carry it through various modulations and moods with as quiet skill, here and there a hint of beauty, especially in the coloring, and hardly a trace of hardness. No youngster of sixteen, with such imagination and resource in timbres and harmonies and in the whole range of symphonic technique as is Korngold's can escape the excess of these rare virtues. Now and then he does modulate out of mere eagerness and restlessness, or lay on instrumental and harmonic strokes for the pleasure of making them. Inevitably and spontaneously he likes to hear the full orchestra going and to strike hard with transition, contrast or climax. He was bound to be occasionally clumsy, heavy-handed or vague as he was bound to recall once and again his recollections of Strauss, of Puccini, of Wagner and of other composers that have filled his young ears. Of course he still rejoices in his medium and his means and his large command of them rather than in the melodic thoughts, the moods, the pictures and vision, the whole imaginative and emotional fabric of which they are the instruments. Korngold is inevitably such because he is young and unashamedly glad of his youth.

On the other hand, that youth has given him much that is precious in itself and that is rare enough in our music. Before fifty measures of the Sinfonietta have come and gone, the vitality and the vivacity of the music, its spirited flow and its propulsive swing win the ear and quicken answering mood and fancy. Not once in the whole young ardor flag. It beats through the rhythms; it streams out of the instrumental and harmonic color; it expands into warm instrumental song; it keeps the whole surface of the music in bright undulation. No wonder that the audience rose to this first movement, and with all the Sinfonietta it was clearly pleased. This same young lustiness and ardor pulse through the beginning and the end of the scherzo, even if they now and then strike too heavy a blow, and there is fine young intensity ,without a trace of self-consciousness or pose, in the smiling and swaying melody of the Trio. The slow movement baffles precocious youth as it inevitably must and so does the attempt at an introspective music at the beginning of the finale where for the first and only time in the long course of the sinfonietta Korngold really flags; but in all the rest of the movement the young ardor returns to mount in sheer young and exuberant gladness. Too hearty at times, especially if the listener has a finical middle-aged ear; but gay and full-throated with a fascinating young strength that relaxes curiously and strikingly for a passage of genuinely grave and intense song—clear indication that before long young Erich will be able to imagine slow movements. Throughout, the Sinfonietta is a gladsome and songful music. With all its play of timbres, harmony and modulation in the modern sense, it is intrinsically a melodious music—born of youth unashamed and normally happy in its gift of symphonic song. After all, this good world of music is not a world of queer men or worse still of old men.

(over)

Korngold, too,—young years or old—has his clear individualities. Elder and better men might envy him his sense of rhythm when there is a Muck to make play with it. He has the Straussian faculty of arresting the attention and kindling responsive impulse at the beginning of each movement and by sheer ardor rather than calculated effect. He has assimilated—or it was instinctive in him—the Straussian sense of broad and intensive melody, expanding in rich and ample periods. He has not merely scholarship in his modulations, his harmonies and instrumental color; he has clear imagination, intuition and instinctive expertness with them. Time and again his strokes are of the born and spontaneous composer alike on the inventive and the manipulative side—the sort of stroke that study may never gain but that intuition makes easy. He has even, in such things, his distinctive aptitudes. He feels his trumpets and his harps as Brahms, for easy example, felt his horns; he has harmonic imagination with his divided strings. Thick as his scoring often is in young excess, he knows how to "let through" a vivid glint of tonal color. Sterner contrapuntists than fortunate Vienna contains could not complain of his development of his musical thoughts; and the fashion in which he makes his chosen motto—"of the cheerful heart"—haunt the Sinfonietta and upspring into its warmest song is plain proof of imagination. It is a pleasant motive at least to ear and fancy, if like the rest of the themes it has no seizing beauty or suggestion in itself, and it is fertile in instrumental song that pleasures. Nowhere also does the Sinfonietta lack sufficient, if undistinguised sense of large design and cumulation. Complex and lavish as Korngold sometimes chooses to be in youthful extravagance, he never loses his hold upon material and processes.

Throughout, moreover, as it was pleasant to some of us to hear and feel yesterday, a true son of Vienna smiled and sang out of the Sinfonietta and was glad and gay unashamed. Vienna seems already in young Korngold's blood and spirit perhaps to remain—precious gift of kindly environment—to the end of his composing days. Viennese vitality, vivacity and suppleness have their part in the sway and swing and march of the flowing first movement. The lusty begining and end of the scherzo are Viennese by all the tokens of such movements in Beethoven and Bruckner. Viennese sentiment is in the andante—the characteristic sentiment that seems born of the surrounding hills and woods—even if Korngold is still too young to touch it with the wistful melancholy that Kreisler infuses into his music of such mood. And the gay exuberance and the careless happiness of Vienna race and sing in the finale. Vienna is not far from Italy, and Viennese instrumental song has had its Italianate undervoice from the days of Mozart and Haydn. Once and again it speaks out of the Sinfonietta and by no means in chance recollection of the influential Puccini. Some day, as he matures, Erich may gain the Viennese elegance, the Viennese aptitude in polished suggestion that he now knows not. But as it is, Vienna has once more in him a composer that is unmistakably its son.

The rest of an unusually pleasurable concert was as interesting. Virtually for the first time, since a passing recital here two years ago went almost unheeded, Mr. Borwick played to a Boston public. He has made his reputation, as most English virtuosi do, equally in Germany and in Britain and yesterday in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto he fully justified it. Oftenest, he seemed a pianist of quiet and polished perfections. His fleetness, for example, had a charming lightness and certainty; he could play with an impeccable smoothness and evenness and yet deploy upon its surface sensitive and subtle gradations of tone; he has a delicate ear for euphonies; his tone is exquisitely pellucid and softly colored; his touch has often a velvety delicacy. His sustained song expands in gentle and unbroken curve; his arabesques are bright and light. He never exercises—much less abuses—the full power of the piano; he is as far from mere grandiosity on the one hand as he is from mere meticulous dryness on the other. But his comparative quietude implies no lack of individual feeling for his music. His continent temperament responds to it in delicate gradations, colorings and accents that he measures very skilfully to the discreet and serene power that he also commands.

The "Emperor" concerto is not the [illegible] chosen piece for such a pianist, [illegible] when Dr. Muck with all his [illegible] to meet the assisting virtuoso [illegible] an ampler and more forceful piano. It is quite possible and warrantable to play it in the heroic vein of Mr. Paderewski, the introspective vein of Mr. Busoni or the brilliant vein of Mr. Rosenthal. Yesterday, as Mr. Borwick answered to the manifold piece, the piano part shone out of the rich, lustrous and energetic background like the fine, limpid and delicately varied strand that the violin part becomes under certain hands in the fellow-concerto. It is not impossible that Beethoven imagined it so.

The gay end was Sinigaglia's chattering overture to Goldoni's yet more chattering comedy of the voluble and volatile squabbles of Venetian beach-folk. It was pleasant to find Dr. Muck forsaking his classics for a deserving contemporary overture and to hear an Italian composer of symphonic music receiving an inning that such concerts, the world over, seem curiously reluctant to give them. (By received notion an Italian must write opera or song or else take the consequences of a misguided predilection for purely instrumental pieces). Sinigaglia's overture, moreover, warrants these deserts. It is well-invented, expertly made, brightly rhythmed, and brilliantly colored, happy in suggestion of gay high spirits, noisy bickerings and sportive mood, melodically warm and pleasantly Latin. A jeu d'esprit of music, a character-piece and a dazzling virtuoso piece, besides, as orchestra and conductor played it. Thank heaven! there is no "deep thought" in it. Sinigaglia, like everybody else in the world—the audience at the Symphony Concerts included—and music, like every other art, have their clear right to gayety. H. T. P.

From WORLD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

LISZT'S FAUST SYMPHONY HEARD AGAIN

ranscript, April 3

The Third Performance of the Year in Which Conductor, Choir and Orchestra Surpass Themselves — The Intrinsic Glories of the Music

AGAIN, yesterday, the performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" at the Symphony Concerts was revelation of the music and of the composer; of the figures, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles that it calls into an imaginary being, more real for the instant than reality; of Goethe's final vision of mystic and quiring voices; of the conductor and his forces and even of the temper of the audience that raptly heard them. Except the few seats left empty by subscribers who do not go to concerts on Good Friday, the hall was filled to the last place and two or three hundred of the second-balcony folk were turned disconsolate away. A like audience will come again this evening and the two make grateful sign that, after all, this town does not take the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck and all their works quite for granted and that it will flock to hear a masterpiece of music in as masterful performance, even though no illustrious "personality," except the conductor's and maybe the composer's self, graces it, Report from a concert of January has persisted even into a concert of April and yesterday it was fulfilled and more in the ears of the audience. Once and again, between many lapses, Boston does vindicate itself as a capital of music.

At the end of the symphony, when Dr. Muck had been many times recalled, he shook hands warmly with Mr. Witek, who as concert-master, passes in orchestral etiquette as the representative of the collective band. It was the prescribed fashion in which a conductor may say publicly that he is well pleased with the work of his men. Dr. Muck resorts to it seldom; when he does it is significant. He had reason for such rare praise because the orchestra and the assisting choir from the Apollo Club had indeed surpassed themselves. It was not merely that the men had played with the usual distinctions of technique and tone, of euphony and of expression, and with the sum of the individual and coalescing virtues that make the orchestra what it is as an executive instrument. It was not merely that they had wrought a wondrous web of harmonic and instrumental detail and of the shading of pace and accent within the unbroken unity and the unflagging march of the whole performance. They had done these things, and they had given besides, to that detail and shading, the disclosing, characterizing and vitalizing quality of the Faust, the Gretchen, the fiend and the vision that Liszt had imagined into almost every measure of the music. In a word they had used their technical and coöperating virtues and their command of tonal eloquence as the transmitting and the heightening means to the imagery of the symphony whereby it gave its illusion of Goethe's drama and whereby it holds hearers fast in the beauty, the power and the diversity of Liszt's voice. They had made the sensuous sensation the unerring and the enhancing instrument of the tonal delineation and suggestion. In such a piece as the Faust Symphony, orchestral virtue may hardly further go.

As the orchestra wrought, so also had Dr. Muck wrought upon and with it. His familiar distinctions have played through these three performances of the "Faust Symphony," even as have those of his forces. Once more he has penetrated the matter of the music in hand, absorbed it and given it forth again in its integrity and with its characteristic voice. Once more he has been unerring with his means of pace and accent, progression and climax, modulation and euphonies, contrast and combination. Once more he has conducted from the beginning to the end a huge tonal and imaginative design, maintaining its unity and cumulation into the mystical expansions of the end and yet individualizing each of its three component parts in the respective music of Faust, Gretchen and the fiend. Once more he has applied this sense of design almost to the fitting of each measure into its place in the tonal fabric; yet he has kept all these minutiae [illegible] clearer and larger, the [illegible] of the whole musical and imaginative design. His sensibility to instrumental and harmonic color, to delicate euphonies, to subtle undulation and variation of sustained song, to the rhythmic stroke that is as a touch of characterization has never seemed more acute. Yet, with all these endless pains, Dr. Muck has maintained the romantic sweep, ardor and exaltation of the music on the one hand and its manifold delineative, dramatizing and vitalizing power on the other.

The listener has heard not only Liszt's "Faust Symphony" as so much music disclosed on all its sides; he has heard also a sublimated music-drama of Faust, Gretchen, Mephistopheles and—at the end—mankind that may stand unashamed in its own medium beside the drama in words that called it forth. To the imagery of Liszt, Dr. Muck has added consciously or unconsciously, his own imaginings. To the power and the beauty of Liszt's music he has added that intensive faculty, permeating the music within and then projecting it without, which is the unique power of a conductor of the first rank and which in him rises to the height of genius. Sometimes, this faculty transforms the music in hand so that it regains at last its true voice and semblance as Strauss's "Zarathustra" so regained them six weeks ago. Again, as yesterday, it fills the chosen music with an enkindled and enkindling intensity of being and voice, of idea and image, of march and color, of picture and passion that it may hardly have known except in the like heats of the composer's creating imagination.

Such qualities and achievement in orchestra and conductor were bestowed upon music that glorified them even as they glorified it. There is no reproaching Liszt's inventive faculty in this "Faust Symphony." His motives speak for themselves as defining and germinal music to the ear; they call into tonal and imaginary being the personage, the passion or the picture that he would evoke. He clothes them with harmonic and instrumental color and forthwith the atmosphere that he would summon suffuses the imaginary scene. He sets to the development and the treatment of them—poor technical and academic words for such transformation into winged eloquence as they undergo in this "Faust Symphony"—and straightway a drama of spiritual struggle, longing and pride, as in the first episode, fills the stage of thought and feeling. To it succeeds a lyric and romantic tragedy of young affection from awakening through surrender to disillusion — in the episode of Gretchen. Then follows a marvellously imagined and marvellously accomplished ironic and sardonic comedy in tones. And out of it, after a transition surcharged with mingled beauty and suspense, rises a scene of mystical vision and sublimated and climacteric voice—a kind of tonal apocalypse to crown the whole.

As the invention and the resource ave hardly once flagged—a rare trength with Liszt—so the designing nd the constructing faculty—also fitful with him—has never once abated. Out of music as such, out of symphonic music impeccable, he has made his tone-pictures, accomplished his tonal characterization, achieved his tonal dramas. The unfailing richness and readiness of the means have matched the tireless invention, the sustained power, the enhancing beauty. The "Faust Symphony" is not only a work of the imagination of a scope, a diversity, a fulness and a vitality that Liszt nowhere else achieved; it is not merely the crown of romantic symphonic music; it is the one translation into tones of Goethe's poem that may stand unabashed and undiminished beside it. The temple of Liszt's achievement does not lack many a supporting stone; but the "Faust Symphony" remains the foundation.

H. T. P.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 2 - 191
Establ

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IS COMING TO FAIR

BOSTON, April 2.—According to present plans, the Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston for San Francisco on May 9, to give a course of concerts at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. Karl Muck, the conductor, is preparing thirteen programs of regular symphonic music. No engagements are to be accepted on the way and the men will be back in Boston at the beginning of June.

It is said that Dr. Muck is entering into plans for the concerts with great enthusiasm. He will make up his repertory from works which have been played in Boston the past three seasons, selecting the most important pieces from the German, French, Russian and Italian schools. He will review many of them with the men before leaving Boston and others he will rehearse in San Francisco on the mornings of the visit.

The programs, it is expected, will be rather longer than those given at the Boston concerts, requiring about two hours in performance. The managers of the fair have asked for the best Dr. Muck has and a good measure of it; and the result will be that in the two weeks of the engagement the orchestra will cover a little more ground than they get over in a half season at home.

◆

[illegible]

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date APR [illegible] 1915
Establ

Triumphant Liszt.

ATTENTION was called in this journal last week to the volcanic outburst of applause that followed the Thursday evening performance of the "Inferno" movement of Liszt's "Dante" symphony by the Philharmonic, under Stransky. It seemed as if the demonstration would never end. Yet this is the most abstruse, and has been heretofore considered the least popular, of Liszt's orchestral works! No less demonstrative is the applause whenever Stransky, who adores Liszt, conducts "Tasso," "Mazeppa," "The Battle of the Huns," "Faust," "Les Préludes," or a Liszt Rhapsody. This vigorous and sincere applause seems to be extremely annoying to certain Brahmsites, who despairingly contrast it in their minds with the polite and flabby hand-clapping that usually follows an orchestral work by their idol.

Dr. Muck made such a sensation in

(Continued from Page Nine.)

Boston a few months ago with Liszt's "Faust" that this great work was slated for two more performances by the Boston Orchestra this week, making four in all. Dr. Muck is, like all great conductors (and pianists), without exception, an ardent admirer of Liszt. Extra interest was given to these concerts by the fact that Dr. Muck used for the first time the final revision of the score made by Liszt, which was given to him at Bayreuth by Liszt's daughter, Cosima Wagner. He intended to perform the "Faust" symphony in New York, too, but his plan was frustrated, not by reason of the expense involved in bringing down a chorus from Boston, but because he does not like the organ in Carnegie Hall. He wrote a personal letter to Mr. Carnegie about this, but got no answer. Did Mr. Carnegie see that letter? Why should not this hall have a good instrument when so many churches have been supplied with organs by that generous donor?

In Germany, Liszt's "Faust," formerly neglected, has been performed during the last five years more frequently than any other symphony except those of Beethoven. The same is true of the great Liszt sonata for piano; and as for Liszt's short pieces and rhapsodies, they figure more frequently on recital programmes than those of any composer excepting Chopin; yet many of them are still music of the future, which generations to come will find as marvellous and up-to-date as we find the eighteenth-century Bach.

Liszt and Bach have much in common. It is not a mere accident that one of the greatest living pianists, Busoni, is the special apostle of these two masters. Josef Hofmann has never played anything with so much enthusiasm as he expended on the great Liszt sonata last season. How Paderewski adores and plays Liszt's sonata, his études, and especially his rhapsodies, everybody knows. A New York critic once asked him to please not to play the rhapsodies any more. The great pianist smiled sarcastically, and at hic next recital he played two of them, to the huge delight of his audience, which always applauds the Liszt rhapsodies more than anything else he plays.

Nikisch often stirs his audiences with his performances of Liszt pieces. Another of the great conductors who adore Liszt's works is Weingartner. In his admirable book, "The Symphony Since Beethoven," he expresses his joy at the fact that that great Hungarian's works are received from year to year with greater enthusiasm. He also pays his compliments to those who still abuse or nag at these inspired works: "Time pronounces its powerful verdict without paying attention to the pygmies puffing themselves up and crawling about in narrow-minded nullity." In the original German this sounds still more crushing: "Die Zeit spricht ihr gewaltiges Urteil ohne Rücksicht auf die sich aufblähenden und in ihrer beschränkten Nichtigkeit herumkrabbelnden Pygmäen."

Time spoke most eloquently in Berlin a few weeks ago, when still another great conductor, who adores Liszt, Richard Strauss, presided over the seventh symphony concert of the Royal Orchestra. The Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung says that "with Liszt's 'Mazeppa' Dr. Rich. Strauss had a tremendous success, a success which even exceeded that of Beethoven's 'Egmont' overture."

[145]

young ardor flag. It beats through the rhythms; it streams out of the instrumental and harmonic color; it expands into warm instrumental song; it keeps the whole surface of the music in bright undulation. No wonder that the audience rose to this first movement, and with all the Sinfonietta it was clearly pleased. This same young lustiness and ardor pulse through the beginning and the end of the scherzo, even if they now and then strike too heavy a blow, and there is fine young intensity, without a trace of self-consciousness or pose, in the smiling and swaying melody of the Trio. The slow movement baffles precocious youth as it inevitably must and so does the attempt at an introspective music at the beginning of the finale where for the first and only time in the long course of the sinfonietta Korngold really flags; but in all the rest of the movement the young ardor returns to mount in sheer young and exuberant gladness. Too hearty at times, especially if the listener has a finical middle-aged ear; but gay and full-throated with a fascinating young strength that relaxes curiously and strikingly for a passage of genuinely grave and intense song—clear indication that before long young Erich will be able to imagine slow movements. Throughout, the Sinfonietta is a gladsome and songful music. With all its play of timbres, harmony and modulation in the modern sense, it is intrinsically a melodious music—born of youth unashamed and normally happy in its gift of symphonic song. After all, this good world of music is not a world of queer men or worse still of old men.

Korngold, too,—young years or old—has his clear individualities. Elder and better men might envy him his sense of rhythm when there is a Muck to make play with it. He has the Straussian faculty of arresting the attention and kindling responsive impulse at the beginning of each movement and by sheer ardor rather than calculated effect. He has assimilated—or it was instinctive in him—the Straussian sense of broad and intensive melody, expanding in rich and ample periods. He has not merely scholarship in his modulations, his harmonies and instrumental color; he has clear imagination, intuition and instinctive expertness with them. Time and again his strokes are of the born and spontaneous composer alike on the inventive and the manipulative side—the sort of stroke that study may never gain but that intuition makes easy. He has even, in such things, his distinctive aptitudes. He feels his trumpets and his harps as Brahms, for easy example, felt his horns; he has harmonic imagination with his divided strings. Thick as his scoring often is in young excess, he knows how to "let through" a vivid glint of tonal color. Sterner contrapuntists than fortunate Vienna contains could not complain of his development of his musical thoughts; and the fashion in which he makes his chosen motto—"of the cheerful heart"—haunt the Sinfonietta and upspring into its warmest song is plain proof of imagination. It is a pleasant motive at least to ear and fancy, if like the rest of the themes it has no seizing beauty or suggestion in itself, and it is fertile in instrumental song that pleasures. Nowhere also does the Sinfonietta lack sufficient, if undistinguised sense of large design and cumulation. Complex and lavish as Korngold sometimes chooses to be in youthful extravagance, he never loses his hold upon material and processes.

Throughout, moreover, as it was pleasant to some of us to hear and feel yesterday, a true son of Vienna smiled and sang out of the Sinfonietta and was glad and gay unashamed. Vienna seems already in young Korngold's blood and spirit perhaps to remain—precious gift of kindly environment—to the end of his composing days. Viennese vitality, vivacity and suppleness have their part in the sway and swing and march of the flowing first movement. The lusty begining and end of the scherzo are Viennese by all the tokens of such movements in Beethoven and Bruckner. Viennese sentiment is in the andante—the characteristic sentiment that seems born of the surrounding hills and woods—even if Korngold is still too young to touch it with the wistful melancholy that Kreisler infuses into his music of such mood. And the gay exuberance and the careless happiness of Vienna race and sing in the finale. Vienna is not far from Italy, and Viennese instrumental song has had its Italianate undervoice from the days of Mozart and Haydn. Once and again it speaks out of the Sinfonietta and by no means in chance recollection of the influential Puccini. Some day, as he matures, Erich may gain the Viennese elegance, the Viennese aptitude in polished suggestion that he now knows not. But as it is, Vienna has once more in him a composer that is unmistakably its son.

The rest of an unusually pleasurable concert was as interesting. Virtually for the first time, since a passing recital here two years ago went almost unheeded, Mr. Borwick played to a Boston public. He has made his reputation, as most English virtuosi do, equally in Germany and in Britain and yesterday in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto he fully justified it. Oftenest, he seemed a pianist of quiet and polished perfections. His fleetness, for example, had a charming lightness and certainty; he could play with an impeccable smoothness and evenness and yet deploy upon its surface sensitive and subtle gradations of tone; he has a delicate ear for euphonies; his tone is exquisitely pellucid and softly colored; his touch has often a velvety delicacy. His sustained song expands in gentle and unbroken curve; his arabesques are bright and light. He never exercises—much less abuses—the full power of the piano; he is as far from mere grandiosity on the one hand as he is from mere meticulous dryness on the other. But his comparative quietude implies no lack of individual feeling for his music. His continent temperament responds to it in delicate gradations, colorings and accents that he measures very skilfully to the discreet and serene power that he also commands.

The "Emperor" concerto is not the best chosen piece for such a pianist, [illegible] when Dr. Muck with all his [illegible] to meet the assisting virtuoso an ampler and more forceful plane. It is quite possible and warrantable to play it in the heroic vein of Mr. Paderewski, the introspective vein of Mr. Busoni or the brilliant vein of Mr. Rosenthal. Yesterday, as Mr. Borwick answered to the manifold piece, the piano part shone out of the rich, lustrous and energetic background like the fine, limpid and delicately varied strand that the violin part becomes under certain hands in the fellow-concerto. It is not impossible that Beethoven imagined it so.

The gay end was Sinigaglia's chattering overture to Goldoni's yet more chattering comedy of the voluble and volatile squabbles of Venetian beach-folk. It was pleasant to find Dr. Muck forsaking his classics for a deserving contemporary overture and to hear an Italian composer of symphonic music receiving an inning that such concerts, the world over, seem curiously reluctant to give them. (By received notion an Italian must write opera or song or else take the consequences of a misguided predilection for purely instrumental pieces). Sinigaglia's overture, moreover, warrants these deserts. It is well-invented, expertly made, brightly rhythmed, and brilliantly colored, happy in suggestion of gay high spirits, noisy bickerings and sportive mood, melodically warm and pleasantly Latin. A jeu d'esprit of music, a character-piece and a dazzling virtuoso piece, besides, as orchestra and conductor played it. Thank heaven! there is no "deep thought" in it. Sinigaglia, like everybody else in the world—the audience at the Symphony Concerts included—and music, like every other art, have their clear right to gayety.

H. T. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

LISZT'S FAUST SYMPHONY HEARD AGAIN

Transcript, April 3

The Third Performance of the Year in Which Conductor, Choir and Orchestra Surpass Themselves — The Intrinsic Glories of the Music

AGAIN, yesterday, the performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" at the Symphony Concerts was revelation of the music and of the composer; of the figures, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles that it calls into an imaginary being, more real for the instant than reality; of Goethe's final vision of mystic and quiring voices; of the conductor and his forces and even of the temper of the audience that raptly heard them. Except the few seats left empty by subscribers who do not go to concerts on Good Friday, the hall was filled to the last place and two or three hundred of the second-balcony folk were turned disconsolate away. A like audience will come again this evening and the two make grateful sign that, after all, this town does not take the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck and all their works quite for granted and that it will flock to hear a masterpiece of music in as masterful performance, even though no illustrious "personality," except the conductor's and maybe the composer's self, graces it. Report from a concert of January has persisted even into a concert of April and yesterday it was fulfilled and more in the ears of the audience. Once and again, between many lapses, Boston does vindicate itself as a capital of music.

At the end of the symphony, when Dr. Muck had been many times recalled, he shook hands warmly with Mr. Witek, who as concert-master, passes in orchestral etiquette as the representative of the collective band. It was the prescribed fashion in which a conductor may say publicly that he is well pleased with the work of his men. Dr. Muck resorts to it seldom; when he does it is significant. He had reason for such rare praise because the orchestra and the assisting choir from the Apollo Club had indeed surpassed themselves. It was not merely that the men had played with the usual distinctions of technique and tone, of euphony and of expression, and with the sum of the individual and coalescing virtues that make the orchestra what it is as an executive instrument. It was not merely that they had wrought a wondrous web of harmonic and instrumental detail and of the shading of pace and accent within the unbroken unity and the unflagging march of the whole performance. They had done these things, and they had given besides, to that detail and shading, the disclosing, characterizing and vitalizing quality of the Faust, the Gretchen, the fiend and the vision that Liszt had imagined into almost every measure of the music. In a word they had used their technical and coöperating virtues and their command of tonal eloquence as the transmitting and the heightening means to the imagery of the symphony whereby it gave its illusion of Goethe's drama and whereby it holds hearers fast in the beauty, the power and the diversity of Liszt's voice. They had made the sensuous sensation the unerring and the enhancing instrument of the tonal delineation and suggestion. In such a piece as the Faust Symphony, orchestral virtue may hardly further go.

As the orchestra wrought, so also had Dr. Muck wrought upon and with it. His familiar distinctions have played through these three performances of the "Faust Symphony," even as have those of his forces. Once more he has penetrated the matter of the music in hand, absorbed it and given it forth again in its integrity and with its characteristic voice. Once more he has been unerring with his means of pace and accent, progression and climax, modulation and euphonies, contrast and combination. Once more he has conducted from the beginning to the end a huge tonal and imaginative design, maintaining its unity and cumulation into the mystical expansions of the end and yet individualizing each of its three component parts in the respective music of Faust, Gretchen and the fiend. Once more he has applied this sense of design almost to the fitting of each measure into its place in the tonal fabric; yet he has kept all these minutiæ [illegible] clearer and larger, the [illegible] of the whole musical and imaginative design. His sensibility to instrumental and harmonic color, to delicate euphonies, to subtle undulation and variation of sustained song, to the rhythmic stroke that is as a touch of characterization has never seemed more acute. Yet, with all these endless pains, Dr. Muck has maintained the romantic sweep, ardor and exaltation of the music on the one hand and its manifold delineative, dramatizing and vitalizing power on the other.

The listener has heard not only Liszt's "Faust Symphony" as so much music disclosed on all its sides; he has heard also a sublimated music-drama of Faust, Gretchen, Mephistopheles and—at the end—mankind that may stand unashamed in its own medium beside the drama in words that called it forth. To the imagery of Liszt, Dr. Muck has added consciously or unconsciously, his own imaginings. To the power and the beauty of Liszt's music he has added that intensive faculty, permeating the music within and then projecting it without, which is the unique power of a conductor of the first rank and which in him rises to the height of genius. Sometimes, this faculty transforms the music in hand so that it regains at last its true voice and semblance as Strauss's "Zarathustra" so regained them six weeks ago. Again, as yesterday, it fills the chosen music with an enkindled and enkindling intensity of being and voice, of idea and image, of march and color, of picture and passion that it may hardly have known except in the like heats of the composer's creating imagination.

Such qualities and achievement in orchestra and conductor were bestowed upon music that glorified them even as they glorified it. There is no reproaching Liszt's inventive faculty in this "Faust Symphony." His motives speak for themselves as defining and germinal music to the ear; they call into tonal and imaginary being the personage, the passion or the picture that he would evoke. He clothes them with harmonic and instrumental color and forthwith the atmosphere that he would summon suffuses the imaginary scene. He sets to the development and the treatment of them—poor technical and academic words for such transformation into winged eloquence as they undergo in this "Faust Symphony"—and straightway a drama of spiritual struggle, longing and pride, as in the first episode, fills the stage of thought and feeling. To it succeeds a lyric and romantic tragedy of young affection from awakening through surrender to disillusion — in the episode of Gretchen. Then follows a marvellously imagined and marvellously accomplished ironic and sardonic comedy in tones. And out of it, after a transition surcharged with mingled beauty and suspense, rises a scene of mystical vision and sublimated and climacteric voice—a kind of tonal apocalypse to crown the whole.

As the invention and the resource have hardly once flagged—a rare strength with Liszt—so the designing and the constructing faculty—also fitful with him—has never once abated. Out of music as such, out of symphonic music impeccable, he has made his tone-pictures, accomplished his tonal characterization, achieved his tonal dramas. The unfailing richness and readiness of the means have matched the tireless invention, the sustained power, the enhancing beauty. The "Faust Symphony" is not only a work of the imagination of a scope, a diversity, a fulness and a vitality that Liszt nowhere else achieved; it is not merely the crown of romantic symphonic music; it is the one translation into tones of Goethe's poem that may stand unabashed and undiminished beside it. The temple of Liszt's achievement does not lack many a supporting stone; but the "Faust Symphony" remains the foundation.

H. T. P.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 2 - 15

Establ

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IS COMING TO FAIR

BOSTON, April 2.—According to present plans, the Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston for San Francisco on May 9, to give a course of concerts at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. Karl Muck, the conductor, is preparing thirteen programs of regular symphonic music. No engagements are to be accepted on the way and the men will be back in Boston at the beginning of June.

It is said that Dr. Muck is entering into plans for the concerts with great enthusiasm. He will make up his repertory from works which have been played in Boston the past three seasons, selecting the most important pieces from the German, French, Russian and Italian schools. He will review many of them with the men before leaving Boston and others he will rehearse in San Francisco on the mornings of the visit.

The programs, it is expected, will be rather longer than those given at the Boston concerts, requiring about two hours in performance. The managers of the fair have asked for the best Dr. Muck has and a good measure of it; and the result will be that in the two weeks of the engagement the orchestra will cover a little more ground than they get over in a half season at home.

◆

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

Date

Establ

Triumphant Liszt.

ATTENTION was called in this journal last week to the volcanic outburst of applause that followed the Thursday evening performance of the "Inferno" movement of Liszt's "Dante" symphony by the Philharmonic, under Stransky. It seemed as if the demonstration would never end. Yet this is the most abstruse, and has been heretofore considered the least popular, of Liszt's orchestral works! No less demonstrative is the applause whenever Stransky, who adores Liszt, conducts "Tasso," "Mazeppa," "The Battle of the Huns," "Faust," "Les Préludes," or a Liszt Rhapsody. This vigorous and sincere applause seems to be extremely annoying to certain Brahmsites, who despairingly contrast it in their minds with the polite and flabby hand-clapping that usually follows an orchestral work by their idol.

Dr. Muck made such a sensation in

(Continued from Page Nine.)

Boston a few months ago with Liszt's "Faust" that this great work was slated for two more performances by the Boston Orchestra this week, making four in all. Dr. Muck is, like all great conductors (and pianists), without exception, an ardent admirer of Liszt. Extra interest was given to these concerts by the fact that Dr. Muck used for the first time the final revision of the score made by Liszt, which was given to him at Bayreuth by Liszt's daughter, Cosima Wagner. He intended to perform the "Faust" symphony in New York, too, but his plan was frustrated, not by reason of the expense involved in bringing down a chorus from Boston, but because he does not like the organ in Carnegie Hall. He wrote a personal letter to Mr. Carnegie about this, but got no answer. Did Mr. Carnegie see that letter? Why should not this hall have a good instrument when so many churches have been supplied with organs by that generous donor?

In Germany, Liszt's "Faust," formerly neglected, has been performed during the last five years more frequently than any other symphony except those of Beethoven. The same is true of the great Liszt sonata for piano; and as for Liszt's short pieces and rhapsodies, they figure more frequently on recital programmes than those of any composer excepting Chopin; yet many of them are still music of the future, which generations to come will find as marvellous and up-to-date as we find the eighteenth-century Bach.

Liszt and Bach have much in common. It is not a mere accident that one of the greatest living pianists, Busoni, is the special apostle of these two masters. Josef Hofmann has never played anything with so much enthusiasm as he expended on the great Liszt sonata last season. How Paderewski adores and plays Liszt's sonata, his études, and especially his rhapsodies, everybody knows. A New York critic once asked him to please not to play the rhapsodies any more. The great pianist smiled sarcastically, and at his next recital he played two of them, to the huge delight of his audience, which always applauds the Liszt rhapsodies more than anything else he plays.

Nikisch often stirs his audiences with his performances of Liszt pieces. Another of the great conductors who adore Liszt's works is Weingartner. In his admirable book, "The Symphony Since Beethoven," he expresses his joy at the fact that that great Hungarian's works are received from year to year with greater enthusiasm. He also pays his compliments to those who still abuse or nag at these inspired works: "Time pronounces its powerful verdict without paying attention to the pygmies puffing themselves up and crawling about in narrow-minded nullity." In the original German this sounds still more crushing: "Die Zeit spricht ihr gewaltiges Urteil ohne Rücksicht auf die sich aufblähenden und in ihrer beschränkten Nichtigkeit herumkrabbelnden Pygmäen."

Time spoke most eloquently in Berlin a few weeks ago, when still another great conductor, who adores Liszt, Richard Strauss, presided over the seventh symphony concert of the Royal Orchestra. The Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung says that "with Liszt's 'Mazeppa' Dr. Rich. Strauss had a tremendous success, a success which even exceeded that of Beethoven's 'Egmont' overture."

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

York, 18

THE REQUEST PROGRAM.

Many patrons of the Philadelphia Orchestra will receive with regret Conductor Stokowski's announcement—printed on another page of this paper—that the custom of playing a request program at the last concert of the orchestral season will be abandoned this year. This custom began in the regime of the late Conductor Scheel and was continued under Conductor Pohlig; and that it was an exceedingly popular custom was evidenced by the large number of ballots cast during every season for the favorite compositions of orchestra patrons.

Conductor Stokowski modified the custom last season by omitting winning compositions on the ground that to play them all would constitute an unharmonious program. This season he abandons the request program altogether.

Though Mr. Stokowski is doubtless actuated by the best of artistic intentions, the wisdom of his course is open to question. For every orchestra patron who disapproves of the request program there are probably five who approve. The average music lover likes to have his favorite composition replayed at the end of the season, enjoys the competition of the request program vote and looks forward with great interest to the result of the balloting. To deprive him of these privileges which he has enjoyed for years—no matter on what high musicianly ideals such action is based—is to run the risk of disturbing the cordial relations that have existed between Mr. Stokowski and his public.

Various opinions are possible as to the structural unity of a concert program. In his arrangement of programs, Mr. Stokowski has made it clear that he strives for a certain uniformity between the several numbers. Other conductors—Dr. Muck, of the Boston Symphony, for instance—seem to select their programs for the purpose of variety rather than uniformity. Mr. Stokowski is entitled to his own opinions; and while he is at the head of the orchestra they should be respected. But it is to be deplored that those opinions are so rigid as first to make him vary the time-honored custom of request programs, and now to abolish it altogether.

SERVING SIXTY-

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 2 1915

384

CITY TO HEAR CHOICEST OF MUSIC SOON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is to Open Its San Francisco Season on Fourteenth of May

TO REMAIN TWO WEEKS

Programmes Include Some of the Noblest Compositions in the History of Music

BY REDFERN MASON

Friday, May 14, will be a red letter day for San Francisco. On that day the Boston Symphony will give its first concert in this city.

We have long had good symphony music in San Francisco. Now we are to have a fortnight of the noblest playing that is to be heard either in this country or in the Old World. It will be a fourteen days' orchestral festival, directed by the man whom Kaiser Wilhelm loves best among Germany's directors and whom, as an act of special good will, he lent to this country.

A commencement will be made with Beethoven's "Eroica," that symphony in which the composer celebrated Napoleon Bonaparte, the republican. When the "little corporal" assumed the purple, Beethoven tore up the inscription, exclaiming, "he is only common clay after all." But when, years afterwards, he heard of the tragedy at St. Helena, he observed, "I have prepared for this misfortune," referring, of course, to the Funeral March which forms the second movement. Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," played for San Franciscans by our Symphony Orchestra for the first time this season, is the second number on the programme, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" comes last.

TO PLAY HAYDN SYMPHONY.

Each succeeding day a concert will be given and, in the programme for Saturday, May 15, I notice Haydn's lovely "Surprise" Symphony; Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Hungaria," is the concluding number, and between the two comes one of the finest works of our greatest American composer, Edward MacDowell, his "Indian" Suite.

German though he is to the core, Dr. Muck does not allow chauvinism to blind him to the artistic virtues of France. The programme for Sunday, May 16, is entirely devoted to French music. It opens with the Cesar Franck symphony; it includes the "Apprenti Sorcier" overture of Dukas, and Bizet's exquisite "Arlesienne" suite, ending with the "Espana" of Chábrier.

On Monday, May 17, we revert to the music of Germany, opening with the first Brahms symphony and concluding with the grand overture to "Egmont" of Beethoven, with two Bach numbers in between, the B minor suite for flute and strings, and the heavenly "Shepherds' Music" from the "Christmas Oratorio."

WAGNER CONCERT MAY 18.

Wagner takes up the entire concert of Tuesday, May 18. First on the programme comes the "Rienzi" overture, followed by the introduction to the "Flying Dutchman," the "Tannhauser" overture with the "Bacchanale," which Wagner wrote for the Parisians, who could not tolerate an opera without a ballet, and the prelude to "Lohengrin." The overtures to "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" are also to be played, likewise the "Idyll," in which the composer celebrated the birth of his son, Siegfried.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the "little one," as the composer called it, appears in Wednesday's numbers, likewise the overture to "Freischutz," Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and three compositions by the Finn, Sibelius, namely, "Karelia," the "Swan of Tuonela" and "Finnlandia."

STRAUSS TO BE FEATURED.

Lovers of Richard Strauss will rejoice to notice the name of his "Death and Enlightenment" in the list of compositions to be played on Thursday, May 20; likewise the Second Brahms Symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Meistersinger" overture.

Italy monopolizes the programme for Friday the 21st. The "Anacreon" overture of Cherubini represents classic Italy; Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani" speaks for the spirit of Italian comedy; the "Baruffe Chiozote" of Sinigaglia belongs to the same category, and "Young Italy" speaks in the First Symphony of Sgambati.

Saturday, the 22d, brings us back to Germany with the G minor Symphony of Mozart, Bach's D minor Concerto for two violins and strings, and the "Siegfried Idyll" of Wagner, with the "Sakuntala" Overture of Goldmark and Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture by way of supplements.

On Sunday the 23d there will be a second French programme, opening with the Third Symphony of Saint Saens, for orchestra and organ.. Chabrier's "Gwendoline" Overture follows; there will be three excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" of Berlioz, to wit, the "Rakoczy" March, the "Will of the Wisps," and the "Dance of Sylphs," and the last number will be Chausson's Symphonic Poem, "Vivienne."

A Muscovitish programme is promised for Monday, the 24th, opening with the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tschaikowsky and including Borodine's sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," Glazounoff's "Overture Solonelle," and the Caprice on Spanish Themes of Rimsky Korsadoff.

The last concert will take place on Tuesday, the 25th of May. It will open with the First Symphony of Sibelius; Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" comes midway in the concert and the end of all with the immortal "Leonora No. 3" of Beethoven

Is not that a wonderful festival of music, a veritable Gargantua's feast of musical delights?

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE TWELVE CONCERTS IN MAY

Famous Organization of 110 Men Plays Engagement at the Exposition From May 14th to May 26th.

rk, 1884

An important musical event of the year will be the concerts by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck. These are announced to take place at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition for two weeks, from May 14th to 26th. Acknowledged to be the finest orchestra in the world, the Boston Symphony has been in existence for thirty-three years, and has only been superseded in length of life by five [illegible] This orchestra has given an average of 100 concerts a season, former seasons consisting of six months which have now been extended to a period of seven and one-half months.

In 1886 the organization, which had till that time confined its efforts to Boston alone, began to expand in territory and gave concerts in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and cities of the Middle West. Soon after the players invaded New York. The present tour is considered to be remarkable, as the body of 110 men will leave Boston on a special train on May 10th, coming directly to San Francisco, and leaving here at midnight May 26th, arriving at Boston in time for a concert on Decoration day.

The orchestra will be under the local management of W. H. Leahy, to whom all communications may be sent at 343 Powell street.

* * * *

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1915

Establi

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT EXPOSITION

Twelve Remarkable Programs to Be Presented by Dr. Muck at San Francisco.

The Boston Symphoy Orchestra having been selected to present a series of high-class concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition for May 14 to May 26, Dr. Muck, the conductor, has made a most remarkable set of programs for the twelve subscription concerts. So far as is possible in such a number of concerts, he covers the entire range of orchestral literature. The programs are as follows:—

NO. 1.
Beethoven....Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica."
Brahms....Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
Richard Strauss...."Don Juan," Tone Poem, (after Lenau), Op. 20.
Weber....Overture to the opera, "Euryanthe."

NO. 2.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27.
Haydn....Symphony No. 6, in G major, "Surprise."
MacDowell....Suite, No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," Op. 48.
Liszt...."Hungaria," Symphonic Poem, No. 9

NO. 3—FRENCH PROGRAM.
Cesar Franck........Symphony in D minor..
Dukas...."L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice) Scherzo (after a ballad of Goethe).
Bizet....Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1. Music to Alphonse Daudet's Play.
Chabrier...Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"

NO. 4.
Brahms..Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68
J. S. Bach....Suite for Flute and Strings in B minor, No. 2.
(Solo Flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre).
J. S. Bach....Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.
Beethoven....Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.

NO. 5—WAGNER PROGRAM.
Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act I (Paris version).
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

NO. 6.
Weber....Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischutz."
Beethoven....Symphony No. 8, in F-major, Op. 93.
Chadwick....Symphonic Sketches: Suites for orchestra.
Sibelius....."Karelia," overture for full orchestra; "The Swan of Tuonela," Legend from the Finnish Folk-epic, "Kalevala;" "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7.

NO. 7.
Brahms....Symphony, No. 2, in D-Major, Op. 73.
Liszt....Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes," (after Lamartine).
Richard Strauss...Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.
Wagner....Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

NO. 8. ITALIAN PROGRAM.
Sgambati....Symphony, No. 1, in D-Major, Op. 16.
Cherubini....Overture to the opera, "Anacreon."
Bossi....Intermezzi Goldoniani, Op. 127.
Sinigaglia....Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," Op. 32, (The Squabbles of the People of Chiozza).

NO. 9.
Mozart....Symphony, No. 2, in G-Minor, (K. 550).
J. S. Bach....Concerto in D-Minor for two violins and orchestra of strings. (Solo violins, Messrs. Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack).
Goldmark....Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13.
Wagner...."A Siegfried Idyl."
Dvorak....Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92.

NO. 10—FRENCH PROGRAM.
Saint-Saens....Symphony, No. 3, for orchestra and organ, Op. 78.
Debussy....Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Berliez....Three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.
Chabrier....Overture to the opera, "Gwendoline."

NO. 11.
Tschaikowsky....Symphony, No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.
Glazounoff.........Overture Solonelle, Op. 73
Borodin....On the Steppes of Central Asia, Orchestral Sketch, Op. 7.
Rimsky-Korsakoff....Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.

NO. 12.
Sibelius...Symphony, No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39
Richard Strauss....Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," (freely after Friedrich Nietzsche) Op. 30.
Beethoven..Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72

The entire complement of the orchestra will be carried by special train across the continent without stopping, leaving Boston May 9 and reaching Boston again on the return trip on Monday, May 31.

* * *

1884

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date 2 7 1915

Establishe

Sunday night at 8:15.

BIG EVENT COMING.

One of the greatest musical events of the year is announced for Festival Hall, from May 14 to 26. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in twelve concerts. It is, perhaps, the world's finest symphony orchestra.

Of the great orchestras of the world only five have had a longer life, and but one has undertaken any such amount of work as the Boston organization. Its first concert was given in 1881. In the thirty-three years since then it has given an average of almost 100 concerts a season. The seasons ranged from six months in the early days to seven and a half months today. The actual number of concerts given up to the close of the season of 1913-1914 was 3,284.

The great majority of these concerts were given in Boston, but in 1886 it began its tours. Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington were visited and a series of concerts was given throughout the Middle West. In 1887 the first concerts were given in New York.

The organization of 110 men will leave Boston on a special train of eight cars on May 10, rushing direct to San Francisco. They will leave at midnight of May 26, arriving at Boston in time for a concert on Decoration Day.

Twelve concerts will be given at Festival Hall, for which the subscription price of seats will range from $7 to $25, seats for single concerts running from 75 cents to $2.50.

The subscription sale will begin at the Exposition ticket offices in the St. Francis Hotel, Monday morning, April 5. Communications enclosing funds may be sent, seats being reserved as near the location desired as possible. This applies to season tickets only. All checks and money orders should be made payable to W. H. Leahy, 343 Powell street.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date 9 1915

Establ 14

Boston Symphony to Play at Fair in May

One of the greatest musical events of the year is announced for Festival Hall at the Exposition from May 14 to May 26, inclusive, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in twelve concerts. The organization is now in its thirty-fourth year. It has given an average of almost 100 concerts a season. The actual number of concerts given up to the close of the season 1913-1914 was 3284.

[146]

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

York, 18

THE REQUEST PROGRAM.

Many patrons of the Philadelphia Orchestra will receive with regret Conductor Stokowski's announcement—printed on another page of this paper—that the custom of playing a request program at the last concert of the orchestral season will be abandoned this year. This custom began in the regime of the late Conductor Scheel and was continued under Conductor Pohlig; and that it was an exceedingly popular custom was evidenced by the large number of ballots cast during every season for the favorite compositions of orchestra patrons.

Conductor Stokowski modified the custom last season by omitting winning compositions on the ground that to play them all would constitute an unharmonious program. This season he abandons the request program altogether.

Though Mr. Stokowski is doubtless actuated by the best of artistic intentions, the wisdom of his course is open to question. For every orchestra patron who disapproves of the request program there are probably five who approve. The average music lover likes to have his favorite composition replayed at the end of the season, enjoys the competition of the request program vote and looks forward with great interest to the result of the balloting. To deprive him of these privileges which he has enjoyed for years—no matter on what high musicianly ideals such action is based—is to run the risk of disturbing the cordial relations that have existed between Mr. Stokowski and his public.

Various opinions are possible as to the structural unity of a concert program. In his arrangement of programs, Mr. Stokowski has made it clear that he strives for a certain uniformity between the several numbers. Other conductors—Dr. Muck, of the Boston Symphony, for instance—seem to select their programs for the purpose of variety rather than uniformity. Mr. Stokowski is entitled to his own opinions; and while he is at the head of the orchestra they should be respected. But it is to be deplored that those opinions are so rigid as first to make him vary the time-honored custom of request programs, and now to abolish it altogether.

◆

SERVING SIXTY-

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 2 1915

384

CITY TO HEAR CHOICEST OF MUSIC SOON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is to Open Its San Francisco Season on Fourteenth of May

TO REMAIN TWO WEEKS

Programmes Include Some of the Noblest Compositions in the History of Music

BY REDFERN MASON

Friday, May 14, will be a red letter day for San Francisco. On that day the Boston Symphony will give its first concert in this city.

We have long had good symphony music in San Francisco. Now we are to have a fortnight of the noblest playing that is to be heard either in this country or in the Old World. It will be a fourteen days' orchestral festival, directed by the man whom Kaiser Wilhelm loves best among Germany's directors and whom, as an act of special good will, he lent to this country.

A commencement will be made with Beethoven's "Eroica," that symphony in which the composer celebrated Napoleon Bonaparte, the republican. When the "little corporal" assumed the purple, Beethoven tore up the inscription, exclaiming, "he is only common clay after all." But when, years afterwards, he heard of the tragedy at St. Helena, he observed, "I have prepared for this misfortune," referring, of course, to the Funeral March which forms the second movement. Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," played for San Franciscans by our Symphony Orchestra for the first time this season, is the second number on the programme, and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" comes last.

TO PLAY HAYDN SYMPHONY.

Each succeeding day a concert will be given and, in the programme for Saturday, May 15, I notice Haydn's lovely "Surprise" Symphony; Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Hungaria," is the concluding number, and between the two comes one of the finest works of our greatest American composer, Edward MacDowell, his "Indian" Suite.

German though he is to the core, Dr. Muck does not allow chauvinism to blind him to the artistic virtues of France. The programme for Sunday, May 16, is entirely devoted to French music. It opens with the Cesar Franck symphony; it includes the "Apprenti Sorcier" overture of Dukas, and Bizet's exquisite "Arlesienne" suite, ending with the "Espana" of Chabrier.

On Monday, May 17, we revert to the music of Germany, opening with the first Brahms symphony and concluding with the grand overture to "Egmont" of Beethoven, with two Bach numbers in between, the B minor suite for flute and strings, and the heavenly "Shepherds' Music" from the "Christmas Oratorio."

WAGNER CONCERT MAY 18.

Wagner takes up the entire concert of Tuesday, May 18. First on the programme comes the "Rienzi" overture, followed by the introduction to the "Flying Dutchman," the "Tannhauser" overture with the "Bacchanale," which Wagner wrote for the Parisians, who could not tolerate an opera without a ballet, and the prelude to "Lohengrin." The overtures to "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" are also to be played, likewise the "Idyll," in which the composer celebrated the birth of his son, Siegfried.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the "little one," as the composer called it, appears in Wednesday's numbers, likewise the overture to "Freischutz," Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and three compositions by the Finn, Sibelius, namely, "Karelia," the "Swan of Tuonela" and "Finnlandia."

STRAUSS TO BE FEATURED.

Lovers of Richard Strauss will rejoice to notice the name of his "Death and Enlightenment" in the list of compositions to be played on Thursday, May 20; likewise the Second Brahms Symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Meistersinger" overture.

Italy monopolizes the programme for Friday the 21st. The "Anacreon" overture of Cherubini represents classic Italy; Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani" speaks for the spirit of Italian comedy; the "Baruffe Chiozote" of Sinigaglia belongs to the same category, and "Young Italy" speaks in the First Symphony of Sgambati.

Saturday, the 22d, brings us back to Germany with the G minor Symphony of Mozart, Bach's D minor Concerto for two violins and strings, and the "Siegfried Idyll" of Wagner, with the "Sakuntala" Overture of Goldmark and Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture by way of supplements.

On Sunday the 23d there will be a second French programme, opening with the Third Symphony of Saint Saens, for orchestra and organ.. Chabrier's "Gwendoline" Overture follows; there will be three excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" of Berlioz, to wit, the "Rakoczy" March, the "Will of the Wisps," and the "Dance of Sylphs," and the last number will be Chausson's Symphonic Poem, "Vivienne."

A Muscovitish programme is promised for Monday, the 24th, opening with the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tschaikowsky and including Borodine's sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," Glazounoff's "Overture Solonelle," and the Caprice on Spanish Themes of Rimsky Korsadoff.

The last concert will take place on Tuesday, the 25th of May. It will open with the First Symphony of Sibelius; Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" comes midway in the concert and the end of all with the immortal "Leonora No. 3" of Beethoven

Is not that a wonderful festival of music, a veritable Gargantua's feast of musical delights?

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date

ork, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE TWELVE CONCERTS IN MAY

Famous Organization of 110 Men Plays Engagement at the Exposition From May 14th to May 26th.

An important musical event of the year will be the concerts by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck. These are announced to take place at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition for two weeks, from May 14th to 26th. Acknowledged to be the finest orchestra in the world, the Boston Symphony has been in existence for thirty-three years, and has only been superseded in length of life by five [illegible] orchestra has given an average of 100 concerts a season, former seasons consisting of six months, which have now been extended to a period of seven and one-half months.

In 1886 the organization, which had till that time confined its efforts to Boston alone, began to expand in territory and gave concerts in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and cities of the Middle West. Soon after the players invaded New York. The present tour is considered to be remarkable, as the body of 110 men will leave Boston on a special train on May 10th, coming directly to San Francisco, and leaving here at midnight May 26th, arriving at Boston in time for a concert on Decoration day.

The orchestra will be under the local management of W. H. Leahy, to whom all communications may be sent at 343 Powell street.

* * *

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Establi

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT EXPOSITION

Twelve Remarkable Programs to Be Presented by Dr. Muck at San Francisco.

The Boston Symphoy Orchestra having been selected to present a series of high-class concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition for May 14 to May 26, Dr. Muck, the conductor, has made a most remarkable set of programs for the twelve subscription concerts. So far as is possible in such a number of concerts, he covers the entire range of orchestral literature. The programs are as follows:—

NO. 1.

Beethoven....Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica."
Brahms....Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
Richard Strauss...."Don Juan," Tone Poem, (after Lenau), Op. 20.
Weber....Overture to the opera, "Euryanthe."

NO. 2.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27.
Haydn....Symphony No. 6, in G major, "Surprise."
MacDowell....Suite, No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," Op. 48.
Liszt...."Hungaria," Symphonic Poem, No. 9

NO. 3—FRENCH PROGRAM.

Cesar Franck........Symphony in D minor..
Dukas...."L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice) Scherzo (after a ballad of Goethe).
Bizet....Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1. Music to Alphonse Daudet's Play.
Chabrier...Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"

NO. 4.

Brahms..Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68
J. S. Bach....Suite for Flute and Strings in B minor, No. 2.
(Solo Flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre).
J. S. Bach....Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.
Beethoven....Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.

NO. 5—WAGNER PROGRAM.

Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act I (Paris version).
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

NO. 6.

Weber....Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischutz."
Beethoven....Symphony No. 8, in F-major, Op. 93.
Chadwick....Symphonic Sketches; Suites for orchestra.
Sibelius;...."Karelia," overture for full orchestra; "The Swan of Tuonela," Legend from the Finnish Folk-epic, "Kalevala;" "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7.

NO. 7.

Brahms....Symphony, No. 2, in D-Major, Op. 73.
Liszt....Symphonic Poem, No. 3. "Les Preludes," (after Lamartine).
Richard Strauss...Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.
Wagner....Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

NO. 8. ITALIAN PROGRAM.

Sgambati....Symphony, No. 1, in D-Major, Op. 16.
Cherubini....Overture to the opera, "Anacreon."
Bossi....Intermezzi Goldoniani, Op. 127.
Sinigaglia....Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," Op. 32, (The Squabbles of the People of Chiozza).

NO. 9.

Mozart....Symphony, No. 2, in G-Minor, (K. 550).
J. S. Bach....Concerto in D-Minor for two violins and orchestra of strings. (Solo violins, Messrs. Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack).
Goldmark....Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13.
Wagner...."A Siegfried Idyl."
Dvorak....Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92.

NO. 10—FRENCH PROGRAM.

Saint-Saens....Symphony, No. 3, for orchestra and organ, Op. 78.
Debussy....Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Berliez....Three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.
Chabrier...Overture to the opera, "Gwendoline."

NO. 11.

Tschaikowsky....Symphony, No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.
Glazounoff.........Overture Solonelle, Op. 73
Borodin....On the Steppes of Central Asia, Orchestral Sketch, Op. 7.
Rimsky-Korsakoff....Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.

NO. 12.

Sibelius...Symphony, No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39
Richard Strauss....Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," (freely after Friedrich Nietzsche) Op. 30.
Beethoven..Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72

The entire complement of the orchestra will be carried by special train across the continent without stopping, leaving Boston May 9 and reaching Boston again on the return trip on Monday, May 31.

* * *

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
1915

Date

Establish

Sunday night at 8:15.

BIG EVENT COMING.

One of the greatest musical events of the year is announced for Festival Hall, from May 14 to 26. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in twelve concerts. It is, perhaps, the world's finest symphony orchestra.

Of the great orchestras of the world only five have had a longer life, and but one has undertaken any such amount of work as the Boston organization. Its first concert was given in 1881. In the thirty-three years since then it has given an average of almost 100 concerts a season. The seasons ranged from six months in the early days to seven and a half months today. The actual number of concerts given up to the close of the season of 1913-1914 was 3,284.

The great majority of these concerts were given in Boston, but in 1886 it began its tours. Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington were visited and a series of concerts was given throughout the Middle West. In 1887 the first concerts were given in New York.

The organization of 110 men will leave Boston on a special train of eight cars on May 10, rushing direct to San Francisco. They will leave at midnight of May 26, arriving at Boston in time for a concert on Decoration Day.

Twelve concerts will be given at Festival Hall, for which the subscription price of seats will range from $7 to $25, seats for single concerts running from 75 cents to $2.50.

The subscription sale will begin at the Exposition ticket offices in the St. Francis Hotel, Monday morning, April 5. Communications enclosing funds may be sent, seats being reserved as near the location desired as possible. This applies to season tickets only. All checks and money orders should be made payable to W. H. Leahy, 343 Powell street.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date

Establi 4

Boston Symphony to Play at Fair in May

One of the greatest musical events of the year is announced for Festival Hall at the Exposition from May 14 to May 26, inclusive, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in twelve concerts. The organization is now in its thirty-fourth year. It has given an average of almost 100 concerts a season. The actual number of concerts given up to the close of the season 1913-1914 was 3284.

m AMERICAN dress: New York City
APR - 4 1915
e tablished: Lon

The Symphony Season and Its Accomplishments

THE executive and provisional work of the symphony managers is almost as perpetual as that of the publishers of that famous magazine, the New York City Telephone Directory, which, by the by, contains a larger number of notable local names than any other periodical. The directory no sooner binds and delivers one issue to its subscribers than the publishers are busy preparing for the next.

So it is with the symphony managers, for on the same programme sheet that gives the selections for the last concerts of the 1914-15 season there appears the advance announcements for the 1915-16 season. With all detail, too, if you please. That is, with the names of the soloists, the dates of the events running from October to March, and the very hour and minute at which these events are to take place.

Similar arrangements for the future were made long before the present season began; promises of notable soloists and new concerted works were made and there was much anticipation of a healthy, busy year. So between these two episodes—the closing of the present season and looking ahead to the next—it will be interesting to note what has been done in symphony circles of 1914-15.

We have, as one may say, two major symphony organisations, the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony Society, and four minor ones, the Russian, People's, the Young People's and Young Men's. The Philharmonic Society, which closed its season a week ago, gave fifty-four concerts in the boroughs of Manhattan and Brooklyn, and twenty-nine in twenty other places. The New York Symphony Society gave forty-eight concerts in Greater New York and was on tour for a week in October, one week in November, ten days in January, and ten in February. There is a good deal of the Wandering Minstrel about the Symphony Society, for in another week it is to start upon a tour of at least five weeks. The other local organizations gave about a dozen concerts.

In addition to these aggregations of home talent New York listened to two visiting orchestras, the Boston and the Philadelphia Symphony folk. The Boston people played ten times and the Philadelphia only once.

Without aiming to present a statistical record it will be seen that this resume means a total of about a hundred and twenty-five concerts. As to the symphonic work of all these orchestras two facts are unmistakably shown. First, that Beethoven is still king, and second, that symphony writers come few and far between. Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, Dvorak, Weber, Mendelssohn still sit safe among the classics; Mozart, Haydn, Liszt, we still accept more as pleasing melodies than as strict workers along symphonic lines; and Debussy, Strauss, Grieg, Berlioz are well established in the hearts of those who are charmed with the more or less fantastic.

But no new great note has been sounded. The New York Symphony for its novelties gave Percy Grainger's British Folk Dances; Josef Suk's "Scherzo Fantastique;" Maurice Ravel's Symphonic fragment from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe;" Roger Ducasse's "Le joli jeu de furet;" Albert Roussel's "Le festin d'Araignee;" Florent Schmitt's "Reflet d'Allemagne;" Frederick S. Converse's "Ormazd;" David Stanley Smith's "Prince Hal;" and two movements from a symphony by Frederick A. Stock. All were listened to with marked attention—sometimes with distinguished patience. Some were found plastic, some promising, but it would be more friendly than just to say that any touched the great.

Mr. Stransky contributed as novelties Arthur Foote's "Four characteristic pieces;" Henry Hadley's Symphonic poem, "Lucifer;" Henry Burck's "Meditation," Mr. Laucella's Prelude and Temple Dance; Arthur Hinton's "Endymion;" Erich Korngold's Symphonietta; Ropartz' Fourth Symphony; Sigismond Stojowski's Suite for orchestra, and Stravinsky's "Fireworks." All interesting, some bearing a flicker of the divine spark but none such as would lead the audience to rise and say, "Here we have found a master."

There remains the curious and much-discussed revival of the Tschaikowsky cult. This season more than in any past the Russian has been heard, and this season more than in any past the Russian has moved the hearts of the people. Whether the composer of "Eugen Onegin" is an unblemished adherent of classic pattern is an old topic of discussion—it was discussed at length in these columns a little time ago. What this season has shown, shown indubitably, is that the Tschaikowsky Symphonies stirred those who listened to them more profoundly than anything placed on all the hundred and twenty-five programmes of 1914-15. All the symphony managers have seen this and all have proved that they saw it by the frequency of their Tschaikowsky offerings. The one fact that the Fourth Symphony was given five or six times in one week in New York is a testimony of love and admiration whose equal has not been bestowed on any composer. It is one of the most poignant tragedies of musical history that Pietor Illytch could not have lived to see how this New York would have grown almost to worship him, instead of almost ignoring him when he was here.

It would be absurd, of course, to imagine that all these concerts were given for love.

The generous assistance bestowed by Mr. Pulitzar on the Philharmonic and by Mr. Flagler on the Symphony Society, was actuated by the unselfish desire to furnish the people with the best orchestral music and to see that the supply was unbroken. But the depots for this supply, that is the symphony organizations, are conducted on business principles. They have their ledgers in which their profit and loss accounts appear. It is an open secret that these accounts show an annual deficit.

Giving one hundred and two concerts in expensive halls, with an aggregate of a hundred and sixty well paid musicians—these figures are those of the Philharmonic and Symphony societies—with expensive conductors, advertising, printing, clerical force, etc., means a lot of money. So much, indeed, that not even the receipts from tickets and interest from subsidies cover the expense. It is understood that the deficit is not as great this year as it was last year, but there is a loss.

"Let us hear now the conclusion of the whole matter." First, the demand for symphonic music judged by the ever-increasing annual supply is simply phenomenal. No city in the world hears so much orchestral music as New York.

Second, Beethoven is more firmly seated than ever as the Emperor of Symphony. His Court is filled with princes of Inspiration and with Lords of Imitation, but no messenger yet brings the news or promise of an approaching successor.

Third, and much more prosaic, symphony giving in New York does not pay and the two great societies are seriously considering some means—whether by the erection of a symphony building with offices, etc., or by an appeal for larger public support—for making their enterprise remunerative.

THE EVENING TIMES,

PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

APRIL 14,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES ITS SEASON

Sixth Concert Given at Infantry Hall—Florence Hinkle Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its 34th Providence season last night, when the sixth concert of the course was given in Infantry Hall, with Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist. The programme was a beautifully varied offering headed by Beethoven's eighth symphony, magnificently played by the orchestra and interpreted with taste and discrimination by the eminent conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

While not so familiar as some of the other Beethoven symphonies, the eighth has been heard sufficiently often by concert audiences in Boston and Providence to become well known to the regular patrons of the symphony concerts. The composer himself called it "the little symphony," probably in a playful mood as a term of endearment. It is shorter than the average symphonic composition, abounds in pretty and tuneful themes, and has the dignity and power inseparable from the works of the master composer.

Bach's suite in B-minor for flute and strings, held second place in the orchestra programme. This suite made up largely of dance airs, is a light and gay composition brimful of melody and the music that in a less decorous assemblage than a symphony concert audience would start the feet a-tapping. Andre Maquarre, solo flute player of the orchestra, played the solo parts, bringing from his instrument a mellow beauty of tone such as only the most accomplished artist can produce. He was given enthusiastic applause.

Miss Hinkle, a soprano who is heard by Providence audiences with constantly increasing pleasure, sang two numbers. The first was the aria, "Voi, che Sapete" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the second was the "Ave Maria" from Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire." Both were sung with a power of expression and an artistic sincerity which always marks the work of this fine singer. Few sopranos visiting Providence have a smoother, more flexible tone, and the selections of last evening were well adopted to her beautiful voice. She received many recalls on her two appearances.

Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntula" was the closing number. Like the other orchestra numbers it was played with a precision and beauty always to be looked for in this splendid company of players, and indeed so familiar to the audience that nothing but perfection is expected. It was a fitting close to a concert which was excellent in every detaiil.

It is announced that Providence will have another course of six concerts next season, and the soloists will include Mme. Melba, who will appear at the first concert, to be given Oct. 19. The other dates are Nov. 23, Dec. 28, Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11, all Tuesdays. In addition to Mme. Melba the soloists will be Mme. Louise Homer, the famous contralto; Ernest Schelling and Laeta Hartley, pianists, and Sylvain Noack, violinist, and Joseph Malkin, 'cellist.

BOSTON HERALD,

APRIL 17,

21ST REHEARSAL BY SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives One of the Most Interesting Concerts of the Season.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 21st Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. Mr. Noack, second concertmaster of the orchestra, was the solo violinist. The program was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "Gwendoline"... Chabrier
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra.... Lalo
Intermezzi Goldoniani, for strings.... Bossi
Symphony in G-major (B. and H. No. 13).... Haydn

The death of Bizet was thought to be a great loss to French music. It is a question whether the death of Chabrier was not a greater one. Bizet even in "Carmen" did not succeed wholly in departing from the old traditions of the Opera Comique. The Toreador's song and Micaela's air were sops thrown by him to the bourgeois, his wife and his daughter. Chabrier was more original, more audacious, more wildly imaginative. What do not the more modern French composers owe to him in matters of harmony and instrumentation! It is true that he had passed the 50th milestone when the fatal sickness that numbed his mind fell upon him, but until then his talent was more and more pronounced—witness his unfinished opera. In this overture to "Gwendoline" there is a demoniac spirit, the mark of genius, that is hardly to be found in "Carmen" or in the music to "L'Arlesienne." Perhaps there is a touch of vulgarity in the Walhalla theme, a suggestion of Meyerbeer's bombast in the "Torchlight Dances," but a certain coarseness enters into the composition of every true genius. What can be more dramatic than the opening pages descriptive of the furious Danish inroad! How decided and significant the profiles of the themes associated with Gwendoline and the romantic side of the tumultuous Harald! What an eloquent orchestra in turmoil and passion!

Mr. Noack played the first, fourth and fifth movements of Lalo's concerto. Buelow once wrote to his manager, Wolff, with regard to a concert-program that the inclusion of this concerto would be most agreeable to him, "but—without amputation." The concerto undoubtedly suffers somewhat when one movement is omitted. The audience yesterday would gladly have heard the whole work, but violinists of late usually play only four movements. The concerto does not grow stale with repetition. On the contrary, the themes and rhythms still delight the most indifferent hearer, while others find fresh beauties in the harmonic schemes and the original and brilliant instrumentation. Even in the finale, which in concertos is too often perfunctory, an exhibition of flagging or extinct invention, Lalo is wholly admirable, as though he had reserved a full display of his resources for the end. How the instruments comment and chatter as if in admiration of the melodies, naked or embroidered, of the solo instrument. Mr. Noack was not wholly in the vein at the beginning, and was not always rhythmically sensitive, but he played the Andante with the requisite breadth and beauty of tone and gave a brilliant performance of the finale. The concerto and the violinist aroused enthusiasm and Mr. Noack was recalled several times.

When Bossi's Intermezzi was last performed here—it was in 1911—only four of the seven were on the program. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler thought that the endurance of the audience would be sorely tried by so much music for strings alone. Yesterday all the movements were heartily enjoyed. The question of endurance on the one side in this instance is largely a question of performance on the other, for Bossi's music has marked vitality and surprising variety. These little pieces are characterized by a peculiar elegance, an old-world charm that is not too archaic, a high-bred, aristocratic spirit. The minuet that follows the Prelude might have been danced by noble dames at the court of the Grand Monarch. In the second minuet the musette is characteristic without a too deliberate attempt to be music of the people. Mr. Ferir's tone and art enlarged the simple beauty of the Serenatina. The Prelude, the galliard and the Burlesca gave opportunity for virtuoso orchestral display.

A noteworthy performance of Haydn's symphony, one of the second set written for Paris, brought an end to one of the most interesting and delightful concerts of the season. We sometimes are led to think that the audiences are so familiar with the genius of Dr. Muck and accustomed to the proficiency of the orchestra that concerts which would excite wonder in other cities of this country and in Paris, London, Berlin, Petrograd are taken as a matter of course. Yesterday the audience was enthusiastic throughout, as if the concert had come suddenly, a surprise, a revelation.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: MacDowell "Indian" suite; Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Fawn"; Mozart, Concerto in D minor for pianos and Weber's Concertstueck for piano (Mr. Gabrilowitsch); Noskowski, "The Steppe."

BOSTON GLOBE

APRIL 17, 1915

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Mr Noack Plays Lalo's Spanish Symphony.

Brilliant Orchestral Performance a Feature.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, its conductor and players were the chief features of the 21st rehearsal yesterday afternoon. Mr Noack, the second concert-master, played three movements from Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra with greater breadth and authority of style than he has yet shown. Dr Muck and the orchestra began with Chabrier overture to "Gwendoline," in which they found at once and sounded the tragic note with sweeping intensity. Bossi's Goldoniani Intermezzi for strings was played with incomparable brilliance. Haydn's Symphony in G Major ended the program.

The hearer of Chabrier's poignant overture well might wish to see the opera done in this country. The poem by Catulle Mendes offers a good basis for a lyric drama. There is pastoral simplicity. There is the element of mysticism, dread and terror, and there is the shock of mortal, tragic combat. The love of country and the love of woman are deep and inspiring motives for action.

Chabrier's music is in the keenest sense imaginative. From its opening measures, the overture is pitched high emotionally. Struggle is imminent, and the dominant, heroic personality of Harald is vividly portrayed. He is seen as warrior and as poet. It may be said that the intensity of feeling is too steadily maintained, that the final pealing of the Wathalla theme by trumpets and trombones in unison, hardly escapes coarseness. As a whole it is music wildly, triumphantly romantic, and was played in a superbly romantic manner.

The virtuosity of the strings in Bossi's suite was breathtaking in its lightness, fleetness and enveloping brilliance—the sweeping fury of the running unison passages in the prelude, the wild caprices of the Gagliardi, like gusts of wind blowing across a sheltered pool. What a beguiling dance in its display of feminine charm and abandon this Gagliardi must have been. The agreement with which these whimsical flights of accent, of suddenly increased or diminished tone were made, excited great admiration, and the string players stood with Dr Muck.

Mr Noack displayed taste and excellent musicianship in his treatment of Lalo's work, music in which the orchestra is used freely as a source of color, and when that of yesterday adds much to the pleasure of the performance. It should be good to hear this music of Spanish suggestion in melodic and rythmic profile played with more sensuous character, more abandon and innuendo. In point of tone, technic and to a large degree in feeling, Mr Noack gave a fine account of himself and was recalled repeatedly.

The soloist next week, the last of the season, will be Mr Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, whose numbers will be Mozart's concerto in D minor and Weber's concert piece. The orchestra will play MacDowell's "Indian Dirge," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and "The Steppe," by Noskowski.

WORLD

m AMERICAN dress: New York City
e

The Symphony Season and Its Accomplishments

tablished: Lon

THE executive and provisional work of the symphony managers is almost as perpetual as that of the publishers of that famous magazine, the New York City Telephone Directory, which, by the by, contains a larger number of notable local names than any other periodical. The directory no sooner binds and delivers one issue to its subscribers than the publishers are busy preparing for the next.

So it is with the symphony managers, for on the same programme sheet that gives the selections for the last concerts of the 1914-15 season there appears the advance announcements for the 1915-16 season. With all detail, too, if you please. That is, with the names of the soloists, the dates of the events running from October to March, and the very hour and minute at which these events are to take place.

Similar arrangements for the future were made long before the present season began; promises of notable soloists and new concerted works were made and there was much anticipation of a healthy, busy year. So between these two episodes—the closing of the present season and looking ahead to the next—it will be interesting to note what has been done in symphony circles of 1914-15.

We have, as one may say, two major symphony organizations, the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony Society, and four minor ones, the Russian, People's, the Young People's and Young Men's. The Philharmonic Society, which closed its season a week ago, gave fifty-four concerts in the boroughs of Manhattan and Brooklyn, and twenty-nine in twenty other places. The New York Symphony Society gave forty-eight concerts in Greater New York and was on tour for a week in October, one week in November, ten days in January, and ten in February. There is a good deal of the Wandering Minstrel about the Symphony Society, for in another week it is to start upon a tour of at least five weeks. The other local organizations gave about a dozen concerts.

In addition to these aggregations of home talent New York listened to two visiting orchestras, the Boston and the Philadelphia Symphony folk. The Boston people played ten times and the Philadelphia only once.

Without aiming to present a statistical record it will be seen that this resume means a total of about a hundred and twenty-five concerts. As to the symphonic work of all these orchestras two facts are unmistakably shown. First, that Beethoven is still king, and second, that symphony writers come few and far between. Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, Dvorak, Weber, Mendelssohn still sit safe among the classics; Mozart, Haydn, Liszt, we still accept more as pleasing melodies than as strict workers along symphonic lines, and Debussy, Strauss, Grieg, Berlioz are well established in the hearts of those who are charmed with the more or less fantastic.

But no new great note has been sounded. The New York Symphony for its novelties gave Percy Grainger's British Folk Dances; Josef Suk's "Scherzo Fantastique;" Maurice Ravel's Symphonic fragment from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe;" Roger Ducasse's "Le joli jeu de furet;" Albert Roussel's "Le festin d'Araignee;" Florent Schmitt's "Reflet d'Allemagne;" Frederick S. Converse's "Ormazd;" David Stanley Smith's "Prince Hal;" and two movements from a symphony by Frederick A. Stock. All were listened to with marked attention—sometimes with distinguished patience. Some were found plastic, some promising, but it would be more friendly than just to say that any touched the great.

Mr. Stransky contributed as novelties Arthur Foote's "Four characteristic pieces;" Henry Hadley's Symphonic poem, "Lucifer;" Henry Burck's "Meditation;" Mr. Laucella's Prelude and Temple Dance; Arthur Hinton's "Endymion;" Erich Korngold's Symphonietta; Ropartz' Fourth Symphony, Sigismond Stojowski's Suite for orchestra, and Stravinsky's "Fireworks." All interesting, some bearing a flicker of the divine spark but none such as would lead the audience to rise and say, "Here we have found a master."

There remains the curious and much-discussed revival of the Tschaikowsky cult. This season more than in any past the Russian has been heard, and this season more than in any past the Russian has moved the hearts of the people. Whether the composer of "Eugen Onegin" is an unblemished adherent of classic pattern is an old topic of discussion—it was discussed at length in these columns a little time ago. What this season has shown, shown indubitably, is that the Tschaikowsky Symphonies stirred those who listened to them more profoundly than anything placed on all the hundred and twenty-five programmes of 1914-15. All the symphony managers have seen this and all have proved that they saw it by the frequency of their Tschaikowsky offerings. The one fact that the Fourth Symphony was given five or six times in one week in New York is a testimony of love and admiration whose equal has not been bestowed on any composer. It is one of the most poignant tragedies of musical history that Pietor Illytch could not have lived to see how this New York would have grown almost to worship him, instead of almost ignoring him when he was here.

It would be absurd, of course, to imagine that all these concerts were given for love.

The generous assistance bestowed by Mr. Pulitzar on the Philharmonic and by Mr. Flagler on the Symphony Society, was actuated by the unselfish desire to furnish the people with the best orchestral music and to see that the supply was unbroken. But the depots for this supply, that is the symphony organizations, are conducted on business principles. They have their ledgers in which their profit and loss accounts appear. It is an open secret that these accounts show an annual deficit.

Giving one hundred and two concerts in expensive halls, with an aggregate of a hundred and sixty well paid musicians—these figures are those of the Philharmonic and Symphony societies—with expensive conductors, advertising, printing, clerical force, etc., means a lot of money. So much, indeed, that not even the receipts from tickets and interest from subsidies cover the expense. It is understood that the deficit is not as great this year as it was last year, but there is a loss.

"Let us hear now the conclusion of the whole matter." First, the demand for symphonic music judged by the ever-increasing annual supply is simply phenomenal. No city in the world hears so much orchestral music as New York.

Second, Beethoven is more firmly seated than ever as the Emperor of Symphony. His Court is filled with princes of Inspiration and with Lords of Imitation, but no messenger yet brings the news or promise of an approaching successor.

Third, and much more prosaic, symphony giving in New York does not pay and the two great societies are seriously considering some means—whether by the erection of a symphony building with offices, etc., or by an appeal for larger public support—for making their enterprise remunerative.

THE EVENING TIMES,

PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

APRIL 14,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES ITS SEASON

Sixth Concert Given at Infantry Hall—Florence Hinkle Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its 34th Providence season last night, when the sixth concert of the course was given in Infantry Hall, with Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist. The programme was a beautifully varied offering headed by Beethoven's eighth symphony, magnificently played by the orchestra and interpreted with taste and discrimination by the eminent conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

While not so familiar as some of the other Beethoven symphonies, the eighth has been heard sufficiently often by concert audiences in Boston and Providence to become well known to the regular patrons of the symphony concerts. The composer himself called it "the little symphony," probably in a playful mood as a term of endearment. It is shorter than the average symphonic composition, abounds in pretty and tuneful themes, and has the dignity and power inseparable from the works of the master composer.

Bach's suite in B-minor for flute and strings, held second place in the orchestra programme. This suite made up largely of dance airs, is a light and gay composition brimful of melody and the music that in a less decorous assemblage than a symphony concert audience would start the feet a-tapping. Andre Maquarre, solo flute player of the orchestra, played the solo parts, bringing from his instrument a mellow beauty of tone such as only the most accomplished artist can produce. He was given enthusiastic applause.

Miss Hinkle, a soprano who is heard by Providence audiences with constantly increasing pleasure, sang two numbers. The first was the aria, "Voi, che Sapete" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the second was the "Ave Maria" from Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire." Both were sung with a power of expression and an artistic sincerity which always marks the work of this fine singer. Few sopranos visiting Providence have a smoother, more flexible tone, and the selections of last evening were well adopted to her beautiful voice. She received many recalls on her two appearances.

Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntula" was the closing number. Like the other orchestra numbers it was played with a precision and beauty always to be looked for in this splendid company of players, and indeed so familiar to the audience that nothing but perfection is expected. It was a fitting close to a concert which was excellent in every detaiil.

It is announced that Providence will have another course of six concerts next season, and the soloists will include Mme. Melba, who will appear at the first concert, to be given Oct. 19. The other dates are Nov. 23, Dec. 28, Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11, all Tuesdays. In addition to Mme. Melba the soloists will be Mme. Louise Homer, the famous contralto; Ernest Schelling and Laeta Hartley, pianists, and Sylvain Noack, violinist, and Joseph Malkin, 'cellist.

BOSTON HERALD,

APRIL 17,

21ST REHEARSAL BY SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives One of the Most Interesting Concerts of the Season.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 21st Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. Mr. Noack, second concertmaster of the orchestra, was the solo violinist. The program was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "Gwendoline" .. Chabrier
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra .... Lalo
Intermezzi Goldoniani, for strings .... Bossi
Symphony in G-major (B. and H. No. 13) .... Haydn

The death of Bizet was thought to be a great loss to French music. It is a question whether the death of Chabrier was not a greater one. Bizet even in "Carmen" did not succeed wholly in departing from the old traditions of the Opera Comique. The Toreador's song and Micaela's air were sops thrown by him to the bourgeois, his wife and his daughter. Chabrier was more original, more audacious, more wildly imaginative. What do not the more modern French composers owe to him in matters of harmony and instrumentation! It is true that he had passed the 50th milestone when the fatal sickness that numbed his mind fell upon him, but until then his talent was more and more pronounced—witness his unfinished opera. In this overture to "Gwendoline" there is a demoniac spirit, the mark of genius, that is hardly to be found in "Carmen" or in the music to "L'Arlesienne." Perhaps there is a touch of vulgarity in the Walhalla theme, a suggestion of Meyerbeer's bombast in the "Torchlight Dances," but a certain coarseness enters into the composition of every true genius. What can be more dramatic than the opening pages descriptive of the furious Danish inroad! How decided and significant the profiles of the themes associated with Gwendoline and the romantic side of the tumultuous Harald! What an eloquent orchestra in turmoil and passion!

Mr. Noack played the first, fourth and fifth movements of Lalo's concerto. Bucfow once wrote to his manager, Wolff, with regard to a concert-program that the inclusion of this concerto would be most agreeable to him, "but—without amputation." The concerto undoubtedly suffers somewhat when one movement is omitted. The audience yesterday would gladly have heard the whole work, but violinists of late usually play only four movements. The concerto does not grow stale with repetition. On the contrary, the themes and rhythms still delight the most indifferent hearer, while others find fresh beauties in the harmonic schemes and the original and brilliant instrumentation. Even in the finale, which in concertos is too often perfunctory, an exhibition of flagging or extinct invention, Lalo is wholly admirable, as though he had reserved a full display of his resources for the end. How the instruments comment and chatter as if in admiration of the melodies, naked or embroidered, of the solo instrument. Mr. Noack was not wholly in the vein at the beginning, and was not always rhythmically sensitive, but he played the Andante with the requisite breadth and beauty of tone and [illegible]ve a brilliant performance of the [illegible]. The concerto and the violinist [illegible]d enthusiasm and Mr. Noack was recalled several times.

When Bossi's Intermezzi was last performed here—it was in 1911—only four of the seven were on the program. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler thought that the endurance of the audience would be sorely tried by so much music for strings alone. Yesterday all the movements were heartily enjoyed. The question of endurance on the one side in this instance is largely a question of performance on the other, for Bossi's music has marked vitality and surprising variety. These little pieces are characterized by a peculiar elegance, an old-world charm that is not too archaic, a high-bred, aristocratic spirit. The minuet that follows the Prelude might have been danced by noble dames at the court of the Grand Monarch. In the second minuet the musette is characteristic without a too deliberate attempt to be music of the people. Mr. Ferir's tone and art enlarged the simple beauty of the Serenatina. The Prelude, the galliard and the Burlesca gave opportunity for virtuoso orchestral display.

A noteworthy performance of Haydn's symphony, one of the second set written for Paris, brought an end to one of the most interesting and delightful concerts of the season. We sometimes are led to think that the audiences are so familiar with the genius of Dr. Muck and accustomed to the proficiency of the orchestra that concerts which would excite wonder in other cities of this country and in Paris, London, Berlin, Petrograd are taken as a matter of course. Yesterday the audience was enthusiastic throughout, as if the concert had come suddenly, a surprise, a revelation.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: MacDowell "Indian" suite; Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Fawn"; Mozart, Concerto in D minor for pianos and Weber's Concertstueck for piano (Mr. Gabrilowitsch); Noskowski, "The Steppe."

BOSTON GLOBE
APRIL 17, 1915

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Mr Noack Plays Lalo's Spanish Symphony.

Brilliant Orchestral Performance a Feature.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, its conductor and players were the chief features of the 21st rehearsal yesterday afternoon. Mr Noack, the second concert-master, played three movements from Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra with greater breadth and authority of style than he has yet shown. Dr Muck and the orchestra began with Chabrier overture to "Gwendoline," in which they found at once and sounded the tragic note with sweeping intensity. Bossi's Goldoniani Intermezzi for strings was played with incomparable brilliance. Haydn's Symphony in G Major ended the program.

The hearer of Chabrier's poignant overture well might wish to see the opera done in this country. The poem by Catulle Mendes offers a good basis for a lyric drama. There is pastoral simplicity. There is the element of mysticism, dread and terror, and there is the shock of mortal, tragic combat. The love of country and the love of woman are deep and inspiring motives for action.

Chabrier's music is in the keenest sense imaginative. From its opening measures, the overture is pitched high emotionally. Struggle is imminent, and the dominant, heroic personality of Harald is vividly portrayed. He is seen as warrior and as poet. It may be said that the intensity of feeling is too steadily maintained, that the final pealing of the Wathalla theme by trumpets and trombones in unison, hardly escapes coarseness. As a whole it is music wildly, triumphantly romantic, and was played in a superbly romantic manner.

The virtuosity of the strings in Bossi's suite was breathtaking in its lightness, fleetness and enveloping brilliance—the sweeping fury of the running unison passages in the prelude, the wild caprices of the Gagliardi, like gusts of wind blowing across a sheltered pool. What a beguiling dance in its display of feminine charm and abandon this Gagliardi must have been. The agreement with which these whimsical flights of accent, of suddenly increased or diminished tone were made, excited great admiration, and the string players stood with Dr Muck.

Mr Noack displayed taste and excellent musicianship in his treatment of Lalo's work, music in which the orchestra is used freely as a source of color, and when that of yesterday adds much to the pleasure of the performance. It should be good to hear this music of Spanish suggestion in melodic and rythmic profile played with more sensuous character, more abandon and innuendo. In point of tone, technic and to a large degree in feeling, Mr Noack gave a fine account of himself and was recalled repeatedly.

The soloist next week, the last of the season, will be Mr Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, whose numbers will be Mozart's concerto in D minor and Weber's concert piece. The orchestra will play MacDowell's "Indian Dirge," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and "The Steppe," by Noskowski.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date MAR 28 1915
Established: 1

The Season's Orchestral Music—Some Reflections on Many Concerts—New Works and Old Ones.

THE three chief series of orchestral concerts given in New York during the season have now all been closed, the Philharmonic Society's popular concert of last evening being the last. The Philharmonic Society, the New York Symphony Society, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra between them have given 85 concerts in 23 weeks—statisticians would say, an average of 3.7 a week. There will have been, by the time the opera season is ended, 23 more given on Sunday nights at the Metropolitan Opera House. The Young People's Symphony concerts are 6 in number, the People's Symphony Concerts 3, the Russian Symphony Orchestra's regular subscription concerts 3, besides several more on Sunday nights of a popular character. The Philadelphia Orchestra came over once to supply any possible deficiencies the New York public may have felt in the way of orchestral music. There have been various others, including some of a popular kind on Sundays. Altogether, the number of orchestral concerts heard during the season will have been well over 125, good, bad, and indifferent.

The number seems to some greater than the actual needs of the musical population call for. Yet there must be something more than a vain optimism that prompts the managers of these various enterprises to add continually to the number of such concerts beyond actual requirements. No doubt the demand increases, in a way, proportionately to the increase of the city's population; but the managers seem always eager to keep ahead of the demand with their supply. How far ahead is probably to be read in the profit and loss accounts in their ledgers, which are not always set forth for the public to inspect. Of course, it is well known that the two principal local orchestras, the Philharmonic Society and the New York Symphony Orchestra, do business at a large annual loss. Each has to make arrangements for covering a financial deficit every year. They do this, as everybody knows, on the ground that the giving of orchestral concerts is not a business like another, but a provision of artistic nutriment that is not to be put on a business basis; or that it is an educational provision, such as are the great universities, which are run at a cost far beyond any sum that their tuition fees bring them in and are heavily endowed for that very purpose; or they could be compared to the great museums and public libraries, which are for the public good and in this country acquire most of their resources from private munificence.

Supporters of the great orchestras, therefore, would say that the fact that most of them have reported deficits by no means indicates a bad adjustment of supply to demand. They would ask what, precisely, is the right adjustment? They would point to the fact that some of the more obviously popular series are profitable, and would say that the best must be artificially promoted, or it would have no chance. How Major Higginson enters on his books the balance brought by the crowded audiences that hear his Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall is not revealed. On the face of it these particular ten concerts presumably show a profit; but, of course, it must be properly apportioned among the annual expenses of the organization which, while they do not all directly bear upon its New York appearances, are necessary to them. The New York receipts are only a way of reducing a deficit that is practically an indispensable condition of the orchestra's existence.

Much might be said and discussion might be continued indefinitely upon the question of how much orchestral music a city like New York "needs," how much it can assimilate, whether it is oversupplied, whether less would be more fully appreciated. The results, if any were arrived at, would not be conclusive, nor would they be final in the case of a community such as this, that has such great increases in its population annually, and that presumably is advancing in the love and appreciation of music, growing by what it feeds on.

⁂

The time is not a propitious one for the production of new works of consequence, and there have not been many such heard here this season. Few of those that have been played here have gained enthusiastic acceptance. The Philharmonic Society has presented for the first time in New York Henry Hadley's tone poem, "Lucifer"; Arthur Hinton's suite, "Endymion"; Erich Korngold's "Sinfonietta," Op. 5; J. Guy Ropartz's Fourth Symphony; Sigismond Stojowski's Suite, Op. 9; Henry Burck's "Meditation" for strings, and Nicola Laucella's "Prelude and Temple Dance."

The New York Symphony Society's new performances were Percy Grainger's British Folk Dances, Josef Suk's "Scherzo Fantastique," Maurice Ravel's symphonic fragment from the ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe"; Roger-Ducasse's "Le Joli Jeu de Furet," Albert Roussel's "Le Festin d'Araignée," Florent Schmitt's waltzes, "Reflets d'Allemagne," and, at a special concert, not in its regular series, these American works: Frederick S. Converse's "Ormazd," David Stanley Smith's overture, "Prince Hal," and two movements from a symphony by Frederick A. Stock.

The record of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York concerts shows only these absolutely new compositions: E. Reznicek's "symphonic biograpy," "Schlehmihl," and Vincent d'Indy's fantasy for oboe and orchestra, though Mr. Converse's "Ormazd" was presented to the general public for the first time and Ropartz's symphony followed the Philharmonic Society's first performance of it by only eight days.

It might be recalled to the Boston Symphony's New York auditors who complain of Dr. Muck's tendency to lay emphasis upon modern works that out of thirty-five compositions played in the ten concerts seventeen are what may be called "classic" in a sense that may be accepted today and that will reckon Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Weber as among the classics. There was protest earlier in the season that he was "relegating the classics to the discard." He is seen thus to have preserved an almost exact balance between works of the classical spirit and those of a different kind. Bach's Shepherds' Music from the "Christmas Oratorio" and his concerto for two violins, Beethoven's third and eighth symphonies and his overtures to "Coriolanus," "Egmont," and "Leonora," (No. 3); Mozart's symphony in C and overture to "The Magic Flute," Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Schubert's symphony in C, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Schumann's overture to "Genovena," and Brahms's first and second symphonies and variations on a theme by Haydn comprise these works.

Mr. Stransky has followed out the moral obligations placed upon the Philharmonic Society in accepting Joseph Pulitzer's bequest of $750,000. This bequest was to "perfect the present orchestra and place it on a more independent basis and to increase the number of concerts to be given in the City of New York, which additional concerts I hope will not have too severely classical programs and be open to the public at reasonable rates, and to recognizing my favorite composers, Beethoven, Wagner, and Liszt." Mr. Stransky has not made his programs "too severely classical," and he has "recognized" Beethoven, Wagner, and Liszt. Beethoven's third, fifth, and seventh symphonies, the overtures "Coriolanus," "The Dedication of the House," "Leonore," (No. 3); the violin concerto, the triple concerto for violin, violoncello, and piano, and numerous vocal pieces; several "Wagner concerts," at which and on other occasions were given the available preludes to the music-dramas, various excerpts from those dramas, the "Faust" overture and "Siegfried Idyll," as well as vocal selections; and Liszt's "Dante" symphony, two symphonic poems—"Les Préludes" and "Tasso"—the E flat concerto for piano and orchestra, and orchestral arrangements of two of the Hungarian Rhapsodies—these have constituted the recognition hoped for by the testator and imposed as a moral, if not a legal, obligation on the society.

Fortunately Mr. Stransky has not interpreted his duties as to Liszt too strictly and has given only seven performances of his works in New York, (eleven if repetitions at the second of a pair of concerts be counted.) If he reads the likings of the real musical public aright there is not likely to be that glorious "Liszt revival" which some of the faithful and vociferous little band of admirers have been hoping for—a revival that is always coming, but never arrives. An endowed series of prescribed Liszt performances would bring dismay to many stout-hearted concert-goers in New York, and it might be found that it is possible to pay too dearly even for $750,000. Some will recall the quaint fact that Karl Graun's once-favorite oratorio, "Der Tod Jesu," is still given perforce once a year in Berlin because somebody left a bequest strictly for that purpose, long ago, when the work was still alive. It is dead and decently buried in the musical histories now, but has to undergo an annual exhumation because some almost forgotten testator left "direction" instead of Mr. Pulitzer's more prudent "hopes."

Mr. Stransky has shown a strong fondness for Tschaikowsky as represented by three symphonies, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the "Italian Capriccio," the "Nutcracker Suite," and some other works; for Strauss, Dvorak, Grieg, Rimsky-Korsakoff; not much for Brahms, whose fourth symphony and "Tragic" overture are the only orchestral works represented on the programs, except orchestral transcriptions of two Hungarian dances.

Mr. Damrosch, with the New York Symphony Society, showed more sympathy with Brahms, whose second and fourth symphonies, "Academic" overture, D minor piano concerto, and violin concerto were played at his concerts. Beethoven's symphonies had an unusually small representation on them—the third and the instrumental movements of the ninth alone appearing, besides which the "King Stephen" overture, the E flat concerto, and some songs were heard. Only Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony and third suite, one of Strauss's symphonic poems, none of Dvorak's symphonies, but the orchestral suite, Op. 39, and the notturno for strings; of Liszt only an orchestral transcription of his "St. Francis Preaching to the Birds," besides the "Hungarian Fantasy," and the "Mephisto Waltz" were heard. Mr. Damrosch lent a willing ear to the modern French sirens—Debussy's "Iberia" and "Nocturne," No. 2; the new pieces of Ravel, Roger-Ducasse, Roussel, and Schmitt testify to it, and of more conservative French music Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony, Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, and "Roman Carnival" overture, and a transcription of César Franck's "Prelude, Choral, and Fugue" show attention to this section of the orchestral repertory.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

ADVERTISER,
MORNING, APRIL 17

AGREEABLE, BUT WITHOUT NOVELTY

SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVES MUCH TO ENJOY

Mr. Noack Chief Success in Programme With Tendency to Dance Rhythms

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Chabrier—"Gwendoline" overture.
Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mr. Sylvain Noack.
Bossi—Intermezzi Goldoniani.
Haydn—Symphony in G major.

Although there was nothing new in this programme, there was much to enjoy and nothing to puzzle over. There was a constant tendency to dance rhythms. Chabrier's "Gwendoline" was, however, as fiery as a Petroleuse. From the very beginning one gets fierce sequences which given with all the power of our energetic artist on that instrument. The imp of the orchestra, the piccolo, begins to shriek early in the proceedings also. But we have become accustomed to all this kind of orchestral revelry (or devilry) and we begin to demand our tonal pepper in every orchestral dish, and this work was almost the only fiery orchestral number of the concert.

The chief theme is beautiful enough, and it was expressively given by violoncellos and wind instruments. The frenzied dance measures were given with the abandon of a cancan, and recalled the late, lamented Offenbach. But the development was altogether of a higher school and exhibited both ingenuity and beauty. At the end bass drum and cymbals joined in the melee and made a very explosive climax, while the kettle-drummer had a swat-fest all to himself and, in the last round, delivered a knock-out blow on the solar plexus of the G drum which was phenomenal. Therefore, "Gwendoline" was an exciting work, much given over to fortissimo effects, but with good, melodic ideas which were finely developed—a much better composition than many a modern work which is called great.

Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole is not a symphony, nor even a true concerto, from the fact that it keeps the soloist in the foreground almost all the time, making the work a series of violin solos with orchestral accompaniment, with strong tutti passages between the solo divisions. This is, however, very acceptable both to the violinist and to the public, and therefore one need not quarrel with the title. The Scherzo is brimful of Spanish dance rhythms, and Cachucas and Fandangoes peep through various parts of the movement. The carillon effect of the finale is attractive enough, although it gives one the idea that Lalo is translating the old round—"Three Blind Mice"—into Spanish. But this same finale has some broad G-string passages that displayed Mr. Noack's tone excellently, and the daintiness and delicacy of parts of the Scherzo were in fine contrast with this more majestic work. In short the composition demands versatility on the part of its interpreter, and it showed Mr. Noack's abilities in many directions.

Spanish Sunshine

The first, fourth and fifth movements only were given. Yet, if amputation was to be done we would much rather have had it exercised on the Bossi suite which followed, for Lalo's "Symphony" is full of Spanish sunshine and syncopation and is very attractive. There is much of the folk-music vein in the work, and Mr. Noack's performance was masterly. His surety in the extreme high positions was marvellous, and his harmonics, his full-tone G-string work and the broad style of his playing in the finale awoke the audience to rapturous enthusiasm and many recalls.

Let no one think that Bossi is at all calf-like in his music. He is the most modern of the Italian composers, and his "Paradise Lost" is quite as ugly as any modern composition of them all. But his "Intermezzi Goldoniani" is more attractive. It is only a week ago that we had Goldoni turned into music by Sinigaglia. It seems that just as the German composers turn to Boecklin and his paintings for inspiration, the Italians draw from the comedies of this 18th century rival of Moliere. Goldoni has a wide range in his plays; he is humorous, whimsical, dainty, and even broadly vulgar at times. He has written in pure Italian and he has also used the Neapolitan and other dialects in his comedies.

This Suite is for Strings alone, and it reflects chiefly the dainty and playful side of the author. It is by no means as graphic as Sinigaglia's "Le Baruffe Chiozotte" of the preceding concert. Nevertheless we found the first Minuet to be a charming picture of 18th century elegance and original in style, which is very much to say with such a composed-to-death form as this dance movement.

Violins Graceful

The violins were especially graceful in the Galliarde, which is a less often heard dance form. In the Serenatina the viola took the place of Viol D'Amore which Bossi calls for. This substitution is perfectly legitimate, since the fourteen-stringed instrument is obsolete in spite of Mr. Loeffler's able use of it in his compositions. It was but natural that the Viol D'Amore should pass out of use. Because of the tuning of the fourteen strings the player generally died of old age before he got to his solo. But Mr. Ferir played the obbligato beautifully upon the viola and was greatly applauded, the movement being one of the chief successes of the work.

The Burlesca, which ended the Suite, was more in the farcical character of Goldoni. This was almost exactly the picture which Sinigaglia gave in "Le Baruffe Chiozotte" of last week, only it was better with full orchestra tone-color than merely with strings, and this in spite of the brusquerie with which it was read and executed. It might picture a street brawl, one of those quarrels which are found copiously in these old Italian comedies. The "curfew" was pensive and delicate, but too long. The second Minuet might have been omitted. But the playing of the string orchestra was something to be proud of, and they were forced to rise after long-continued applause.

It seemed as if Dr. Muck had determined to give us a programme entirely of bright tints. After the dashing rhythms of "Gwendoline," the dance touches of the Symphonic Espagnole, and the whimsicalities, playfulness and humor of Goldoni-Bossi, the programme closed with yet more lightness in a Haydn symphony. It made one long for a few ultra-modern bitternesses just for a change. It was too much of dance and daintiness for a session. Three minuets in one concert are about as out of place as three courses of soup in a single dinner. Nevertheless the Haydn symphony had its charm and Dr. Muck takes care to give the old composer enough of virility to disprove the fitness of the patronizing title of "Papa Haydn," which some moderns bestow upon him.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date MAR 28 19

Established: 19

The Season's Orchestral Music—Some Reflections on Many Concerts—New Works and Old Ones.

THE three chief series of orchestral concerts given in New York during the season have now all been closed, the Philharmonic Society's popular concert of last evening being the last. The Philharmonic Society, the New York Symphony Society, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra between them have given 85 concerts in 23 weeks—statisticians would say, an average of 3.7 a week. There will have been, by the time the opera season is ended, 3 more given on Sunday nights at the Metropolitan Opera House. The Young People's Symphony concerts are 6 in number, the People's Symphony Concerts 3, the Russian Symphony Orchestra's regular subscription concerts 3, besides several more on Sunday nights of a popular character. The Philadelphia Orchestra came over once to supply any possibly deficiencies the New York public may have felt in the way of orchestral music. There have been various others, including some of a popular kind on Sundays. Altogether, the number of orchestral concerts heard during the season will have been well over 125, good, bad, and indifferent.

The number seems to some greater than the actual needs of the musical population call for. Yet there must be something more than a vain optimism that prompts the managers of these various enterprises to add continually to the number of such concerts beyond actual requirements. No doubt the demand increases, in a way, proportionately to the increase of the city's population; but the managers seem always eager to keep ahead of the demand with their supply. How far ahead is probably to be read in their ledgers, which are not always set forth for the public to inspect. Of course, it is well known that the two principal local orchestras, the Philharmonic Society and the New York Symphony Orchestra, do business at a large annual loss. Each has to make arrangements for covering a financial deficit every year. They do this, as everybody knows, on the ground that the giving of orchestral concerts is not a business like another, but a provision of artistic nutriment that is not to be put on a business basis; or that it is an educational provision, such as are the great universities, which are run at a cost far beyond any sum that their tuition fees bring them in and are heavily endowed for that very purpose; or they could be compared to the great museums and public libraries, which are for the public good and in this country acquire most of their resources from private munificence.

Supporters of the great orchestras, therefore, would say that the fact that most of them have reported deficits by no means indicates a bad adjustment of supply to demand. They would ask what, precisely, is the right adjustment? They would point to the fact that some of the more obviously popular series are profitable, and would say that the best must be artificially promoted, or it would have no chance. How Major Higginson enters on his books the balance brought by the crowded audiences that hear his Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall is not revealed. On the face of it these particular ten concerts presumably show a profit; but, of course, it must be properly apportioned among the annual expenses of the organization which, while they do not all directly bear upon its New York appearances, are necessary to them. The New York receipts are only a way of reducing a deficit that is practically an indispensable condition of the orchestra's existence.

Much might be said and discussion might be continued indefinitely upon the question of how much orchestral music a city like New York "needs," how much it can assimilate, whether it is oversupplied, whether less would be more fully appreciated. The results, if any were arrived at, would not be conclusive, nor would they be final in the case of a community such as this, that has such great increases in its population annually, and that presumably is advancing in the love and appreciation of music, growing by what it feeds on.

⁂

The time is not a propitious one for the production of new works of consequence, and there have not been many such heard here this season. Few of those that have been played here have gained enthusiastic acceptance. The Philharmonic Society has presented for the first time in New York Henry Hadley's tone poem, "Lucifer"; Arthur Hinton's suite, "Endymion"; Erich Korngold's "Sinfonietta," Op. 5; J. Guy Ropartz's Fourth Symphony; Sigismond Stojowski's Suite, Op. 9; Henry Burck's "Meditation" for strings, and Nicola Laucella's "Prelude and Temple Dance."

The New York Symphony Society's new performances were Percy Grainger's British Folk Dances, Josef Suk's "Scherzo Fantastique," Maurice Ravel's symphonic fragment from the ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe"; Roger-Ducasse's "Le Joli Jeu de Furet," Albert Roussel's "Le Festin d'Araignée," Florent Schmitt's waltzes, "Reflets d'Allemagne," and, at a special concert, not in its regular series, these American works: Frederick S. Converse's "Ormazd," David Stanley Smith's overture, "Prince Hal," and two movements from a symphony by Frederick A. Stock.

The record of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York concerts shows only these absolutely new compositions: E. Reznicek's "symphonic biograpy," "Schlehmihl," and Vincent d'Indy's fantasy for oboe and orchestra, though Mr. Converse's "Ormazd" was presented to the general public for the first time and Ropartz's symphony followed the Philharmonic Society's first performance of it by only eight days.

It might be recalled to the Boston Symphony's New York auditors who complain of Dr. Muck's tendency to lay emphasis upon modern works that out of thirty-five compositions played in the ten concerts seventeen are what may be called "classic" in a sense that may be accepted today and that will reckon Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Weber as among the classics. There was protest earlier in the season that he was "relegating the classics to the discard." He is seen thus to have preserved an almost exact balance between works of the classical spirit and those of a different kind. Bach's Shepherds' Music from the "Christmas Oratorio" and his concerto for two violins, Beethoven's third and eighth symphonies and his overtures to "Coriolanus," "Egmont," and "Leonora," (No. 3); Mozart's symphony in C and overture to "The Magic Flute," Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Schubert's symphony in C, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Schumann's overture to "Genovena," and Brahms's first and second symphonies and variations on a theme by Haydn comprise these works.

Mr. Stransky has followed out the moral obligations placed upon the Philharmonic Society in accepting Joseph Pulitzer's bequest of $750,000. This bequest was to "perfect the present orchestra and place it on a more independent basis and to increase the number of concerts to be given in the City of New York, which additional concerts I hope will not have too severely classical programs and be open to the public at reasonable rates, and to recognizing my favorite composers, Beethoven, Wagner, and Liszt." Mr. Stransky has not made his programs "too severely classical," and he has "recognized" Beethoven, Wagner, and Liszt. Beethoven's third, fifth, and seventh symphonies, the overtures "Coriolanus," "The Dedication of the House," "Leonore," (No. 3); the violin concerto, the triple concerto for violin, violoncello, and piano, and numerous vocal pieces; several "Wagner concerts," at which and on other occasions were given the available preludes to the music-dramas, various excerpts from those dramas, the "Faust" overture and "Siegfried Idyll," as well as vocal selections; and Liszt's "Dante" symphony, two symphonic poems—"Les Préludes" and "Tasso"—the E flat concerto for piano and orchestra, and orchestral arrangements of two of the Hungarian Rhapsodies—these have constituted the recognition hoped for by the testator and imposed as a moral, if not a legal, obligation on the society.

Fortunately Mr. Stransky has not interpreted his duties as to Liszt too strictly and has given only seven performances of his works in New York, (eleven if repetitions at the second of a pair of concerts be counted.) If he reads the likings of the real musical public aright there is not likely to be that glorious "Liszt revival" which some of the faithful and vociferous little band of admirers have been hoping for—a revival that is always coming, but never arrives. An endowed series of prescribed Liszt performances would bring dismay to many stout-hearted concert-goers in New York, and it might be found that it is possible to pay too dearly even for $750,000. Some will recall the quaint fact that Karl Graun's once-favorite oratorio, "Der Tod Jesu," is still given perforce once a year in Berlin because somebody left a bequest strictly for that purpose, long ago, when the work was still alive. It is dead and decently buried in the musical histories now, but has to undergo an annual exhumation because some almost forgotten testator left "direction" instead of Mr. Pulitzer's more prudent "hopes."

Mr. Stransky has shown a strong fondness for Tschaikowsky as represented by three symphonies, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the "Italian Capriccio," the "Nutcracker Suite," and some other works; for Strauss, Dvorak, Grieg, Rimsky-Korsakoff; not much for Brahms, whose fourth symphony and "Tragic" overture are the only orchestral works represented on the programs, except orchestral transcriptions of two Hungarian dances.

Mr. Damrosch, with the New York Symphony Society, showed more sympathy with Brahms, whose second and fourth symphonies, "Academic" overture, D minor piano concerto, and violin concerto were played at his concerts. Beethoven's symphonies had an unusually small representation on them—the third and the instrumental movements of the ninth alone appearing, besides which the "King Stephen" overture, the E flat concerto, and some songs were heard. Only Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony and third suite, one of Strauss's symphonic poems, none of Dvorak's symphonies, but the orchestral suite, Op. 39, and the notturno for strings; of Liszt only an orchestral transcription of his "St. Francis Preaching to the Birds," besides the "Hungarian Fantasy," and the "Mephisto Waltz" were heard. Mr. Damrosch lent a willing ear to the modern French sirens—Debussy's "Iberia" and "Nocturne," No. 2; the new pieces of Ravel, Roger-Ducasse, Roussel, and Schmitt testify to it, and of more conservative French music Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony, Berlioz's "Fanastic" Symphony, and "Roman Carnival" overture, and a transcription of César Franck's "Prelude, Choral, and Fugue" show attention to this section of the orchestral repertory.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

ADVERTISER,
MORNING, APRIL 17

AGREEABLE, BUT WITHOUT NOVELTY

SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVES MUCH TO ENJOY

Mr. Noack Chief Success in Programme With Tendency to Dance Rhythms

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Chabrier—"Gwendoline" overture.
Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mr. Sylvain Noack.
Bossi—Intermezzi Goldoniani.
Haydn—Symphony in G major.

Although there was nothing new in this programme, there was much to enjoy and nothing to puzzle over. There was a constant tendency to dance rhythms. Chabrier's "Gwendoline" was, however, as fiery as a Petroleuse. From the very beginning one gets fierce sequences which given with all the power of our energetic artist on that instrument. The imp of the orchestra, the piccolo, begins to shriek early in the proceedings also. But we have become accustomed to all this kind of orchestral revelry (or devilry) and we begin to demand our tonal pepper in every orchestral dish, and this work was almost the only fiery orchestral number of the concert.

The chief theme is beautiful enough, and it was expressively given by violoncellos and wind instruments. The frenzied dance measures were given with the abandon of a cancan, and recalled the late, lamented Offenbach. But the development was altogether of a higher school and exhibited both ingenuity and beauty. At the end bass drum and cymbals joined in the melee and made a very explosive climax, while the kettle-drummer had a swat-fest all to himself and, in the last round, delivered a knock-out blow on the solar plexus of the G drum which was phenomenal. Therefore, "Gwendoline" was an exciting work, much given over to fortissimo effects, but with good, melodic ideas which were finely developed—a much better composition than many a modern work which is called great.

Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole is not a symphony, nor even a true concerto, from the fact that it keeps the soloist in the foreground almost all the time, making the work a series of violin solos with orchestral accompaniment, with strong tutti passages between the solo divisions. This is, however, very acceptable both to the violinist and to the public, and therefore one need not quarrel with the title. The Scherzo is brimful of Spanish dance rhythms, and Cachucas and Fandangoes peep through various parts of the movement. The carillon effect of the finale is attractive enough, although it gives one the idea that Lalo is translating the old round—"Three Blind Mice"—into Spanish. But this same finale has some broad G-string passages that displayed Mr. Noack's tone excellently, and the daintiness and delicacy of parts of the Scherzo were in fine contrast with this more majestic work. In short the composition demands versatility on the part of its interpreter, and it showed Mr. Noack's abilities in many directions.

Spanish Sunshine

The first, fourth and fifth movements only were given. Yet, if amputation was to be done we would much rather have had it exercised on the Bossi suite which followed, for Lalo's "Symphony" is full of Spanish sunshine and syncopation and is very attractive. There is much of the folk-music vein in the work, and Mr. Noack's performance was masterly. His surety in the extreme high positions was marvellous, and his harmonics, his full-tone G-string work and the broad style of his playing in the finale awoke the audience to rapturous enthusiasm and many recalls.

Let no one think that Bossi is at all calf-like in his music. He is the most modern of the Italian composers, and his "Paradise Lost" is quite as ugly as any modern composition of them all. But his "Intermezzi Goldoniani" is more attractive. It is only a week ago that we had Goldoni turned into music by Sinigaglia. It seems that just as the German composers turn to Boecklin and his paintings for inspiration, the Italians draw from the comedies of this 18th century rival of Moliere. Goldoni has a wide range in his plays; he is humorous, whimsical, dainty, and even broadly vulgar at times. He has written in pure Italian and he has also used the Neapolitan and other dialects in his comedies.

This Suite is for Strings alone, and it reflects chiefly the dainty and playful side of the author. It is by no means as graphic as Sinigaglia's "Le Baruffe Chiozotte" of the preceding concert. Nevertheless we found the first Minuet to be a charming picture of 18th century elegance and original in style, which is very much to say with such a composed-to-death form as this dance movement.

Violins Graceful

The violins were especially graceful in the Galliarde, which is a less often heard dance form. In the Serenatina the viola took the place of Viol D'Amore which Bossi calls for. This substitution is perfectly legitimate, since the fourteen-stringed instrument is obsolete in spite of Mr. Loeffler's able use of it in his compositions. It was but natural that the Viol D'Amore should pass out of use. Because of the tuning of the fourteen strings the player generally died of old age before he got to his solo. But Mr. Ferir played the obbligato beautifully upon the viola and was greatly applauded, the movement being one of the chief successes of the work.

The Burlesca, which ended the Suite, was more in the farcical character of Goldoni. This was almost exactly the picture which Sinigaglia gave in "Le Baruffe Chiozotte" of last week, only it was better with full orchestra tone-color than merely with strings, and this in spite of the brusquerie with which it was read and executed. It might picture a street brawl, one of those quarrels which are found copiously in these old Italian comedies. The "curfew" was pensive and delicate, but too long. The second Minuet might have been omitted. But the playing of the string orchestra was something to be proud of, and they were forced to rise after long-continued applause.

It seemed as if Dr. Muck had determined to give us a programme entirely of bright tints. After the dashing rhythms of "Gwendoline," the dance touches of the Symphonic Espagnole, and the whimsicalities, playfulness and humor of Goldoni-Bossi, the programme closed with yet more lightness in a Haydn symphony. It made one long for a few ultra-modern bitternesses just for a change. It was too much of dance and daintiness for a session. Three minuets in one concert are about as out of place as three courses of soup in a single dinner. Nevertheless the Haydn symphony had its charm and Dr. Muck takes care to give the old composer enough of virility to disprove the fitness of the patronizing title of "Papa Haydn," which some moderns bestow upon him.

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 17,

SYMPHONY PRESENTS EXTREMES

Whole Gamut Run in Chabrier's Work, Mr. Noack Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The soloist at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was Sylvain Noack, the second concertmeister, who played three movements of Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole."

The orchestral pieces were Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," Bossi's "Intermezzo Goldoniani," for strings, and Haydn's symphony in G major (Breitkopf and Hartel, No. 13).

MR. NOACK'S PERFORMANCE

Mr. Noack gave a performance which was admirable for its tonal beauty, its esprit and elegance and musicianship. "The Symphonie Espagnole" seems especially suited to his style. We have heard the work played with exaggeration and sentimentality, and what of it that was piquant turned into cheap handsprings for the soloist, and what was charming and fancifully sensuous turned into mowling and gush. Mr. Noack never dragged his tempi, and never made grosser the thought or the idiom of this delightfully written music. His finished technic and beauty of tone, and his sensetive feeling for what is good and what is not good taste, made for an admirable interpretation by a modest and most deserving musician. The audience appreciated Mr. Noack's performance, and he was recalled repeatedly, with unusual enthusiasm.

Is To Extremes

Of Chabrier, it was once said that he was a composer who had rare the gift of being vulgar in good taste That is a very fine and flippant aphorism, for the fact remains that in many instances Chabrier also knew how to be vulgar in astonishingly poor taste; and the overture to Gwendoline is an unblushing example of two extremes of his genius. In all music drama, for instance, there are few wilder and more stirring pages than the magnificent sweep with which the overture heard yesterday, commences. This is indeed a picture of a wind-swept coast, and of splendid crude days of joyous battle. One is swept away by it, and the music presses on, finer and more powerful—to what? To the theme which is the best that Chabrier could think of when he made his Harald sing of the glories of Walhalla. Walhalla? Say, rather, a beer-garden!

In all French music worthy of serious consideration, we know of no theme so banal as this, appearing in the midst of music that has roared like the elements, and called to battle with splendid challenging fanfares that make the blood run cold.

Full of Genius

The overture is full of genius. Its rhythms in themselves are maddening, and the rhythms and the orchestration of the Gwendoline overture are audacious to the verge of extravagance. The fanfares of the trumpets with their now familiar "whole-tone" progressions anticipated in many years the practises of Debussy and other moderns who received harmonic suggestions from Chabrier as well as Liszt and Moussorgsky. And it is all so magnificently of the theatre, of music drama, that one is temporarily carried away. Chabrier had an intensely nervous and animated temperament which was worth much to him as a composer, but which, too often, alas, put sheer nervous impulse before thought and feeling. This electric intensity makes the overture as a whole a vital and thrilling piece, but it seems to have interfered deplorably with the inherent value of the music. At last the dregs of the wine are forced down the hearer's throat, as with all imaginable pomp and crash and glory the theme which is the opotheosis, not of Harald and Gwendoline, and of the pasteboard downfall of the gods with which Chabrier brings his opera to a close, but of the extreme of bombast and vulgarity, is thundered out with all the force and brilliancy of a modern orchestra.

A Manysided Master

What, then, is Chabrier? Sometimes he appears as a master dramatist as a harmonist—not a melodist—but a harmonist and a master of the orchestra of the most exceptional gifts, and then again he is no more than a boulevardier, cynical, vulgar, mocking, a sort of intensified Offenbach—or gut- [illegible] might be a better word—a Beeth- [illegible] sneer, a malicious wit and [illegible] to whom the

But if there were in America one composer who could produce the equivalent of the first 20 measures of the Gwendoline overture, the American genius of music drama would long since have arrived.

Bossi's music in the 18th century manner is delightful, and beautifully written. It is as Italian as the ultra-modern music of Chabrier is French. The scoring for strings is original and masterly. The prelude, the gay Gagliarda, the "Curfew" music and the Serenatina when Mr. Ferir's viola d'amore and Mr. Witek's solo violin answered each other so beautifully, are for us the most admirable numbers. But it is all beautiful and the work of a most accomplished artist, and it paved the way from Cabrier and Lalo to a five symphony in G major by one Joseph Haydn.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

APRIL 17,

NOACK SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST

This week's Symphony soloist is Sylvian Noack, second concert-master of the orchestra, and yesterday his performance of a part of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" was heartily approved by the "rehearsal" audience. The second and third movements were omitted. Of the three movements offered yesterday, the andante was on the whole the most enjoyable, especially as regards the efforts of the soloist. Mr. Noack is at his best in tender, lyrical passages, to which his light but usually clear and charming tone is suited; but he is also a master of the technic of the violin, as he proved in the finale.

This major portion of the celebrated symphony for violin and orchestra was one of several bright and popular works chosen by Dr. Muck for this 21st program. Chabrier's dramatic "Gwendoline" overture, Enrico Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," for strings alone, and Haydn's symphony in G major comprise a list furnishing temperate pleasure, if not the accustomed melodramatic excitement of the day.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, next week's soloist, will play the Mozart piano concerto in D minor, which has not been played at a Symphony concert for 30 years, and Weber's "Concertstueck," which has also been long absent from Symphony programs. The orchestra will perform MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun,'" and "The Steppe," by Noskowski.

MONITOR, BO STON, MASS., SATURDAY, APRIL 17,

MUSIC PLAYED BY SYMPHONY MAKES A JOYOUS OCCASION

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-first public rehearsal, Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 16. The program: Chabrier. overture to the opera "Gwendolin"; Lalo, "Spanish symphony" for violin and orchestra, first, fourth and fifth movements (Sylvain Noack, soloist); Bossi, "Intermezzi Goldoniani" for strings; Haydn, symphony in G major, B. & H. No. 13.

The program showed the orchestra in carnival mood. It expressed a sentiment which is characteristic enough of the conductor and the players, but one which is seldom given such free rein. Occasionally in the course of the season a piece like the Chabrier, the Lalo, the Bossi or the Haydn of Friday afternoon is introduced in order that a public which is striving to make headway with Sibelius, Reznicek or Schoenberg may be cheered up a little. But rarely are works of this gay and open-air sort allowed to occupy a whole concert. They would, if persisted in, put the orchestra in the class of musical organizations known as popular. They would make an illustrious type of conductor seem just like any other kind. They would make expensive players at first desks in string, wood and brass sections superfluous. They would, in short, unsettle the artistic foundations of the city.

It was, indeed, a bright and lively program, and it caused a response from the audience that was unnaturally free. The playing took the house out of its usual critical attitude and put it into one of almost careless enjoyment. Let the orchestra bring other "Gwendoline" overtures and other "Intermezzi Goldoniani" out of its repertory, and soon it will set the floor and galleries of Symphony hall into an exchange of confetti-throwing.

The four pieces, seemingly, were quite in the line of popular music. But why? Only because of their contrast with extremely heavy programs that have been presented hitherto. There is plenty to engage the attention of the most experienced listener in the Chabrier overture, highly colored and obvious in general meaning as it is. There is plenty to enlist the curiosity of the most devoted follower of the German school of music in the six little pieces of Bossi for string orchestra. Just to follow up the question of how the composer compels from the strings so great a variety of tone color, making the want of wood and brass tone unnoticeable, should be enough for anybody in one afternoon. And as for Lalo, if any work for orchestra and solo instrument exists in which scoring is more skilfully adapted to form than in the "Spanish Symphony," will somebody tell what it is?

No classic composer could have been chosen who would carry out the merry mood of the day better than Haydn. In his symphony in G major, he appears on the best of terms not only with the world, but with himself. He makes his hearers laugh, though telling the same story he has told before. Haydn was remarkable at paraphrasing his own writings. And strangely he did not seriously affect the vitality of his work by this trait. He got enough freshness into the variants of his happy contemplations to make them appeal. He made a new way of presenting a thought amount almost to a new idea.

Mr. Noack as soloist was inclined at the beginning of his performance to push the tone of his violin harder than it would go, but the orchestra covered most of the roughness thus caused. He entered into the feeling of the occasion, and that was the principal demand on him. He executed the brilliant opening and closing movements of the "Spanish Symphony" with great mastery and he made the slow movement interesting, to say the least. But best of all, he and the field were of one mind in announcement and reply. He and the players phrased the themes with singleness of intention. And this seems possible only when the soloist is a member of the orchestra and knows familiarly the temperament of the men supporting him.

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 17, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A LIGHT PROGRAMME AND EASY PLEASURE

Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline" in All Its Eloquence—Bossi's Artful and Fanciful Intermezzi for Goldoni Revived—Haydn for Ending and Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" with Mr. Noack in the Solo Part

COMING events cast their shadows before at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon and two, if not three, numbers of the programme were pieces that conductor and orchestra have been restudying for their expedition to San Francisco. Chabrier's overture to his opera, "Gwendoline," will begin one of the concerts of French music there as it began the concert here; Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," will figure on the Italian programme in California; and if memory does not slip, Haydn's little symphony in G, though it may be fairly counted in the active repertory of the band, will be played at the Panama Exhibition as it was in Symphony Hall. The overture and the Intermezzi in their completeness had not been heard in Boston since Dr. Muck's first term with the orchestra and side by side with Haydn's symphony and three parts of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin, they made a pleasurable programme, light enough for the end of the season and the lassitude of spring, that displayed the force and the fire of Dr. Muck and the men in Chabrier's music and their fleetness, finesse and fluent exactitude in Haydn's. Lalo's piece in turn renewed the familiar impression of the fine contours, the lustrous texture, the undulating flow of Mr. Noack's tone and the technical elegance and the musical and imaginative sensibility with which he accents it. Similarly, the Intermezzi revealed once more the variety of tonal color, rhythmic beat and adroit euphonies and contrasts of which the string choir is in a suite that much depends upon these virtues. Thus the matter and the manner of the whole concert gave equal and manifold pleasure and the audience was intent and applausive accordingly.

Above all the rest of the music stood Chabrier's puissant and eloquent prelude to his opera on the Wagnerian model that won him place and prestige in Germany long before the Parisians heard and appreciated it. Even more than the familiar rhapsody, "España," it is music of Chabrier's opulent and glowing prime. He seems to conceive it with all the passion of design that makes the rhapsody also like a magnificent and far-flung improvisation in which each element falls spontaneously and hotly into its place in the whole as though from the crucible of Chabrier's imagination and the forge of his power. The force, the variety, the interplay and contrasts of the rhythms are thrilling to hear and where the composer ended with them the conductor began anew. The instrumental color is hot, deep, spontaneous and changeful. There are moments when the music moves in magnificent clangors, even when it is born of such mere effective tonal rhetoric as the motive of the Walhalla to which the Danish prince, tricked and murdered by the Saxons, mounts with his bride. There are moments when its tumultuous emotion drives the imagination before its sweep; others when it rises to a height of barbaric tone-picturing of the Viking hordes as only Sibelius in his first symphony and Wagner in the gathering of the Gibichung hosts in the second act of "Götterdämerung" has equalled; and others still, as Chabrier summons the devoted and longing Gwendoline, when it swims in the warm and wistful beauty of the melody for the clarinet, rising in long curves, deepening in intensity, glowingly sung yesterday by Mr. Sand and as glowingly colored by the two harpists. Nowhere does the overture lack pictorial power and theatrical force and suspense; nowhere until it reaches the square-toed choral-like progressions does it lose its tonal splendor, its rhythmic verve and its eloquence as music. It is magnificent, and with the characteristic passion of Chabrier that as long as his Bourrée Fantasque is unknown to our concerts and his "Le Roi l'a Dit" to our opera houses, we know elsewhere only in "España."

Though Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" came between, Bossi's Intermezzi for the string choir seemed the contrasting piece. To invent them was a happy notion as though the composer upon a day had taken down the many volumes of Goldoni's comedy and noted their multifarious matter. Here was one of babbling and bickering beach-folk, voluble, comic, full-bodied and full-blooded, like "Le Baruffe Chiozzote"; here was another full of wit, wile, elegance and sentiment, masculine and feminine, like "Le Donne Curiose"; here was another still all light gayety and homely humor like "La Locandiera"; and yet others Parisian-like in their artful artificiality, like "Il Burbero Benefico." Why not festoon them in tones with a set of intermezzi that should catch this, that and the other of all these substances and styles, now homely and gay, now elegant and sentimental? Bossi, Italian by birth and dwelling-place and half German by artistic inclination, experience and rewarding fortune, is a composer of scholarship as well as of fancy. His form was obviously the suite as it was written in the eighteenth century with its sturdy preluding, its succession of glorified dance-tunes, its intervening song and its ebullient ending.

Write the suite for string choir only and the two-fold Bossi could strew his music with the little felicities of counterpoint, accent, arabesque and contrast with which these suits abounded and conduct it also with the mingling of artifice and ardor, pretty sentiment and playful humor with which Goldoni conducted his comedies. So he fashioned his vivacious and snapping prelude; his wistful minuet as though for the instant he were setting Goldoni's personages in ghostly dance; his homely and swinging galliard; his sentimental anecdote of the curfew; his piquant musetta of the folk; his elegant and tinkling serenatina; and the rough and ready verve and humors of his final burlesca. Scholarship at sport with itself, and never once growing weary, while fancy calls the tune. A charming suite, but one that needs all the artful aid that Dr. Muck and the string choir brought to it.

When the orchestra plays Haydn's symphonies, we listeners by the sheer skill, spirit and pervading perfection of the performance, are prone to listen to them as though they were virtuoso pieces. How fleet and light is the orchestra in the returns of the final rondo; how full and warm and sustained its phrasing of the largo; how deft its inflections and suave its euphonies in this or that allegro. So admiring we forget that it was busy old Haydn, after all, who set the rondo to its skipping, who fashioned the phrases, who imposed the accents. He had his elegances as well as his simplicity; he knew the art as well as the impulse of instrumental song; his voice is deft as well as mellifluous. He had artistry; he asked artistry and style, and they quite as much as substance keep his music sweet and savory. With the smiling classic, we forget the skill for the smile.

And Haydn knew the light hand better, perhaps than the more sophisticated, imagining and sometimes curiously puzzling Lalo of the "Spanish Symphony." As in the concerto for violoncello that Mr. Casals and Dr. Muck played, the listener wonders more than once at what seems the superfluous force, vigor and largeness of many of the purely orchestral passages, contrasts and climaxes; whereas through all the music the violin part runs like a fine bright thread, moving in gentle curves and undulations, beating to light rhythms, lustrous with delicate tonal colors, warm with song, piquant always yet felicitously fashioned for the bow. The finesse and the fancy, the sophisticated discretion of it charmed the ear in the gentle or piquant perfections of Mr. Noack's playing. And then the orchestra answered as though Lalo would say, "I, too, am a man of force." Elsewhere in his music he has given proof enough of that.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 17,

SYMPHONY PRESENTS EXTREMES

Whole Gamut Run in Chabrier's Work, Mr. Noack Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The soloist at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was Sylvain Noack, the second concertmeister, who played three movements of Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole."

The orchestral pieces were Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," Bossi's "Intermezzo Goldoniani," for strings, and Haydn's symphony in G major (Breitkopf and Hartel, No. 13).

MR. NOACK'S PERFORMANCE

Mr. Noack gave a performance which was admirable for its tonal beauty, its esprit and elegance and musicianship. "The Symphonie Espagnole" seems especially suited to his style. We have heard the work played with exaggeration and sentimentality, and what of it that was piquant turned into cheap handsprings for the soloist, and what was charming and fancifully sensuous turned into mowling and gush. Mr. Noack never dragged his tempi, and never made grosser the thought or the idiom of this delightfully written music. His finished technic and beauty of tone, and his sensetive feeling for what is good and what is not good taste, made for an admirable interpretation by a modest and most deserving musician. The audience appreciated Mr. Noack's performance, and he was recalled repeatedly, with unusual enthusiasm.

Is To Extremes

Of Chabrier, it was once said that he was a composer who had rarely the gift of being vulgar in good taste. That is a very fine and flippant aphorism, for the fact remains that in many instances Chabrier also knew how to be vulgar in astonishingly poor taste; and the overture to Gwendoline is an unblushing example of two extremes of his genius. In all music drama, for instance, there are few wilder and more stirring pages than the magnificent sweep with which the overture heard yesterday, commences. This is indeed a picture of a wind-swept coast, and of splendid crude days of joyous battle. One is swept away by it, and the music presses on, finer and more powerful—to what? To the theme which is the best that Chabrier could think of when he made his Harald sing of the glories of Walhalla. Walhalla? Say, rather, a beer-garden!

In all French music worthy of serious consideration, we know of no theme so banal as this, appearing in the midst of music that has roared like the elements, and called to battle with splendid challenging fanfares that make the blood run cold.

Full of Genius

The overture is full of genius. Its rhythms in themselves are maddening, and the rhythms and the orchestration of the Gwendoline overture are audacious to the verge of extravagance. The fanfares of the trumpets with their now familiar "whole-tone" progressions anticipated in many years the practises of Debussy and other moderns who received harmonic suggestions from Chabrier as well as Liszt and Moussorgsky. And it is all so magnificently of the theatre, of music drama, that one is temporarily carried away. Chabrier had an intensely nervous and animated temperament which was worth much to him as a composer, but which, too often, alas, put sheer nervous impulse before thought and feeling. This electric intensity makes the overture as a whole a vital and thrilling piece, but it seems to have interfered deplorably with the inherent value of the music. At last the dregs of the wine are forced down the hearer's throat, as with all imaginable pomp and crash and glory the theme which is the opotheosis, not of Harald and Gwendoline, and of the pasteboard downfall of the gods with which Chabrier brings his opera to a close, but of the extreme of bombast and vulgarity, is thundered out with all the force and brilliancy of a modern orchestra.

A Manysided Master

What, then, is Chabrier? Sometimes he appears as a master dramatist as a harmonist—not a melodist—but a harmonist and a master of the orchestra of the most exceptional gifts, and then again he is no more than a boulevardier, cynical, vulgar, mocking, a sort of intensified Offenbach—or gut-ne might be a better word—a Beethsneer, a malicious wit and [illegible] whom the

But if there were in America one composer who could produce the equivalent of the first 20 measures of the Gwendoline overture, the American genius of music drama would long since have arrived.

Bossi's music in the 18th century manner is delightful, and beautifully written. It is as Italian as the ultramodern music of Chabrier is French. The scoring for strings is original and masterly. The prelude, the gay Gagliarda, the "Curfew" music and the Serenatina when Mr. Ferir's viola d'amore and Mr. Witek's solo violin answered each other so beautifully, are for us the most admirable numbers. But it is all beautiful and the work of a most accomplished artist, and it paved the way from Cabrier and Lalo to a five symphony in G major by one Joseph Haydn.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

APRIL 17,

NOACK SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST

This week's Symphony soloist is Sylvian Noack, second concert-master of the orchestra, and yesterday his performance of a part of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" was heartily approved by the "rehearsal" audience. The second and third movements were omitted. Of the three movements offered yesterday, the andante was on the whole the most enjoyable, especially as regards the efforts of the soloist. Mr. Noack is at his best in tender, lyrical passages, to which his light but usually clear and charming tone is suited; but he is also a master of the technic of the violin, as he proved in the finale.

This major portion of the celebrated symphony for violin and orchestra was one of several bright and popular works chosen by Dr. Muck for this 21st program. Chabrier's dramatic "Gwendoline" overture, Enrico Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," for strings alone, and Haydn's symphony in G major comprise a list furnishing temperate pleasure, if not the accustomed melodramatic excitement of the day.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, next week's soloist, will play the Mozart piano concerto in D minor, which has not been played at a Symphony concert for 30 years, and Weber's "Concertstueck," which has also been long absent from Symphony programs. The orchestra will perform MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun,'" and "The Steppe," by Noskowski.

ONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, APRIL 17,

MUSIC PLAYED BY SYMPHONY MAKES A JOYOUS OCCASION

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-first public rehearsal, Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 16. The program: Chabrier, overture to the opera "Gwendolin"; Lalo, "Spanish symphony" for violin and orchestra, first, fourth and fifth movements (Sylvain Noack, soloist); Bossi, "Intermezzi Goldoniani" for strings; Haydn, symphony in G major, B. & H. No. 13.

The program showed the orchestra in carnival mood. It expressed a sentiment which is characteristic enough of the conductor and the players, but one which is seldom given such free rein. Occasionally in the course of the season a piece like the Chabrier, the Lalo, the Bossi or the Haydn of Friday afternoon is introduced in order that a public which is striving to make headway with Sibelius, Reznicek or Schoenberg may be cheered up a little. But rarely are works of this gay and open-air sort allowed to occupy a whole concert. They would, if persisted in, put the orchestra in the class of musical organizations known as popular. They would make an illustrious type of conductor seem just like any other kind. They would make expensive players at first desks in string, wood and brass sections superfluous. They would, in short, unsettle the artistic foundations of the city.

It was, indeed, a bright and lively program, and it caused a response from the audience that was unnaturally free. The playing took the house out of its usual critical attitude and put it into one of almost careless enjoyment. Let the orchestra bring other "Gwendoline" overtures and other "Intermezzi Goldoniani" out of its repertory, and soon it will set the floor and galleries of Symphony hall into an exchange of confetti-throwing.

The four pieces, seemingly, were quite in the line of popular music. But why? Only because of their contrast with extremely heavy programs that have been presented hitherto. There is plenty to engage the attention of the most ex- erienced listener in the Chabrier over- e, highly colored and obvious in general meaning as it is. There is plenty to enlist the curiosity of the most devoted follower of the German school of music in the six little pieces of Bossi for string orchestra. Just to follow up the question of how the composer compels from the strings so great a variety of tone color, making the want of wood and brass tone unnoticeable, should be enough for anybody in one afternoon. And as for Lalo, if any work for orchestra and solo instrument exists in which scoring is more skilfully adapted to form than in the "Spanish Symphony," will somebody tell what it is?

No classic composer could have been chosen who would carry out the merry mood of the day better than Haydn. In his symphony in G major, he appears on the best of terms not only with the world, but with himself. He makes his hearers laugh, though telling the same story he has told before. Haydn was remarkable at paraphrasing his own writings. And strangely he did not seriously affect the vitality of his work by this trait. He got enough freshness into the variants of his happy contemplations to make them appeal. He made a new way of presenting a thought amount almost to a new idea.

Mr. Noack as soloist was inclined at the beginning of his performance to push the tone of his violin harder than it would go, but the orchestra covered most of the roughness thus caused. He entered into the feeling of the occasion, and that was the principal demand on him. He executed the brilliant opening and closing movements of the "Spanish Symphony" with great mastery and he made the slow movement interesting, to say the least. But best of all, he and the field were of one mind in announcement and reply. He and the players phrased the themes with singleness of intention. And this seems possible only when the soloist is a member of the orchestra and knows familiarly the temperament of the men supporting him.

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 17, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A LIGHT PROGRAMME AND EASY PLEASURE

Chabrier's Overture to "Gwendoline" in All Its Eloquence—Bossi's Artful and Fanciful Intermezzi for Goldoni Revived —Haydn for Ending and Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" with Mr. Noack in the Solo Part

COMING events cast their shadows before at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon and two, if not three, numbers of the programme were pieces that conductor and orchestra have been restudying for their expedition to San Francisco. Chabrier's overture to his opera, "Gwendoline," will begin one of the concerts of French music there as it began the concert here; Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," will figure on the Italian programme in California; and if memory does not slip, Haydn's little symphony in G, though it may be fairly counted in the active repertory of the band, will be played at the Panama Exhibition as it was in Symphony Hall. The overture and the Intermezzi in their completeness had not been heard in Boston since Dr. Muck's first term with the orchestra and side by side with Haydn's symphony and three parts of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin, they made a pleasurable programme, light enough for the end of the season and the lassitude of spring, that displayed the force and the fire of Dr. Muck and the men in Chabrier's music and their fleetness, finesse and fluent exactitude in Haydn's. Lalo's piece in turn renewed the familiar impression of the fine contours, the lustrous texture, the undulating flow of Mr. Noack's tone and the technical elegance and the musical and imaginative sensibility with which he accents it. Similarly, the Intermezzi revealed once more the variety of tonal color, rhythmic beat and adroit euphonies and contrasts of which the string choir is in a suite that much depends upon these virtues. Thus the matter and the manner of the whole concert gave equal and manifold pleasure and the audience was intent and applausive accordingly.

Above all the rest of the music stood Chabrier's puissant and eloquent prelude to his opera on the Wagnerian model that won him place and prestige in Germany long before the Parisians heard and appreciated it. Even more than the familiar rhapsody, "España," it is music of Chabrier's opulent and glowing prime. He seems to conceive it with all the passion of design that makes the rhapsody also like a magnificent and far-flung improvisation in which each element falls spontaneously and hotly into its place in the whole as though from the crucible of Chabrier's imagination and the forge of his power. The force, the variety, the interplay and contrasts of the rhythms are thrilling to hear and where the composer ended with them the conductor began anew. The instrumental color is hot, deep, spontaneous and changeful. There are moments when the music moves in magnificent clangors, even when it is born of such mere effective tonal rhetoric as the motive of the Walhalla to which the Danish prince, tricked and murdered by the Saxons, mounts with his bride. There are moments when its tumultuous emotion drives the imagination before its sweep; others when it rises to a height of barbaric tone-picturing of the Viking hordes as only Sibelius in his first symphony and Wagner in the gathering of the Gibichung hosts in the second act of "Götterdämerung" has equalled; and others still, as Chabrier summons the devoted and longing Gwendoline, when it swims in the warm and wistful beauty of the melody for the clarinet, rising in long curves, deepening in intensity, glowingly sung yesterday by Mr. Sand and as glowingly colored by the two harpists. Nowhere does the overture lack pictorial power and theatrical force and suspense; nowhere until it reaches the square-toed choral-like progressions does it lose its tonal splendor, its rhythmic verve and its eloquence as music. It is magnificent, and with the characteristic passion of Chabrier that as long as his Bourrée Fantasque is unknown to our concerts and his "Le Roi l'a Dit" to our opera houses, we know elsewhere only in "España."

Though Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" came between, Bossi's Intermezzi for the string choir seemed the contrasting piece. To invent them was a happy notion as though the composer upon a day had taken down the many volumes of Goldoni's comedy and noted their multifarious matter. Here was one of babbling and bickering beach-folk, voluble, comic, full-bodied and full-blooded, like "Le Baruffe Chiozzote"; here was another full of wit, wile, elegance and sentiment, masculine and feminine, like "Le Donne Curiose"; here was another still all light gayety and homely humor like "La Locandiera"; and yet others Parisian-like in their artful artificiality, like "Il Burbero Benefico." Why not festoon them in tones with a set of intermezzi that should catch this, that and the other of all these substances and styles, now homely and gay, now elegant and sentimental? Bossi, Italian by birth and dwelling-place and half German by artistic inclination, experience and rewarding fortune, is a composer of scholarship as well as of fancy. His form was obviously the suite as it was written in the eighteenth century with its sturdy preluding, its succession of glorified dance-tunes, its intervening song and its ebullient ending.

Write the suite for string choir only and the two-fold Bossi could strew his music with the little felicities of counterpoint, accent, arabesque and contrast with which these suits abounded and conduct it also with the mingling of artifice and ardor, pretty sentiment and playful humor with which Goldoni conducted his comedies. So he fashioned his vivacious and snapping prelude; his wistful minuet as though for the instant he were setting Goldoni's personages in ghostly dance; his homely and swinging galliard; his sentimental anecdote of the curfew; his piquant musetta of the folk; his elegant and tinkling serenatina; and the rough and ready verve and humors of his final burlesca. Scholarship at sport with itself, and never once growing weary, while fancy calls the tune. A charming suite, but one that needs all the artful aid that Dr. Muck and the string choir brought to it.

When the orchestra plays Haydn's symphonies, we listeners by the sheer skill, spirit and pervading perfection of the performance, are prone to listen to them as though they were virtuoso pieces. How fleet and light is the orchestra in the returns of the final rondo; how full and warm and sustained its phrasing of the largo; how deft its inflections and suave its euphonies in this or that allegro. So admiring we forget that it was busy old Haydn, after all, who set the rondo to its skipping, who fashioned the phrases, who imposed the accents. He had his elegances as well as his simplicity; he knew the art as well as the impulse of instrumental song; his voice is deft as well as mellifluous. He had artistry; he asked artistry and style, and they quite as much as substance keep his music sweet and savory. With the smiling classic, we forget the skill for the smile.

And Haydn knew the light hand better, perhaps than the more sophisticated, imagining and sometimes curiously puzzling Lalo of the "Spanish Symphony." As in the concerto for violoncello that Mr. Casals and Dr. Muck played, the listener wonders more than once at what seems the superfluous force, vigor and largeness of many of the purely orchestral passages, contrasts and climaxes; whereas through all the music the violin part runs like a fine bright thread, moving in gentle curves and undulations, beating to light rhythms, lustrous with delicate tonal colors, warm with song, piquant always yet felicitously fashioned for the bow. The finesse and the fancy, the sophisticated discretion of it charmed the ear in the gentle or piquant perfections of Mr. Noack's playing. And then the orchestra answered as though Lalo would say, "I, too, am a man of force." Elsewhere in his music he has given proof enough of that.

H. T. P.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date APR 14 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ENDS 34TH SEASON HERE

Sixth Concert of Series Featured by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Dr. Muck Conducting. Florence Hinkle Soloist.—Audience Applauds Generously.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its 34th season of concerts in this city to a close last evening in Infantry Hall with its sixth and last concert of the present series, at which the soloist was Miss Florence Hinkle, who was also the soloist at the last concert last year.

The programmme was singularly gay and lively for one of its length, and aptly chosen for the spring season; and from the first bright notes of the symphony to the close of the overture, seemed to meet with favor from the audience, which though smaller in size, was as enthusiastic as at earlier concerts of the season.

In the order of its performance the programmme was as follows:

Beethoven....Symphony No. 8, F-major, Op. 93
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Mozart.........Aria, "Voi, che sapete," from ...."Le Nozze di Figaro"
Bach..Suite No. 2, in B-minor, for Flute and .... Strings
(Hans von Buelow's Arrangement.)
I. Overture: Largo; Allegro.
II. Rondo: Allegretto espressivo.
III. Sarabande: Andante.
IV. Bourree I. and Bourree II.: Allegro molto.
V. Polonaise with Double: Moderato.
VI. Minuet.
VII. Badjnerie: Presto.
Solo Flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre.
Bruch..."Ave Maria," from "The Cross of Fire," ....A Dramatic Cantata, Op. 52
Goldmark......Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13

Of the nine symphonies of Beethoven the last two have been less often heard here than those which antedate them, and the eighth, given last evening, although performed here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra but a little over two years ago, had previously hardly been recorded among such productions.

Written by Beethoven at a sad period of his life, when out of health and embroiled in a family quarrel, the eighth symphony gives no hint of anything depressing, but is cheerful, bright and apparently full of humor. The composer's ability to rise above distressing details, which was shown in his serene fourth symphony, is again manifested in the eighth, which was given last evening in all its beauty under the skilful leadership of Dr. Muck. Gayly the first movement began and pursued its way like the jocular companionship of kindred spirits, to which was contrasted the more delicate second movement, which was played to perfection, as the wind instruments "ticked" a background for the delicate tracery of the strings.

With these the "tempo di Menuetto" taken at an ordinary pace, embellished by the beautiful "dialogue" for clarinet and horns, and the final loud and lively movement, combined to show again the skill in composition, and the wonderful working out of themes which have made these symphonies immortal. Beethoven called this symphony the "little" symphony, but in its way it is as impressive and as perfect as those which are more majestic and better known. In the hands of such performers as the Boston orchestra, directed by a master mind, it was a performance worthy of attention.

The Bach suite for flute and strings, the second orchestral number, with its old-time dance measures of various forms, was an agreeable continuation of the motive of cheer, admirably played by soloist and such of the orchestra as played the "sinfu', wee fiddles" or their deeper-toned brethren. Mr. Maquarre evolved from his instrument a beautiful tone, remarkably sustained, dominated by an intelligence and taste that made his performance an addition of unique quality to the list of the solos already contributed by members of the orchestra from time to time. In its rhythms the music had a flavor of the past, but in its interpretation it was of the sort that made it a welcome addition to a modern programme.

The last number on the programme, the Goldmark overture to "Sakuntala," was that which established the fame of the composer, who lived to see the opening of this year. It was played with a spirit that made it a fitting finale to a season of concerts that has maintained the standard of the orchestra.

Of the work of Miss Hinkle, one can speak only with praise, the purity of her voice, the beauty of its tone, the sincerity of her method have all been manifested at her previous appearances here; and the friends she made at the two concerts of the University Glee Club, at which she sang before singing with the Symphony Orchestra last year, as well as on that occasion, welcomed her back last evening, recalling her again and again after each appearance.

The Canzona was given with much charm, and the more serious "Ave Maria" with the depth of feeling it commanded.

While it is a matter of regret that the season has come to an end, it is with satisfaction that the announcement is made of six concerts to be given next season if all goes well. According to established custom they will be given on Tuesday evenings for which the dates have been set at Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11. A. W. C.

MME. MELBA HEADS LIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

Six Concerts Already Arranged for Next Season in Providence.

Mme. Melba will be the soloist at the first of the six concerts already arranged to be given in Providence by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. The concerts, as in recent years, will be given on Tuesday evenings and the following dates have been selected: Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, 1915; Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11, 1916.

As soloists, the management has been successful in engaging for this series of concerts artists of extraordinary high quality. In addition to Mme. Melba, who will sing on Oct. 19, prior to starting an extensive tour of America under the direction of C. A. Ellis of Boston, the American contralto, Mme. Louise Homer, who has long been a favorite in this city, has been secured.

For pianists, the orchestra offers Ernest Schelling and Miss Laeta Hartley, both Americans. Mr. Schelling, a pupil of the great Paderewski, has long been recognized as a pianist of highest quality. Miss Hartley is one of the younger pianists who had successful debuts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season.

The other two soloists will be drawn from the ranks of the orchestra and Providence concert lovers will have the first opportunity of hearing them. One is Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, and the other is Josef Malkin, who shares the 'cello honors with Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Malkin joined the orchestra last fall. He has long been regarded as one of the great 'cello virtuosos of Europe.

To-day the subscribers of this year's series of concerts will receive notices, informing them that to retain their seats, they must notify the Boston office of the orchestra on or before June 1.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date APR 10 1915

Boston Stirred by Liszt.

THE great array of facts printed in this column last week under the head of "Triumphant Liszt" made an amusing commentary on the amazing assertion of a prominent local critic that the "real musical public" does not like Liszt. The fact that his "Dante," when played by the Philharmonic, got more voluminous and prolonged applause than any other orchestral work played by any orchestra in New York this season proves nothing, for the Philharmonic, of course, is not heard by the "real musical public." The "real musical public," in the opinion of the same writer, is that which hears the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—or rather, was that which hears the Boston orchestra's concerts; for after what has occurred during the present season, this audience can no longer, alas! claim any such distinction. Read what happened in the Hub.

Last January Dr. Muck made a sensation by his performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. So great was the enthusiasm over the two performances of it that he promptly decided to give two more later in the season. He did so last week, and here is what happened. Under the heading "Liszt's 'Faust' Makes Records," the Boston Journal of April 3 proclaimed the following:

> Liszt's "Faust" symphony, featured for the second time this season on Dr. Muck's programmes, drew the biggest crowd of the Symphony season yesterday afternoon, and capped this record by arousing the biggest outburst of enthusiasm witnessed at a Symphony concert for a long, long time.
>
> Hundreds of enthusiasts couldn't get into the hall at all. There has been nothing like this intense interest over a symphony in Boston in recent years, except at one or two special performances of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The "Faust" symphony is gradually forcing its way into recognition as the most impressive musical translation of Goethe's drama. It is wonderfully rich, both in lyrical and dramatic qualities.

Philip Hale wrote in the Herald that "It is enough to say that the music seemed even more poetic, dramatic, imaginative, imposing." He then pays his compliments to those who are not with the musical public in its enthusiasm over Liszt:

> It is the fashion for some to admit the genius of Liszt in shaping the symphonic poem, in enlarging the scope of the symphony; to admit, though grudgingly, his influence on contemporaries and followers even to this day; but they deny his creative power, as there are some who find no "ideas" in the music of Berlioz, no skill in thematic treatment, only an unusual sense of orchestral color, and an inexplicable ability in orchestration. Argument is out of the question with these men. They have ears and they do not hear; they will not hear; Berlioz and Liszt are not thus to be idly dismissed. It is not possible to think of modern music without invoking their glorious names and remembering their music. It is pleasant to think that in this city they have long been ranked among the immortals. . . . The performance of the "Faust" symphony yesterday should have turned the most prejudiced, the most "conservative" from the error of his ways.

"Once and again, between many lapses, Boston does vindicate itself as a capital of music," wrote H. T. Parker, of the Transcript, in his account of this Liszt performance, which the audience heard "raptly," impressed by "the beauty, the power, and the diversity of Liszt's voice." His "Faust" is "not merely the crown of romantic symphonic music; it is the one translation into tones of Goethe's poem that may stand unabashed and undiminished beside it."

"Music of the future it not only was, but is," exclaimed Olin Downes, in the Post; adding: "Lo and behold! Symphony Hall could not yesterday and cannot to-night contain the people who want to hear music that was the very crown of madness in the 40's—the 'Faust' symphony." To Louis C. Elson, of the Advertiser, "the final climaxes of orchestra and chorus were the grandest we have ever heard." And he shared the "wild enthusiasm" of the audience. The "wild enthusiasm" of a Boston Symphony audience over Liszt! Alack and alas!—that leaves the New York critic referred to as the sole and solitary survivor of the "real musical public"!

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date APR 13 1915

That the Philharmonic Society should have ended its seventy-third season with earnings increased by several thousands of dollars, and much enlarged attendance at its concerts, is peculiarly gratifying because of the financial stringency of the past winter. It signifies that, despite the war and the demands of innumerable charities, New Yorkers are awakening to the fact that this orchestra has progressed amazingly under Mr. Stransky's leadership, and that his conducting is remarkably virile, brilliant, and inspiring. If this progress continues, it will only be a short time before the Philharmonic's seats are as much in demand as those at the Boston Symphony Concerts. With all respect to that organization, the Philharmonic is not behind it in musical ability, and in th matter of programmes it is far ahea of its Boston rival. But the Philha monic has not yet received the popu lar support which it deserves. Its de cits are large, and there are still to many empty seats. The membershi of the Society, in particular, should b further increased. There are certainl 2,000 people in New York willing t pay $10 a year to support this magni cent institution, of which the city ha every reason to be proud. But peop do not seem to understand that no o chestra can be self-supporting; that there must be additional subscriptions. If the public fully realized the extraordinary artistic development of the orchestra, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the means it needs. If it improves another year as it has during the past it will be superior to any in the

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 11 1915

MUSICAL MENTION

With the passing of Easter and its precedence over all things else in the musical realm the concert season again resumes its sway.

For the coming week music lovers will have the satisfaction of listening to another concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last in the series of six, and for the near future a second Steinert Concert, with John McCormack, as the chief attraction, is of interest to musical people throughout this city and State.

Beethoven's bright and joyous eighth symphony, Bach's quaint old world suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's glowingly Oriental "Sakuntala" overture will be the orchestral numbers on the programme of the sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, April 13.

The programme is light and melodious and appropriate to the season. Beethoven's "little symphony in F," one of the indubitable masterpieces of all times, shows the composer in a really genial, even playful mood, and is filled with the joy of living Bach's suite for flute and strings in which the solo part will be played by Mr. Andre Maquarre, the admirable flutist of the orchestra, is full of old world charm in melody and rhythm, while Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture is gorgeously Oriental in its color and feeling.

As already announced, the soloist will be Miss Florence Hinkle, that most delightful American singer who was soloist with the orchestra here with such success a year ago. She will sing twice. Her first number will be Cherubino's Canzona 'Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and her second will be the "Ava Maria," from Max Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire," which is founded on an episode of Scott's poem, "The Lady of the Lake."

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Symphony No. 8, in F-Major, Beethoven; Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Suite in B-Minor for flute and string orchestra, Bach, Mr. Andre debate. ... obvious expediency, is to agree to disa... other amendments and submit the revenue ... by common or unanimous consent. In short, ... done the only thing that seems possible at ... session to do.

---

CAN SUCH THINGS BE?

Boston audiences at Symphony hall are rep to have thrown all classical restraint aside a have given full vent to "wild enthusiasm." I on certain occasions were struggling for a c to gain admission into the famous hall, hundred to be turned away, and only Hub culture prev serious riotings and calls for police and firemen.

And what were these historic occasions? Conductor Muck was giving Liszt's "Faust" phony and giving it in an ultra-romantic and tense" manner. The auditors were stirred to depths and the final climaxes threw them delirious joy. Caruso never witnessed greater ment among the gallery gods.

This recalls an event in Symphony hall som seasons ago. The program was severely class Haydn, Beethoven, Bach. Dr. Muck was p scholarly, austere, and solemn. The audienc trayed not a sign of pleasure or interest. It plause was perfunctory and dignified. An ou would have said it was bored and listless, native would have frowned at such barbarism lack of understanding. To hear of rapture, thu of applause, shouting, and wild enthusiasm a Hub, and apropos, too, of Liszt, the irregula often formless Liszt, is to rub one's eyes in a ment. Here in Chicago the "Faust" sympho seldom dusted and produced; it is enjoyed, never provoked much excitement. But perha have yet to hear it played in an ultra-romantic to discover its power and richness. Dr. Muck visit us in the fall. Will he give us the "F symphony? A comparative study of Hub and ern enthusiasm over Liszt rediscovered should to the curiosity of Boston musicians and critic

---

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

For the last concert of the season t be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesda evening at 8:15 o'clock, the programm which has been arranged by Dr. Muc is appropriate to the season of sprin containing a series of bright and joyou numbers, which present no problems modern harmony and dissonance for th public to attempt to solve.

The symphony with which the conce opens will be Beethoven's "Little Sym phony in F," the Eighth, which sho the composer in a genial, almost playf mood. Although the eighth sympho was called by its composer "The Litt Symphony in F," chiefly because it shorter than the Sixth or Big Symphon in F, with its melodious charm it wou have been sufficient to immortalize a composer, and while it lacks the seriou ness and tragedy to be found in mo of the other eight symphonies, its sere beauty has made it one of the mo popular works in symphonic literature.

In the second part of the programme, t orchestra will play Bach's suite for flu and string orchestra and Goldmark "Sakuntala" overture. The Bach su in which the solo flute will be played Andre Maquarre, the admirable flutist the orchestra, is like other works of kind and of its day, a series of old-ti dances, a form of composition on wh the entire formal structure of orchest music is founded. This suite consists seven movements; an Overture, a Ron a Sarabande, a Bouroe, a Polonaise, Double and a Badiniere.

The closing number will be Goldmar "Sakuntala" Overture, which is unque tionably the greatest orchestral w which came from this prolific compos It is based on the old Hindu play of t same name, and is like the rest of Go mark's music, filled with the flowing c of the Orient.

Miss Florence Hinkle, the admirable prano, who will be the soloist, will s as her first number Cherubino's Canzo "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage Figaro," and the "Ave Maria" fr Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire."

The programme in its proper order as follows: Symphony No. 8, in F-maj Beethoven; aria, "Voi che sapete," fr "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; su in B-minor for flute and string orchest Bach, Mr. Andre Maquarre, solo flu "Ave Maria," from the cantata, "T Cross of Fire," Bruch, Miss Floren Hinkle; overture, "Sakuntala," Go mark.

Miss Florence Hinkle

From BULLETIN

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ENDS 34TH SEASON HERE

Sixth Concert of Series Featured by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Dr. Muck Conducting. Florence Hinkle Soloist.—Audience Applauds Generously.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its 34th season of concerts in this city to a close last evening in Infantry Hall with its sixth and last concert of the present series, at which the soloist was Miss Florence Hinkle, who was also the soloist at the last concert last year.

The programmme was singularly gay and lively for one of its length, and aptly chosen for the spring season; and from the first bright notes of the symphony to the close of the overture, seemed to meet with favor from the audience, which though smaller in size, was as enthusiastic as at earlier concerts of the season.

In the order of its performance the programmme was as follows:

Beethoven....Symphony No. 8, F-major, Op. 93
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Mozart..........Aria, "Voi, che sapete," from ...."Le Nozze di Figaro"
Bach..Suite No. 2, in B-minor, for Flute and .... Strings
(Hans von Buelow's Arrangement.)
I. Overture: Largo; Allegro.
II. Rondo: Allegretto espressivo.
III. Sarabande: Andante.
IV. Bourree I. and Bourree II.: Allegro molto.
V. Polonaise with Double: Moderato.
VI. Minuet.
VII. Badinerie: Presto.
Solo Flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre.
Bruch.."Ave Maria," from "The Cross of Fire," ....A Dramatic Cantata, Op. 52
Goldmark......Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13

Of the nine symphonies of Beethoven the last two have been less often heard here than those which antedate them, and the eighth, given last evening, although performed here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra but a little over two years ago, had previously hardly been recorded among such productions.

Written by Beethoven at a sad period of his life, when out of health and embroiled in a family quarrel, the eighth symphony gives no hint of anything depressing, but is cheerful, bright and apparently full of humor. The composer's ability to rise above distressing details, which was shown in his serene fourth symphony, is again manifested in the eighth, which was given last evening in all its beauty under the skilful leadership of Dr. Muck. Gayly the first movement began and pursued its way like the jocular companionship of kindred spirits, to which was contrasted the more delicate second movement, which was played to perfection, as the wind instruments "ticked" a background for the delicate tracery of the strings.

With these the "tempo di Menuetto" taken at an ordinary pace, embellished by the beautiful "dialogue" for clarinet and horns, and the final loud and lively movement, combined to show again the skill in composition, and the wonderful working out of themes which have made these symphonies immortal. Beethoven called this symphony the "little" symphony, but in its way it is as impressive and as perfect as those which are more majestic and better known. In the hands of such performers as the Boston orchestra, directed by a master mind, it was a performance worthy of attention.

The Bach suite for flute and strings, the second orchestral number, with its old-time dance measures of various forms, was an agreeable continuation of the motive of cheer, admirably played by soloist and such of the orchestra as played the "sinfu', wee fiddles" or their deeper-toned brethren. Mr. Maquarre evolved from his instrument a beautiful tone, remarkably sustained, dominated by an intelligence and taste that made his performance an addition of unique quality to the list of the solos already contributed by members of the orchestra from time to time. In its rhythms the music had a flavor of the past, but in its interpretation it was of the sort that made it a welcome addition to a modern programme.

The last number on the programme, the Goldmark overture to "Sakuntala," was that which established the fame of the composer, who lived to see the opening of this year. It was played with a spirit that made it a fitting finale to a season of concerts that has maintained the standard of the orchestra.

Of the work of Miss Hinkle, one can speak only with praise, the purity of her voice, the beauty of its tone, the sincerity of her method have all been manifested at her previous appearances here; and the friends she made at the two concerts of the University Glee Club, at which she sang before singing with the Symphony Orchestra last year, as well as on that occasion, welcomed her back last evening, recalling her again and again after each appearance.

The Canzona was given with much charm, and the more serious "Ave Maria" with the depth of feeling it commanded.

While it is a matter of regret that the season has come to an end, it is with satisfaction that the announcement is made of six concerts to be given next season if all goes well. According to established custom they will be given on Tuesday evenings for which the dates have been set at Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11. A. W. C.

MME. MELBA HEADS LIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

Six Concerts Already Arranged for Next Season in Providence.

Mme. Melba will be the soloist at the first of the six concerts already arranged to be given in Providence by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. The concerts, as in recent years, will be given on Tuesday evenings and the following dates have been selected: Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, 1915; Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11, 1916.

As soloists, the management has been successful in engaging for this series of concerts artists of extraordinary high quality. In addition to Mme. Melba, who will sing on Oct. 19, prior to starting an extensive tour of America under the direction of C. A. Ellis of Boston, the American contralto, Mme. Louise Homer, who has long been a favorite in this city, has been secured.

For pianists, the orchestra offers Ernest Schelling and Miss Laeta Hartley, both Americans. Mr. Schelling, a pupil of the great Paderewski, has long been recognized as a pianist of highest quality. Miss Hartley is one of the younger pianists who had successful debuts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season.

The other two soloists will be drawn from the ranks of the orchestra and Providence concert lovers will have the first opportunity of hearing them. One is Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, and the other is Josef Malkin, who shares the 'cello honors with Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Malkin joined the orchestra last fall. He has long been regarded as one of the great 'cello virtuosos of Europe.

To-day the subscribers of this year's series of concerts will receive notices, informing them that to retain their seats, they must notify the Boston office of the orchestra on or before June 1.

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date APR

Boston Stirred by Liszt.

THE great array of facts printed in this column last week under the head of "Triumphant Liszt" made an amusing commentary on the amazing assertion of a prominent local critic that the "real musical public" does not like Liszt. The fact that his "Dante," when played by the Philharmonic, got more voluminous and prolonged applause than any other orchestral work played by any orchestra in New York this season proves nothing, for the Philharmonic, of course, is not heard by the "real musical public." The "real musical public," in the opinion of the same writer, is that which hears the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—or rather, was that which hears the Boston orchestra's concerts; for after what has occurred during the present season, this audience can no longer, alas! claim any such distinction. Read what happened in the Hub.

Last January Dr. Muck made a sensation by his performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. So great was the enthusiasm over the two performances of it that he promptly decided to give two more later in the season. He did so last week, and here is what happened. Under the heading "Liszt's 'Faust' Makes Records," the Boston Journal of April 3 proclaimed the following:

> Liszt's "Faust" symphony, featured for the second time this season on Dr. Muck's programmes, drew the biggest crowd of the Symphony season yesterday afternoon, and capped this record by arousing the biggest outburst of enthusiasm witnessed at a Symphony concert for a long, long time.
>
> Hundreds of enthusiasts couldn't get into the hall at all. There has been nothing like this intense interest over a symphony in Boston in recent years, except at one or two special performances of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The "Faust" symphony is gradually forcing its way into recognition as the most impressive musical translation of Goethe's drama. It is wonderfully rich, both in lyrical and dramatic qualities.

Philip Hale wrote in the Herald that "It is enough to say that the music seemed even more poetic, dramatic, imaginative, imposing." He then pays his compliments to those who are not with the musical public in its enthusiasm over Liszt:

> It is the fashion for some to admit the genius of Liszt in shaping the symphonic poem, in enlarging the scope of the symphony; to admit, though grudgingly, his influence on contemporaries and followers even to this day; but they deny his creative power, as there are some who find no "ideas" in the music of Berlioz, no skill in thematic treatment, only an unusual sense of orchestral color, and an inexplicable ability in orchestration. Argument is out of the question with these men. They have ears and they do not hear; they will not hear; Berlioz and Liszt are not thus to be idly dismissed. It is not possible to think of modern music without invoking their glorious names and remembering their music. It is pleasant to think that in this city they have long been ranked among the immortals. . . . The performance of the "Faust" symphony yesterday should have turned the most prejudiced, the most "conservative" from the error of his ways.

"Once and again, between many lapses, Boston does vindicate itself as a capital of music," wrote H. T. Parker, of the Transcript, in his account of this Liszt performance, which the audience heard "raptly," impressed by "the beauty, the power, and the diversity of Liszt's voice." His "Faust" is "not merely the crown of romantic symphonic music; it is the one translation into tones of Goethe's poem that may stand unabashed and undiminished beside it."

"Music of the future it not only was, but is," exclaimed Olin Downes, in the Post; adding: "Lo and behold! Symphony Hall could not yesterday and cannot to-night contain the people who want to hear music that was the very crown of madness in the 40's—the 'Faust' symphony." To Louis C. Elson, of the Advertiser, "the final climaxes of orchestra and chorus were the grandest we have ever heard." And he shared the "wild enthusiasm" of the audience. The "wild enthusiasm" of a Boston Symphony audience over Liszt! Alack and alas!—that leaves the New York critic referred to as the sole and solitary survivor of the "real musical public"!

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date

That the Philharmonic Society should have ended its seventy-third season with earnings increased by several thousands of dollars, and much enlarged attendance at its concerts, is peculiarly gratifying because of the financial stringency of the past winter. It signifies that, despite the war and the demands of innumerable charities, New Yorkers are awakening to the fact that this orchestra has progressed amazingly under Mr. Stransky's leadership, and that his conducting is remarkably virile, brilliant, and inspiring. If this progress continues, it will only be a short time before the Philharmonic's seats are as much in demand as those at the Boston Symphony Concerts. With all respect to that organization, the Philharmonic is not behind it in musical ability, and in the matter of programmes it is far ahead of its Boston rival. But the Philharmonic has not yet received the popular support which it deserves. Its deficits are large, and there are still too many empty seats. The membership of the Society, in particular, should be further increased. There are certainly 2,000 people in New York willing to pay $10 a year to support this magnificent institution, of which the city has every reason to be proud. But people do not seem to understand that no orchestra can be self-supporting; that there must be additional subscriptions. If the public fully realized the extraordinary artistic development of the orchestra, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the means it needs. If it improves another year as it has during the past it will be superior to any in the

---

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date APR 11 1915

MUSICAL MENTION

With the passing of Easter and its precedence over all things else in the musical realm the concert season again resumes its sway.

For the coming week music lovers will have the satisfaction of listening to another concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last in the series of six, and for the near future a second Steinert Concert, with John McCormack, as the chief attraction, is of interest to musical people throughout this city and State.

Beethoven's bright and joyous eighth symphony, Bach's quaint old world suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's glowingly Oriental "Sakuntala" overture will be the orchestral numbers on the programme of the sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, April 13.

The programme is light and melodious and appropriate to the season. Beethoven's "little symphony in F," one of the indubitable masterpieces of all times, shows the composer in a really genial, even playful mood, and is filled with the joy of living Bach's suite for flute and strings in which the solo part will be played by Mr. Andre Maquarre, the admirable flutist of the orchestra, is full of old world charm in melody and rhythm, while Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture is gorgeously Oriental in its color and feeling.

As already announced, the soloist will be Miss Florence Hinkle, that most delightful American singer who was soloist with the orchestra here with such success a year ago. She will sing twice. Her first number will be Cherubino's Canzona 'Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and her second will be the "Ava Maria," from Max Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire," which is founded on an episode of Scott's poem, "The Lady of the Lake."

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Symphony No. 8, in F-Major, Beethoven; Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Suite in B-Minor for flute and string orchestra, Bach, Mr. Andre

---

[illegible] has passed beyond the region of debate. The [illegible] of common sense, or the most obvious expediency, is to agree to disagree on all other amendments and submit the revenue proposal by common or unanimous consent—in short, to get done the only thing that seems possible at this session to do.

CAN SUCH THINGS BE?

Boston audiences at Symphony hall are reported to have thrown all classical restraint aside and to have given full vent to "wild enthusiasm." People on certain occasions were struggling for a chance to gain admission into the famous hall, hundreds had to be turned away, and only Hub culture prevented serious riotings and calls for police and firemen.

And what were these historic occasions? Why, Conductor Muck was giving Liszt's "Faust" symphony and giving it in an ultra-romantic and "intense" manner. The auditors were stirred to their depths and the final climaxes threw them into delirious joy. Caruso never witnessed greater excitement among the gallery gods.

This recalls an event in Symphony hall some two seasons ago. The program was severely classical—Haydn, Beethoven, Bach. Dr. Muck was precise, scholarly, austere, and solemn. The audience betrayed not a sign of pleasure or interest. Its applause was perfunctory and dignified. An outsider would have said it was bored and listless, but a native would have frowned at such barbarism and lack of understanding. To hear of rapture, thunders of applause, shouting, and wild enthusiasm at the Hub, and apropos, too, of Liszt, the irregular and often formless Liszt, is to rub one's eyes in amazement. Here in Chicago the "Faust" symphony is seldom dusted and produced; it is enjoyed, but it never provoked much excitement. But perhaps we have yet to hear it played in an ultra-romantic style to discover its power and richness. Dr. Muck is to visit us in the fall. Will he give us the "Faust" symphony? A comparative study of Hub and western enthusiasm over Liszt rediscovered should appeal to the curiosity of Boston musicians and critics.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

For the last concert of the season to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock, the programme which has been arranged by Dr. Muck is appropriate to the season of spring, containing a series of bright and joyous numbers, which present no problems in modern harmony and dissonance for the public to attempt to solve.

The symphony with which the concert opens will be Beethoven's "Little Symphony in F," the Eighth, which shows the composer in a genial, almost playful mood. Although the eighth symphony was called by its composer "The Little Symphony in F," chiefly because it is shorter than the Sixth or Big Symphony in F, with its melodious charm it would have been sufficient to immortalize any composer, and while it lacks the seriousness and tragedy to be found in most of the other eight symphonies, its serene beauty has made it one of the most popular works in symphonic literature.

In the second part of the programme, the orchestra will play Bach's suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. The Bach suite in which the solo flute will be played by Andre Maquarre, the admirable flutist of the orchestra, is like other works of its kind and of its day, a series of old-time dances, a form of composition on which the entire formal structure of orchestral music is founded. This suite consists of seven movements; an Overture, a Rondo, a Sarabande, a Bouroe, a Polonaise, a Double and a Badiniere.

The closing number will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture, which is unquestionably the greatest orchestral work which came from this prolific composer. It is based on the old Hindu play of the same name, and is like the rest of Goldmark's music, filled with the flowing color of the Orient.

Miss Florence Hinkle, the admirable soprano, who will be the soloist, will sing as her first number Cherubino's Canzona "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Ave Maria" from Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire."

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Symphony No. 8, in F-major, Beethoven; aria, "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra, Bach, Mr. Andre Maquarre, solo flute; "Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire," Bruch, Miss Florence Hinkle; overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark.

* * *

Miss Florence Hinkle

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date PR 14 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ENDS 34TH SEASON HERE

Sixth Concert of Series Featured by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Dr. Muck Conducting. Florence Hinkle Soloist.—Audience Applauds Generously.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its 34th season of concerts in this city to a close last evening in Infantry Hall with its sixth and last concert of the present series, at which the soloist was Miss Florence Hinkle, who was also the soloist at the last concert last year.

The programmme was singularly gay and lively for one of its length, and aptly chosen for the spring season; and from the first bright notes of the symphony to the close of the overture, seemed to meet with favor from the audience, which though smaller in size, was as enthusiastic as at earlier concerts of the season.

In the order of its performance the programmme was as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 8, F-major, Op. 93
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Mozart..........Aria, "Voi, che sapete," from "Le Nozze di Figaro"
Bach..Suite No. 2, in B-minor, for Flute and Strings
(Hans von Buelow's Arrangement.)
I. Overture: Largo; Allegro.
II. Rondo: Allegretto espressivo.
III. Sarabande: Andante.
IV. Bourree I. and Bourree II.: Allegro molto.
V. Polonaise with Double: Moderato.
VI. Minuet.
VII. Badinerie: Presto.
Solo Flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre.
Bruch..."Ave Maria," from "The Cross of Fire," A Dramatic Cantata, Op. 52
Goldmark......Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13

Of the nine symphonies of Beethoven the last two have been less often heard here than those which antedate them, and the eighth, given last evening, although performed here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra but a little over two years ago, had previously hardly been recorded among such productions.

Written by Beethoven at a sad period of his life, when out of health and embroiled in a family quarrel, the eighth symphony gives no hint of anything depressing, but is cheerful, bright and apparently full of humor. The composer's ability to rise above distressing details, which was shown in his serene fourth symphony, is again manifested in the eighth, which was given last evening in all its beauty under the skilful leadership of Dr. Muck. Gayly the first movement began and pursued its way like the jocular companionship of kindred spirits, to which was contrasted the more delicate second movement, which was played to perfection, as the wind instruments "ticked" a background for the delicate tracery of the strings.

With these the "tempo di Menuetto" taken at an ordinary pace, embellished by the beautiful "dialogue" for clarinet and horns, and the final loud and lively movement, combined to show again the skill in composition, and the wonderful working out of themes which have made these symphonies immortal. Beethoven called this symphony the "little" symphony, but in its way it is as impressive and as perfect as those which are more majestic and better known. In the hands of such performers as the Boston orchestra, directed by a master mind, it was a performance worthy of attention.

The Bach suite for flute and strings, the second orchestral number, with its old-time dance measures of various forms, was an agreeable continuation of the motive of cheer, admirably played by soloist and such of the orchestra as played the "sinfu', wee fiddles" or their deeper-toned brethren. Mr. Maquarre evolved from his instrument a beautiful tone, remarkably sustained, dominated by an intelligence and taste that made his performance an addition of unique quality to the list of the solos already contributed by members of the orchestra from time to time. In its rhythms the music had a flavor of the past, but in its interpretation it was of the sort that made it a welcome addition to a modern programme.

The last number on the programme, the Goldmark overture to "Sakuntala," was that which established the fame of the composer, who lived to see the opening of this year. It was played with a spirit that made it a fitting finale to a season of concerts that has maintained the standard of the orchestra.

Of the work of Miss Hinkle, one can speak only with praise, the purity of her voice, the beauty of its tone, the sincerity of her method have all been manifested at her previous appearances here; and the friends she made at the two concerts of the University Glee Club, at which she sang before singing with the Symphony Orchestra last year, as well as on that occasion, welcomed her back last evening, recalling her again and again after each appearance.

The Canzona was given with much charm, and the more serious "Ave Maria" with the depth of feeling it commanded.

While it is a matter of regret that the season has come to an end, it is with satisfaction that the announcement is made of six concerts to be given next season if all goes well. According to established custom they will be given on Tuesday evenings for which the dates have been set at Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11. A. W. C.

MME. MELBA HEADS LIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

Six Concerts Already Arranged for Next Season in Providence.

Mme. Melba will be the soloist at the first of the six concerts already arranged to be given in Providence by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. The concerts, as in recent years, will be given on Tuesday evenings and the following dates have been selected: Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, 1915; Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11, 1916.

As soloists, the management has been successful in engaging for this series of concerts artists of extraordinary high quality. In addition to Mme. Melba, who will sing on Oct. 19, prior to starting an extensive tour of America under the direction of C. A. Ellis of Boston, the American contralto, Mme. Louise Homer, who has long been a favorite in this city, has been secured.

For pianists, the orchestra offers Ernest Schelling and Miss Laeta Hartley, both Americans. Mr. Schelling, a pupil of the great Paderewski, has long been recognized as a pianist of highest quality. Miss Hartley is one of the younger pianists who had successful debuts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season.

The other two soloists will be drawn from the ranks of the orchestra and Providence concert lovers will have the first opportunity of hearing them. One is Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, and the other is Josef Malkin, who shares the 'cello honors with Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Malkin joined the orchestra last fall. He has long been regarded as one of the great 'cello virtuosos of Europe.

To-day the subscribers of this year's series of concerts will receive notices, informing them that to retain their seats, they must notify the Boston office of the orchestra on or before June 1.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date APR 10 1915

Boston Stirred by Liszt.

THE great array of facts printed in this column last week under the head of "Triumphant Liszt" made an amusing commentary on the amazing assertion of a prominent local critic that the "real musical public" does not like Liszt. The fact that his "Dante," when played by the Philharmonic, got more voluminous and prolonged applause than any other orchestral work played by any orchestra in New York this season proves nothing, for the Philharmonic, of course, is not heard by the "real musical public." The "real musical public," in the opinion of the same writer, is that which hears the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—or rather, was that which hears the Boston orchestra's concerts; for after what has occurred during the present season, this audience can no longer, alas! claim any such distinction. Read what happened in the Hub.

Last January Dr. Muck made a sensation by his performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. So great was the enthusiasm over the two performances of it that he promptly decided to give two more later in the season. He did so last week, and here is what happened. Under the heading "Liszt's 'Faust' Makes Records," the Boston Journal of April 3 proclaimed the following:

> Liszt's "Faust" symphony, featured for the second time this season on Dr. Muck's programmes, drew the biggest crowd of the Symphony season yesterday afternoon, and capped this record by arousing the biggest outburst of enthusiasm witnessed at a Symphony concert for a long, long time.
>
> Hundreds of enthusiasts couldn't get into the hall at all. There has been nothing like this intense interest over a symphony in Boston in recent years, except at one or two special performances of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The "Faust" symphony is gradually forcing its way into recognition as the most impressive musical translation of Goethe's drama. It is wonderfully rich, both in lyrical and dramatic qualities.

Philip Hale wrote in the Herald that "It is enough to say that the music seemed even more poetic, dramatic, imaginative, imposing." He then pays his compliments to those who are not with the musical public in its enthusiasm over Liszt:

> It is the fashion for some to admit the genius of Liszt in shaping the symphonic poem, in enlarging the scope of the symphony; to admit, though grudgingly, his influence on contemporaries and followers even to this day; but they deny his creative power, as there are some who find no "ideas" in the music of Berlioz, no skill in thematic treatment, only an unusual sense of orchestral color, and an inexplicable ability in orchestration. Argument is out of the question with these men. They have ears and they do not hear; they will not hear; Berlioz and Liszt are not thus to be idly dismissed. It is not possible to think of modern music without invoking their glorious names and remembering their music. It is pleasant to think that in this city they have long been ranked among the immortals. . . . The performance of the "Faust" symphony yesterday should have turned the most prejudiced, the most "conservative" from the error of his ways.

"Once and again, between many lapses, Boston does vindicate itself as a capital of music," wrote H. T. Parker, of the Transcript, in his account of this Liszt performance, which the audience heard "raptly," impressed by "the beauty, the power, and the diversity of Liszt's voice." His "Faust" is "not merely the crown of romantic symphonic music; it is the translation into tones of Goethe's poem that may stand unabashed and undiminished beside it."

"Music of the future it not only was, but is," exclaimed Olin Downes, in the Post; adding: "Lo and behold! Symphony Hall could not yesterday and cannot to-night contain the people who want to hear music that was the very crown of madness in the 40's—the 'Faust' symphony." To Louis C. Elson, of the Advertiser, "the final climaxes of orchestra and chorus were the grandest we have ever heard." And he shared the "wild enthusiasm" of the audience. The "wild enthusiasm" of a Boston Symphony audience over Liszt! Alack and alas!—that leaves the New York critic referred to as the sole and solitary survivor of the "real musical public"!

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date 13 1915

That the Philharmonic Society should have ended its seventy-third season with earnings increased by several thousands of dollars, and much enlarged attendance at its concerts, is peculiarly gratifying because of the financial stringency of the past winter. It signifies that, despite the war and the demands of innumerable charities, New Yorkers are awakening to the fact that this orchestra has progressed amazingly under Mr. Stransky's leadership, and that his conducting is remarkably virile, brilliant, and inspiring. If this progress continues, it will only be a short time before the Philharmonic's seats are as much in demand as those at the Boston Symphony Concerts. With all respect to that organization, the Philharmonic is not behind it in musical ability, and in the matter of programmes it is far ahead of its Boston rival. But the Philharmonic has not yet received the popular support which it deserves. Its deficits are large, and there are still too many empty seats. The membership of the Society, in particular, should be further increased. There are certainly 2,000 people in New York willing to pay $10 a year to support this magnificent institution, of which the city has every reason to be proud. But people do not seem to understand that no orchestra can be self-supporting; that there must be additional subscriptions. If the public fully realized the extraordinary artistic development of the orchestra, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the means it needs. If it improves another year as it has during the past it will be superior to any in the

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 11 1915

MUSICAL MENTION

With the passing of Easter and its precedence over all things else in the musical realm the concert season again resumes its sway.

For the coming week music lovers will have the satisfaction of listening to another concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last in the series of six, and for the near future a second Steinert Concert, with John McCormack, as the chief attraction, is of interest to musical people throughout this city and State.

Beethoven's bright and joyous eighth symphony, Bach's quaint old world suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's glowingly Oriental "Sakuntala" overture will be the orchestral numbers on the programme of the sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, April 13.

The programme is light and melodious and appropriate to the season. Beethoven's "little symphony in F," one of the indubitable masterpieces of all times, shows the composer in a really genial, even playful mood, and is filled with the joy of living Bach's suite for flute and strings in which the solo part will be played by Mr. Andre Maquarre, the admirable flutist of the orchestra, is full of old world charm in melody and rhythm, while Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture is gorgeously Oriental in its color and feeling.

As already announced, the soloist will be Miss Florence Hinkle, that most delightful American singer who was soloist with the orchestra here with such success a year ago. She will sing twice. Her first number will be Cherubino's Canzona 'Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and her second will be the "Ava Maria," from Max Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire," which is founded on an episode of Scott's poem, "The Lady of the Lake."

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Symphony No. 8, in F-Major, Beethoven; Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Suite in B-Minor for flute and string orchestra, Bach, Mr. Andre debate. [illegible] obvious expediency, is to agree to disagree on all other amendments and submit the revenue proposal by common or unanimous consent—in short, to get done the only thing that seems possible at this session to do.

---

CAN SUCH THINGS BE?

Boston audiences at Symphony hall are reported to have thrown all classical restraint aside and to have given full vent to "wild enthusiasm." People on certain occasions were struggling for a chance to gain admission into the famous hall, hundreds had to be turned away, and only Hub culture prevented serious riotings and calls for police and firemen.

And what were these historic occasions? Why, Conductor Muck was giving Liszt's "Faust" symphony and giving it in an ultra-romantic and "intense" manner. The auditors were stirred to their depths and the final climaxes threw them into delirious joy. Caruso never witnessed greater excitement among the gallery gods.

This recalls an event in Symphony hall some two seasons ago. The program was severely classical—Haydn, Beethoven, Bach. Dr. Muck was precise, scholarly, austere, and solemn. The audience betrayed not a sign of pleasure or interest. Its applause was perfunctory and dignified. An outsider would have said it was bored and listless, but a native would have frowned at such barbarism and lack of understanding. To hear of rapture, thunders of applause, shouting, and wild enthusiasm at the Hub, and apropos, too, of Liszt, the irregular and often formless Liszt, is to rub one's eyes in amazement. Here in Chicago the "Faust" symphony is seldom dusted and produced; it is enjoyed, but it never provoked much excitement. But perhaps we have yet to hear it played in an ultra-romantic style to discover its power and richness. Dr. Muck is to visit us in the fall. Will he give us the "Faust" symphony? A comparative study of Hub and western enthusiasm over Liszt rediscovered should appeal to the curiosity of Boston musicians and critics.

---

om JOURNAL
dress: Providence, R. I.

For the last concert of the season to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock, the programme which has been arranged by Dr. Muck is appropriate to the season of spring, containing a series of bright and joyous numbers, which present no problems in modern harmony and dissonance for the public to attempt to solve.

The symphony with which the concert opens will be Beethoven's "Little Symphony in F," the Eighth, which shows the composer in a genial, almost playful mood. Although the eighth symphony was called by its composer "The Little Symphony in F," chiefly because it is shorter than the Sixth or Big Symphony in F, with its melodious charm it would have been sufficient to immortalize any composer, and while it lacks the seriousness and tragedy to be found in most of the other eight symphonies, its serene beauty has made it one of the most popular works in symphonic literature.

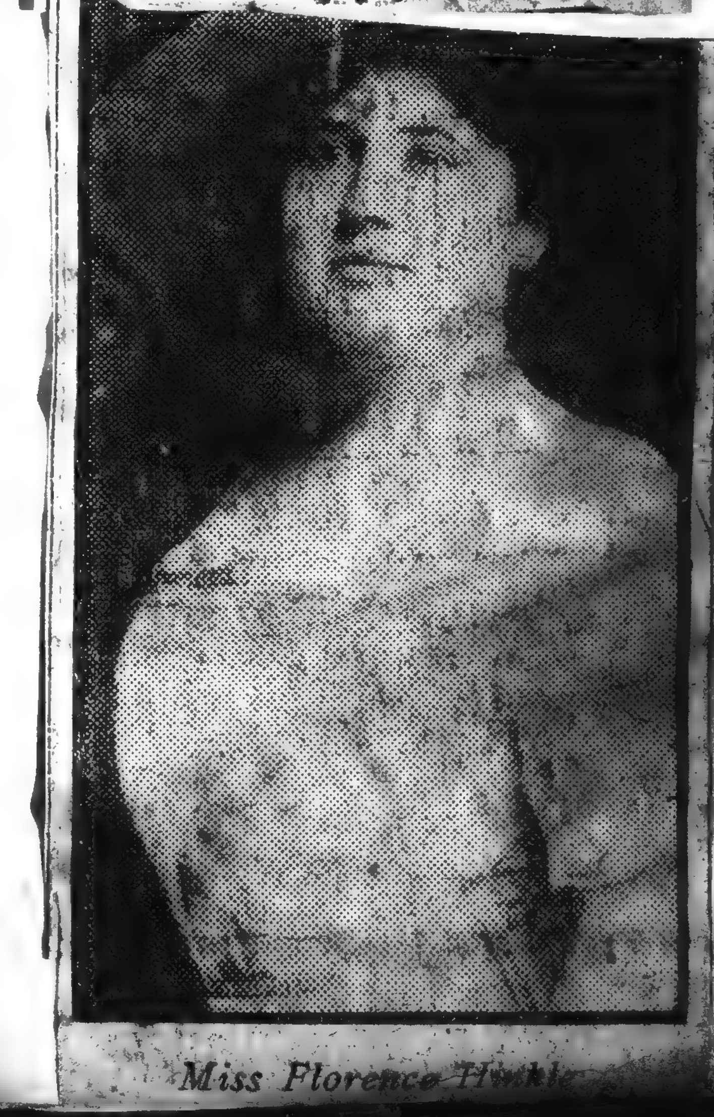
In the second part of the programme, the orchestra will play Bach's suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. The Bach suite in which the solo flute will be played by Andre Maquarre, the admirable flutist of the orchestra, is like other works of its kind and of its day, a series of old-time dances, a form of composition on which the entire formal structure of orchestral music is founded. This suite consists of seven movements; an Overture, a Rondo, a Sarabande, a Bouroe, a Polonaise, a Double and a Badiniere.

The closing number will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture, which is unquestionably the greatest orchestral work which came from this prolific composer. It is based on the old Hindu play of the same name, and is like the rest of Goldmark's music, filled with the flowing color of the Orient.

Miss Florence Hinkle, the admirable soprano, who will be the soloist, will sing as her first number Cherubino's Canzona "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Ave Maria" from Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire."

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Symphony No. 8 in F-major, Beethoven; aria, "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra, Bach, Mr. Andre Maquarre, solo flute; "Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire," Bruch, Miss Florence Hinkle; overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark.

* * *



Miss Florence Hinkle

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Estab

TOUCH OF SPRING IN LAST CONCERT

Symphony Series Ends with Bright and Joyous Programme. — Miss Hinkle Delights Again.

The sixth and last concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew another large audience to Infantry Hall last night, and one of the best programmes of this or any preceding season was rendered by the orchestra, assisted by Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist. Dr. Muck, the director, fairly excelled himself in his selection and the combination of numbers showed in a remarkable degree the versatility of his company of musicians as well as the ability they possess to interpret the masters in their many moods. The programme was so arranged as to display the lightness and brightness of the spring time, and it was a wise act to make the numbers fit the season for every one seemed in just the mood to find keenest pleasure in the delicate and lively music. There were unmistakable signs of enjoyment shown all through the concert and at the close many expressions were heard of the delight that had been found in th programme. Dr. Muck and his musicians added one more plume to their sheaf of fame in this city and left their hearers eager for further oportunities to hear them another year.

The oder of the selections was as follows:

Beethoven...Symphony No. 8, F-major, Op. 93
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Mozart......Aria, "Voi, che sapete, from ...."Le Nozze di Figaro"
Bach....Suite No. 2, in B-minor, for Flute ....and Strings
(Hans von Buelow's Arrangement.)
I. Overture; Largo; Allegro.
II. Rondo; Allegretto expressivo.
III. Sarabande: Andante.
IV. Bourree I. and Bourree II.: Allegro motto.
V. Polonaise with Double; Moderato.
VI. Minuet.
VII. Bandinerie: Presto.
Solo Flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre.
Bruch.."Ave aMria." from "The Cross of Fire" ....A Dramatic Cantata, Op. 52
Goldmark......Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13

Beethoven's glowing and joyous eighth symphony is justly regarded as one of the best of his productions. The composer evidently was in a happy, jovial mood when he wrote this music and it reveals and inspires the joy of life. Particularly appropriate in this respect to the spring season when the pleasure of living runs strong in the veins of all who love nature and interpret her moods aright, it has a melodious charm that creeps into the heart and fills it with music. It is shorter than most of his symphonies but its calm beauty makes it ever popular. Rendered incomparably well last night by this orchestra it was a rich experience to hear its peaceful melody.

The second number by the orchestra, Bach's suite for flute and strings, is a quaint composition, full of the charm of the old world in its melody and rhythm. It is composed of a series of old dances of other days in seven movements, each representing a different form and each a gem in itself, while the combination is finely adapted to reveal the versatile ability of the musicians. The solo part was played by Abdre Maquarre, the leading flutist of the orchestra, and he gave complete satisfaction by his execution and control of the instrument. With the orchestral accompaniment this suite was brilliantly played and won the hearty applause it merited. The final number by the orchestra, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture is rated as beyond question the composer's finest production for orchestral rendition. It is marked by the glowing color of the Orient, being based upon an old Hindu play. This, too, was presented with keen sympathy and artistic execution and gave a fitting end to the concert and the series.

Miss Hinkle, who was the soloist at the final concert last year and has been heard here with pleasure on other occasions also, was greeted warmly by friends she has made in this city. Her two numbers were sung with the clarity and richness of tone that marks her vocal work and in the manner that charms those who hear her. The Ava Maria was particularly well done and the singer was rewarded with repeated recalls. She has fully established herself in the favor of the musical people of this city.

NEXT YEAR'S SERIES.

The pleasing announcement is made that there will be six concerts again next season and the dates have been fixed for the following Tuesday evenings: Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, Feb. 8, March 7, April 11.

Dr. Muck will, of course, again be at his post as conductor of the orchestra.

The management of the orchestra has been successful in engaging for this series of concerts as soloists, six artists of extraordinary high quality. The list is headed by Madame Melba, who will be the soloist at the first concert, Oct. 19. Madame Melba is coming to America in September for an extended concert tour under the management of C. A. Ellis of Boston. As a part of her tour, she will make a limited number of appearances in Boston and the larger cities with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the first of these appearances will be in Providence. One other singer appears on the list—this is the ever-popular American contralto, Madame Louise Homer. Madame Homer has long been a favorite here in Providence, and her name strengthens the list greatly.

For pianists, the orchestra offers Mr. Ernest Schelling and Miss Laeta Hartley. Both of these pianists are Americans. Mr. Schelling has the added renown of having been a pupil of the great Paderewski. He has long been recognized as a pianist of highest quality. Miss Hartley is one of the younger pianists who had a most suc-

The other two soloists will be drawn from the ranks of the orchestra. Providence will have its first hearing of both of them. One is Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, and the other is Josef Malkin who shares the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Noack is in every sense of the word a great artist, and his annual appearances in Boston are always looked forward to greatly by the patrons of the orchestra there. Mr. Malkin joined the orchestra last fall. He had long been regarded as one of the great 'cello virtuosos of Europe, and only an organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra could get such a man in its membership.

To-day the subscribers of this year's series of concerts received notices informing them that to retain their seats, they must notify the Boston office of the orchestra on or before June 1.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date -5 1915

Establishe

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, coming to Jewel City, and Mme.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DUE HERE IN MAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is coming to San Francisco in May and will give a series of concerts in Festival Hall at Jewel City. This organization of 100 instrumentalists stands at the head of symphonic orchestras and during the thirty-three years of its existence it has never reached a higher pinnacle of perfection than under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, who first conducted the orchestra in 1906.

The coming of the orchestra is an extraordinary event, the organization coming direct from Boston in a special train and returning to its home city immediately after the final concert here. The sale of seats for the series of twelve concerts began this morning at 343 Powell street, with a demand that indicates great interest in the season.

Mme. Julia Culp, the great lieder singer, will give the first of a series of three concerts at the Columbia Theater beginning Sunday afternoon, April 11.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date APR 18 1915

A Neutral Season of Music — New York Served Impartially by Its Artistic Purveyors.

MUSIC in New York has observed strict neutrality in the musical season now drawing to a close. The programs here have contained about the same proportion of music by Germans, Austrians, Hungarians, Bohemians, Frenchmen, Belgians, Russians, Englishmen, and English colonists, and by the composers of neutral countries, as they did before the first of August, 1914. And if the number of English compositions given this Winter has been small, it is not smaller than the average of their number in years before war was thought of the cause is not to be sought in the war. No doubt there is plenty of very positive feeling on the part of conductors, managers, singers, instrumental soloists, and orchestral players in regard to the war and the merits and demerits of the respective combatants. It would be strange, considering the origin of most of them, if there were not. But so far as has appeared on the face of things, there has been no disturbance, mental or physical, caused by undue expression of these feelings, and there has been no trace of chauvinism in the programs of any of the organizations or the private individuals who have contributed to the music of the season. New York can properly say, and so can the other musical cities of the United States, that art for her as a neutral, officially, knows no nationality, no prejudices, no bitterness of feeling, and that such things enter not at all into the estimate and appreciation of music. Music has indeed been called not infrequently and importunately to contribute to the aid of almost every sort of person, every nationality in Europe that is suffering from the war, and has responded liberally, unstintedly—and impartially.

It is perhaps not unnatural that nations in the throes of a life-and-death struggle should have their passions so wrought upon, and that individuals should be so set on edge that it should seem disloyalty, even treason, to perform or to listen to the work of an "enemy." We, at this distance, and at this time, are not called upon to judge whether, if it is comprehensible that a living composer's music should be barred out because he is an "enemy," a dead one, who can have had no part in the war and lives only in his works, should be treated to the same process of exclusion. If Saint-Saëns is not now wanted in Berlin concert halls, is Bizet logically to be considered anathema in the opera house? Still harder is it to find a good reason to denounce and proscribe the classical composers of any nation, however hated; the Olympians, untroubled by the affairs of men. As a matter of fact, it has not been possible to do it with a good grace or any grace at all. Any nation that tried to be "musical" without the help of the Germans would soon find itself in embarrassment.

It seems likewise rather foolish, at this distance, for the German societies and associations to expel from their membership all French and Belgian and English musicians whom aforetime they had elected, and for the French or the English to reciprocate in kind and in bitterness. Membership, it would seem, might have been allowed to be neglected or forgotten till the war was over, when perhaps a different feeling will some time arise. Foolish things have been said and written, but there are, after all, more foolish things in war than talking and writing. Our interests are not engaged in a manner that makes it possible to enter fully into the feelings that have controlled in this matter.

New Yorkers have fortunately been able to listen to all music without an "arrière pensée"; music has spoken for itself. Italian opera, German opera, French opera, Russian opera, have been given with equal scrupulousness and fidelity; and if French opera has had a showing less conspicuous at the Metropolitan Opera House than its place in the world of art should have given it, the causes long antedate the war and operated before the war began. The complaint is an old one. Nor has there been, so far as the public has been allowed to know, friction between artists of the warring nationalities, who are represented in the roster of the Opera House.

Mr. Damrosch at the very beginning of the season made it plain how such friction was to be avoided among the different nationalities in his orchestra, and its members have apparently found something more profitable to do than to quarrel about the war at 3,000 miles' distance. His programs for the season have shown a complete independence of any warlike feelings. So have the programs of the Philharmonic Society arranged by Mr. Stransky; so have those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. Not even the most sensitive and suspicious could find a trace of musical chauvinism in the arrangement of any of these programs. One or two unwise and overzealous vocalists may have taken occasion in public performance to emphasize some striking line or sentiment that seemed to them to liberate something of their own patriotic or sympathetic feelings. Not much of a "rise" was to be obtained from their public thereby, and they scarcely did more than injure the artistic symmetry of their own work.

All this is as it should be; and it is one of the advantages of the American position that American music lovers have been enabled to have their tastes gratified with as much catholicity as ever before, during the season just closed. The public in various European capitals which has demanded or suffered a limitation of the programs presented, in accordance with composers' nationalities, to suit the various angry passions roused inevitably by war, have had the worst of it.

_

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date R 191

Establi

PROGRAMME FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY FINAL CONCERT

Miss Florence Hinkle, Soprano, to be Soloist This Evening.

The sixth and final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15 o'clock. Miss Florence Hinkle, the American soprano, will be the soloist.

The programme is light and melodious and appropriate to the season. Beethoven's "Little Symphony in F" shows the composer in a really genial mood. Bach's suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's Oriental "Sakuntala" will be other orchestral numbers on the programme.

The order of numbers on the programme follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F-major: Mozart, aria, "Vio Che Sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Miss Florence Hinkle; Bach, suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra, Andre Marquarre, solo flute; Bruch, "Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire;" Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala," Miss Florence Hinkle.

From Examiner
Address San Francisco. Cal.
Date APR - 4 1915

Establis

BY REDFERN MASON.

IN Boston the sale of seats for the concerts of the Boston Symphony is a social event. Not a seat of the whole series is left unsold and the rivalry of the social elect in the competition for places is keen. San Francisco will be able to show whether its interest in the first orchestral organization in the world is as great as the occasion demands it should be. The best that Europe has to give has been drawn upon to build up this magnificent orchestra; men like Gericke, Fiedler, Henschel and Karl Muck have devoted their energy and genius to welding the tonal body into a homogeneous whole. And a Boston banker, Henry Lee Higginson, has footed the bill. If it had been necessary to make the Boston Symphony a paying investment in the financial sense of the word, America would lack the brightest jewel in its musical crown.

The men of the Boston Symphony devote their lives solely to its service; they are well paid; an endowment secures them a pension; they rehearse every day; their ideal is perfection, and exacting judges say they as nearly approximate to its realization as anything human can do.

I am in hopes that the coming of the Boston Symphony will beget in the hearts of our music lovers such a spirit of divine discontent as will lead to the placing of the San Francisco Symphony on a more satisfactory basis. We must have daily rehearsals; the weak spots in the ranks must be remedied, and the players must be paid well enough to devote all their time to symphonic work. To do this means the spending of much more money; but the credit of San Francisco as a musical center is involved in the future of the Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of seats for the concerts of the Boston Symphony will open to-morrow morning at 343 Powell street, St. Francis Hotel. The prices for the whole series of twelve concerts range from $7 to $25, according to location. Mail orders will be received and filled as near the desired location as possible, and all checks, money orders and communications should be addressed to W. H. Leahy, manager, 343 Powell street, San Francisco.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 191

Estab

Big Seat Sale for Boston Orchestra

Interest is keen in the coming series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, unquestionably the greatest organization of the kind in the world, and when the subscription sale of seats for the twelve concerts began at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, this morning, there was a long line of music lovers in attendance.

Impressario W. H. Leahy, who is in charge of the concerts, which will begin at Festival Hall Friday evening, May 14, expressed himself as delighted with the [illegible] cessful season

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

TOUCH OF SPRING IN LAST CONCERT

Symphony Series Ends with Bright and Joyous Programme: — Miss Hinkle Delights Again.

The sixth and last concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew another large audience to Infantry Hall last night, and one of the best programmes of this or any preceding season was rendered by the orchestra, assisted by Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist. Dr. Muck, the director, fairly excelled himself in his selection and the combination of numbers showed in a remarkable degree the versatility of his company of musicians as well as the ability they possess to interpret the masters in their many moods. The programme was so arranged as to display the lightness and brightness of the spring time, and it was a wise act to make the numbers fit the season for every one seemed in just the mood to find keenest pleasure in the delicate and lively music. There were unmistakable signs of enjoyment shown all through the concert and at the close many expressions were heard of the delight that had been found in th programme. Dr. Muck and his musicians added one more plume to their sheaf of fame in this city and left their hearers eager for further oportunities to hear them another year.

The oder of the selections was as follows:

Beethoven...Symphony No. 8, F-major, Op. 93
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Mozart......Aria, "Voi, che sapete, from ...."Le Nozze di Figaro"
Bach....Suite No. 2, in B-minor, for Flute .... and Strings
(Hans von Buelow's Arrangement.)
I. Overture; Largo; Allegro.
II. Rondo: Allegretto expressivo.
III. Sarabande: Andante.
IV. Bourree I. and Bourree II.: Allegro motto.
V. Polonaise with Double: Moderato.
VI. Minuet.
VII. Bandinerie: Presto.
Solo Flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre.
Bruch.."Ave aMria," from "The Cross of Fire" ....A Dramatic Cantata, Op. 52
Goldmark......Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13

Beethoven's glowing and joyous eighth symphony is justly regarded as one of the best of his productions. The composer evidently was in a happy, jovial mood when he wrote this music and it reveals and inspires the joy of life. Particularly appropriate in this respect to the spring season when the pleasure of living runs strong in the veins of all who love nature and interpret her moods aright, it has a melodious charm that creeps into the heart and fills it with music. It is shorter than most of his symphonies but its calm beauty makes it ever popular. Rendered incomparably well last night by this orchestra it was a rich experience to hear its peaceful melody.

The second number by the orchestra, Bach's suite for flute and strings, is a quaint composition, full of the charm of the old world in its melody and rhythm. It is composed of a series of old dances of other days in seven movements, each representing a different form and each a gem in itself, while the combination is finely adapted to reveal the versatile ability of the musicians. The solo part was played by Abdre Maquarre, the leading flutist of the orchestra, and he gave complete satisfaction by his execution and control of the instrument. With the orchestral accompaniment this suite was brilliantly played and won the hearty applause it merited. The final number by the orchestra, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture is rated as beyond question the composer's finest production for orchestral rendition. It is marked by the glowing color of the Orient, being based upon an old Hindu play. This, too, was presented with keen sympathy and artistic execution and gave a fitting end to the concert and the series.

Miss Hinkle, who was the soloist at the final concert last year and has been heard here with pleasure on other occasions also, was greeted warmly by friends she has made in this city. Her two numbers were sung with the clarity and richness of tone that marks her vocal work and in the manner that charms those who hear her. The Ava Maria was particularly well done and the singer was rewarded with repeated recalls. She has fully established herself in the favor of the musical people of this city.

NEXT YEAR'S SERIES.

The pleasing announcement is made that there will be six concerts again next season and the dates have been fixed for the following Tuesday evenings: Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, Feb. 8, March 7, April 11.

Dr. Muck will, of course, again be at his post as conductor of the orchestra.

The management of the orchestra has been successful in engaging for this series of concerts as soloists, six artists of extraordinary high quality. The list is headed by Madame Melba, who will be the soloist at the first concert, Oct. 19. Madame Melba is coming to America in September for an extended concert tour under the management of C. A. Ellis of Boston. As a part of her tour, she will make a limited number of appearances in Boston and the larger cities with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the first of these appearances will be in Providence. One other singer appears on the list—this is the ever-popular American contralto, Madame Louise Homer. Madame Homer has long been a favorite here in Providence, and her name strengthens the list greatly.

For pianists, the orchestra offers Mr. Ernest Schelling and Miss Laeta Hartley. Both of these pianists are Americans. Mr. Schelling has the added renown of having been a pupil of the great Paderewski. He has long been recognized as a pianist of highest quality. Miss Hartley is one of the younger pianists who had a most suc-

The other two soloists will be drawn from the ranks of the orchestra. Providence will have its first hearing of both of them. One is Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, and the other is Josef Malkin who shares the first desk of the 'cellos with Mr. Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Noack is in every sense of the word a great artist, and his annual appearances in Boston are always looked forward to greatly by the patrons of the orchestra there. Mr. Malkin joined the orchestra last fall. He had long been regarded as one of the great 'cello virtuosos of Europe, and only an organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra could get such a man in its membership.

To-day the subscribers of this year's series of concerts received notices informing them that to retain their seats, they must notify the Boston office of the orchestra on or before June 1.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, coming to Jewel City, and Mme.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DUE HERE IN MAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is coming to San Francisco in May and will give a series of concerts in Festival Hall at Jewel City. This organization of 100 instrumentalists stands at the head of symphonic orchestras and during the thirty-three years of its existence it has never reached a higher pinnacle of perfection than under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, who first conducted the orchestra in 1906.

The coming of the orchestra is an extraordinary event, the organization coming direct from Boston in a special train and returning to its home city immediately after the final concert here. The sale of seats for the series of twelve concerts began this morning at 343 Powell street, with a demand that indicates great interest in the season.

Mme. Julia Culp, the great lieder singer, will give the first of a series of three concerts at the Columbia Theater beginning Sunday afternoon, April 11.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date APR 18 1915

A Neutral Season of Music—New York Served Impartially by Its Artistic Purveyors.

MUSIC in New York has observed strict neutrality in the musical season now drawing to a close. The programs here have contained about the same proportion of music by Germans, Austrians, Hungarians, Bohemians, Frenchmen, Belgians, Russians, Englishmen, and English colonists, and by the composers of neutral countries, as they did before the first of August, 1914. And if the number of English compositions given this Winter has been small, it is not smalle than the average of their number in years before war was thought of the cause is not to be sought in the war. No doubt there is plenty of very positive feeling on the part of conductors, managers, singers, instrumental soloists, and orchestral players in regard to the war and the merits and demerits of the respective combatants. It would be strange, considering the origin of most of them, if there were not. But so far as has appeared on the face of things, there has been no disturbance, mental or physical, caused by undue expression of these feelings, and there has been no trace of chauvinism in the programs of any of the organizations or the private individuals who have contributed to the music of the season. New York can properly say, and so can the other musical cities of the United States, that art for her as a neutral, officially, knows no nationality, no prejudices, no bitterness of feeling, and that such things enter not at all into the estimate and appreciation of music. Music has indeed been called not infrequently and importunately to contribute to the aid of almost every sort of person, every nationality in Europe that is suffering from the war, and has responded liberally, unstintedly—and impartially.

It is perhaps not unnatural that nations in the throes of a life-and-death struggle should have their passions so wrought upon, and that individuals should be so set on edge that it should seem disloyalty, even treason, to perform or to listen to the work of an "enemy." We, at this distance, and at this time, are not called upon to judge whether, if it is comprehensible that a living composer's music should be barred out because he is an "enemy," a dead one, who can have had no part in the war and lives only in his works, should be treated to the same process of exclusion. If Saint-Saëns is not now wanted in Berlin concert halls, is Bizet logically to be considered anathema in the opera house? Still harder is it to find a good reason to denounce and proscribe the classical composers of any nation, however hated; the Olympians, untroubled by the affairs of men. As a matter of fact, it has not been possible to do it with a good grace or any grace at all. Any nation that tried to be "musical" without the help of the Germans would soon find itself in embarrassment.

It seems likewise rather foolish, at this distance, for the German societies and associations to expel from their membership all French and Belgian and English musicians whom aforetime they had elected, and for the French or the English to reciprocate in kind and in bitterness. Membership, it would seem, might have been allowed to be neglected or forgotten till the war was over, when perhaps a different feeling will some time arise. Foolish things have been said and written, but there are, after all, more foolish things in war than talking and writing. Our interests are not engaged in a manner that makes it possible to enter fully into the feelings that have controlled in this matter.

New Yorkers have fortunately been able to listen to all music without an "arrière pensée"; music has spoken for itself. Italian opera, German opera, French opera, Russian opera, have been given with equal scrupulousness and fidelity; and if French opera has had a showing less conspicuous at the Metropolitan Opera House than its place in the world of art should have given it, the causes long antedate the war and operated before the war began. The complaint is an old one. Nor has there been, so far as the public has been allowed to know, friction between artists of the warring nationalities, who are represented in the roster of the Opera House.

Mr. Damrosch at the very beginning of the season made it plain how such friction was to be avoided among the different nationalities in his orchestra, and its members have apparently found something more profitable to do than to quarrel about the war at 3,000 miles' distance. His programs for the season have shown a complete independence of any warlike feelings. So have the programs of the Philharmonic Society arranged by Mr. Stransky; so have those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. Not even the most sensitive and suspicious could find a trace of musical chauvinism in the arrangement of any of these programs. One or two unwise and overzealous vocalists may have taken occasion in public performance to emphasize some striking line or sentiment that seemed to them to liberate something of their own patriotic or sympathetic feelings. Not much of a "rise" was to be obtained from their public thereby, and they scarcely did more than injure the artistic symmetry of their own work.

All this is as it should be; and it is one of the advantages of the American position that American music lovers have been enabled to have their tastes gratified with as much catholicity as ever before, during the season just closed. The public in various European capitals which has demanded or suffered a limitation of the programs presented, in accordance with composers' nationalities, to suit the various angry passions roused inevitably by war, have had the worst of it.

* *

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

PROGRAMME FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY FINAL CONCERT

Miss Florence Hinkle, Soprano, to be Soloist This Evening.

The sixth and final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15 o'clock. Miss Florence Hinkle, the American soprano, will be the soloist.

The programme is light and melodious and appropriate to the season. Beethoven's "Little Symphony in F" shows the composer in a really genial mood. Bach's suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's Oriental "Sakuntala" will be other orchestral numbers on the programme.

The order of numbers on the programme follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F-major; Mozart, aria, "Vio Che Sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Miss Florence Hinkle; Bach, suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra, Andre Marquarre, solo flute; Bruch, "Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire;" Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala," Miss Florence Hinkle.

From Examiner
Address San Francisco Cal
Date APR

BY REDFERN MASON.

IN Boston the sale of seats for the concerts of the Boston Symphony is a social event. Not a seat of the whole series is left unsold and the rivalry of the social elect in the competition for places is keen. San Francisco will be able to show whether its interest in the first orchestral organization in the world is as great as the occasion demands it should be. The best that Europe has to give has been drawn upon to build up this magnificent orchestra; men like Gericke, Fiedler, Henschel and Karl Muck have devoted their energy and genius to welding the tonal body into a homogeneous whole. And a Boston banker, Henry Lee Higginson, has footed the bill. If it had been necessary to make the Boston Symphony a paying investment in the financial sense of the word, America would lack the brightest jewel in its musical crown.

The men of the Boston Symphony devote their lives solely to its service; they are well paid; an endowment secures them a pension; they rehearse every day; their ideal is perfection, and exacting judges say they as nearly approximate to its realization as anything human can do.

I am in hopes that the coming of the Boston Symphony will beget in the hearts of our music lovers such a spirit of divine discontent as will lead to the placing of the San Francisco Symphony on a more satisfactory basis. We must have daily rehearsals; the weak spots in the ranks must be remedied, and the players must be paid well enough to devote all their time to symphonic work. To do this means the spending of much more money; but the credit of San Francisco as a musical center is involved in the future of the Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of seats for the concerts of the Boston Symphony will open to-morrow morning at 343 Powell street, St. Francis Hotel. The prices for the whole series of twelve concerts range from $7 to $25, according to location. Mail orders will be received and filled as near the desired location as possible, and all checks, money orders and communications should be addressed to W. H. Leahy, manager, 343 Powell street, San Francisco.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR

Big Seat Sale for Boston Orchestra

Interest is keen in the coming series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, unquestionably the greatest organization of the kind in the world, and when the subscription sale of seats for the twelve concerts began at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, this morning, there was a long line of music lovers in attendance.

Impressario W. H. Leahy, who is in charge of the concerts, which will begin at Festival Hall Friday evening, May 14, expressed himself as delighted with the [illegible] cessful season.

From BULLETIN

Address …ce, R. I.

Date

PROGRAMME FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY FINAL CONCERT

Miss Florence Hinkle, Soprano, to be Soloist This Evening.

The sixth and final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15 o'clock. Miss Florence Hinkle, the American soprano, will be the soloist.

The programme is light and melodious and appropriate to the season. Beethoven's "Little Symphony in F" shows the composer in a really genial mood. Bach's suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's Oriental "Sakuntala" will be other orchestral numbers on the programme.

The order of numbers on the programme follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F-major; Mozart, aria, "Vio Che Sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Miss Florence Hinkle; Bach, suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra, Andre Marquarre, solo flute; Bruch, "Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire;" Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala," Miss Florence Hinkle.

…, 1884

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The final concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15. Miss Florence Hinkle, the American soprano, will be the soloist. The programme is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F-Major; Mozart, aria, "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro"; Bach, Suite in B-Minor for flute and string orchestra, Andre Maquarre, solo flute; Bruch, "Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire"; Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala," Miss Florence Hinkle.

1884

From NEWS

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

Miss Florence Hinkle, the American soprano, who won such favor with the Symphony orchestra here last year, will be soloist at the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry hall Tuesday evening, April 13. She will sing the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire," and Cherubino's aria, "Voi che sapete" from Mozart's "the Marriage of Figaro." The rest of the program is to be announced.

Estab

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date APR 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled for next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. As already announced, the soloist will be Florence Hinkle, who now by common consent, seems to rank as the foremost American who has devoted herself entirely to concert work.

Miss Hinkle appeared here with such success with the orchestra a year ago that she was engaged for this season. She has sung already a number of times with the orchestra, including appearances at the regular series of concerts in Boston where she sang the same pieces she will sing in Providence, Cherubini's aria "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire." The symphony will be the ever delightful Eighth by Beethoven.

The sale of tickets opens at Seddon's newstand, Butler Exchange, Saturday morning.

Est… 84

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date APR

for this production.

A varied program of songs and piano solos has been arranged for the joint recital of Celine Verkerk, soprano, and Miss Louise Hopkins, pianist, which will be held at the Little Theatre Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Miss Hopkins, who is a Philadelphian, is remembered here as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has also scored a success abroad and has been studying in Germany under Breithaupt since last she was heard here. Mme. Verkerk makes her debut here, having already sung in New York, where the beauty of her voice and her clear enunciation have been commended.

1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS

Address …ce, R. I.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Beethoven's bright and joyous Eighth symphony, Bach's quaint old world suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's glowingly Oriental "Sakuntala" Overture will be the orchestral numbers on the program of the sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening, April 13.

The program is light and melodious and appropriate to the season. Beethoven's "little symphony in F," one of the indubitable masterpieces of all times, shows the composer in a really genial, even playful mood, and is filled with the joy of living.

Bach's Suite for flute and strings, in which the solo part will be played by Mr. Andre Maquarre, the admirable flutist of the orchestra, is full of old world charm in melody and rhythm, while Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture is gorgeously Oriental in its color and feeling.

As already announced, the soloist will be Miss Florence Hinkle, that most delightful American singer who was soloist with the orchestra here with such success a year ago. She will sing twice. Her first number will be Cherubino's Canzona "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and her second will be the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire," which is founded on an episode of Scott's poem, "The Lady of the Lake."

The program in its proper order is as follows:

Beethoven — Symphony No. 8, in F-Major.

Mozart—Aria, "Voi che sapate" from "The Marriage of Figaro."

Bach—Suite in B-Minor for Flute and String Orchestra.

Mr. Andre Maquarre, Solo Flute.

Bruch—"Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire."

G…k—Overture, "Sakuntala."

…nce Hinkle.

Est

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 10 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The programs that Dr. Carl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged for the twelve concerts at the Exposition from May 12 to 26, are on a par with the reputation of the orchestra itself. This is considered the finest symphony organization in the world It is fitting, therefore, that it should play the finest music in the world. And that is exactly what it is going to do.

The following programs tell the tale:

NO. 1.

Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica" ....Beethoven

Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56a ....Brahms

"Don Juan," Tone Poem (after Lenau), Op. 20 ....Richard Strauss

Overture to the opera "Euryanthe"..........Weber

NO. 2.

Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27 ....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy

Symphony No. 6, in G major, "Surprise"..Haydn

Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," Op 48.. ....MacDowell

"Hungaria," symphonic poem, No. 9..........Liszt

NO. 3 (FRENCH PROGRAM).

Symphony in D minor..........Cesar Franck

"L' Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice), scherzo (after ballad of Goethe) ....Dukas

Suite, "L' Arlesienne," No. 1, Music to Alphonse Daudet's play ....Bizet

Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"..........Chabrier

NO. 4.

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.....Brahms

Suite for flute and strings in B minor, No. 2 ....J. S. Bach

(Solo flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)

Symphony (shepherds' music), from the Christmas Oratorio ....J. S Bach

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84..Beethoven

NO. 5 (WAGNER PROGRAM).

Overture to "Rianzi."

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act 1 (Paris version).

Prelude to "Lohengrin."

Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."

Prelude to "Parsifal."

NO. 6.

Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz".....Weber

Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93....Beethoven

Symphonic sketches: Suite for Orchestra..Chadwick

"Karelia," overture for full orchestra; "The Swan of Tuonela," legend from the Finnish folk epic, "Kalevala"; "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No 7 ....Sibelius

Symphonic poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine) ....Liszt

Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24 ....Richard Strauss

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner

NO. 8 (ITALIAN PROGRAM).

Symphony No. 1, in D major, Op. 16—Sgambati

Overture to the opera "Anacreon".......Cherubini

Intermezzi Goldoniani, Op 127..........Bossi

Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," Op. 32 (The Squabbles of the People of Chiozza) ....Sinigaglia

NO. 9.

Symphony No. 2, in G minor (K. 550)......Mozart

Concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra of strings ....J. S. Bach

(Solo violins, Messrs. Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack.)

Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13........Goldmark

"A Siegfried Idyl" ....Weber

Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92..........Dvorak

NO. 10 (FRENCH PROGRAM).

Symphony No. 3, for orchestra and organ, Op. 78 ....Saint-Saens

Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"..........Debussy

Three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24 ....Berlbaz

Overture to the opera "Gwendoline".....Chabrier

NO. 11

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74 ....Tschaikowsky

Overture Solonelle, Op. 73..........Glazounoff

On the Steppes of Central Asia, orchestral sketch, Op. 7 ....Borodin

Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.......... Rimsky-Korsakoff

NO. 12.

Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 39.....Sibelius

Tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" (freely after Friedrich Nietsche), Op. 30.......... ....Richard Strauss

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72....Beethoven

Establis

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date

Established: 1

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is coming to San Francisco in May and will give a series of concerts at Festival Hall has created intense interest among music lovers of California and that it will be greeted by a succession of crowded houses seems a foregone conclusion. This organization of one hundred instrumentalists, the pick of the profession, stands at the very head of symphonic orchestras, and during the thirty-three years of its experience it has never reached a higher pinnacle of perfection than under the present leader, Dr. Karl Muck.

The sale of seats for the series of twelve concerts will begin Monday morning at 343 Powell street, and at the St. Francis Hotel, with prices ranging from $7 to $25, according to location.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Establi

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S 34TH SEASON ENDS

Sixth Concert of Series Has Gay Programme.

FLORENCE HINKLE SOLOIST

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony Given Under Leadership of Dr. Muck. Programme, Aptly Chosen for Spring Season, Heartily Approved by Critical Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its 34th season of concerts in this city to a close last evening in Infantry Hall with its sixth and last concert of the present series, at which the soloist was Miss Florence Hinkle, who was also the soloist at the last concert last year.

The programmme was singularly gay and lively for one of its length, and aptly chosen for the spring season; and from the first bright notes of the symphony to the close of the overture, seemed to meet with favor from the audience, which though smaller in size, … thusiastic as at earlier conce… season.

In the order of its perform… programmme was as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 8, F-m…
- I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
- II. Allegretto scherzando.
- III. Tempo di menuetto.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

Mozart..........Aria, "Voi che sa… ...."Le Nozze…

Bach..Suite No. 2, in B-minor, fo… ....

(Hans von Buelow's Arrange…
- I. Overture: Largo; Allegro.
- II. Rondo: Allegretto espressivo…
- III. Sarabande: Andante.
- IV. Bourree I. and Bourree II.: A…
- V. Polonaise with Double: Mod…
- VI. Minuet.
- VII. Badinerie: Presto.

Solo Flute, Mr. Andre Mac…

Bruch.."Ave Maria," from "The Cro… ....A Dramatic Cant…

Goldmark......Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13

Of the nine symphonies of Beethoven the last two have been less often heard here than those which antedate them, and the eighth, given last evening, although performed here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra but a little over two years ago, had previously hardly been recorded among such productions.

Written by Beethoven at a sad period of his life, when out of health and embroiled in a family quarrel, the eighth symphony gives no hint of anything depressing, but is cheerful, bright and apparently full of humor. The composer's ability to rise above distressing details, which was shown in his serene fourth symphony, is again manifested in the eighth, which was given last evening in all its beauty under the skilful leadership of Dr. Muck. Gayly the first movement began and pursued its way like the jocular companionship of kindred spirits, to which was contrasted the more delicate second movement, which was played to perfection, as the wind instruments "ticked" a background for the delicate tracery of the strings.

With these the "tempo di Menuetto" taken at an ordinary pace, embellished by the beautiful "dialogue" for clarinet and horns, and the final loud and lively movement, combined to show again the skill in composition, and the wonderful working out of themes which have made these symphonies immortal. Beethoven called this symphony the "little" symphony, but in its way it is as impressive and as perfect as those which are more majestic and better known. In the hands of such performers as the Boston orchestra, directed by a master mind, it was a performance worthy of attention.

The Bach suite for flute and strings, the second orchestral number, with its old-time dance measures of various forms, was an agreeable continuation of the motive of cheer, admirably played by soloist and such of the orchestra as played the "sinfu', wee fiddles" or their deeper-toned brethren. Mr. Maquarre evolved from his instrument a beautiful tone, remarkably sustained, dominated by an intelligence and taste that made his performance an addition of unique quality to the list of the solos already contributed by members of the orchestra from time to time. In its rhythms the music had a flavor of the past, but in its interpretation it was of the sort that made it a welcome addition to a modern programme.

The last number on the programme, the Goldmark overture to "Sakuntala," was that which established the fame of the composer, who lived to see the opening of this year. It was played with a spirit that made it a fitting finale to a season of concerts that has maintained the standard of the orchestra.

Of the work of Miss Hinkle, one can speak only with praise, the purity of her voice; the beauty of its tone, the sincerity of her method have all been manifested at her previous appearances here; and the friends she made at the two concerts of the University Glee Club, at which she sang before singing with the Symphony Orchestra last year, as well as on that occasion, welcomed her back last evening, recalling her again and again after each appearance.

The Canzona was given with much charm, and the more serious "Ave Maria" with the depth of feeling it commanded.

While it is a matter of regret that the season has come to an end, it is with satisfaction that the announcement is made of six concerts to be given next season if all goes well. According to established custom they will be given on Tuesday evenings for which the dates have been set at Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11. A. W. C.

MME. MELBA HEADS LIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

Six Concerts Already Arranged for Next Season in Providence.

Mme. Melba will be the soloist at the first of the six concerts already arranged to be given in Providence by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. The concerts, as in recent years, will be given on Tuesday evenings and the following dates have been selected: Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, 1915; Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11, 1916.

As soloists, the management has been successful in engaging for this series of concerts artists of extraordinary high quality. In addition to Mme. Melba, who will sing on Oct. 19, prior to starting an extensive tour of America under the direction of C. A. Ellis of Boston, the American contralto, Mme. Louise Homer, who has long been a favorite in this city, has been secured.

For pianists, the orchestra offers Ernest Schelling and Miss Laeta Hartley, both Americans. Mr. Schelling, a pupil of the great Paderewski, has long been recognized as a pianist of highest quality. Miss Hartley is one of the younger pianists who had successful debuts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season.

The other two soloists will be drawn from the ranks of the orchestra and Providence concert lovers will have the first opportunity of hearing them. One is Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, and the other is Josef Malkin, who shares the 'cello honors with Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Malkin joined the orchestra last fall. He has long been regarded as one of the great 'cello virtuosos of Europe.

To-day the subscribers of this year's series of concerts will receive notices, informing them that to retain their seats they must notify the Boston office of the orchestra on or before June 1.

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 15 1915

Established

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE WELCOMED

Much interest is centering on the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin a series of twelve concerts in Festival Hall, Friday evening, May 14.

This great organization, the finest of the kind in the world, was founded in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson of Boston, the orchestra then consisting of sixty musicians with the composer, Georg Henschel, as leader. He was succeeded three years later by Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna. After five years under Gericke, during which time the orchestra increased to one hundred musicians and became world famous, the great Arthur Nikisch came from Leipsic and conducted it for five years, giving way to Emil Paur, also from Leipsic.

Then Gericke came back for eight years, and, on his retirement, the orchestra had the good fortune to secure for two years the services of Dr. Karl Muck, general music director for the Royal Theater of the Kingdom of Prussia.

Dr. Muck is one of the most interesting personalities in the world of music and a conductor of genius. The orchestra, fine as it was before, has reached a height of achievement greater than ever under him, and has attained a popularity that is unique. In a regular season in Boston, it gives 110 concerts. Last season every seat was sold for every concert.

The subscription sale for the twelve concerts, eight of which will take place at night, is progressing at 343 Powell street with a very large demand. Mail orders, accompanied by funds, addressed to W. H. Leahy, will receive prompt attention and seats will be allotted as near to the location desired as is possible.

From BULLETIN
Address ...ence, R. I.
Date

PROGRAMME FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY FINAL CONCERT

Miss Florence Hinkle, Soprano, to be Soloist This Evening.

The sixth and final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15 o'clock. Miss Florence Hinkle, the American soprano, will be the soloist.

The programme is light and melodious and appropriate to the season. Beethoven's "Little Symphony in F" shows the composer in a really genial mood. Bach's suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's Oriental "Sakuntala" will be other orchestral numbers on the programme.

The order of numbers on the programme follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F-major; Mozart, aria, "Vio Che Sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," Miss Florence Hinkle; Bach, suite in B-minor for flute and string orchestra, Andre Marquarre, solo flute; Bruch, "Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire;" Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala," Miss Florence Hinkle.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The final concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15. Miss Florence Hinkle, the American soprano, will be the soloist. The programme is as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F-Major; Mozart, aria, "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro"; Bach, Suite in B-Minor for flute and string orchestra, Andre Maquarre, solo flute; Bruch, "Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire"; Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala," Miss Florence Hinkle.

From NEWS
Address Providence, R. I.
Date

Miss Florence Hinkle, the American soprano, who won such favor with the Symphony orchestra here last year, will be soloist at the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry hall Tuesday evening, April 13. She will sing the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire," and Cherubino's aria, "Voi che sapete" from Mozart's "the Marriage of Figaro." The rest of the program is to be announced.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled for next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. As already announced, the soloist will be Florence Hinkle, who now by common consent, seems to rank as the foremost American who has devoted herself entirely to concert work.

Miss Hinkle appeared here with such success with the orchestra a year ago that she was engaged for this season. She has sung already a number of times with the orchestra, including appearances at the regular series of concerts in Boston where she sang the same pieces she will sing in Providence, Cherubini's aria "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire." The symphony will be the ever delightful Eighth by Beethoven. The sale of tickets opens at Seddon's newsstand, Butler Exchange, Saturday morning.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date APR

for this production.

A varied program of songs and piano solos has been arranged for the joint recital of Celine Verkerk, soprano, and Miss Louise Hopkins, pianist, which will be held at the Little Theatre Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Miss Hopkins, who is a Philadelphian, is remembered here as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has also scored a success abroad and has been studying in Germany under Breithaupt since last she was heard here. Mme. Verkerk makes her debut here, having already sung in New York, where the beauty of her voice and her clear enunciation have been commended.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address ...ence, R. I.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Beethoven's bright and joyous Eighth symphony, Bach's quaint old world suite for flute and string orchestra and Goldmark's glowingly Oriental "Sakuntala" Overture will be the orchestral numbers on the program of the sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening, April 13.

The program is light and melodious and appropriate to the season. Beethoven's "little symphony in F," one of the indubitable masterpieces of all times, shows the composer in a really genial, even playful mood, and is filled with the joy of living.

Bach's Suite for flute and strings, in which the solo part will be played by Mr. Andre Maquarre, the admirable flutist of the orchestra, is full of old world charm in melody and rhythm, while Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture is gorgeously Oriental in its color and feeling.

As already announced, the soloist will be Miss Florence Hinkle, that most delightful American singer who was soloist with the orchestra here with such success a year ago. She will sing twice. Her first number will be Cherubino's Canzona "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and her second will be the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's cantata, "The Cross of Fire," which is founded on an episode of Scott's poem, "The Lady of the Lake."

The program in its proper order is as follows:

Beethoven — Symphony No. 8, in F-Major.
"The Marriage of Figaro."
Mozart—Aria, "Voi che sapate" from
Bach—Suite in B-Minor for Flute and String Orchestra.
Mr. Andre Maquarre, Solo Flute.
Bruch—"Ave Maria," from the cantata, "The Cross of Fire."
Goldmark—Overture, "Sakuntala."
Miss Florence Hinkle.

BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 10 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The programs that Dr. Carl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged for the twelve concerts at the Exposition from May 12 to 26, are on a par with the reputation of the orchestra itself. This is considered the finest symphony organization in the world It is fitting, therefore, that it should play the finest music in the world. And that is exactly what it is going to do.

The following programs tell the tale:

NO. 1.

Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica" .... Beethoven
Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56a .... Brahms
"Don Juan," Tone Poem (after Lenau), Op. 20 .... Richard Strauss
Overture to the opera "Euryanthe" .... Weber

NO. 2.

Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27 .... Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony No. 6, in G major, "Surprise" .. Haydn
Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," Op 48 .... MacDowell
"Hungaria," symphonic poem, No. 9 .... Liszt

NO. 3 (FRENCH PROGRAM).

Symphony in D minor .... Cesar Franck
"L' Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice), scherzo (after ballad of Goethe) .... Dukas
Suite, "L' Arlesienne," No. 1. Music to Alphonse Daudet's play .... Bizet
Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana" .... Chabrier

NO. 4.

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68 ..... Brahms
Suite for flute and strings in B minor, No. 2 .... J. S. Bach
(Solo flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)
Symphony (shepherds' music), from the Christmas Oratorio .... J. S Bach
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84 .. Beethoven

NO. 5 (WAGNER PROGRAM).

Overture to "Rianzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act 1 (Paris version).
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

NO. 6.

Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93 .... Beethoven
Symphonic sketches: Suite for Orchestra. Chadwick
"Karelia," overture for full orchestra; "The Swan of Tuonela," legend from the Finnish folk epic, "Kalevala"; "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No .... Sibelius

Symphonic poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine) .... Liszt
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24 .... Richard Strauss
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .... Wagner

NO. 8 (ITALIAN PROGRAM).

Symphony No. 1, in D major, Op. 16—Sgambati
Overture to the opera "Anacreon" .... Cherubini
Intermezzi Goldoniani, Op 127 .... Bossi
Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," Op. 32 (The Squabbles of the People of Chiozza) .... Sinigaglia

NO. 9.

Symphony No. 2, in G minor (K. 550) ...... Mozart
Concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra of strings .... J. S. Bach
(Solo violins, Messrs. Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack.)
Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13 .... Goldmark
"A Siegfried Idyl" .... Weber
Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92 .... Dvorak

NO. 10 (FRENCH PROGRAM).

Symphony No. 3, for orchestra and organ, Op. 78 .... Saint-Saens
Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun" .... Debussy
Three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24 .... Berlbaz
Overture to the opera "Gwendoline" ..... Chabrier

NO. 11

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74 .... Tschaikowsky
Overture Solonelle, Op. 73 .... Glazounoff
On the Steppes of Central Asia, orchestral sketch, Op. 7 .... Borodin
Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34 .... Rimsky-Korsakoff

NO. 12.

Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39 ..... Sibelius
Tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" (freely after Friedrich Nietsche), Op. 30 .... Richard Strauss
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72 .... Beethoven

[152]

BULLETIN
San Francisco, Cal.

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is coming to San Francisco in May and will give a series of concerts at Festival Hall has created intense interest among music lovers of California and that it will be greeted by a succession of crowded houses seems a foregone conclusion. This organization of one hundred instrumentalists, the pick of the profession, stands at the very head of symphonic orchestras, and during the thirty-three years of its experience it has never reached a higher pinnacle of perfection than under the present leader, Dr. Karl Muck.

The sale of seats for the series of twelve concerts will begin Monday morning at 343 Powell street, and at the St. Francis Hotel, with prices ranging from $7 to $25, according to location.

* * *

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S 34TH SEASON ENDS

Sixth Concert of Series Has Gay Programme.

FLORENCE HINKLE SOLOIST

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony Given Under Leadership of Dr. Muck. Programme, Aptly Chosen for Spring Season, Heartily Approved by Critical Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its 34th season of concerts in this city to a close last evening in Infantry Hall with its sixth and last concert of the present series, at which the soloist was Miss Florence Hinkle, who was also the soloist at the last concert last year.

The programmme was singularly gay and lively for one of its length, and aptly chosen for the spring season; and from the first bright notes of the symphony to the close of the overture, seemed to meet with favor from the audience, which though smaller in size, was as enthusiastic as at earlier concerts of the season.

In the order of its performance the programmme was as follows:

Beethoven ..... Symphony No. 8, F-major, Op. 93
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.
Mozart .... Aria, "Voi, che sapete," from .... "Le Nozze di Figaro"
Bach .. Suite No. 2, in B-minor, for Flute and .... Strings
(Hans von Buelow's Arrangement.)
I. Overture: Largo; Allegro.
II. Rondo: Allegretto espressivo.
III. Sarabande: Andante.
IV. Bourree I. and Bourree II.: Allegro molto.
V. Polonaise with Double: Moderato.
VI. Minuet.
VII. Badinerie: Presto.
Solo Flute, Mr. Andre Maquarre.
Bruch .. "Ave Maria," from "The Cross of Fire." .... A Dramatic Cantata, Op. 52
Goldmark ...... Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13

Of the nine symphonies of Beethoven the last two have been less often heard here than those which antedate them, and the eighth, given last evening, although performed here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra but a little over two years ago, had previously hardly been recorded among such productions.

Written by Beethoven at a sad period of his life, when out of health and embroiled in a family quarrel, the eighth symphony gives no hint of anything depressing, but is cheerful, bright and apparently full of humor. The composer's ability to rise above distressing details, which was shown in his serene fourth symphony, is again manifested in the eighth, which was given last evening in all its beauty under the skilful leadership of Dr. Muck. Gayly the first movement began and pursued its way like the jocular companionship of kindred spirits, to which was contrasted the more delicate second movement, which was played to perfection, as the wind instruments "ticked" a background for the delicate tracery of the strings.

With these the "tempo di Menuetto" taken at an ordinary pace, embellished by the beautiful "dialogue" for clarinet and horns, and the final loud and lively movement, combined to show again the skill in composition, and the wonderful working out of themes which have made these symphonies immortal. Beethoven called this symphony the "little" symphony, but in its way it is as impressive and as perfect as those which are more majestic and better known. In the hands of such performers as the Boston orchestra, directed by a master mind, it was a performance worthy of attention.

The Bach suite for flute and strings, the second orchestral number, with its old-time dance measures of various forms, was an agreeable continuation of the motive of cheer, admirably played by soloist and such of the orchestra as played the "sinfu', wee fiddles" or their deeper-toned brethren. Mr. Maquarre evolved from his instrument a beautiful tone, remarkably sustained, dominated by an intelligence and taste that made his performance an addition of unique quality to the list of the solos already contributed by members of the orchestra from time to time. In its rhythms the music had a flavor of the past, but in its interpretation it was of the sort that made it a welcome addition to a modern programme.

The last number on the programme, the Goldmark overture to "Sakuntala," was that which established the fame of the composer, who lived to see the opening of this year. It was played with a spirit that made it a fitting finale to a season of concerts that has maintained the standard of the orchestra.

Of the work of Miss Hinkle, one can speak only with praise, the purity of her voice; the beauty of its tone, the sincerity of her method have all been manifested at her previous appearances here; and the friends she made at the two concerts of the University Glee Club, at which she sang before singing with the Symphony Orchestra last year, as well as on that occasion, welcomed her back last evening, recalling her again and again after each appearance.

The Canzona was given with much charm, and the more serious "Ave Maria" with the depth of feeling it commanded.

While it is a matter of regret that the season has come to an end, it is with satisfaction that the announcement is made of six concerts to be given next season if all goes well. According to established custom they will be given on Tuesday evenings for which the dates have been set at Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11. A. W. C.

MME. MELBA HEADS LIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

Six Concerts Already Arranged for Next Season in Providence.

Mme. Melba will be the soloist at the first of the six concerts already arranged to be given in Providence by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. The concerts, as in recent years, will be given on Tuesday evenings and the following dates have been selected: Oct. 19, Nov. 23, Dec. 28, 1915; Feb. 8, March 7 and April 11, 1916.

As soloists, the management has been successful in engaging for this series of concerts artists of extraordinary high quality. In addition to Mme. Melba, who will sing on Oct. 19, prior to starting an extensive tour of America under the direction of C. A. Ellis of Boston, the American contralto, Mme. Louise Homer, who has long been a favorite in this city, has been secured.

For pianists, the orchestra offers Ernest Schelling and Miss Laeta Hartley, both Americans. Mr. Schelling, a pupil of the great Paderewski, has long been recognized as a pianist of highest quality. Miss Hartley is one of the younger pianists who had successful debuts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season.

The other two soloists will be drawn from the ranks of the orchestra and Providence concert lovers will have the first opportunity of hearing them. One is Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, and the other is Josef Malkin, who shares the 'cello honors with Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Malkin joined the orchestra last fall. He has long been regarded as one of the great 'cello virtuosos of Europe.

To-day the subscribers of this year's series of concerts will receive notices, informing them that to retain their seats they must notify the Boston office of the orchestra on or before June 1.

ETIN
n Francisco, Cal.
APR 15 1915

STON SYMPHONY TO BE WELCOMED

Much interest is centering on the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin a series of twelve concerts in Festival Hall, Friday evening, May 14.

This great organization, the finest of the kind in the world, was founded in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson of Boston, the orchestra then consisting of sixty musicians with the composer, Georg Henschel, as leader. He was succeeded three years later by Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna. After five years under Gericke, during which time the orchestra increased to one hundred musicians and became world famous, the great Arthur Nikisch came from Leipsic and conducted it for five years, giving way to Emil Paur, also from Leipsic.

Then Gericke came back for eight years, and, on his retirement, the orchestra had the good fortune to secure for two years the services of Dr. Karl Muck, general music director for the Royal Theater of the Kingdom of Prussia.

Dr. Muck is one of the most interesting personalities in the world of music and a conductor of genius. The orchestra, fine as it was before, has reached a height of achievement greater than ever under him, and has attained a popularity that is unique. In a regular season in Boston, it gives 110 concerts. Last season every seat was sold for every concert.

The subscription sale for the twelve concerts, eight of which will take place at night, is progressing at 343 Powell street with a very large demand. Mail orders, accompanied by funds, addressed to W. H. Leahy, will receive prompt attention and seats will be allotted as near to the location desired as is possible.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date APR 18 1915
Established:

MR. TOSCANINI TO CONDUCT AN ORCHESTRAL CONCERT THIS WEEK

The concert of orchestral musi which Mr. Toscanini is to conduct in th Metropolitan Opera House on Frida will challenge the attention of the p: trons of the concerts which have bee given by the Philharmonic and Syn phony societies and the Boston Orche tra. The programme is calculated pique a twofold curiosity. What w Mr. Toscanini do with such famili compositions as Brahms's Symphony D, and Beethoven's "Pastoral?" Th music does not give wide latitu in the matter of interpretatio nor does the overture to "Tan häuser." The conductor may be pected to bring out the virtuoso quality of the opera orchestra in Debussy's "La Mer," and in that capital piece of musical grotesquerie, Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The latter is the better known work, though the sketches in which Debussy has undertaken to picture the moods of old ocean have also been heard here. Sibelius's "En Saga" is practically a stranger to our concert rooms, though played here five years ago by the Boston Orchestra, but Roger-Ducasse's "Sarbande" is a complete novelty. It is not, as one might surmise from its title, a piece in the form of the old dance which used to hold a place in the suite and the operatic ballets of the 18th century, but a symphonic poem designed to illustrate a fragment taken from an old French chronicle. The passage runs as follows:

"In the morning of the next day the dead princeling was brought to the Abbey of Aisnay. Before passing away he had often requested with sweet amiability: 'Play for me the "Saraband," a dance of Spain which his favorite lutenist played most beautifully. And in his last agony he kept repeating, 'Play the "Saraband" for me.' Whereupon, as is often vouchsafed to the departing, the whole length of the roadway leading to the abbey seemed to resound with the 'Saraband'—viols, hautboys d'amour and flutes mingling its music with the psalms of the priests and clerks, and the frequent lamentations of the good Pope, who wept loudly. And at the same time all the bells rang out and all the church towers droned with the melodious music."

Sibelius's composition is a piece of programme music which the composer has left unprovided with a programme. It is like a song without words. The language of its title suggests that the tale, or story, or legend, which the composer leaves for the listener to construct, is Norse in character; yet Dr. Walter Niemann, who has written with enthusiastic appreciation about Sibelius as the greatest of all bards who have sung of the glories and sorrows of Finland, maintains that the underlying story is that of the Finnish people. In his opinion, "En Saga" is "one of the most magnificent, most heartrending and strongly affecting tone pictures of our time—in which, as one can perceive easily, Sibelius has set forth in tones for posterity the present lot of his people."

In support of this notion it can be urged that Sibelius has placed a distinctively national stamp upon much of his music by making it illustrative of episodes from the Finnish epic "Kalevala." It was thence he drew his "Swan of Tuonela," "Lemminkainen Journeys Homeward," "Pohjola's Daughter," "Kullerwo" and the three pianoforte pieces called "Kyilikki." But Sibelius is, by parentage, as much Swedish as he is Finnish, and his life has been passed under Russian political and artistic influences. His music is basically German, like all Scandinavian music, though it is tinged with the idioms of Swedish folksong and the spirit of Finnish literature. It could not well be different. The Finns have no racial relationship with the peoples of the northern peninsula under whose cultural influence they have lived for centuries. They are Ugrians and cousins german to the Hungarians and Turks. But their art music derives from Germany through Sweden.

"Saga" is not a Finnish word, but a Norse. Its root is the ancient Icelandic segja, "to say," which we recognize in the German sagen, the old English secgan, and which has preserved a meaning for the modern English "a saw." Originally, a saga was a tale that was told orally, handed down by word of mouth, as all history all law, all legends were till writin was invented. Its subject matte might be of any character—religiou mythical, historical, romantic, amator or what not; so long as it came direc ly, or remotely from the mouth of th sagaman it was a saga. This symphon poem resembles the pieces which S belius has written to illustrate stori from the "Kalevala," in that it is not wholly or strictly narrative, though it contains features which suggest the unfolding of a tale. On the whole, however, it seems to be a large mood picture, a delineation of a character of heroic stature under the influence of primordial passions, powers or agencies—such impulses as we naturally associate with life in the dark, damp, cold, misty and mystical Northland. There is much melancholy, much tenderly veiled gloom in the music. We hear it proclaimed in the triste melody sung by the clarinet early in the composition. But there is also an heroic energy in the rhythmical figure which takes possession of it at the climax, in which we hear something like the song of Ragnar Lodbrok: "We smote with swords!" The close, with its exquisitely beautiful clarinet song, accompanied by muted strings and overspread with the faint sheen which arises from the shivering cymbals, not clashed but gently pounded, suggests a pathetic outcome for the story, whatever it be.

H. E. K.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date
Establ

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HERE MAY 14

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin a series of twelve concerts in Festival Hall at the Exposition Friday evening, May 14. This great organization was founded in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson of Boston, the orchestra consisting of sixty musicians with the famous singer and composer, Georg Henschel, as leader, he being succeeded three years later by Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna. After five years under Gericke, during which time the orchestra of the 100 musicians became world famous, Arthur Nikisch came from Leipzig conducting for five years, giving way to Emil Paur, also from Leipzig, and who directed for a like number of years. Then Gericke came back and for eight years conducted and on his retirement the orchestra had the good fortune to secure for two years the services of Dr. Karl Muck, general music director for the royal theaters of the kingdom of Prussia, who is the present conductor.

Dr. Muck has wrought wonders with the orchestra. Fine as it was before, it has reached a height of achievement greater than ever before in its history.

The subscription sale of seats for the twelve concerts, eight of which will take place at night, is progressing.

Anton Witek, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is coming here.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 11
Estab

SYMPHONIC WORKS WORLD'S EPITOMI

Dr. Muck Will Lead Orchestra Through Twelve Great Programmes in May.

Interest is being shown on every side in the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is considered by all odds the music event of the year. A large number of applicants for tickets, season and otherwise, is an encouraging feature both as an expression of the appreciation of fine music and as a prop to the financial end of the venture, which has been brought under great expense.

Perhaps there is as much interest in Dr. Karl Muck himself as in the organized body of players under his direction, for Muck holds a wonderfu place in the mind and estimation of the world's musical fraternity and has gai ics. Of him H. T. Parker of Bost says: "Dr. Muck has held and heigh ened the orchestra in its techni range and perfection until there is range of virtuosity, however fleet, acting or subtle, left that it can do. He has schooled it to a sensu beauty of tone that ranges from exquisite finesse to a glowing spl dor. He has taught the orchestra phrase the song of its instruments though they were human voices, w the keenest musical sensibility dir ing them. He has made rhythm second nature and accent as an stinctive impulse. He stands in first rank of the conductors of time and has excelled all his predecessors with the orchestra."

The list of works for the twelve concerts will provide for many preferences and is an example of what breadth may be exercised in a season of this length. Several of these works have been made partially familiar to us during San Francisco's local symphony seasons and many others will be virtually new, and welcome, for hearsay knowledge has had to be sufficient for some of our musical residents. Two days will be devoted to French composers. There will be days for German composers, including an all-Wagner programme, a Russian day and an Italian day, with generous contributions from such other writers as all musical people are interested in.

The first concert will take place on the evening of May 14th, at 8:30 o'clock, in Festival Hall, when Dr. Muck will raise his baton over the Beethoven "Eroica" as the introductory number. Following will be the Brahms "Variations" on a theme by Josef Haydn, the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

The season will then present the following programme:

Saturday afternoon, May 15, 2:30 o'clock.
Overture, Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage ....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
"Surprise Symphony" ....Haydn
Indian Suite in E minor....MacDowell
Hungaria, symphonic poem ....Liszt
Sunday afternoon, May 16, 2:30 o'clock; French programme.
Symphony in D minor ....Cesar Franck
L'Apprenti Sorcier ....Dukas
L'Arlesienne, suite ....Bizet
Espana, rhapsody for orchestra....Chabrier
May 17, 8:30 o'clock.
Symphony in C minor ....Brahms
Suite for flute and strings....Bach
Symphony, Shepherd's music from the Christmas Oratorio ....Bach
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"....Beethoven
May 18th, 8:30 o'clock; Wagner programme.
Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version).
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to the "Meistersingers."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."
May 19th, 8:30 o'clock.
Overture to "Der Freischutz"....Weber
Symphony, No. 8, in F major....Beethoven
Symphonic sketches ....Chadwick
"Karelia."
"The Swan of Tuonela."
"Kalevala."
"Finlandia" ....Sibelius
May 20th, 8:30 o'clock.
Symphony, No. 2, in D major....Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"....Liszt
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration" ....Strauss
Prelude to "The Meistersingers"....Wagner
May 21st, 8:30 o'clock; Italian programme.
Symphony, No. 1, in D major....Sgambati
Overture to "Anacreon" ....Cherubini
Intermezzo Goldoniani ....Bossi
Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" ....Sinigaglia
May 22d, 2:30 o'clock.
Symphony, No. 2, in G minor....Mozart
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and orchestra of strings....Bach
Overture to "Sakuntala" ....Goldmark
"A Siegfried Idyl" ....Wagner
Overture, "Carnival" ....Dvorak
May 23, 2:30 o'clock; French programme.
Symphony, No. 3, in C minor for orchestra and organ ....Saint-Saens
Overture to the opera "Gwendoline"..Chabrier
Three Pieces from "The Damnation of Faust" ....Berlioz
Symphonic Poem, "Viviane" ....Chausson
May 24th, 8:30 o'clock; Russian programme.
Symphony, "Pathetic" ....Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Solenelle" ....Glazounoff
Orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia" ....Borodin
Caprice on Spanish Themes..Rimsky-Korsakoff
May 25th, 8:30 o'clock.
Symphony, No. 1, E minor....Sibelius
Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" ....Strauss
Overture, "Leonora" ....Beethoven

Dr. Karl Muck

From Examiner
Address Francisco, Cal
Date APR 14
Established:

BEST OF MUSIC WITH US SOON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Open Season Here on May 14.

BY REDFERN MASON.

On the evening of Friday, May 14, San Franciscans will gather in Festival Hall to hear an orchestra of which it is asserted by musicians of the highest authority that it is not merely the greatest orchestral organization in America but in the whole world.

The Boston Symphony will be with us just twelve days, and a concert will be given each day. The programme will include the cream of what is best in modern music, ranging from Haydn and Mozart to Richard Strauss and Sibelius and the American MacDowell and Chadwick.

Every taste will be considered. There will be the great Viennese composer, from Mozart to Brahms, for the classicist; Weber and Wagner for the lover of German opera; Cesar Franck, Chabrier and Saint-Saens for those who look for musical salvation to France; Rimsky Korsakworw, Glazounoff and Tschaikowsky for the Muscovite.

CAN TAKE YOUR PLEASURE.

If you are romantic, you can take your pleasure in the excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" of Hector Berlioz or the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala"; your Italian yearning will be satisfied by the performance of works of Cherubini, Sgambati, Sinigaglia and Bossi; when you have longings for inspired counterpoint old Johann Sebastian Bach will be played for you.

Never have twelve more charming programmes been prepared for the delectation of concert-goers than these players from Boston have arranged for this season in San Francisco.

And lest someone should ask whether these musical prophets are honored in their own country, it may be useful to remind the reader that, during the 110 concerts given by the Boston Symphony during its last season, every seat at every one of the concerts was sold.

STORY IS INSPIRING.

The very story of the evolution of the orchestra is inspiring. Henry L. Higginson founded it; Georg Henschel directed the efforts of the young orchestra; then Wilhelm Gericke, as stern a drill-master as ever wielded baton, gave the players the benefit of German discipline. This done, Arthur Nikisch brought to bear the force and poetry of his inspiring personality. Emil Pauer stirred the sang froid of the instrumentalists by his vitriolic leadership. Then came the schoolmasterly regime of Max Fiedler, and, last of this brilliant succession of directors, is the present conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who will direct the concerts in Festival Hall.

Local music-lovers are looking to the visit of the organization as to an event of the first significance in the musical history of the city.

From
Address San Francisco, Cal
Date APR - 4 1915
Establis

KARL MUCK WILL BE HERE TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concerts to Be Given in Festival Hall—Studio Musical Reveals Much Good Vocal Material.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are being looked forward to with the intensest interest, the approach of this famed orchestra perhaps creating more real excitement among musicians than any other musical event for some years past. Its caliber is so high and its reputation so wide that the men from Boston, under the splendid guidance of Dr. Karl Muck, will meet with great enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck has been conductor for the past nine years, and the orchestra's ten concerts each season in Boston are sold out several months before they begin. Twelve concerts will be given in Festival Hall, beginning May 14th, the organization coming directly from Boston and returning immediately upon the close of the final concert here on May 26th.

* * * *

[153]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date APR 18 1915
Established:

MR. TOSCANINI TO CONDUCT AN ORCHESTRAL CONCERT THIS WEEK

The concert of orchestral music which Mr. Toscanini is to conduct in the Metropolitan Opera House on Friday will challenge the attention of the patrons of the concerts which have been given by the Philharmonic and Symphony societies and the Boston Orchestra. The programme is calculated to pique a twofold curiosity. What will Mr. Toscanini do with such familiar compositions as Brahms's Symphony in D, and Beethoven's "Pastoral?" This music does not give wide latitude in the matter of interpretation; nor does the overture to "Tannhäuser." The conductor may be expected to bring out the virtuoso quality of the opera orchestra in Debussy's "La Mer," and in that capital piece of musical grotesquerie, Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The latter is the better known work, though the sketches in which Debussy has undertaken to picture the moods of old ocean have also been heard here. Sibelius's "En Saga" is practically a stranger to our concert rooms, though played here five years ago by the Boston Orchestra, but Roger-Ducasse's "Sarbande" is a complete novelty. It is not, as one might surmise from its title, a piece in the form of the old dance which used to hold a place in the suite and the operatic ballets of the 18th century, but a symphonic poem designed to illustrate a fragment taken from an old French chronicle. The passage runs as follows:

"In the morning of the next day the dead princeling was brought to the Abbey of Aisnay. Before passing away he had often requested with sweet amiability: 'Play for me the "Saraband," a dance of Spain which his favorite lutenist played most beautifully. And in his last agony he kept repeating, 'Play the "Saraband" for me.' Whereupon, as is often vouchsafed to the departing, the whole length of the roadway leading to the abbey seemed to resound with the 'Saraband'—viols, hautboys d'amour and flutes mingling its music with the psalms of the priests and clerks, and the frequent lamentations of the good Pope, who wept loudly. And at the same time all the bells rang out and all the church towers droned with the melodious music."

Sibelius's composition is a piece of programme music which the composer has left unprovided with a programme. It is like a song without words. The language of its title suggests that the tale, or story, or legend, which the composer leaves for the listener to construct, is Norse in character; yet Dr. Walter Niemann, who has written with enthusiastic appreciation about Sibelius as the greatest of all bards who have sung of the glories and sorrows of Finland, maintains that the underlying story is that of the Finnish people. In his opinion, "En Saga" is "one of the most magnificent, most heartrending and strongly affecting tone pictures of our time—in which, as one can perceive easily, Sibelius has set forth in tones for posterity the present lot of his people."

In support of this notion it can be urged that Sibelius has placed a distinctively national stamp upon much of his music by making it illustrative of episodes from the Finnish epic "Kalevala." It was thence he drew his "Swan of Tuonela," "Lemminkainen Journeys Homeward," "Pohjola's Daughter," "Kullerwo" and the three pianoforte pieces called "Kyllikki." But Sibelius is, by parentage, as much Swedish as he is Finnish, and his life has been passed under Russian political and artistic influences. His music is basically German, like all Scandinavian music, though it is tinged with the idioms of Swedish folksong and the spirit of Finnish literature. It could not well be different. The Finns have no racial relationship with the peoples of the northern peninsula under whose cultural influence they have lived for centuries. They are Ugrians and cousins german to the Hungarians and Turks. But their art music derives from Germany through Sweden.

"Saga" is not a Finnish word, but a Norse. Its root is the ancient Icelandic segja, "to say," which we recognize in the German sagen, the old English secgan, and which has preserved a meaning for the modern English "a saw." Originally, a saga was a tale that was told orally, handed down by word of mouth, as all history, all law, all legends were till writing was invented. Its subject matter might be of any character—religious, mythical, historical, romantic, amatory or what not; so long as it came directly, or remotely from the mouth of the sagaman it was a saga. This symphonic poem resembles the pieces which Sibelius has written to illustrate stories from the "Kalevala," in that it is not wholly or strictly narrative, though it contains features which suggest the unfolding of a tale. On the whole, however, it seems to be a large mood picture, a delineation of a character of heroic stature under the influence of primordial passions, powers or agencies—such impulses as we naturally associate with life in the dark, damp, cold, misty and mystical Northland. There is much melancholy, much tenderly veiled gloom in the music. We hear it proclaimed in the triste melody sung by the clarinet early in the composition. But there is also an heroic energy in the rhythmical figure which takes possession of it at the climax, in which we hear something like the song of Ragnar Lodbrok: "We smote with swords!" The close, with its exquisitely beautiful clarinet song, accompanied by muted strings and overspread with the faint sheen which arises from the shivering cymbals, not clashed but gently pounded, suggests a pathetic outcome for the story, whatever it be.

H. E. K.

CALL
s: San Francisco, Cal.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HERE MAY 14

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin a series of twelve concerts in Festival Hall at the Exposition Friday evening, May 14. This great organization was founded in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson of Boston, the orchestra consisting of sixty musicians with the famous singer and composer, Georg Henschel, as leader, he being succeeded three years later by Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna. After five years under Gericke, during which time the orchestra of the 100 musicians became world famous, Arthur Nikisch came from Leipzig conducting for five years, giving way to Emil Paur, also from Leipzig, and who directed for a like number of years. Then Gericke came back and for eight years conducted and on his retirement the orchestra had the good fortune to secure for two years the services of Dr. Karl Muck, general music director for the royal theaters of the kingdom of Prussia, who is the present conductor.

Dr. Muck has wrought wonders with the orchestra. Fine as it was before, it has reached a height of achievement greater than ever before in its history.

The subscription sale of seats for the twelve concerts, eight of which will take place at night, is progressing.

Anton Witek, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is coming here.

---

m CHRONICLE
'ess: San Francisco, Cal.
APR 11

MPHONIC WORKS ORLD'S EPITOME

Dr. Muck Will Lead Orchestra Through Twelve Great Programmes in May.

Interest is being shown on every side in the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is considered by all odds the music event of the year. A large number of applicants for tickets, season and otherwise, is an encouraging feature both as an expression of the appreciation of fine music and as a prop to the financial end of the venture, which has been brought under great expense.

Perhaps there is as much interest in Dr. Karl Muck himself as in the organized body of players under his direction, for Muck holds a wonderful place in the mind and estimation of the world's musical fraternity and has gain

ics. Of him H. T. Parker of Boston says: "Dr. Muck has held and heightened the orchestra in its technical range and perfection until there is no range of virtuosity, however fleet, exacting or subtle, left that it cannot do. He has schooled it to a sensuous beauty of tone that ranges from an exquisite finesse to a glowing splendor. He has taught the orchestra to phrase the song of its instruments as though they were human voices, with the keenest musical sensibility directing them. He has made rhythm as second nature and accent as an instinctive impulse. He stands in the first rank of the conductors of our time and has excelled all his predecessors with the orchestra."

The list of works for the twelve concerts will provide for many preferences and is an example of what breadth may be exercised in a season of this length. Several of these works have been made partially familiar to us during San Francisco's local symphony seasons and many others will be virtually new, and welcome, for hearsay knowledge has had to be sufficient for some of our musical residents. Two days will be devoted to French composers. There will be days for German composers, including an all-Wagner programme, a Russian day and an Italian day, with generous contributions from such other writers as all musical people are interested in.

The first concert will take place on the evening of May 14th, at 8:30 o'clock, in Festival Hall, when Dr. Muck will raise his baton over the Beethoven "Eroica" as the introductory number. Following will be the Brahms "Variations" on a theme by Josef Haydn, the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

The season will then present the following programme:

Saturday afternoon, May 15, 2:30 o'clock.
Overture, Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage .... Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
"Surprise Symphony" .... Haydn
Indian Suite in E minor........ MacDowell
Hungaria, symphonic poem .... Liszt

Sunday afternoon, May 16, 2:30 o'clock; French programme.
Symphony in D minor .... Cesar Franck
L'Apprenti Sorcier .... Dukas
L'Arlesienne, suite .... Bizet
Espana, rhapsody for orchestra........ Chabrier

May 17, 8:30 o'clock.
Symphony in C minor .... Brahms
Suite for flute and strings........ Bach
Symphony, Shepherd's music from the Christmas Oratorio .... Bach
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont".... Beethoven

May 18th, 8:30 o'clock; Wagner programme.
Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version).
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to the "Meistersingers."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

May 19th, 8:30 o'clock.
Overture to "Der Freischutz"........ Weber
Symphony, No. 8, in F major...... Beethoven
Symphonic sketches .... Chadwick
"Karelia."
"The Swan of Tuonela."
"Kalevala."
"Finlandia" .... Sibelius

May 20th, 8:30 o'clock.
Symphony, No. 2, in D major........ Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"...... Liszt
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration" .... Strauss
Prelude to "The Meistersingers"...... Wagner

May 21st, 8:30 o'clock; Italian programme.
Symphony, No. 1, in D major....... Sgambati
Overture to "Anacreon" .... Cherubini
Intermezzo Goldoniani .... Bossi
Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" .... Sinigaglia

May 22d, 2:30 o'clock.
Symphony, No. 2, in G minor........ Mozart
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and orchestra of strings........ Bach
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
"A Siegfried Idyl" .... Wagner
Overture, "Carnival" .... Dvorak

May 23, 2:30 o'clock; French programme.
Symphony, No. 3, in C minor for orchestra and organ .... Saint-Saens
Overture to the opera "Gwendoline".. Chabrier
Three Pieces from "The Damnation of Faust" .... Berlioz
Symphonic Poem, "Viviane" ...... Chausson

May 24th, 8:30 o'clock; Russian programme.
Symphony, "Pathetic" .... Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Solenelle" .... Glazounoff
Orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia" .... Borodin
Caprice on Spanish Themes.. Rimsky-Korsakoff

May 25th, 8:30 o'clock.
Symphony, No. 1, E minor........ Sibelius
Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" .... Strauss
Overture, "Leonora" .... Beethoven

Dr. Karl Muck

---

amine
Francisco, Cal
APR 14

EST OF MUSIC WITH US SOON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Open Season Here on May 14.

BY REDFERN MASON.

On the evening of Friday, May 14, San Franciscans will gather in Festival Hall to hear an orchestra of which it is asserted by musicians of the highest authority that it is not merely the greatest orchestral organization in America but in the whole world.

The Boston Symphony will be with us just twelve days, and a concert will be given each day. The programme will include the cream of what is best in modern music, ranging from Haydn and Mozart to Richard Strauss and Sibelius and the American MacDowell and Chadwick.

Every taste will be considered. There will be the great Viennese composer, from Mozart to Brahms, for the classicist; Weber and Wagner for the lover of German opera; Cesar Franck, Chabrier and Saint-Saens for those who look for musical salvation to France; Rimsky Korsakworw, Glazounoff and Tschaikowsky for the Muscovite.

CAN TAKE YOUR PLEASURE.

If you are romantic, you can take your pleasure in the excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" of Hector Berlioz or the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala"; your Italian yearning will be satisfied by the performance of works of Cherubini, Sgambati, Sinigaglia and Bossi; when you have longings for inspired counterpoint old Johann Sebastian Bach will be played for you.

Never have twelve more charming programmes been prepared for the delectation of concert-goers than these players from Boston have arranged for this season in San Francisco.

And lest someone should ask whether these musical prophets are honored in their own country, it may be useful to remind the reader that, during the 110 concerts given by the Boston Symphony during its last season, every seat at every one of the concerts was sold.

STORY IS INSPIRING.

The very story of the evolution of the orchestra is inspiring. Henry L. Higginson founded it; Georg Henschel directed the efforts of the young orchestra; then Wilhelm Gericke, as stern a drill-master as ever wielded baton, gave the players the benefit of German discipline. This done, Arthur Nikisch brought to bear the force and poetry of his inspiring personality. Emil Pauer stirred the sang froid of the instrumentalists by his vitriolic leadership. Then came the schoolmasterly regime of Max Fiedler, and, last of this brilliant succession of directors, is the present conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who will direct the concerts in Festival Hall.

Local music-lovers are looking to the visit of the organization as to an event of the first significance in the musical history of the city.

From
Address San Francisco, Cal
Date APR 4 1915
Establis

KARL MUCK WILL BE HERE TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concerts to Be Given in Festival Hall—Studio Musical Reveals Much Good Vocal Material.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are being looked forward to with the intensest interest, the approach of this famed orchestra perhaps creating more real excitement among musicians than any other musical event for some years past. Its caliber is so high and its reputation so wide that the men from Boston, under the splendid guidance of Dr. Karl Muck, will meet with great enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck has been conductor for the past nine years, and the orchestra's ten concerts each season in Boston are sold out several months before they begin. Twelve concerts will be given in Festival Hall, beginning May 14th, the organization coming directly from Boston and returning immediately upon the close of the final concert here on May 26th.

* * * *

[133]

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 24,

ELSON'S REVIEW OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

A FINE PIANIST ON PROGRAMME

MacDowell Orchestral Work Meets Favor—His "Indian Suite" of Merit

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME

MacDowell—"Indian Suite."
Mozart—Concerto in D Minor.
Weber—Concertstueck, for Piano and Orchestra.
Pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.
Debussy—"Afternoon of a Faun."
Nowskowski—"The Steppe."

A programme which did not force one to think too deeply and which was somewhat pictorial in its style. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" claims the merit, if there be any merit in it, of introducing some real Indian themes. We are not at all in sympathy with the efforts to build a national style of music upon the foundation of the musical phrases of the aborigines. When Dvorak or Chadwick brought in the flavor of the Southern plantation in their symphonic music, it was clearly recognizable to every auditor. But we cannot imagine any auditor, even of the most musical nature, being able to absolutely identify what parts of the Indian Suite are aboriginal. That the work sounds beautiful is no especial recommendation for the Indian phrases used, for we may remember the French cook who could make a delicious Ragout out of an old glove saying, "it all lies in the sauce." In such a work as this it all lies in the treatment, which is so entirely civilized that we doubt if any Indian would recognize his suite.

The first number, "Legend," was full of poetic dreaminess and led up to a more powerful climax. The second and fourth movements ("Love song" and "Dirge") were perhaps too much in the same subdued vein, but in the "War-song" Dr. Muck brandished his tomahawk—we should say his baton—vehemently, as if he were going after the scalps of all the ultra-modern composers. The picturesque effect of the braves galloping away was splendidly shaded. The final movement—in the village—seemed to indicate that the redskins take their pleasures either sadly or noisily, but it made a very successful ending to the Suite, which was applauded vociferously until the orchestra was obliged to rise in response.

Comparative Stranger

Debussy's Faun has not nad an afternoon at the Symphony for some time. The last afternoon of this melancholy individual in Boston was in the evening when George Copeland turned him into a piano solo. There is nothing new to be said about the work. It has been given some two dozen times by our Symphony Orchestra and we have become inured to its pensive sadness. It wears better than we thought it would. It is far better than "The Sea," by the same composer. He is more at home in the woods than on the waves. But it is not a case where we pass from the stage of enduring, to that of embracing. We consider the composition a poetic example in a dainty pastoral school. Watteau is not Michael Angelo, and when Debussy decries Schumann and patronizes Wagner we feel doubtful of the composer ever growing more versatile.

Dr. Muck entered heartily into the spirit of the work. It was as if Keats' poetry had been translated into instrumental music. All the daintiness of the work was given with great finesse, and one could only praise the interpretation; but there was one thing that we could not praise. The delicate work was given after the most fiery and theatrical number of the programme,—Weber's very military and ecstatic picture of the Crusader's return—"Concert-piece"—and was made as ineffective as possible by the juxtaposition. One does not serve Arrack punch before Chateau Yquem; one does not read Jack London just before Keats; the poor faun was about crushed with Weber coming before it and Nowskowski directly after. But we are becoming sufficiently interested in this faun to be curious as to how he would behave at 9 a.m. We have had the p.m. pensiveness; let Debussy add the a.m. activity.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch (may we suggest to the reader to accent the "O"?) is evidently a growing artist; one endowed not only with an abundant technique, but with a poetic nature as well. It was exceptional to hear a soloist give two concerted pieces in a single symphony concert, but there was a certain advantage in this case, for the versatility of the pianist was made very evident thereby. A stronger contrast could not be imagined than that between Mozart's concerto and Weber's Concert-piece. The one all conservative, classical, symmetrical, and "Absolute," not "Programme-music," the other theatrical, and giving a picture of a Crusader returning from the wars. The flavor of the footlights is in Weber's music and it demands a totally different style of interpretation from that required by Mozart. Yet let no one imagine that Mozart is an easy matter to play. One can hide a dozen slips and errors in a modern concerto, but every false note would stand out in a Mozart concerto like a flaw in a crystal.

No Such Flaws

There were no such flaws yesterday afternoon, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave excellent support in just the proper unforced vein.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch played with limpid purity and, although delicate in most of the work, did not make it effeminate. The cadenzas were very modern and brilliant, yet did not seem to oppose the concerto in [illegible] these old masters (especially Mozart and Haydn) seem to have faded most, but even here there was a brilliant episode in the centre which saved the movement from monotony. There was great applause after each movement, an ovation at the end.

But the real triumph was made in Weber's Concert-piece. This is not often heard nowadays. It is ten years since poor Reisenauer played it in Boston. Gabrilowitsch gave it with tremendous effect, working up to a climax that was full of bravura. The whole story was easily understood, and at the end the audience went fairly wild with enthusiasm. Well, Mr. Gabrilowitsch thoroughly deserved it, but all the same we think it a bad precedent to allow an instrumentalist to give two long numbers on a single symphony programme.

Then came "The Steppe"; our fair readers will at once ask was it a two-steppe or a one-steppe? As much of it was chromatic we should say it was chiefly half-steppe. Although Nowskowski is Polish, he has steeped himself in the glorious Russian melodies, and they were here in full force,—the Cossack dances, the Muscovite songs of triumph, the barbaric splendor of military marches. Russia has such a wealth of noble song that she will probably remain melodic for generations to come, while Germany is becoming merely modulatory.

The reading of the work was superb and many remained to applaud instead of rushing for the corridors. The concert was a trifle extended, but it is a long journey from the American prairies to the Russian Steppes.

BOSTON GLOBE—

APRIL 24,

NOTABLE CONCERT.

Symphony Rehearsal One of True Inspiration.

Dr Muck and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Soloist, Vie in Their Art.

The 22d Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon will be remembered as a brilliant occasion in the waning season. The program was unusual. A soloist who stands alone as a pianist of musicianship of intelligence and of poetic perceptions, was present in Mr Gabrilowitsch. Dr Muck and the orchestra, always the makers of artistic musical standards for the community, outdid themselves in their inspiration and the emotional fullness of beauty.

MacDowell's "Indian" suite, music conceived in an epic vein, was played in an appropriate manner. The composer has said that the themes employed in his work were chosen for the greater part from Indian sources. The different movements bear titles indicative of Indian life. But the significance of the music is beyond any implied characterization in tone of the American savage. It has been thought by some that the work of the American composer lacks identity, individuality, a National idiom.

The contention of "nationality" in music is largely a fatuous one. Music develops through epochs rather than through nationalities; but to those familiar with the pine forests of New England, temples that well might have been the habitation of a past and stalwart race, this score has a character which is poignant and searching in its emotional appeal.

It is music of nature, of her vast stillness, of the stress of her storms, of the procession of changing seasons; music that depicts the gayety of elemental man, his savage strife and ambitions, but underneath there is ever the note of gravity, a sadness, the portent as if something to come. It is a score of which every American should be proud, one that holds a lofty expression of poetic beauty.

Debussy's Prelude.

The performance of Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" was one of as perfect appreciation in its own manner. It was a marvelous reading in exquisite sensuousness, in variety and delicacy of color tints, in plasticity of nuance and in continuity.

Noskowski's "The Steppe," whatever its program, begins and ends with a passage of modal harmonies, streaming from divided strings like light through a cathedral window which are of unearthly beauty. There is little suggestion of the terror or the solitude of the desert.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch gave a consummate exhibition of artistic piano playing in Mozart's concerto in D minor. The clarity, delicacy, patrician elegance and pervading grace of the classically romantic music were wrought into tone as by magic. Such treatment of the piano—that of a superb technician, a sterling musician and above all that of a poet and a romanticist—cannot be recalled among all the efforts of the various exponents.

Resonant Oldtimer.

Fortunately the intermission divided MacDowell's noble music and this heavenly concerto from Weber's trumpery old concert piece—F minor—which Mr Gabrilowitsch chose to add. Boarding-school graduates have tested its endurance. We have heard our grandmothers and maiden aunts tell of its glories, and can see their orderly rows of curls tremble with the emotion it inspired in them.

Mr Gabrilowitsch assumed for the time the pompous and showy virtuosity of the music and its period, and swept the keyboard with aplomb, until another generation might have rubbed its eyes to see the old piece in all its furbelows. Soloist, conductor and orchestra galloped through it bravely, nostrils dilated, mane and tail in air, and great was the enjoyment of the men. The audience fairly hung upon Mr Gabrilowitsch's neck for joy.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

APRIL 24,

GABRILOWITSCH IN FINE FETTLE

Pianist Divides Honors With the Symphony Orchestra.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch's artistic performance of the Mozart concerto in D minor and of Weber's "Concert Piece" in F minor was enthusiastically applauded yesterday by the large audience attending the first of this week's Symphony concerts. But no less impressive was the work of the orchestra, which played MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the Noskowski tone poem, "The Steppe."

The brilliant Russian pianist was recalled repeatedly after his two solos—and two solos by the same performer are rare features of a Symphony program—and one of the numerous ovations of the season was awarded Dr. Muck and the orchestra after the spirited and poetical performance of MacDowell's suite.

The program this week is one of the most interesting of the season. The Mozart concerto reappears after an absence of 29 years; the Weber number is revived after a lapse of a decade; "The Steppe" is brought out again for the first time since Dr. Muck's initial season and the Debussy tone poem was last conducted at these concerts by Mr. Fiedler in 1911. These works would be welcome if only as rarities, but, like the "Indian Suite," they are beautiful, each in a different style, and they lend remarkable variety and artistic merit to the program.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch's performance was profoundly impressive on account of its clarity, brilliancy and esthetic feeling. The elegance of the Mozart concerto and the flashing virtuosity of the Weber "Concertstuecke" were both set forth with the utmost effectiveness.

Next week the orchestra will play the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor, Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, Smetana's symphonic poem, "From Bohemia's Gravoes and Meadows," and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

The final program of the season, to be played May 7 and 8, will include Beethoven's fifth symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa;" a Strauss tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers."

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 24,

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE IS DELIGHTED

Gabrilowitsch's Artistry Gives Rare Pleasure

BY OLIN DOWNES

Even for the standard observed at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the public rehearsal held yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall was of unusual interest. The orchestral music included MacDowell's "Indian Suite"; Debussy's "Prelude a L'Apres-midi d'un Faun," and Noskowski's symphonic poem, "The Steppe." And this music, remarkably performed, was but half the tale, since Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist, interpreted music by Mozart and Weber with a brilliancy and versatility of style that no great artist who has appeared in recent seasons with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has surpassed.

CHOSE OLD FAMILIARS

The Post has had occasion this season to refer more than once to the splendid development and the [illegible] maturity of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's talent as a pianist. Yesterday he provided unique pleasure. He had chosen the Mozart piano concerto in D minor, and the concert-piece of Weber in F minor, more familiar to audiences of half a century ago than to those of today. Few pianists would have had the initiative and the daring to play these two pieces in one concert; still fewer would have been so successful as Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Every note in the concerto of Mozart was the accomplishment of a great artist.

In the beauty of every tone, the treatment of each phrase and figure and the sterling musicianship which Mr. Gabrilowitsch displayed, he gave a performance that was almost unsurpassable in its technical perfection and its exquisite art.

Every Tone a Jewel

Another matter should be emphasized. If Mr. Gabrilowitsch had played a concerto by Liszt or Tschaikowsky comment upon his technic would be entirely superfluous and beside the mark. The mechanical consideration no longer enters into the mind of the hearer when Mr. Gabrilowitsch appears, but the technic which he displayed in the extremely simple and difficult music of Mozart really deserves a treatise in itself. To smash a piano and exult in speed and power is one thing, but to play a slow movement with such a wonderful sing to the tone, and an articulation of phrase and melody as expressive and varied, or rather more so than the most sensitve inflection in speech, and to play the last movement of the concerto heard yesterday with such magical speed, clearness, and finesse that every tone was like a jewel in itself—this was, indeed, an apotheosis of the art of the pianist. And worthily was this art expended, for the classical balance and the romantic content of this concerto of Mozart is one of the wonders of musical literature. It should also be said that Dr. Muck's accompaniment was not only as important, but as difficult and as notable an achievement as that of the pianist.

Elegance of Weber

Then Mr. Gabrilowitsch turned over his page, as it were, and played the old-fashioned music of Weber—far more old-fashioned than that of his predecessor, Mozart—with an elegance and elan which carried everyone away. One might say that this gallant and showy music fairly cavorted over the keyboard. But in speaking a little condescendingly of Weber and his flourishes let us not forget Weber and his melody and his piano style that was so new and so colorful in its time, and also the youth and the romantic spirit which sanctifies for us, at least, many measures of convention and artifice now time worn with which the piece abounds. In the singing of the melodies Mr. Gabrilowitsch was a poet, and in the finale with its gayety and inimitable savoir faire, he was simply a conqueror.

It was astonishing that the wires did not smoke with the intrepid virtuosity of that performance. Those glissandos, like lightning flashes, those mighty crescendos, the scales and passage work that seemed to ride in tournament over the key-board! This performance was as intoxicating as the performance of Mozart's concerto was in the highest sense beautiful. It is seldom that a soloist at an orchestral concert necessitates extended comment on the part of the reviewer, and it is seldom that he is not accorded by the public more prominence than he should be given in an orchestral programme, but yesterday the playing of Mr. Gabrilowitsch was so masterly that his achievement stood by the side of the works of Dr. Muck and his men.

MacDowell's Suite

The orchestral music was engrossing. MacDowell's suite is so individual and poetic, so rich in its harmonic and orchestral dress, and so simple and happy in its workmanship that it must rank, not only as the greatest piece of orchestral music which this country has yet produced, but also as one of the great orchestral compositions of the last quarter century. Dr. Muck's reading was in the nature of a new revelation of its beauty. What wonder, then, that the audience sat absorbed and in sorrow for the untimely end of a man whom America so sorely needed.

The hearer who is not obliged to peruse scores in preparation for professional listening need only enjoy such a performance as that of Dubussy's Prelude, but perhaps its complete significance is only to be understood by an orchestral player or conductor, or in part by those who know just enough of the music to realize its demands upon the interpreter. Dr. Muck seemed to have made this amazing music part of him. It would not have been his own admirable performance if every color, sonority and nuance had been that of other conductors. There were new vistas of color and sonority, additional evidences of the exactness and logic of a piece of music which has seemed through many hearings to be so magically written that no one of the laws of its structure or trace of the origin of its musical being can be discovered. Surely there is no work which condenses into a few pages so much sheer genius. And in interpreting this piece Dr. Muck was assisted incomparably by his players, particularly those of the wood wind.

Noskowski's poem is good second rate music, competently put together, and especially suggestive of vast plains and spaces in its introduction and conclusion. The concert was unusually long. It was also rarely entertaining.

[154]

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 24,

ELSON'S REVIEW OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

A FINE PIANIST ON PROGRAMME

MacDowell Orchestral Work Meets Favor—His "Indian Suite" of Merit

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME

MacDowell—"Indian Suite."
Mozart—Concerto in D Minor.
Weber—Concertstueck, for Piano and Orchestra.
Pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.
Debussy—"Afternoon of a Faun."
Nowskowski—"The Steppe."

A programme which did not force one to think too deeply and which was somewhat pictorial in its style. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" claims the merit, if there be any merit in it, of introducing some real Indian themes. We are not at all in sympathy with the efforts to build a national style of music upon the foundation of the musical phrases of the aborigines. When Dvorak or Chadwick brought in the flavor of the Southern plantation in their symphonic music, it was clearly recognizable to every auditor. But we cannot imagine any auditor, even of the most musical nature, being able to absolutely identify what parts of the Indian Suite are aboriginal. That the work sounds beautiful is no especial recommendation for the Indian phrases used, for we may remember the French cook who could make a delicious Ragout out of an old glove saying, "it all lies in the sauce." In such a work as this it all lies in the treatment, which is so entirely civilized that we doubt if any Indian would recognize his suite.

The first number, "Legend," was full of poetic dreaminess and led up to a more powerful climax. The second and fourth movements ("Love song" and "Dirge") were perhaps too much in the same subdued vein, but in the "War-song" Dr. Muck brandished his tomahawk—we should say his baton—vehemently, as if he were going after the scalps of all the ultramodern composers. The picturesque effect of the braves galloping away was splendidly shaded. The final movement—in the village—seemed to indicate that the redskins take their pleasures either sadly or noisily, but it made a very successful ending to the Suite, which was applauded vociferously until the orchestra was obliged to rise in response.

Comparative Stranger

Debussy's Faun has not nad an afternoon at the Symphony for some time. The last afternoon of this melancholy individual in Boston was in the evening when George Copeland turned him into a piano solo. There is nothing new to be said about the work. It has been given some two dozen times by our Symphony Orchestra and we have become inured to its pensive sadness. It wears better than we thought it would. It is far better than "The Sea," by the same composer. He is more at home in the woods than on the waves. But it is not a case where we pass from the stage of enduring, to that of embracing. We consider the composition a poetic example in a dainty pastoral school. Watteau is not Michael Angelo, and when Debussy decries Schumann and patronizes Wagner we feel doubtful of the composer ever growing more versatile.

Dr. Muck entered heartily into the spirit of the work. It was as if Keats' poetry had been translated into instrumental music. All the daintiness of the work was given with great finesse, and one could only praise the interpretation; but there was one thing that we could not praise. The delicate work was given after the most fiery and theatrical number of the programme,—Weber's very military and ecstatic picture of the Crusader's return—"Concert-piece"—and was made as ineffective as possible by the juxtaposition. One does not serve Arrack punch before Chateau Yquem; one does not read Jack London just before Keats; the poor faun was about crushed with Weber coming before it and Nowskowski directly after. But we are becoming sufficiently interested in this faun to be curious as to how he would behave at 9 a.m. We have had the p.m. pensiveness; let Debussy add the a.m. activity.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch (may we suggest to the reader to accent the "O"?) is evidently a growing artist; one endowed not only with an abundant technique, but with a poetic nature as well. It was exceptional to hear a soloist give two concerted pieces in a single symphony concert, but there was a certain advantage in this case, for the versatility of the pianist was made very evident thereby. A stronger contrast could not be imagined than that between Mozart's concerto and Weber's Concert-piece. The one all conservative, classical, symmetrical, and "Absolute," not "Programme-music," the other theatrical, and giving a picture of a Crusader returning from the wars. The flavor of the footlights is in Weber's music and it demands a totally different style of interpretation from that required by Mozart. Yet let no one imagine that Mozart is an easy matter to play. One can hide a dozen slips and errors in a modern concerto, but every false note would stand out in a Mozart concerto like a flaw in a crystal.

No Such Flaws

There were no such flaws yesterday afternoon, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave excellent support in just the proper unforced vein.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch played with limpid purity and, although delicate in most of the work, did not make it effeminate. The cadenzas were very modern and brilliant, yet did not seem to oppose the concerto in [illegible] w mov[illegible] these old masters (especially Mozart and Haydn) seem to have faded most, but even here there was a brilliant episode in the centre which saved the movement from monotony. There was great applause after each movement, an ovation at the end.

But the real triumph was made in Weber's Concert-piece. This is not often heard nowadays. It is ten years since poor Reisenauer played it in Boston. Gabrilowitsch gave it with tremendous effect, working up to a climax that was full of bravura. The whole story was easily understood, and at the end the audience went fairly wild with enthusiasm. Well, Mr. Gabrilowitsch thoroughly deserved it, but all the same we think it a bad precedent to allow an instrumentalist to give two long numbers on a single symphony programme.

Then came "The Steppe"; our fair readers will at once ask was it a two-steppe or a one-steppe? As much of it was chromatic we should say it was chiefly half-steppe. Although Nowskowski is Polish, he has steeped himself in the glorious Russian melodies, and they were here in full force,—the Cossack dances, the Muscovite songs of triumph, the barbaric splendor of military marches. Russia has such a wealth of noble song that she will probably remain melodic for generations to come, while Germany is becoming merely modulatory.

The reading of the work was superb and many remained to applaud instead of rushing for the corridors. The concert was a trifle extended, but it is a long journey from the American prairies to the Russian Steppes.

BOSTON GLOBE—

APRIL 24,

NOTABLE CONCERT.

Symphony Rehearsal One of True Inspiration.

Dr Muck and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Soloist, Vie in Their Art.

The 22d Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon will be remembered as a brilliant occasion in the waning season. The program was unusual. A soloist who stands alone as a pianist of musicianship of intelligence and of poetic perceptions, was present in Mr Gabrilowitsch. Dr Muck and the orchestra, always the makers of artistic musical standards for the community, outdid themselves in their inspiration and the emotional fullness of beauty.

MacDowell's "Indian" suite, music conceived in an epic vein, was played in an appropriate manner. The composer has said that the themes employed in his work were chosen for the greater part from Indian sources. The different movements bear titles indicative of Indian life. But the significance of the music is beyond any implied characterization in tone of the American savage. It has been thought by some that the work of the American composer lacks identity, individuality, a National idiom.

The contention of "nationality" in music is largely a fatuous one. Music develops through epochs rather than through nationalities; but to those familiar with the pine forests of New England, temples that well might have been the habitation of a past and stalwart race, this score has a character which is poignant and searching in its emotional appeal.

It is music of nature, of her vast stillness, of the stress of her storms, of the procession of changing seasons; music that depicts the gayety of elemental man, his savage strife and ambitions, but underneath there is ever the note of gravity, a sadness, the portent as if something to come. It is a score of which every American should be proud, one that holds a lofty expression of poetic beauty.

Debussy's Prelude.

The performance of Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" was one of as perfect appreciation in its own manner. It was a marvelous reading in exquisite sensuousness, in variety and delicacy of color tints, in plasticity of nuance and in continuity.

Noskowski's "The Steppe," whatever its program, begins and ends with a passage of modal harmonies, streaming from divided strings like light through a cathedral window which are of unearthly beauty. There is little suggestion of the terror or the solitude of the desert.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch gave a consummate exhibition of artistic piano playing in Mozart's concerto in D minor. The clarity, delicacy, patrician elegance and pervading grace of the classically romantic music were wrought into tone as by magic. Such treatment of the piano—that of a superb technician, a sterling musician and above all that of a poet and a romanticist—cannot be recalled among all the efforts of the various exponents.

Resonant Oldtimer.

Fortunately the intermission divided MacDowell's noble music and this heavenly concerto from Weber's trumpery old concert piece—F minor—which Mr Gabrilowitsch chose to add. Boarding-school graduates have tested its endurance. We have heard our grandmothers and maiden aunts tell of its glories, and can see their orderly rows of curls tremble with the emotion it inspired in them.

Mr Gabrilowitsch assumed for the time the pompous and showy virtuosity of the music and its period, and swept the keyboard with aplomb, until another generation might have rubbed its eyes to see the old piece in all its furbelows. Soloist, conductor and orchestra galloped through it bravely, nostrils dilated, mane and tail in air, and great was the enjoyment of the men. The audience fairly hung upon Mr Gabrilowitsch's neck for joy.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

APRIL 24,

GABRILOWITSCH IN FINE FETTLE

Pianist Divides Honors With the Symphony Orchestra.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch's artistic performance of the Mozart concerto in D minor and of Weber's "Concert Piece" in F minor was enthusiastically applauded yesterday by the large audience attending the first of this week's Symphony concerts. But no less impressive was the work of the orchestra, which played MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the Noskowski tone poem, "The Steppe."

The brilliant Russian pianist was recalled repeatedly after his two solos—and two solos by the same performer are rare features of a Symphony program—and one of the numerous ovations of the season was awarded Dr. Muck and the orchestra after the spirited and poetical performance of MacDowell's suite.

The program this week is one of the most interesting of the season. The Mozart concerto reappears after an absence of 29 years; the Weber number is revived after a lapse of a decade; "The Steppe" is brought out again for the first time since Dr. Muck's initial season and the Debussy tone poem was last conducted at these concerts by Mr. Fiedler in 1911. These works would be welcome if only as rarities, but, like the "Indian Suite," they are beautiful, each in a different style, and they lend remarkable variety and artistic merit to the program.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch's performance was profoundly impressive on account of its clarity, brilliancy and esthetic feeling. The elegance of the Mozart concerto and the flashing virtuosity of the Weber "Concertstuecke" were both set forth with the utmost effectiveness.

Next week the orchestra will play the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor, Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, Smetana's symphonic poem, "From Bohemia's Gravoes and Meadows," and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

The final program of the season, to be played May 7 and 8, will include Beethoven's fifth symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa;" a Strauss tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers."

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 24,

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE IS DELIGHTED

Gabrilowitsch's Artistry Gives Rare Pleasure

BY OLIN DOWNES

Even for the standard observed at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the public rehearsal held yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall was of unusual interest. The orchestral music included MacDowell's "Indian Suite"; Debussy's "Prelude a L'Apres-midi d'un Faun," and Noskowski's symphonic poem. "The Steppe." And this music, remarkably performed, was but half the tale, since Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist, interpreted music by Mozart and Weber with a brilliancy and versatility of style that no great artist who has appeared in recent seasons with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has surpassed.

CHOSE OLD FAMILIARS

The Post has had occasion this season to refer more than once to the splendid development and the pre[illegible] maturity of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's talent as a pianist. Yesterday he provided unique pleasure. He had chosen the Mozart piano concerto in D minor, and the concert-piece of Weber in F minor, more familiar to audiences of half a century ago than to those of today. Few pianists would have had the initiative and the daring to play these two pieces in one concert; still fewer would have been so successful as Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Every note in the concerto of Mozart was the accomplishment of a great artist.

In the beauty of every tone, the treatment of each phrase and figure and the sterling musicianship which Mr. Gabrilowitsch displayed, he gave a performance that was almost unsurpassable in its technical perfection and its exquisite art.

Every Tone a Jewel

Another matter should be emphasized. If Mr. Gabrilowitsch had played a concerto by Liszt or Tschaikowsky comment upon his technic would be entirely superfluous and beside the mark. The mechanical consideration no longer enters into the mind of the hearer when Mr. Gabrilowitsch appears, but the technic which he displayed in the extremely simple and difficult music of Mozart really deserves a treatise in itself. To smash a piano and exult in speed and power is one thing, but to play a slow movement with such a wonderful sing to the tone, and an articulation of phrase and melody as expressive and varied, or rather more so than the most sensitve inflection in speech, and to play the last movement of the concerto heard yesterday with such magical speed, clearness, and finesse that every tone was like a jewel in itself—this was, indeed, an apotheosis of the art of the pianist. And worthily was this art expended, for the classical balance and the romantic content of this concerto of Mozart is one of the wonders of musical literature. It should also be said that Dr. Muck's accompaniment was not only as important, but as difficult and as notable an achievement as that of the pianist.

Elegance of Weber

Then Mr. Gabrilowitsch turned over his page, as it were, and played the old-fashioned music of Weber—far more old-fashioned than that of his predecessor, Mozart—with an elegance and elan which carried everyone away. One might say that this gallant and showy music fairly cavorted over the keyboard. But in speaking a little condescendingly of Weber and his flourishes let us not forget Weber and his melody and his piano style that was so new and so colorful in its time, and also the youth and the romantic spirit which sanctifies for us, at least, many measures of convention and artifice now time worn with which the piece abounds. In the singing of the melodies Mr. Gabrilowitsch was a poet, and in the finale with its gayety and inimitable savoir faire, he was simply a conqueror.

It was astonishing that the wires did not smoke with the intrepid virtuosity of that performance. Those glissandos, like lightning flashes, those mighty crescendos, the scales and passage work that seemed to ride in tournament over the key-board! This performance was as intoxicating as the performance of Mozart's concerto was in the highest sense beautiful. It is seldom that a soloist at an orchestral concert necessitates extended comment on the part of the reviewer, and it is seldom that he is not accorded by the public more prominence than he should be given in an orchestral programme, but yesterday the playing of Mr. Gabrilowitsch was so masterly that his achievement stood by the side of the works of Dr. Muck and his men.

MacDowell's Suite

The orchestral music was engrossing. MacDowell's suite is so individual and poetic, so rich in its harmonic and orchestral dress, and so simple and happy in its workmanship that it must rank, not only as the greatest piece of orchestral music which this country has yet produced, but also as one of the great orchestral compositions of the last quarter century. Dr. Muck's reading was in the nature of a new revelation of its beauty. What wonder, then, that the audience sat absorbed and in sorrow for the untimely end of a man whom America so sorely needed.

The hearer who is not obliged to peruse scores in preparation for professional listening need only enjoy such a performance as that of Dubussy's Prelude, but perhaps its complete significance is only to be understood by an orchestral player or conductor, or in part by those who know just enough of the music to realize its demands upon the interpreter. Dr. Muck seemed to have made this amazing music part of him. It would not have been his own admirable performance if every color, sonority and nuance had been that of other conductors. There were new vistas of color and sonority, additional evidences of the exactness and logic of a piece of music which has seemed through many hearings to be so magically written that no one of the laws of its structure or trace of the origin of its musical being can be discovered. Surely there is no work which condenses into a few pages so much sheer genius. And in interpreting this piece Dr. Muck was assisted incomparably by his players, particularly those of the wood wind.

Noskowski's poem is good second rate music, competently put together, and especially suggestive of vast plains and spaces in its introduction and conclusion. The concert was unusually long. It was also rarely entertaining.

BOSTON HERALD,

APRIL 24.

NOSKOWSKI'S POEM IS GIVEN

"The Steppe" Features Boston Symphony Orchestra's 22d Public Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 22d Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Orchestral Suite in E minor, No. 2, "Indian," Op. 48	MacDowell
Concerto in D minor for piano	Mozart
Concert Piece in F minor for piano	Weber
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun (Eclogue by Mallarme)"	Debussy
"The Steppe"	Noskowski

Noskowski's symphonic poem was comparatively unfamiliar. It was played here eight years ago last month, when it left no deep impression. There is a printed argument in the score to this effect: The heath is calm and beautiful after the warriors that fought on it are dust; it was indifferent to "drums and tramplings of three conquests," to shepherd's pipe and song of Cossack. This argument recalls a sentence in "The Return of the Native": "Only the imperturbable countenance of the heath, which having defied the cataclysmal onsets of centuries, reduced to insignificance by its seamed and antique features the wildest turmoil of a single man."

Noskowski (1846-1909), a Pole, had here a fine subject for music, pictorial and imaginative. The most striking feature of his composition is the introduction that should portray the health itself without suggestion of man. Here he gives the idea of a monotonous steppe without becoming himself monotonous. The Cossack episode has character, as it is sung by wood wind instruments to harp, tambourine, violins with an opposing figure and violas pizzicati. Yet the hearer, remembering a similar episode in Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture prefers the Russian's melody and his treatment of it. A disproportionate amount of space is given to the battle music and here Noskowski's invention fails. He cast this symphonic poem in the form of an overture and thus deprived himself of freedom. The chief themes are developed and they reappear as in any orthodox overture. The steppe, which is the one important thing, is too long neglected. The battle cries and clashing of warriors' weapons should be more episodic, especially when the descriptive music seldom rises above the commonplace.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave a remarkably efficient interpretation of MacDowell's "Indian" suite. It is nearly 20 years since this work was first performed. During these years there have been changes in the wit of composition, in the theory of music, in the public taste. That which is imaginative, poetic or containing the elements of grandeur survives, whatever the year, whatever the school may be. This Suite with the noble Legend and solemn Dirge, beautiful in its solemnity; with the charming Love Song, the ferocious war dance and the savage gaiety of the festival, is modern in thought and in expression. With each performance the wealth of ideas and the mastery in expression are more and more apparent.

MacDowell and Debussy were together in Marmontel's piano class at the Conservatory in Paris. MacDowell was the older by eight months. If the tragedy in his life had not prematurely put an end to his creative faculty would he have been influenced by his colleague as he was in his later piano music by Grieg? Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" must have appealed to MacDowell and I believe that "Pelleas and Melisande" would have enchanted him. For MacDowell, with all his vigor, his marked virility, was a dreamer, a dreamer not without a streak of mysticism in his nature. The performance of Debussy'c "Eclogue" yesterday was conspicuous for tonal beauty, exquisite proportion, languorous, sensuous atmosphere. The effect would have been still greater in a smaller hall and there were moments when the pace seemed a little too slow.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch made a bold experiment by playing Mozart's concerto in Symphony Hall. He was greatly daring, but he triumphed gloriously. There was an adorable simplicity in the performance; a grace that was not finical; an elegance that did not fall into empty bravura. Mozart, who insisted that passages should "flow like oil," would have clapped his little and shapely hands together in approval. In giving this rarely musical interpretation of the concerto Mr. Gabrilowitsch was aided by the perfect accompaniment of the reduced orchestra.

Weber's Concertstueck was in itself an excellent contrast. No one thinks today of the program of this virtuoso piece, or if one reads the story of the chatelaine and the knight, one smiles, as over a novel of old-fashioned sentiment and stilted phrases; but the music itself still makes its way when it is played in the Weberian chivalric manner. As Mr. Gabrilowitsch caught the spirit of Mozart, so he appreciated the dash and brilliance of Weber, composer and pianist. Dr. Muck and the orchestra furnished a sympathetic, sustaining, inciting accompaniment.

Again a most interesting concert. Alas, there are only two more this season. The orchestra was never so plastic, euphonious and eloquent. In Dr. Muck are all the qualities of the supreme conductor.

The program of the concerts next will be as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Goldmark, Overture

---

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 24, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. GABRILOWITSCH CARRIES ALL BEFORE HIM

Weber's Romantic Rhetoric and Mozart's Polished Perfections in Equal Mastery from the Pianist—Dr. Muck Conducts for the First Time in "The Afternoon of a Faun"—MacDowell's "Indian Suite" That Is American and Universal Too

THERE is no repressing the virtuosi. When singers are called to symphony concerts they are allotted two numbers of the programme. Why, then, should their brethren of the piano or the violin be limited to a single piece by harsh prescription of unfeeling conductors and by ancient precedent better broken? True, a concerto usually consumes a half hour, while the longest of "scenas" for the voice seldom fills more than fifteen minutes. But what virtuoso ever doubted that his hearers took a limitless pleasure in him and his music? Ruse can evade rule and the ruse of the pianists and the violinists to gain their two pieces praises equally their innocence and their ingenuity. Concertos written in the eighteenth century were shorter than those of the nineteenth and the twentieth. Play one of these elder classics, then, and since it is so short, ask—or take—leave to add to it a modern piece. Mr. Ysaye turned the trick when he played a concerto by Vivaldi and another by Saint-Saëns in a single Symphony Concert; once upon a time Mr. Kreisler also played his two pieces; while yesterday afternoon, for the pianists, Mr. Gabrilowitsch added to a concerto by Mozart, the once classic and familiar "Concert-Piece" by Weber. Of course, the two filled a longer space than would a single number; but the audience rejoiced in both and in the ways of the pianist with them; and there were fewer early departures than there sometimes are when the programme is shorter.

The glory of Mr. Gabrilowitch's playing of either piece was the differentiating sense of style that he brought to it. Weber's "Concert-Piece," as it seems nowadays, is of the rhetoric of music and the piano, pure but not simple. It is impossible to play it too showily. The glissando with which in the march movement, the pianist sweeps the keyboard and an orchestra that has been hushed forthwith begins to shout, is typical of the whole piece. "What an effect!" audiences have been expected to say from 1821 to 1915. Akin are the darting rhythms, the rhapsodic rush and the exuberant returns of the rondo—a "grand finale" of the elder sort, if there ever was one, with music and pianist and audience whirled along in a common excitement. Weber liked to believe that in the "Concert-Piece" he was publishing the emotions of parted, lamenting, approaching, reunited and rejoicing lovers in some sort of romantic environment of the Crusades. Actually he is making showy tonal rhetoric about these sensations which shall display the brilliancy of the piano and the technique of the pianist, as such things went ninety years ago, and his imagination and the imagination of the virtuoso in the piling of effect upon effect. Piano and pianist in the twentieth century, with multiplied sonorities and "transcendental" technique, can begin where Weber ended and conductor and orchestra, as they did yesterday, can add their excitements too. At one moment Mr. Gabrilowitsch and his piano seemed to drive the band before them; at another Dr. Muck and his men were whipping the pianist into new nervous energies. There were crescendi great and small; riots of ornament; sonorous sweeps of song; incessant play in big strokes and little upon the hearer's nervous sensibilties. The operatic Weber and the pianistic Weber jostled each other in and out, only to return as the romantic Weber who ought to have made operas out of the plays of Victor Hugo; for the German composer could summon the rhetoric and the glamor of romantic music as the French poet the rhetoric and the glamor of romantic verse. Equally they loved their effects—and made them.

The Gabrilowitsch of Mozart's little concerto was as another pianist, who had translated himself in mind, temper and even technical accomplishment back into the Vienna of 1785. It is hard to imagine the piece played, even by Mozart himself, with more exquisite limpidity of tone, more elegance of phrase and grace of accent, more even and purling fleetness, more softly glinting tonal color and more melting euphonies with the accompanying orchestra, which oftener than not leaves the piano to go its own way until it is time for cumulation or contrast. There is no "expression" in the music, except of its own beauty of pattern and voice and its own charm of design, ornament and fancy, and Mr. Gabrilowitsch was content to be the felicitously heightening mirror of them. From the first measure to the last the concerto is an innocently adroit and a spontaneously elegant music, and Mr. Gabrilowitsch played it without a hint of conscious effort or of finical artifice. Maybe, out of himself, by sheer play of transfusing imagination, he shed the same charm upon the music that the Viennese chronicles of the time say exhaled from it under Mozart's hand. The ear heard the romanza as it might hear an air from Mozart's operatic comedies and as no singer of these days may sing it. For once a little concerto of the eighteenth century, in spite of a "grand piano," a large orchestra and a big hall, sang in its own voice. Between the poised perfections of Mozart and the romantic rhetoric of Weber, Mr. Gabrilowitsch has not seemed for long so variously accomplished and imaginative a pianist.

On the purely orchestral side of the concert, Dr. Muck conducted for the first time here, or indeed anywhere else, in Debussy's prelude to Mallarmé's eclogue of the faun. Some will say that he departed from the Parisian tradition—the piece is twenty years old now, though the "Debussyites" still speak of it as if it were some strange new thing—in his choice of a slower pace than most French conductors use, so prolonging the phrases dreamily and making characteristic passages, like the motive in the flute, hang for the instant with a kind of sensuous titillation. But is not the gaining of this sensuous suggestiou, the compassing of this dream-like atmosphere, shot with the iridescent instrumental and harmonic colors, the be-all and the end-all of the piece—its characteristic voice and quality? Whatever the pace, the conductor and the orchestra—from Mr. Maquarre, who excelled himself with the outstanding passages for the flute to him who merely clinked the antique cymbals—wrought this illusion as completely and penetratingly as does the music itself. Never have Dr. Muck and the men lent more sensitive and imaginative ear to the quality and the color of their tone, to the delicate modelling of their phrases, to subtle euphonies and to the faintest stir of rhythmic beat. They evoked the glamorous haze of the music; yet through it played its supple form and limpid substance. The whole illusion is purely sensuous—a gradual enveloping and a subtle titillating of ear and fancy with the magic of tonal colors and visioned image. It was a strange new illusion in the Paris of the nineties or the Boston of a decade ago. Now it is one that Debussy himself—for his range is relatively narrow and he many times retraverses it—has often compassed and that his imitators have repeated as often after him. They are saying nowadays in Paris that the change of temper that the war has wrought in the French will be the end of such music. Elsewhere, however—and no doubt there, too—it is more likely to survive by its own intrinsic beauty in its rare kind.

As individuality plus accomplishment may preserve "The Afternoon of a Faun," so individuality plus achievement has already set apart MacDowell's "Indian Suite" from the common run of American music. It is not American because MacDowell happened to be resident in the United States when he wrote it. Mr. Loeffler dwells in Medfield; but his pieces are the expression of an individual mind, imagination and skill that probably would have found voice anywhere in the civilized world. Mr. Converse and twenty other composers abide on our Eastern seaboard, but there is nothing distinctively American in their music. It might as plausibly have been written in London or Berlin. Nor is MacDowell's suite American music because he has utilized in it the suggestion of motives that the archæologists have collected from Indian song. It is good that he uses such material from the primitive music of his own land; but it might have stirred one and another foreign composer to composition as it lately kindled Mr. Busoni. MacDowell's music is American because on its imaginative, pictorial and spiritual sides, it has qualities that are recognizably American and no other.

Hearing the first and the last of Mr. Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches—"Jubilee" and "The Vagrom Ballad"—or a scherzo in one of his symphonies, the listener feels on the instant that characteristically American imagination and mood are fashioning and coloring the music. Hearing the love-song of MacDowell's suite, rising, mounting, dying, penetrating and plangent as from the still depths of great woods, touched with the sentiment that we Americans like to call tenderness yet not lacking romantic glamor, the listener feels again a distinctively American voice and imagination. From the dirge, wailing out of darkness and solitude as across great spaces, persistent and piercing, as from a single mourning heart and mourning in a native wildness, he receives like sensation.

The merry-making of the finale, with or without its touches of barbaric color, is as distinctly American in its sharp-set and racing tumults as Mr. Chadwick's symphonic rejoicings. The vast emptiness of the elder West and the elementary fancy that tried to people it with imagined beings and powers speaks out of the beginning of the suite, as it has touched more than one American temperament. Only in the episode of the war dance with its naked melodies, its barbaric reiterations and its rise and fall between fury and exhaustion does the listener feel that a European might have written it so out of a universal imagination.

Moreover, this distinctively American music has, as it must, if it is to prevail, an intrinsic beauty, power, imagination and suggestion that are universally comprehensible and enkindling. The Prelude of the Faun is characteristically French and Debussyan, yet audiences in America feel its beauty and adroitness of sensuous impression. Beethoven's Choral Symphony is German through and through—even the French and probably the Belgians have sickened of the recent Flemish nonsense—but it is a universal music. Even so, a hearer in Paris or in Munich would be of dull ear and fancy did he not feel the pictorial power, the imaginative range, the emotional warmth, the tonal beauty, the technical skill and cogency of MacDowell's "Indian Suite." The intensity of mood, the glow of expression, the creative force that fill his final piano sonatas fill it too and run so warm and high that they burn away his usual malaise with an orchestra and it becomes an elastic and eloquent instrument to his hand. The suite crowns MacDowell's work, crowns distinctively American music and—Mr. Loeffler's pieces aside—the music that as yet has been written in the United States. If our faith in our composer flags, compare the "Indian Suite" with the commonplace design, the trite "tone-painting," the mechanical handling, the mediocrity unrelieved of Noskowski's piece of "The Step' that ended yesterday's concert. From beginning to end, it was the merest tonal stencelling of conventional patterns.

H. T. P.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 19 1915

Subscription List for Boston Symphony Open

The last week of the season subscription sale for the twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra began today. The concerts will commence Friday evening, May 14. The organization, which includes 100 of the world's best musicians, comes direct from Boston. Next Monday morning seats for two or more concerts will be on sale and on May 3 the sale for single concerts will begin.

Est 84

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 19

Interest in Coming of Boston Symphony

The last week of the season subscription sale of seats for the twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin this morning at the exposition ticket office, 343 Powell street. Next Monday seats for two or more concerts may be purchased. Great interest is manifested in these concerts, commencing Friday evening, May 14th. The organization, which includes 100 of the world's best musicians, comes direct from Boston to the exposition, and will leave at midnight after the last concert on a special train bound straight for the orchestra's home city.

Estal 884

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 18 1915

erest in the coming of the Boston Symphony grows apace. People are writing from Los Angeles, from Denver, from British Columbia telling that they have timed their visit to the Exposition so as to be able to assist at the concerts given by this unique organization.

Estab 184

Interest in the personnel of the Symphony is keen. People are already familiar with the life story of Dr. Karl Muck, the director whom Kaiser Wilhelm loaned to Boston for a year. Afterwards, on the earnest appeal of Henry L. Higginson, the emperor extended the musician's leave of absence. But every member of the orchestra is a man of mark.

For sixteen years Anton Witek, the concert-master, was a first prize graduate of the Prague Conservatory, was concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin. He succeeded Willy Hess, who had been concert-master of the orchestra for several years. Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the orchestra, shares with Heinrich Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section, is now in his fourth year in Boston. He had been 'cello soloist at the Wagner Festivals in Bayreuth, solo 'cellist of the Royal Opera Orchestra of Berlin and principal conductor in Barmen, Bucharest, Belgrade and Sofia. Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master, is a Hollander who has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra seven years. He is a first priz graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory and before he came to America was concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra at Aix and famous as a player of chamber music. Georges Grisez, the first clarinet, is the famous son of a famous father, for his father was regarded as the first clarinet player of France. He is a first prize graduate of the Paris Conservatoire and is regarded generally as one of the greatest masters of his instrument. Modeste Alloc, the first trombone of the orchestra, is a Belgian winner of the first prize in the Brussels Conservatory. He has been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for four years.

The subscription sale of seats for the twelve concerts, to be given in Festival Hall, commencing Friday evening, May 14, is progressing at 343 Powell street.

* * *

which can be oneliness which or le tow ll flat.
l element
" which g story tells urrender t n him, gh mo

[155]

Address

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS.,

S[illegible]RDAY, APRIL 24,

SYMPHONY PROGRAM A UNITY OF EXCELLENT SMALL PIECES

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-second public rehearsal, Boston Symphony orchestra, Kark Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 23. The program: MacDowell, "Indian" suite; Mozart, piano concerto (K 466) in D minor (Ossip Gabrilowitsch, soloist); Weber, Concertstueck for piano and orchestra, op. 79 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch); Debussy, prelude, "Afternoon of a Faun"; Noskowski, "The Steppe" symphonic poem, op. 66.

This program is a master-goldsmith's piece of construction, an assembling of highly colored and for the greater part first quality jewels. Two of the group, the MacDowell suite and the Debussy prelude, are of a beauty that results only from the fusion of fine individuality and original idea. One, the Mozart concerto, is an example from a large collection, all of which have permanent charm. Two of them, the Weber piano work and the Noskowski overture, may be put technically in the class of the precious, though they can hardly be ranked among the rare.

The problem of setting them in attractive relations so disturbed the conductor, that he changed his original scheme, making necessary the printing of a loose leaflet, to be inserted into the program books. According to the first arrangement, the two inferior specimens, the Weber and the Noskowski, were side by side. Under the altered plan, they were framed around the Debussy prelude, unquestionably to the improvement of the design as a whole.

It has been said that the Symphony conductor regards the "Indian" suite of MacDowell as the greatest orchestral work that has yet been composed in the United States. A further comment of his on the value of the piece is his associating it in performance with the "Faun" prelude of the French composer, Debussy. He seems to regard the two works as having a common message, and with good reason, for they both plainly define a state of mind characteristic of the world in the last decade of the nineteenth century—a feeling of optimism veiled under melancholy. They express a sentiment that had but brief existence—one that could get expressed with peculiar effectiveness in terms of instrumental color and one that deserved to be recorded.

MacDowell in the suite and Debussy in the prelude speak with remarkable unanimity of thought, notwithstanding a diversity of method. The American presents his ideas in a number of little pieces as traditional as they can be in form. He sings one song after another, changing his mood with each one, being now dignified, now tender, now vigorous, now sad, now festive. The Frenchman, on the contrary, presents his ideas in continuous form, making constant shifts of mood, but doing so without use of academic conventions.

The piano pieces of early schools called out the best efforts of the soloist. The Mozart concerto gave opportunity to Mr. Gabrilowitsch to employe his delicate touch and his gift for elegant phrasing. The Weber piece gave him opportunity to illustrate the execution of technical impossibilities. The first work tested the understanding of the interpreter as historian; the second tested his talents as an antiquarian. The first one gave great results with a reasonable outlay of mechanical skill. The second gave meager results in return for an enormous expenditure of finger cleverness. The first work represents what is lasting in music; the second what is temporary and trifling. Weber in the Concertstueck was trying to open a path for a more brilliant piano expression than had been known. He was protesting the stiff formalism of the classic school. But he had too slight a harmonic resource to achieve any great results. A Liszt and a Chopin had to take up the whole problem before a solution could be found.

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 17 1915

Es 1884

Anton Witek, the concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play at Festival Hall next month, is famous throughout Europe as a solo violinist, and in the four years that he has been in America his fame has become as great here. Wherever he has played with the orchestra he has had a marked success.

Witek has a most remarkable memory. He has twenty-eight concertos, any one of which he is ready to play with orchestra at a half hour's notice. These run from the great classical works of Beethoven and Brahms to the tremendously difficult technical problems which have been placed before violinists by Paganini and Ernest.

Not long ago some one was asking Witek if his memory ever failed him. He said that he knew of no man who had done much solo work whose memory had not failed him completely at some time.

Witek was once playing the Paganini Concerto in Berlin, and as he got to the middle of the first movement his mind seemed absolutely to become a blank, he said. He could not for the life of him remember how to go on and he had to be helped out by the concert-master.

Witek's father was a Bohemian—a Czech—his mother a Pole, so that he is entirely Slavic. In his solo work he uses a wonderful Stradivarius violin which is valued at $12,000.

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 18 1915

Esta , 188

DEVELOPM SYMPHONY TO MANY LE

Boston Orchestra Has Had Line of Splendid Conductor, Culminating With Dr. Karl Muck.

The evolution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the most interesting facts in the history of music; and even though it was recognized as a great organization when founded by Henry L. Higginson in 1881, its advance to the present day is far in excess of any other of its kind.

having sixty players at his dis[illegible]. He was followed by Wilhelm G[illegible]e of Vienna, who conducted the men for five years, at the end of which time the membership numbered 100 players. The orchestra was then world famous and Arthur Nikisch came from Leipsic and led for five years before it passed into the hands of Emil Paur, also from Leipsic.

After his regime for five years Paur gave way to Gericke, who retained the orchestra under his control for eight years; the next conductor being Dr. Karl Muck, who came from the Royal Theaters of the Kingdom of Prussia, where he had been general music director. He first arrived through the leniency of the German Emperor, who granted Muck a leave of absence for a year; but this was extended for a year, and on his return to Germany it was with the agreement that he should come back to Boston when his term in Berlin was at an end.

The orchestra was then under Max Fiedler of Hamburg for four years, and its experience and cultivation have been under the best auspices all during its life, though the influence of Dr. Muck has brought it to the highest pinnacle of success. In a course of thirty weeks the orchestra gives 110 concerts, which are always sold out long before the season begins.

Twelve concerts will be given in Festival Hall, beginning May 14th, eight of which will take place at night. Manager W. H. Leahy states that the interest in the Boston Symphony is very great and the season sale is progressing at 343 Powell street with gratifying results.

The orchestra has a double quartet of horns, which is famous throughout America, while the wind and brass sections of thirty-two men are considerably larger than the average military band.

San Francisco is the only city in which the Boston Syhphony Orchestra will play, as the journey across the continent is made expressly for this city, with the return trip directly back to Boston.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
MAY 1, 1915.

ENTHUSIASM OVER FRANCK SYMPHONY

Audience Lavishes Applause on Dr. Muck and His Orchestra.

One of the most complimentary demonstrations of the year followed the performance of Cesar Franck's D minor symphony at yesterday's concert of the Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck, recalled for the third time by the prolonged applause, finally called upon the orchestra to stand up with him and take its share of the honors; and even after this the applause went on until the much-desirel leader returned to make another bow.

The Franck work seems to be especially favored by Symphony patrons. It has been placed on the Symphony programs twice in the last 15 months. Yesterday the warm applause following each one of the three movements testified to the admiration and perhaps affection of the large audience—a tribute that would gladden the heart of Vincent d'Indy, Franck's most ardent disciple anl biographer. The work demands not only sympathetic, but most skilful treatment from conductor and performers, and this it is fortunate to receive from Dr. Muck and his men. The symphony has a rather lofty character that solicits loftiness in the performance. There was nothing lacking yesterday to satisfy the most enthusiastic admirer of the gifted Belgian composer.

The remainder of this week's program is comparatively light, and with just a suggestion of the approach of the "Pop" season. Tunefulness, a spring sprightliness far removed from the gloom cast by yesterday's weather and much tripping as of light, fantastic toes characterize the Goldmark overture, "In the Spring;" Smetana's vernal or midsummer tone poem, "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows," and the "Espana" rhapsody that Chabrier wrote after his tour of Spain in 1882, and which is wrought upon two Spanish dances, the fiery jota and the voluptuous malaguena. These were seasonable, enjoyable, and they were played con amore.

The Symphony season will end with next week's concerts. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Beethoven; Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," Liszt; tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," R. Strauss; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Wagner.

The day after the season closes the orchestra will start for San Francisco to give 12 concerts at the fair. It will return on May 31. The "Pop" season is to open June 1.

ADVERTISER,

MAY 1,

SYMPHONY CONCERT AND DR. MUCK

PURELY ORCHESTRAL; FRANCK'S GREAT WORK

Dramatic Conductor Makes Most of Points in Smetana's Symphonic Poem

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME

Cesar Franck—Symphony in D minor.
Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Smetana—"From Bohemia's Groves." Tone Poem.
Chabrier—"Espana," Orchestral Rhapsody.

Franck's symphony will be remembered when D'Indy's asceticism and Debussy's aestheticism are forgotten. The two best outcomes of modern Musical France are Bizet and Franck. Yet Franck's D minor symphony is not a sugar-coated pill. One can readily imagine the sydupy Gounod saying (as he did) that this symphony was incompetence pushed to dogmatic length. The noblest music is that in which the intellectual and emotional are well blended, and both elements are present in this great work. There is a vein of sadness running through much of the composition, made more noticeable by the absence of a Scherzo, but the intellectual appeal is always powerful and Franck shows himself a great master of development.

The homogeneity of the work is another masterly point. The transference of figures from one movement to another is skilfully done and the third movement becomes an epitome of the work in something of the manner of the finale of Brahms' C minor symphony. The simple figure of three notes which is made so prominent in the first movement is very easily recognized in all of its ingenious transformations, even if it is not made as grand as the Wagner "Fate-motif," which it resembles.

One might call Franck the French Brahms, for there is much of similarity in the work of the two men. Neither was intensely dramatic in the modern sense, and in both the intellectual side was often more prominent than the emotional.

The symphony was read in a very broad manner, sometimes a little too fortissimo. The brass canon in the first movement could not have been heavier if it had come from Krupp's foundry. The work appeals both to the general public and to the trained auditor. The latter, however, can revel in contrapuntal beauties which are not revealed to the less-educated listener. But Dr. Muck and his orchestra brought out the subtle points, so that one could follow the interweavings, the canons and other contrapuntal touches with comparative ease. The beautiful work of the English horn is to be especially commended.

In Highest Degree

The work was appreciated in the highest degree, three recalls following its conclusion. The symphony audiences seem to show in a very marked manner that they do not belong to the ultra-radical school; they at once appreciate logical and beautiful music, and receive the ultra-modern experiments much more coldly.

Now followed Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture. It may be that Dr. Muck intended a compliment to Spring by this work, but we do not have this kind of a Spring in Boston. There were gentle carollings, soft zephyrs, and a very mellifluous picture altogether, which suited to the melodic and sensuous style of Goldmark finely. But our Boston Spring would demand very different treatment. There would need be an umbrella motif, a sneeze-motif, an overcoat figure, sudden skips from piccolo to bass tuba, to illustrate the changes of the thermometer. A New England spring would never be scored in the pleasant manner of this overture, but would demand bass drum, cymbals, and high wind passages. But the agreeable style of Goldmark was appreciated after the more severe vein of Franck. Browning did not abolish Tennyson in literature, and all the heavier composers will not crush out the melodic Goldmark, who died so recently, and was so sincerely mourned. There were many wood-wind warblings in the overture and the flutes deserve especial praise for florid work. There were powerful passages interspersed at times, the coda being full of robust jollity.

Smetana's "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows" is not quite as great as some of the other numbers of this set of symphonic poems, which he wrote to celebrate his native land. The "tutti" phrases at the beginning, with their constant contrasts of major and minor, suggested that the Bohemian landscape ran in sharply defined layers. The sudden entrance of the exposition of a fugue seemed to intimate that a Conservatory professor was taking a promenade across it, accompanied by his class in counterpoint.

But now there enters a lofty theme on the brasses, a species of apotheosis of the Bohemian Folk-song. With this the work begins to be more coherent and works up to a very impressive climax. Then follows a picture of peasant revelry of rather feverish type. These are not the kind of peasants that can be pictured upon the oboe, but they demand the whole orchestra to portray their frenzied proceedings. While we have the greatest appreciation of Smetana's music, we do not rank this symphonic poem with "Vltava," or "Vysehrad," which belong to the same set of national pieces.

Address

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS.,

S RDAY, APRIL 24,

SYMPHONY PROGRAM A UNITY OF EXCELLENT SMALL PIECES

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-second public rehearsal, Boston Symphony orchestra, Kark Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 23. The program: MacDowell, "Indian" suite; Mozart, piano concerto (K 466) in D minor (Ossip Gabrilowitsch, soloist); Weber, Concertstueck for piano and orchestra, op. 79 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch); Debussy, prelud , "Afternoon of a Faun"; Noskowski, "The Steppe" symphonic poem, op. 66.

This program is a master-goldsmith's piece of construction, an assembling of highly colored and for the greater part first quality jewels. Two of the group, the MacDowell suite and the Debussy prelude, are of a beauty that results only from the fusion of fine individuality and original idea. One, the Mozart concerto, is an example from a large collection, all of which have permanent charm. Two of them, the Weber piano work and the Noskowski overture, may be put technically in the class of the precious, though they can hardly be ranked among the rare.

The problem of setting them in attractive relations so disturbed the conductor, that he changed his original scheme, making necessary the printing of a loose leaflet, to be inserted into the program books. According to the first arrangement, the two inferior specimens, the Weber and the Noskowski, were side by side. Under the altered plan, they were framed around the Debussy prelude, unquestionably to the improvement of the design as a whole.

It has been said that the Symphony conductor regards the "Indian" suite of MacDowell as the greatest orchestral work that has yet been composed in the United States. A further comment of his on the value of the piece is his associating it in performance with the "Faun" prelude of the French composer, Debussy. He seems to regard the two works as having a common message, and with good reason, for they both plainly define a state of mind characteristic of the world in the last decade of the nineteenth century—a feeling of optimism veiled under melancholy. They express a sentiment that had but brief existence—one that could get expressed with peculiar effectiveness in terms of instrumental color and one that deserved to be recorded.

MacDowell in the suite and Debussy in the prelude speak with remarkable unanimity of thought, notwithstanding a diversity of method. The American presents his ideas in a number of little pieces as traditional as they can be in form. He sings one song after another, changing his mood with each one, being now dignified, now tender, now vigorous, now sad, now festive. The Frenchman, on the contrary, presents his ideas in continuous form, making constant shifts of mood, but doing so without use of academic conventions.

The piano pieces of early schools called out the best efforts of the soloist. The Mozart concerto gave opportunity to Mr. Gabrilowitsch to employe his delicate touch and his gift for elegant phrasing. The Weber piece gave him opportunity to illustrate the execution of technical impossibilities. The first work tested the understanding of the interpreter as historian; the second tested his talents as an antiquarian. The first one gave great results with a reasonable outlay of mechanical skill. The second gave meager results in return for an enormous expenditure of finger cleverness. The first work represents what is lasting in music; the second what is temporary and trifling. Weber in the Concertstueck was trying to open a path for a more brilliant piano expression than had been known. He was protesting the stiff formalism of the classic school. But he had too slight a harmonic resource to achieve any great results. A Liszt and a Chopin had to take up the whole problem before a solution could be found.

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 17 1915

Es' 1884

Anton Witek, the concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play at Festival Hall next month, is famous throughout Europe as a solo violinist, and in the four years that he has been in America his fame has become as great here. Wherever he has played with the orchestra he has had a marked success.

Witek has a most remarkable memory. He has twenty-eight concertos, any one of which he is ready to play with orchestra at a half hour's notice. These run from the great classical works of Beethoven and Brahms to the tremendously difficult technical problems which have been placed before violinists by Paganini and Ernest.

Not long ago some one was asking Witek if his memory ever failed him. He said that he knew of no man who had done much solo work whose memory had not failed him completely at some time..

Witek was once playing the Paganini Concerto in Berlin, and as he got to the middle of the first movement his mind seemed absolutely to become a blank, he said. He could not for the life of him remember how to go on and he had to be helped out by the concert-master.

Witek's father was a Bohemian—a Czech—his mother a Pole, so that he is entirely Slavic. In his solo work he uses a wonderful Stradivarius violin hich is valued at $12,000.

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 18 1915

Esta , 188

DEVELOPM SYMPHON TO MANY LE

Boston Orchestra Has Had Line of Splendid Conducto , Culminating With Dr. Karl Muck.

The evolution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the most interesting facts in the history of music; and even though it was recognized as a great organization when founded by Henry L. Higginson in 1881, its advance to the present day is far in excess of any other of its kind.

having sixty players at his dis He was followed by Wilhelm G e of Vienna, who conducted the men for five years, at the end of which time the membership numbered 100 players. The orchestra was then world famous and Arthur Nikisch came from Leipsic and led for five years before it passed into the hands of Emil Paur, also from Leipsic.

After his regime for five years Paur gave way to Gericke, who retained the orchestra under his control for eight years; the next conductor being Dr. Karl Muck, who came from the Royal Theaters of the Kingdom of Prussia, where he had been general music director. He first arrived through the leniency of the German Emperor, who granted Muck a leave of absence for a year; but this was extended for a year, and on his return to Germany it was with the agreement that he should come back to Boston when his term in Berlin was at an end.

The orchestra was then under Max Fiedler of Hamburg for four years, and its experience and cultivation have been under the best auspices all during its life, though the influence of Dr. Muck has brought it to the highest pinnacle of success. In a course of thirty weeks the orchestra gives 110 concerts, which are always sold out long before the season begins.

Twelve concerts will be given in Festival Hall, beginning May 14th, eight of which will take place at night. Manager W. H. Leahy states that the interest in the Boston Symphony is very great and the season sale is progressing at 343 Powell street with gratifying results.

The orchestra has a double quartet of horns, which is famous throughout America, while the wind and brass sections of thirty-two men are considerably larger than the average military band.

San Francisco is the only city in which the Boston Syhphony Orchestra will play, as the journey across the continent is made expressly for this city, with the return trip directly back to Boston.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
MAY 1, 1915.

ENTHUSIASM OVER FRANCK SYMPHONY

Audience Lavishes Applause on Dr. Muck and His Orchestra.

One of the most complimentary demonstrations of the year followed the performance of Cesar Franck's D minor symphony at yesterday's concert of the Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck, recalled for the third time by the prolonged applause, finally called upon the orchestra to stand up with him and take its share of the honors; and even after this the applause went on until the much-desirel leader returned to make another bow.

The Franck work seems to be especially favored by Symphony patrons. It has been placed on the Symphcny programs twice in the last 15 months. Yesterday the warm applause following each one of the three movements testified to the admiration and perhaps affection of the large audience—a tribute that would gladden the heart of Vincent d'Indy, Franck's most ardent disciple anl biographer. The work demands not only sympathetic, but most skilful treatment from conductor and performers, and this it is fortunate to receive from Dr. Muck and his men. The symphony has a rather lofty character that solicits loftiness in the performance. There was nothing lacking yesterday to satisfy the most enthusiastic admirer of the gifted Belgian composer.

The remainder of this week's program is comparatively light, and with just a suggestion of the approach of the "Pop" season. Tunefulness, a spring sprightliness far removed from the gloom cast by yesterday's weather and much tripping as of light, fantastic toes characterize the Goldmark overture, "In the Spring;" Smetana's vernal or midsummer tone poem, "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows," and the "Espana" rhapsody that Chabrier wrote after his tour of Spain in 1882, and which is wrought upon two Spanish dances, the fiery jota and the voluptuous malaguena. These were seasonable, enjoyable, and they were played con amore.

The Symphony season will end with next week's concerts. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Beethoven; Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," Liszt; tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," R. Strauss; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Wagner.

The day after the season closes the orchestra will start for San Francisco to give 12 concerts at the fair. It will return on May 31. The "Pop" season is to open June 1.

ADVERTISER,

MAY 1,

SYMPHONY CONCERT AND DR. MUCK

PURELY ORCHESTRAL; FRANCK'S GREAT WORK

Dramatic Conductor Makes Most of Points in Smetana's Symphonic Poem

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME

Cesar Franck—Symphony in D minor.
Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Smetana—"From Bohemia's Groves." Tone Poem.
Chabrier—"Espana," Orchestral Rhapsody.

Franck's symphony will be remembered when D'Indy's asceticism and Debussy's aestheticism are forgotten. The two best outcomes of modern Musical France are Bizet and Franck. Yet Franck's D minor symphony is not a sugar-coated pill. One can readily imagine the sydupy Gounod saying (as he did) that this symphony was incompetence pushed to dogmatic length. The noblest music is that in which the intellectual and emotional are well blended, and both elements are present in this great work. There is a vein of sadness running through much of the composition, made more noticeable by the absence of a Scherzo, but the intellectual appeal is always powerful and Franck shows himself a great master of development.

The homogeneity of the work is another masterly point. The transference of figures from one movement to another is skilfully done and the third movement becomes an epitome of the work in something of the manner of the finale of Brahms' C minor symphony. The simple figure of three notes which is made so prominent in the first movement is very easily recognized in all of its ingenious transformations, even if it is not made as grand as the Wagner "Fate-motif," which it resembles.

One might call Franck the French Brahms, for there is much of similarity in the work of the two men. Neither was intensely dramatic in the modern sense, and in both the intellectual side was often more prominent than the emotional.

The symphony was read in a very broad manner, sometimes a little too fortissimo. The brass canon in the first movement could not have been heavier if it had come from Krupp's foundry. The work appeals both to the general public and to the trained auditor. The latter, however, can revel in contrapuntal beauties which are not revealed to the less-educated listener. But Dr. Muck and his orchestra brought out the subtle points, so that one could follow the interweavings, the canons and other contrapuntal touches with comparative ease. The beautiful work of the English horn is to be especially commended.

In Highest Degree

The work was appreciated in the highest degree, three recalls following its conclusion. The symphony audiences seem to show in a very marked manner that they do not belong to the ultra-radical school; they at once appreciate logical and beautiful music, and receive the ultra-modern experiments much more coldly.

Now followed Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture. It may be that Dr. Muck intended a compliment to Spring by this work, but we do not have this kind of a Spring in Boston. There were gentle carollings, soft zephyrs, and a very mellifluous picture altogether, which suited to the melodic and sensuous style of Goldmark finely. But our Boston Spring would demand very different treatment. There would need be an umbrella motif, a sneeze-motif, an overcoat figure, sudden skips from piccolo to bass tuba, to illustrate the changes of the thermometer. A New England spring would never be scored in the pleasant manner of this overture, but would demand bass drum, cymbals, and high wind passages. But the agreeable style of Goldmark was appreciated after the more severe vein of Franck. Browning did not abolish Tennyson in literature, and all the heavier composers will not crush out the melodic Goldmark, who died so recently, and was so sincerely mourned. There were many wood-wind warblings in the overture and the flutes deserve especial praise for florid work. There were powerful passages interspersed at times, the coda being full of robust jollity.

Smetana's "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows" is not quite as great as some of the other numbers of this set of symphonic poems, which he wrote to celebrate his native land. The "tutti" phrases at the beginning, with their constant contrasts of major and minor, suggested that the Bohemian landscape ran in sharply defined layers. The sudden entrance of the exposition of a fugue seemed to intimate that a Conservatory professor was taking a promenade across it, accompanied by his class in counterpoint.

But now there enters a lofty theme on the brasses, a species of apotheosis of the Bohemian Folk-song. With this the work begins to be more coherent and works up to a very impressive climax. Then follows a picture of peasant revelry of rather feverish type. These are not the kind of peasants that can be pictured upon the oboe, but they demand the whole orchestra to portray their frenzied proceedings. While we have the greatest appreciation of Smetana's music, we do not rank this symphonic poem with "Vltava," or "Vysehrad," which belong to the same set of national pieces.

TIGHT BINDING

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON HERALD.

MAY 1, 1915.

23D PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Orchestral Brilliance Characterizes Next to Last of Season's Programs.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 23d Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D minor..................Franck
Overture, "In the Spring," Op. 36....Goldmark
Symphonic Poem, "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows," from "My Country," No. 4..........Smetana
"Espana,"...........................Chabrier

There was an unusual event yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. For the first time within the recollection of many the conductor was obliged to bow more than once after the first movement of a symphony at the beginning of a concert. This tribute was due to the music itself and to the remarkable performance.

When Franck's symphony was first performed here under Mr. Gericke's leadership, 16 years ago, the majority of the hearers were perplexed; some were grieved; others were incensed; they considered the production an outrage. I believe there were a few that went so far as to characterize the music as "immoral." Yesterday this same music was enthusiastically applauded. The applause was singularly spontaneous and prolonged. Yet this symphony was in itself as beautiful and glorious in April, 1899, when the work had been diligently rehearsed, and the performance was excellent. Thus the whirligig of time brings in his revenges to the joy of us who from the beginning recognized the nobility and grandeur of the work and were moved and thrilled by it.

Anr what symphony since the ninth of Beethoven is to be compared with it as a whole? Certainly not one by Mendelssohn or Schumann. We are not unmindful of pages in Schubert's in C major, and in the first symphony of Brahms. There is fine music in the first of Sibelius. There are wonderful things in d'Indy's symphony in B-flat major, a pure and lofty spirit, a wealth of ideas, an unsurpassable mastery of expression. But Franck's symphony has something that is nearer and farther. For such a musical portrayal of doubts, not querulous, but known to the bravest, of compassion and consolation, of the final triumph and rejoicing that are voiced in a celestial Alleluia, we must go back to Beethoven, and Franck's symphony is worthy to stand by the side of Beethoven's greatest.

Overtures associated with the thought of Spring are usually played on days that are far from spring-like. "And the Spring comes slowly up this way." It comes slowly; there is a day that leads one to think the poets are after all not romantic liars; the malicious east and north winds arise and tarry; lo, it is summer. But Goldmark's "Spring" is the season of the poets. There is the vernal outbursts, the exultation of nature. The suggestion of birds in praise is not two mimetic. The sentiment that might be called rural does not become lackadaisical. There is the spontaneity of the earth. "Warble me now, for joy of Lilac-time."

Make me over, mother April,
When the sap begins to stir!

The Program Book that had buried Goldmark earlier in the season with becoming and solemn words stated yesterday through carelessness that he was still living in Vienna. The composer of this overture, other overtures and "The Queen of Sheba," is still living and not only in Vienna.

And what is to be said of Smetana's symphonic poem? It has not been played here since 1900. With all due respect to the composer we can willingly wait another 15 years. The beginning is effective, and the fugato is not without interest; but the thematic material on the whole is too naive and the polka is for a brass-band on the Sophien Island in the Moldau. There is a naivete that is delightful. The naivete of genius, and Smetana has shown it in other works. Dvorak, his countryman, was also naive, before he went to England and was spoiled there, but his naivete was most fascinating when it was artfully cloaked. Smetana was passionately fond of dancing; the polka was the national dance and in his wish to portray the Bohemians at play he naturally turned to the polka. Would that he had written a better one!

A concert that was characterized by the utmost orchestral brilliance ended with a dazzling performance of Chabrier's "Espana." Here we have the Spain that we all have imagined. Rimsky-Korsakoff heard the Spanish dance tunes with Russian ears. The Spaniards do not accept Bizet's "Carmen." Debussy has portrayed Seville, Grenada and the Alhambra, but as a poet, a dreamer, remote and solitary. Chabrier mixed with the dancers; he drank the manzanilla and looked in the eyes of the gypsy girls; he, too, clapped hands as the Andalusians twisted their hips; he, too, in his ecstasy shouted "Olle, Olle."

The program of the concerts next week, the last ones of the season, will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony

---

MONITOR, BOSTON

MAY 1, 1915

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL BIT OF EXCELLENT PROGRAM MAKING

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 30. The program: Franck, symphony in D minor; Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring"; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Bohemia's Groves," No. 4 in "My Country" cycle; Chabrier, "Espana."

Composers of the sort that would support Franck, that would supply certain marked deficiencies of his, and that would make agreeable contrast with him, could hardly have been better chosen than Goldmark, Smetana and Chabrier. The three writers who were represented with short pieces in the second half of the afternoon, gave what the writer of the symphony could not, but at the same time they contributed ideas that were companionable to his. That is to say, they and he together produced a scheme of expression that was congruous throughout, no less than varied.

The selection of short works to go with the Franck symphony was happy indeed, achieving in the first place unity of mood, for all four of the composers are sentimentalists of one kind or another, and attaining in the second place as strong a contrast in orchestral style between opening and closing numbers as could be planned. The conductor in drawing up the program might easily have picked out pieces that would supply the thing most wanting in Franck, orchestral humor, but such a procedure would only have mocked the composer of the three-movement symphony in D minor. The "Till Eulenspiegel" rondo might have been moved back from next week's concerts into this week's. The contrast between Franck and Strauss would have been striking enough. But Dr. Muck is too well schooled in the art of comedy himself to put fun in the wrong place.

The requirements that large symphonic works shall have a scherzo movement, or shall have passages developed at some length in the comedy vein, seems arbitrary, but there is no escape from it. A composer does not get around it, Franck's way, by entitling a portion of his music scherzo, and by writing it after the classic scherzo model. He must put on a touch of burlesque somewhere, or listeners are not satisfied. Tone poems in continuous and free form are subject to this requirement no less than symphonies written to the old pattern. When comedy is wanting, the piece is likely to have either an overbuilt or an under-planned effect. Franck's symphony belongs in the latter class. His structure lacks openness and breadth of conception. It is cramped. It has unity, but a unity that is attained by a hard and stiff interlocking of leading ideas. It stands altogether safer on its foundations than is necessary. It needs an impossibility or two in the way of roof pressure or of arch thrust that is buttressed up with a satiric comment or is held static with a laugh.

When comedy is wanting, sentiment goes a long way to make up for it. And sentiment of the rarest kind imbues the three movements of the D minor symphony. It inheres in every interval of the leading melody, it vibrates in every chord and in every tone color combination from opening bars to closing.

And sentiment glows no less brightly in the pages of the three minor composers who supported Franck.

In the case of their music it was associated not with abstract musing, but with contemplation of nature,—or of open-air folk scenes. The charm of the three pieces, as arranged on the program was progressive. It took hold of listeners vaguely in the Goldmark number, turning their thoughts from the concert hall to out-of-doors. It sank into them deeper in the Smetana number, making them think they were watching dances on a village green. It carried them away completely in the Chabrier number, setting them down in a festal village of Spain and compelling them to join in the merry-making.

BOSTON POST,
MAY 1, 1915

SYMPHONY BY FRANCK PERFORMED

Dazzlingly Brilliant Playing of Goldmark and Chabrier

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Cesar Franck Symphony; Goldmark's Spring Overture; Smetana's symphonic poem from "Bohemia's Groves and Meadows," and Chabrier's Espana made the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

FRANCK IN HIGH FAVOR

The Franck Symphony, only a few years ago a puzzling and ultra-modern work, and now almost a popular favorite with audiences in this city, had never had such an enthusiastic reception in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck's reading was very dramatic and very clear in its exposition of each feature of the score. And it was his own reading, with which some may have disagreed, although there was no question of its reception by the majority. We personally prefer a slightly faster tempo for the allegro in the first movement; a broader, more pontifical treatment of that passage when the first theme is proclaimed in canon by the brass instruments; a slower tempo and a more mystical and shadowy mood for the middle movement. Where Franck was exalted or serenely majestic in his profession of faith, Dr. Muck made him at times assertive as well as prophetic. The outlines of the work were more powerful and rugged than usual.

It was the difference between Francis of Assisi and Martin Luther. The musings of the allegretto were as the troubled dialogue of the soul and God. Aspiration was at times near to defeat. The finale was more dramatic than ever before, and more plastic in its tempi and its treatment of phrases, and always searchingly eloquent. The reading was not as characteristic of Franck, as we know him, as other readings of the work which we have heard, but it was convincing and of the deepest sincerity, and the rejoicing conclusion was memorable.

Impressive Performance

It was evident that the conductor was not standing aloof and ordering intelligently the interpretation of beautiful music. The performance seemed, in fact, unusually subjective with Dr. Muck. He could well have said: "This may not be your religion, but it is mine." So saying, in a figurative sense, he gave a reading that was not only unusually effective, but also, after its own logic, very impressive.

The performance of Goldmark's overture was of astonishing brilliancy. As a virtuoso piece for orchestra, at the hands of such a conductor and such players, it is capital. As music it will not live by the side of "Sakuntala" or "Sappho" overtures, or other works of Goldmark in which he is Oriental and unutterably gorgeous. Nor is Smetana's tone poem, sincere as it is, to be ranked in musical value with the better known "Vysehrad" and "Vltava," other poems of the cycle, "My Country." True, it is fresh and melodic, and the concluding measures are the best in the whole work, but it did not make a pronounced effect yesterday.

Riot of Wit and Joy

The features of the concert were the Franck symphony and the electric performance of Chabrier's "Espana." This is one of the wittiest pieces of music in existence, one of the most intoxicating in its rythms and in its color. It is a perfect volcano of esprit, with a roar of laughter in every measure. The orchestration, of course, is pure genius, from the first note to the last. There is no end to the resource and the astonishing inventiveness of the composer. Dr. Muck allowed no detail to escape him. This is especially his piece. It is one side of his own temperament. No wonder that even at the end of a long concert the audience remained to applaud. If there were a remark to add to all this, it would be that there was, if anything, too much tonal excitement for one concert. Only Franck's symphony was relatively quiet in its coloring, and that coloring was made far more brilliant than usual.

Monitor, May [illegible]

HISTORIC VALUES OF MUSIC OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY RESTATED IN SYMPHONY YEAR

Audience Acclaims Liszt's "Faust" Symphony Above All Else of Season—Scant Approval for Schoenberg—Other Composers Considered in a Review

Liszt's "Faust" symphony is the piece which has brought the Boston Symphony orchestra the greatest acclaim of the season. Wherever people discuss the winter's Wherever people discuss the winter's work of the orchestra, in musical or in domestic gatherings, the performance of the "Faust" symphony has preeminent mention. Let the programs of the Boston orchestral season become a topic of studio talk or table talk, and immediately the comparative interest of the three character episodes relating to Faust, Marguerite and Mephistopheles, or some other question touching the Liszt compositon is argued. The manner in which the "Faust" symphony was conducted and played at the two pairs of concerts in which it was the principal number, has been a marvel to musicians. The revelation which a masterful reading of it gave of Liszt as the greatest, perhaps of mid-nineteenth century musical thinkers, has caused general listeners to revise their valuations.

Awakening

In former years, the revival of a grea composition that the public had half forgotten, or the production of a new composition of startling qualities, has had the same effect that the performance of the Liszt piece had this season. Such revival or production has absorbed more attention than anything else and has caused an awakening of one sort or another, sometimes not a pleasant one. Last year, the fourth symphony of Sibelius, when played for the first time, stirred the artistic sensibilities of the public in an extraordinary way. It divided listeners into two camps, the larger by far being the one opposed to Sibelius and his laconic, somber expression. In the two years before, when the orchestra took a new conductor and let gc an old one, no piece made a much deeper impression than any other. But in the three years before that, when Max Fiedler was at the height of his influence as conductor, the Strauss "Don Quixote" tone poem (season of 1910-11) the Rachmaninoff "Island of the Dead" tone poem (1909-10) and the Bruckner eighth symphony (1908-09) were conspicuous. Likewise in the first year of Dr. Muck's first term of conducting 1906-07, one piece entranced everybody's ears, and that was the Strauss "Domestic" symphony, which was then new.

Two Occurrences

Of all these times of musical renascence, these moments of esthetic readjustment, two are especially noteworthy, the one which occurred in Dr Muck's first term and the one which has occurred this season. The interpretation of the "Domestic" symphony eight years ago brought the orchestral public out of a state of half hostility to modern composers into a state of complete friendliness to them. With the season of 1906-07, the classical dominance ended in Boston. The shield on the proscenium lintel in Symphony hall, inscribed with the name of Beethoven, might colorably at that time have been taken down; not to have the name of Strauss substituted, but to have some impersonal device put on it signifying the union of classic and modern appreciations. The interpretation of the "Faust" symphony this season put the public into a new state of mind with regard to Liszt as an originative force in nineteenth century art. It made listeners aware that Liszt is the master musical engineer after Beethoven. It made them understand that Liszt not only invented the method of structure by theme transformation that was always admitted; but that he perfected it too. It proved that Liszt applied his ideas with all the thoroughness of his greatest contemporary and of his greatest successor to make short, that he taught Wagner and Strauss all they ever knew about musical architecture.

Motives of Listening

Such exalted experiences could come only to a public vitally interested in music; and they could be caused only by performers who study the problem of expression in the most serious way. To regard them as mere accidents of program arrangement or as mere technical exploits would be a great mistake. They explain the community which enjoyed them. They explain, in fact, every community which sustains an orchestra. The two most vivid experiences of the Boston Symphony public in eight years illustrate two motives of listening. The first one, the experience with the Strauss symphony, satisfied that curiosity which audiences feel in the social purport of present-day music. The second one, the experience with the Liszt symphony, satisfied that interest which audiences have in revising historic valuations.

Schoenberg

These two motives underlie all orchestral pleasure; they are the basis of all orchestral discussion. They usually get about equal emphasis in the programme making of a conductor, and that is what has happened in the season [illegible] closing. Strongly contrasted with the favorable declaration in the case of Liszt, was the fiinding in the case of Arnold Schoenberg, writer of the "Five Pieces" for orchestra. Whether the public desired to frown upon this composer for painting an unintelligible picture of modern society, whether it wished to call him to task for uttering trivial and pessimistic sentiments, or whether it meant to discountenance his breaking with old melodic and harmonic law, cannot easily be told. But it put itself on record distinctly enough as taking no joy in the sound of the "Five Pieces." Perhaps it thus left for a future public the very opportunity for revision of opinion that a former one bequeathed to it in the "Faust" symphony.

Important modern works produced to uncertain applause last season and repeated this season with happier consequences, were the Reznicek tone biography, "Schlemihl," and the Sibelius fourth symphony. The public showed unmistakable delight in having a closer acquaintance with the magnificently colored piece of portraiture by Reznicek. It broke into a more even division of opinion on the Sibelius work than the year before, the opposition camp counting a small, if any, majority.

A little tone poem that was expected to cause a commotion but did not, was the Stravinsky "Fireworks." Doubtless the disturbingly modern Stravinsky is not heard in this little study. He may be expected another year; and when he comes he may justify all that is reported of him in the thorough manner of Schoenberg in the "Five Pieces." A new set of tone poems, amounting to a symphony in free form, which illustrate an altered tendency in German musical expression, were the pieces of Reger after four paintings by Boecklin. There is an asceticism and a restraint in this symphonic group which make a plain protest against the romanticism and irrepressibility of Strauss. Reger brings a fresh social view in his compositions, and he merits much hearing.

Minor Works

Two new works that contained little comment of world significance, but that held many moments of interesting sonority, were the Guy Ropartz symphony in C major, No. 4; and the Fritz Volbach symphony in B minor. Other minor poetry in small forms which disclosed great charm and workmanlike finish were the "Spanish Rhapsody" suite of Maurice Ravel, and the variations on an original theme of Gustav Strube. There was more new music of one sort and another, including Oskar Fried's prelude and fugue for strings; the same composer's adagio and scherzo for wind and percussion instruments; Mahler's "Songs of a Journeyman," for tenor voice and orchestra; Friedrich Klose's organ prelude and double fugue, with ending for choir of brasses, and the youthful Eric Korngold's sinfonietta, scored in the sumptuous instrumental style of Mahler.

Markworthy in the list of revivals were the Borodin symphony, No. 2, in B minor, which had a fresher sound and a deeper appeal than anything else from the nineteenth century Russian repertory; the Strauss "Don Juan" and "Zarathustra" tone poems; the Brahms first symphony; the Converse "Ormazd" tone poem; and the MacDowell "Indian" suite. A revival that was of little more than biographical interest was the Strauss "From Italy" fantasia.

All the visiting artists at the concerts have distinguished themselves. The short list of them takes in Messrs

Addr ss

Bauer, Borwick
pianists; Mr. Kreisler, viol asals, violoncellist; Miss Hi ulp and Miss Gerhardt, sop raper, tenor, and Mr. Amato oloists from the orchestra
cluded Messrs. Witek and No
linists; Mr. Ferir, viola player
Warnke and Malkin, violoncell
Maquarre, flutist; Mr. Longy
and Mr. Marshall, organist. Th
Club of male voices assisted choral ending of the Liszt "Fau
phony in the two pairs of con
which it was presented. Mr.
the assistant conductor, took Dr.
place at one pair of concerts in season.

BOSTON TRAV

MAY 1, 19

EXCEPTIONAL D FOR THE SYMPH

Particularly Attractive P Finely Given Arouses N able Enthusiasm.

An exceptionally fine progra
in the orchestra's best style,
story of yesterday afternoo
phony concert in a nutshell.
afternoon to be remembered
ured. Both leader and player bent upon going previous re better.

After hearing Dr. Muck's r
the Franck D minor sympho tempted to say the harsh critic greeted its first presentation
tated rather by prejudice th
ment. It is a beautiful work, written, and was grandly in Enthusiasm reigned throughou
ing, culminating in a triple
Dr. Muck at its close, the con sisting upon the players shari audience's tribute.

The mind of more than one might well have drawn a co
tween the weather Goldmark
in his Spring overture and tha
ing in Boston. Goldmark's we ideal. To carry the contrast st
came Smetana's "From Groves and Meadows." It was to learn that once upon a weather was seasonable.
"Espana" closed the concert, drew sharp contrasts and aff conductor and players many ties for demonstrating their One thinks with regret that be but one more concert th
San Francisco is to be con
upon its opportunities to h great players during the next

TRANSCRI

MAY 1, 1

THE SYMPHONY

FRENCH MUSIC WI INTERME

Franck's Symphony and sody Out of a Golden
and the True Voice of place Smetana from and Goldmark's Glow
the Spring

FOR once, with th
cert of yesterd was possible gramme more even is Dr. Muck's c with Franck's familia
he ended with Chabrie
sody, "España." Betw pieces by Goldmark
only in their stead, served Lalo's "Spa
played by Mr. Noack
ago and added to it,
Bizet's music to "L'Ar
be restudied for one
San Francisco! The
gramme of Friday hav
ome of what now app
most glorious periods
music. "There were memnon"; there were ian composers in the nineteenth century b
Ravel, d'Indy, Dukas
to kindle and hold t own and other worlds
they have had not their time, though, as adjustments of the what now seems thei
course of French and sic. Perhaps and easier to agree that novating work have owed the achievemen eration that precede enties and eightie
Paris and the worl
Franck and Lalo,

TIGHT BINDING

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON HERALD.

MAY 1, 1915.

23D PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Orchestral Brilliance Characterizes Next to Last of Season's Programs.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 23d Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D minor....................Franck
Overture, "In the Spring," Op. 36....Goldmark
Symphonic Poem, "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows," from "My Country," No. 4....................Smetana
"Espana," ....Chabrier

There was an unusual event yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. For the first time within the recollection of many the conductor was obliged to bow more than once after the first movement of a symphony at the beginning of a concert. This tribute was due to the music itself and to the remarkable performance.

When Franck's symphony was first performed here under Mr. Gericke's leadership, 16 years ago, the majority of the hearers were perplexed; some were grieved; others were incensed; they considered the production an outrage. I believe there were a few that went so far as to characterize the music as "immoral." Yesterday this same music was enthusiastically applauded. The applause was singularly spontaneous and prolonged. Yet this symphony was in itself as beautiful and glorious in April, 1899, when the work had been diligently rehearsed, and the performance was excellent. Thus the whirligig of time brings in his revenges to the joy of us who from the beginning recognized the nobility and grandeur of the work and were moved and thrilled by it.

Anr what symphony since the ninth of Beethoven is to be compared with it as a whole? Certainly not one by Mendelssohn or Schumann. We are not unmindful of pages in Schubert's in C major, and in the first symphony of Brahms. There is fine music in the first of Sibelius. There are wonderful things in d'Indy's symphony in B-flat major, a pure and lofty spirit, a wealth of ideas, an unsurpassable mastery of expression. But Franck's symphony has something that is nearer and farther. For such a musical portrayal of doubts, not querulous, but known to the bravest, of compassion and consolation, of the final triumph and rejoicing that are voiced in a celestial Alleluia, we must go back to Beethoven, and Franck's symphony is worthy to stand by the side of Beethoven's greatest.

Overtures associated with the thought of Spring are usually played on days that are far from spring-like. "And the Spring comes slowly up this way." It comes slowly; there is a day that leads one to think the poets are after all not romantic liars; the malicious east and north winds arise and tarry; lo, it is summer. But Goldmark's "Spring" is the season of the poets. There is the vernal outbursts, the exultation of nature. The suggestion of birds in praise is not two mimetic. The sentiment that might be called rural does not become lackadaisical. There is the spontaneity of the earth. "Warble me now, for joy of Lilac-time."

Make me over, mother April,
When the sap begins to stir!

The Program Book that had buried Goldmark earlier in the season with becoming and solemn words stated yesterday through carelessness that he was still living in Vienna. The composer of this overture, other overtures and "The Queen of Sheba," is still living and not only in Vienna.

And what is to be said of Smetana's symphonic poem? It has not been played here since 1900. With all due respect to the composer we can willingly wait another 15 years. The beginning is effective, and the fugato is not without interest; but the thematic material on the whole is too naive and the polka is for a brass-band on the Sophien Island in the Moldau. There is a naivete that is delightful. The naivete of genius, and Smetana has shown it in other works. Dvorak, his countryman, was also naive, before he went to England and was spoiled there, but his naivete was most fascinating when it was artfully cloaked. Smetana was passionately fond of dancing; the polka was the national dance and in his wish to portray the Bohemians at play he naturally turned to the polka. Would that he had written a better one!

A concert that was characterized by the utmost orchestral brilliance ended with a dazzling performance of Chabrier's "Espana." Here we have the Spain that we all have imagined. Rimsky-Korsakoff heard the Spanish dance tunes with Russian ears. The Spaniards do not accept Bizet's "Carmen." Debussy has portrayed Seville, Grenada and the Alhambra, but as a poet, a dreamer, remote and solitary. Chabrier mixed with the dancers; he drank the manzanilla and looked in the eyes of the gypsy girls; he, too, clapped hands as the Andalusians twisted their hips; he, too, in his ecstasy shouted "Olle, Olle."

The program of the concerts next week, the last ones of the season, will ... follows: Beethoven, Symphony

---

MONITOR, BOSTON

MAY 1, 1915

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL BIT OF EXCELLENT PROGRAM MAKING

SYMPHONY HALL—Twenty-third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of April 30. The program: Franck, symphony in D minor; Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring"; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Bohemia's Groves," No. 4 in "My Country" cycle; Chabrier, "Espana."

Composers of the sort that would support Franck, that would supply certain marked deficiencies of his, and that would make agreeable contrast with him, could hardly have been better chosen than Goldmark, Smetana and Chabrier. The three writers who were represented with short pieces in the second half of the afternoon, gave what the writer of the symphony could not, but at the same time they contributed ideas that were companionable to his. That is to say, they and he together produced a scheme of expression that was congruous throughout, no less than varied.

The selection of short works to go with the Franck symphony was happy indeed, achieving in the first place unity of mood, for all four of the composers are sentimentalists of one kind or another, and attaining in the second place as strong a contrast in orchestral style between opening and closing numbers as could be planned. The conductor in drawing up the program might easily have picked out pieces that would supply the thing most wanting in Franck, orchestral humor, but such a procedure would only have mocked the composer of the three-movement symphony in D minor. The "Till Eulenspiegel" rondo might have been moved back from next week's concerts into this week's. The contrast between Franck and Strauss would have been striking enough. But Dr. Muck is too well schooled in the art of comedy himself to put fun in the wrong place.

The requirements that large symphonic works shall have a scherzo movement, or shall have passages developed at some length in the comedy vein, seems arbitrary, but there is no escape from it. A composer does not get around it, Franck's way, by entitling a portion of his music scherzo, and by writing it after the classic scherzo model. He must put on a touch of burlesque somewhere, or listeners are not satisfied. Tone poems in continuous and free form are subject to this requirement no less than symphonies written to the old pattern. When comedy is wanting, the piece is likely to have either an overbuilt or an under-planned effect. Franck's symphony belongs in the latter class. His structure lacks openness and breadth of conception. It is cramped. It has unity, but a unity that is attained by a hard and stiff interlocking of leading ideas. It stands altogether safer on its foundations than is necessary. It needs an impossibility or two in the way of roof pressure or of arch thrust that is buttressed up with a satiric comment or is held static with a laugh.

When comedy is wanting, sentiment goes a long way to make up for it. And sentiment of the rarest kind imbues the three movements of the D minor symphony. It inheres in every interval of the leading melody, it vibrates in every chord and in every tone color combination from opening bars to closing.

And sentiment glows no less brightly in the pages of the three minor composers who supported Franck.

In the case of their music it was associated not with abstract musing, but with contemplation of nature,—or of open-air folk scenes. The charm of the three pieces, as arranged on the program was progressive. It took hold of listeners vaguely in the Goldmark number, turning their thoughts from the concert hall to out-of-doors. It sank into them deeper in the Smetana number, making them think they were watching dances on a village green. It carried them away completely in the Chabrier number, setting them down in a festal village of Spain and compelling them to join in the merry-making.

BOSTON POST,
MAY 1, 1915

SYMPHONY BY FRANCK PERFORMED

Dazzlingly Brilliant Playing of Goldmark and Chabrier

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Cesar Franck Symphony; Goldmark's Spring Overture; Smetana's symphonic poem from "Bohemia's Groves and Meadows," and Chabrier's Espana made the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

FRANCK IN HIGH FAVOR

The Franck Symphony, only a few years ago a puzzling and ultra-modern work, and now almost a popular favorite with audiences in this city, had never had such an enthusiastic reception in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck's reading was very dramatic and very clear in its exposition of each feature of the score. And it was his own reading, with which some may have disagreed, although there was no question of its reception by the majority. We personally prefer a slightly faster tempo for the allegro in the first movement; a broader, more pontifical treatment of that passage when the first theme is proclaimed in canon by the brass instruments; a slower tempo and a more mystical and shadowy mood for the middle movement. Where Franck was exalted or serenely majestic in his profession of faith, Dr. Muck made him at times assertive as well as prophetic. The outlines of the work were more powerful and rugged than usual.

It was the difference between Francis of Assisi and Martin Luther. The musings of the allegretto were as the troubled dialogue of the soul and God. Aspiration was at times near to defeat. The finale was more dramatic than ever before, and more plastic in its tempi and its treatment of phrases, and always searchingly eloquent. The reading was not as characteristic of Franck, as we know him, as other readings of the work which we have heard, but it was convincing and of the deepest sincerity, and the rejoicing conclusion was memorable.

Impressive Performance

It was evident that the conductor was not standing aloof and ordering intelligently the interpretation of beautiful music. The performance seemed, in fact, unusually subjective with Dr. Muck. He could well have said: "This may not be your religion, but it is mine." So saying, in a figurative sense, he gave a reading that was not only unusually effective, but also, after its own logic, very impressive.

The performance of Goldmark's overture was of astonishing brilliancy. As a virtuoso piece for orchestra, at the hands of such a conductor and such players, it is capital. As music it will not live by the side of "Sakuntala" or "Sappho" overtures, or other works of Goldmark in which he is Oriental and unutterably gorgeous. Nor is Smetana's tone poem, sincere as it is, to be ranked in musical value with the better known "Vysehrad" and "Vltava," other poems of the cycle, "My Country." True, it is fresh and melodic, and the concluding measures are the best in the whole work, but it did not make a pronounced effect yesterday.

Riot of Wit and Joy

The features of the concert were the Franck symphony and the electric performance of Chabrier's "Espana." This is one of the wittiest pieces of music in existence, one of the most intoxicating in its rythms and in its color. It is a perfect volcano of esprit, with a roar of laughter in every measure. The orchestration, of course, is pure genius, from the first note to the last. There is no end to the resource and the astonishing inventiveness of the composer. Dr. Muck allowed no detail to escape him. This is especially his piece. It is one side of his own temperament. No wonder that even at the end of a long concert the audience remained to applaud. If there were a remark to add to all this, it would be that there was, if anything, too much tonal excitement for one concert. Only Franck's symphony was relatively quiet in its coloring, and that coloring was made far more brilliant than usual.

Monitor, May 1, 15

HISTORIC VALUES OF MUSIC OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY RESTATED IN SYMPHONY YEAR

Audience Acclaims Liszt's "Faust" Symphony Above All Else of Season—Scant Approval for Schoenberg—Other Composers Considered in a Review

Liszt's "Faust" symphony is the piece which has brought the Boston Symphony orchestra the greatest acclaim of the season. Wherever people discuss the winter's Wherever people discuss the winter's work of the orchestra, in musical or in domestic gatherings, the performance of the "Faust" symphony has preeminent mention. Let the programs of the Boston orchestral season become a topic of studio talk or table talk, and immediately the comparative interest of the three character episodes relating to Faust, Marguerite and Mephistopheles, or some other question touching the Liszt compositon is argued. The manner in which the "Faust" symphony was conducted and played at the two pairs of concerts in which it was the principal number, has been a marvel to musicians. The revelation which a masterful reading of it gave of Liszt as the greatest, perhaps of mid-nineteenth century musical thinkers, has caused general listeners to revise their valuations.

Awakening

In former years, the revival of a great composition that the public had half forgotten, or the production of a new composition of startling qualities, has had the same effect that the performance of the Liszt piece had this season. Such revival or production has absorbed more attention than anything else and has caused an awakening of one sort or another, sometimes not a pleasant one. Last year, the fourth symphony of Sibelius, when played for the first time, stirred the artistic sensibilities of the public in an extraordinary way. It divided listeners into two camps, the larger by far being the one opposed to Sibelius and his laconic, somber expression. In the two years before, when the orchestra took a new conductor and let go an old one, no piece made a much deeper impression than any other. But in the three years before that, when Max Fiedler was at the height of his influence as conductor, the Strauss "Don Quixote" tone poem (season of 1910-11) the Rachmaninoff "Island of the Dead" tone poem (1909-10) and the Bruckner eighth symphony (1908-09) were conspicuous. Likewise in the first year of Dr. Muck's first term of conducting 1906-07, one piece entranced everybody's ears, and that was the Strauss "Domestic" symphony, which was then new.

Two Occurrences

Of all these times of musical renascence, these moments of esthetic readjustment, two are especially noteworthy, the one which occurred in Dr Muck's first term and the one which has occurred this season. The interpretation of the "Domestic" symphony eight years ago brought the orchestral public out of a state of half hostility to modern composers into a state of complete friendliness to them. With the season of 1906-07, the classical dominance ended in Boston. The shield on the proscenium lintel in Symphony hall, inscribed with the name of Beethoven, might colorably at that time have been taken down; not to have the name of Strauss substituted, but to have some impersonal device put on it signifying the union of classic and modern appreciations. The interpretation of the "Faust" symphony this season put the public into a new state of mind with regard to Liszt as an originative force in nineteenth century art. It made listeners aware that Liszt is the master musical engineer after Beethoven. It made them understand that Liszt not only invented the method of structure by theme transformation; that was always admitted; but that he perfected it too. It proved that Liszt applied his ideas with all the thoroughness of his greatest contemporary and of his greatest successor; to make short, that he taught Wagner and Strauss all they ever knew about musical architecture.

Motives of Listening

Such exalted experiences could come only to a public vitally interested in music; and they could be caused only by performers who study the problem of expression in the most serious way. To regard them as mere accidents of program arrangement or as mere technical exploits would be a great mistake. They explain the community which enjoyed them. They explain, in fact, every community which sustains an orchestra.

The two most vivid experiences ... Boston Symphony public in eight ... illustrate two motives of listening ... first one, the experience with the S... symphony, satisfied that curiosity ... audiences feel in the social purp... present-day music. The second one ... experience with the Liszt symphony, satisfied that interest which audiences ha... in revising historic valuations.

Schoenberg

These two motives underlie all ... chestral pleasure; they are the bas... all orchestral discussion. They us... get about equal emphasis in the prog... making of a conductor, and that is ... has happened in the season pres... closing. Strongly contrasted with ... favorable declaration in the cas... Liszt, was the finding in the ca... Arnold Schoenberg, writer of the F... Pieces" for orchestra. Whether th... lic desired to frown upon this comp... for painting an unintelligible picture ... modern society, whether it wished ... call him to task for uttering trivial a... pessimistic sentiments, or whether ... meant to discountenance his break ... with old melodic and harmonic law, ca... not easily be told. But it put itself ... record distinctly enough as taking ... joy in the sound of the "Five Pie..." Perhaps it thus left for a future ... the very opportunity for revision of opin-ion that a former one bequeathed to the "Faust" symphony.

Important modern works produced ... uncertain applause last season and repeated this season with happier consequences, were the Reznicek tone biography, "Schlemihl," and the Sibelius fourth symphony. The public showed unmistakable delight in having a closer acquaintance with the magnificently colored piece of portraiture by Reznicek. It broke into a more even division of opinion on the Sibelius work than the year before, the opposition camp counting a small, if any, majority.

A little tone poem that was expected to cause a commotion but did not, was the Stravinsky "Fireworks." Doubtless the disturbingly modern Stravinsky is not heard in this little study. He may be expected another year; and when he comes he may justify all that is reported of him in the thorough manner of Schoenberg in the "Five Pieces." A new set of tone poems, amounting to a symphony in free form, which illustrate an altered tendency in German musical expression, were the pieces of Reger after four paintings by Boecklin. There is an asceticism and a restraint in this symphonic group which make a plain protest against the romanticism and irrepressibility of Strauss. Reger brings a fresh social view in his compositions, and he merits much hearing.

Minor Works

Two new works that contained little comment of world significance, but that held many moments of interesting sonority, were the Guy Ropartz symphony in C major, No. 4; and the Fritz Volbach symphony in B minor. Other minor poetry in small forms which disclosed great charm and workmanlike finish were the "Spanish Rhapsody" suite of Maurice Ravel, and the variations on an original theme of Gustav Strube. There was more new music of one sort and another, including Oskar Fried's prelude and fugue for strings; the same ...poser's adagio and scherzo for wind ... percussion instruments;* Mahler's ...gs of a Journeyman," for tenor voice ... orchestra; Friedrich Klose's organ ...de and double fugue, with ending ...hoir of brasses, and the youthful ... Korngold's sinfonietta, scored in ... sumptuous instrumental style of ...er.

...kworthy in the list of revivals ... the Borodin symphony, No. 2, in ...or, which had a fresher sound and ...er appeal than anything else from ...neteenth century Russian repertory ... the Strauss "Don Juan" and ...ustra" tone poems; the Brahms ...mphony; the Converse "Ormazd" ...m; and the MacDowell "Indian" ... revival that was of little more ...ographical interest was the ..."From Italy" fantasia.

... visiting artists at the concerts ...tinguished themselves. The ...t of them takes in Messrs

RI

Address...

Bauer, Borwick ...
pianists; Mr. Kreisler, viol...
...s, violoncellist; Miss Hi...
Culp and Miss Gerhardt, sop...
...aper, tenor, and Mr. Amato...
Soloists from the orchestra ...
cluded Messrs. Witek and No...
linists; Mr. Ferir, viola player...
Warnke and Malkin, violoncell...
Maquarre, flutist; Mr. Longy... and Mr. Marshall, organist. Th...
Club of male voices assisted...
choral ending of the Liszt "Fau...
phony in the two pairs of con...
which it was presented. Mr. ...
the assistant conductor, took Dr...
place at one pair of concerts in ...
season.

BOSTON TRAV...

MAY 1, 19...

EXCEPTIONAL D... FOR THE SYMP...

Particularly Attractive ... Finely Given Arouses N... able Enthusiasm

An exceptionally fine progra...
in the orchestra's best style, ...
story of yesterday afternoo...
phony concert in a nutshell. ...
afternoon to be remembered ...
ured. Both leader and playe...
bent upon going previous re...
better.

After hearing Dr. Muck's ...
the Franck D minor sympho...
tempted to say the harsh criti...
greeted its first presentation ...
tated rather by prejudice t...
ment. It is a beautiful work, ...
written, and was grandly in...
Enthusiasm reigned throughou...
ing, culminating in a triple ...
Dr. Muck at its close, the con... sisting upon the players shari...
audience's tribute.

The mind of more than one ...
might well have drawn a co...
tween the weather Goldmark...
in his Spring overture and tha...
ing in Boston. Goldmark's we...
ideal. To carry the contrast st...
came Smetana's "From ...
Groves and Meadows." It wa...
to learn that once upon a ...
weather was seasonable.
"Espana" closed the concert, ...
drew sharp contrasts and af...
conductor and players many ...
ties for demonstrating thei...
One thinks with regret that ...
be but one more concert th...
San Francisco is to be con...
upon its opportunities to h...
great players during the next ...

TRANSCRI...

MAY 1, 1...

THE SYMPHONY...

FRENCH MUSIC WI... INTERME...

Franck's Symphony and ...
sody Out of a Golden ...
and the True Voice of ...
place Smetana from ...
and Goldmark's Glo...
the Spring

FOR once, with th...
cert of yester...
was possible ...
gramme more...
even is Dr. Muck's c...
with Franck's famili... he ended with Chabri...
sody, "España." Betw... pieces by Goldmark ...
only in their stead, ...
served Lalo's "Spa... played by Mr. Noack...
ago and added to it, ...
Bizet's music to "L'Ar...
be restudied for one ...
San Francisco! The...
gramme of Friday hav...
ome of what now app...
most glorious periods ...
music. "There were ...
memnon"; there were ...
ian composers in th...
nineteenth century b...
Ravel, d'Indy, Dukas ...
to kindle and hold t... own and other world...
they have had not ...
their time, though, a...
adjustments of the ...
what now seems thei...
course of French an...
sic. Perhaps and ...
easier to agree that ...
novating work hav...
owed the achievemen...
eration that precede...
enties and eightie...
Paris and the world...
Franck and Lalo, ...

1915

MUSIC ENTURY
NY YEAR

mphony Above oval for Schoen-d in a Review

ivid experiences of the public in eight years tives of listening. The rience with the Strauss
d that curiosity which the social purport of
The second one, the Liszt symphony, sat-which audiences have valuations.

tives underlie all or-they are the basis of ussion. They usually hasis in the program-tor, and that is what he season presently contrasted with the on in the case of ding in the case of writer of the "Five
. Whether the pub-
upon this composer

telligible picture of ther it wished to ttering trivial and s, or whether it nce his breaking harmonic law, can-ut it put itself on gh as taking no
the "Five Pieces."
or a future public or revision of opinbequeathed to it in works produced to st season and re-

th happier conse-
Reznicek tone
" and the Sibelius
he public showed in having a closer magnificently col-
ure by Reznicek.
even division of s work than the ition camp count-ajority.
hat was expected but did not, was orks." Doubtless n Stravinsky is study. He may r; and when he all that is rehorough manner ive Pieces." A amounting to m, which illuscy in German the pieces of gs by Boecklin.
and a restraint which make a e romanticism trauss. Reger
w in his comuch hearing.

ontained little nce, but that nteresting sortz symphony
he Fritz Vol-
Other minor ich disclosed anlike finish dy" suite of variations on stav Strube.
c of one sort skar Fried's gs; the same rzo for wind ts;* Mahler's
r tenor voice lose's organ with ending the youthful a, scored in al style of of revivals y, No. 2, in r sound and g else from ssian reper-

Juan" and the Brahms se "Ormazd" ell "Indian"
f little more was the sia.
he concerts
lves. The is Messrs

Address

Bauer, Borwick and ilowitsch, pianists; Mr. Kreisler, violinist; Mr. Casals, violoncellist; Miss Hinkle, Mme. Culp and Miss Gerhardt, sopranos; Mr. Draper, tenor, and Mr. Amato, baritone. Soloists from the orchestra have included Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists; Mr. Ferir, viola player; Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violoncellists; Mr. Maquarre, flutist; Mr. Longy, oboist, and Mr. Marshall, organist. The Apollo Club of male voices assisted in the choral ending of the Liszt "Faust" symphony in the two pairs of concerts at which it was presented. Mr. Schmidt, the assistant conductor, took Dr. Muck's place at one pair of concerts in the mid-season.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

MAY 1, 1915

EXCEPTIONAL DAY FOR THE SYMPHONY

Particularly Attractive Program Finely Given Arouses Noticeable Enthusiasm.

An exceptionally fine program, played in the orchestra's best style, tells the story of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert in a nutshell. It was an afternoon to be remembered and treasured. Both leader and players seemed bent upon going previous records one better.

After hearing Dr. Muck's reading of the Franck D minor symphony one is tempted to say the harsh criticisms that greeted its first presentation were dictated rather by prejudice than judgment. It is a beautiful work, masterly written, and was grandly interpreted. Enthusiasm reigned throughout its reading, culminating in a triple recall for Dr. Muck at its close, the conductor insisting upon the players sharing in the audience's tribute.

The mind of more than one in the hall might well have drawn a contrast between the weather Goldmark pictured in his Spring overture and that prevailing in Boston. Goldmark's weather was ideal. To carry the contrast still further came Smetana's "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows." It was pleasant to learn that once upon a time the weather was seasonable. Chabrier's "Espana" closed the concert, one that drew sharp contrasts and afforded the conductor and players many opportunities for demonstrating their artistry. One thinks with regret that there is to be but one more concert this season. San Francisco is to be congratulated upon its opportunities to hear these great players during the next month.

TRANSCRIPT,

MAY 1, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FRENCH MUSIC WITH AUSTRIAN INTERMEZZI

Franck's Symphony and Chabrier's Rhapsody Out of a Golden Period—Dr. Muck and the True Voice of Franck—Commonplace Smetana from Prairie to Polka, and Goldmark's Glowing Overture of the Spring

FOR once, with the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, it was possible to wish a programme more "unified" than even is Dr. Muck's custom. He began with Franck's familiar symphony and he ended with Chabrier's glowing rhapsody, "España." Between the two stood pieces by Goldmark and Smetana. If only in their stead, Dr. Muck had reserved Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," played by Mr. Noack only a fortnight ago and added to it, say, the suite of Bizet's music to "L'Ariésienne," that must be restudied for one of the concerts in San Francisco! Then would the programme of Friday have been a little epitome of what now appears as one of the most glorious periods of modern French music. "There were kings before Agamemnon"; there were illustrious Parisian composers in the last half of the nineteenth century before Debussy and Ravel, d'Indy, Dukas and Schmitt began to kindle and hold the interest of their own and other worlds. Fortunate men, they have had not a little reward in their time, though, as some say, the readjustments of the future may lessen what now seems their importance in the course of French and of European music. Perhaps and perhaps; but it is easier to agree that they and their innovating work have unduly overshadowed the achievement of the great generation that preceded them in the seventies and eighties and that enriched Paris and the world with the music of Franck and Lalo, Chabrier and Bizet.

LETI
San Francisco, Cal.
From

Nowadays we take "Carmen" as an opera for granted and sit down to consider it as the fortunate "vehicle" of a long line of eminent singing-actresses from Mme. Galli-Marié to Miss Farrar. Yet in itself and by itself, it is a masterpiece of lyric drama. The brass bands play transcriptions of Bizet's music to "L'Arlésienne" and even they may not altogether blur and roughen its wondrous beauty, fervor and pictorial power. Lalo virtually lives for us in two cencertos and an overture, though many another of his pieces deserve re-hearing. Yet sufficiently these three prove him a composer of rare invention and artistry who sought and gained an individual beauty in his music. We know the Chabrier of "España," the overture to "Gwendoline" and the "Bourré Fantasque" and we might know the Chabrier of a few other orchestral fragments. All mark him as a composer of puissant heats of imagination and eloquence. Franck in his symphony, in a tone-poem or two, and in his chamber music is familiar and placed—among the illustrious and enduring composers of a century that began with a Beethoven and ended with a Wagner. In their day all four composers went relatively neglected and despised; the seventies and the eighties were for the lyric sweetness of Gounod and the eclectic and polished artifice of Saint-Saëns. Now they sit deservedly in posthumous glory and on this earth and may be in the Elysian Fields, a rich period in French music is stamped with their names. Their successors have been more fortunate in their own day; the sifting future that sealed the others' fame awaits them.

Sufficient unto the day was the programme thereof, especially with an audience that probably took more thought of the variegated entertainment that it proffered than of the kindred composers whom it omitted. As usual it rose—or rather in this particular instance stayed in its seats—for Chabrier's "España" at the end of the concert. If "encores" were permissible on these Fridays of Symphony Hall no piece would so quickly and surely gain one. The stern young purists, recalling their Ravel and Laparra, their Albeñiz and Granados, like to say that the rhapsody is of the fictitious Spain that picture and play, verse and prose, have fashioned exotically for us these many years. There is no "veracity" in it, they repeat, as there is in "real" Spanish music. It is easy to retort that Chabrier actually took down all his motives but one on the tables of Spanish cafés and "dancing-places," and there heard the rhythms that he intensified and blended. It is better to answer that his music makes us that hear believe in his "fictitious" Spain and thrill to it, which is the "real" business of artistry and imagination.

Chabrier does not condescend to persuade us; he merely sweeps us into the hot flame of his temperament and imagination, translating into tones his impression of the Spain that kindled him. The rhythmic force of "España," whether the rhythms are in conflict or union, whether they run in normal beat or caprice whirls them; the diverse intensity of the striding or the languorous melody; the glow of the instrumental colors; the bite of the modulations; the far-flung eagerness and zest of the whole are the old story of the analysts. True, they are more than the dry bones of the piece; they are even its flesh and blood. But its life is the magnificent projecting power, the limitless fervor, the transmitting force of Chabrier's blazing spirit. Whatever he has written, opera or rhapsody, song or piano piece, he pours it forth in exuberant ardor. There is no resisting such a molten torrent; there is no thought of what is really a very expert yet spontaneous "ordnance" of it. No one analyzes the blaze that sets him in equal glow.

Franck's symphony, by ampler and more just title, has now succeeded Dvořák's symphony "Of the New World," beloved in the nineties and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, no less cherished later and for longer, as the modern symphony that present-day audiences like most to hear. It is applauded beyond any other in Chicago; the Bostonians multiply their clapping until orchestra and conductor and maybe the listening ghost of Father Franck himself have bowed time and again; even New York, as it is the custom of the outlanders to say, comes to the symphony gladly. Hardly a year passes that it is not heard in America, if not in its own France; and twice within fifteen months it has been played in Boston. The outcome is twofold. Exactly as with Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, far inferior as it is to Franck's, frequent repetition brings a familiarity with the composer's characteristic procedures that makes them seem his manner and his convention beyond due proportion. By this time, everyone that hears the Russian's symphony knows when to expect the frenzied and tossing orchestral outbursts, the languorous and brooding sensual melodies, the broken rhythms, the up-piled climaxes, the whole neurotic design in alternations of struggle and despair. Similarly with Franck's symphony, the ear listens prepared and accustomed to his "cyclic" processes and there is no stir of surprise at the dramatic return or cumulation of this or that motive. As expectedly come the slow mounting in his moods and music of longing aspiration into more and more ardent ecstasy and brighter and brighter illumination; as regularly descend the shadows of doubt and the torment of struggle; triumphant measures sound their sonorous gladness and conviction; then the hushed whispers again and so on to the final pæan of the whole half-mystical and half-human, half-earthly and half-celestial design. Even an inspired symphony may have its routine and familiarity may heighten the listener's sense of it.

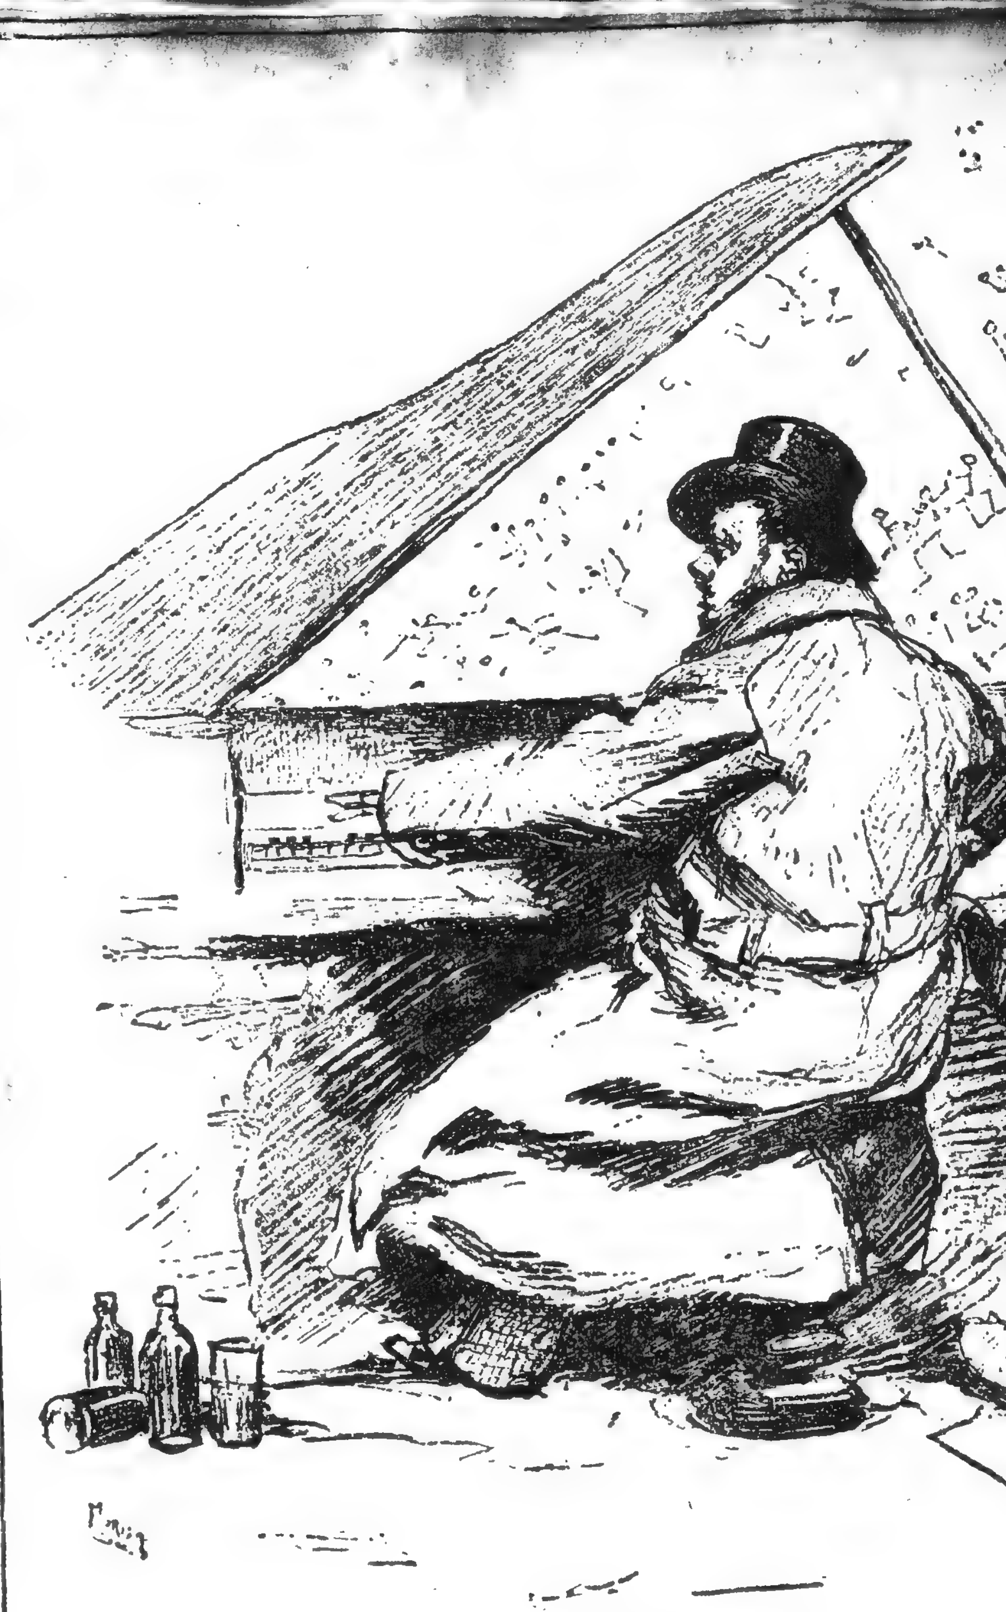
On the other hand, frequent repetition does heighten the hearer's sense of the beauty and, under Dr. Muck's hand, of the power of the music. The conductor was largely eloquent with the symphony yesterday—puissant beyond the endurance of some of those same young purists already cited. But when they protest against what they call Dr. Muck's excess of power are they not harking back to what is a traditional and in many respects false view of Franck and his music? When he and it first became known on this side of the Atlantic it was the custom to harp upon the hearty and expansive Père Franck (as full of Belgian humanity as he was of spiritualized visions, and living the life of a "bon bourgeois" who was musician, too) as some celestially minded organist dreaming his dreams over the keyboard in the lights and shadows of the stained glass and Gothic arches of Sainte-Clothilde. It was also the custom with his music to dwell upon its devout, msytical and ecstatic side, to etheralize it beyond its actual and normal content and quality in these things, and to reduce it, most unjustly, to a kind of luminous and spiritual gossamer born of a soul too pure and simple for those earthly contacts and emotions in which Father Franck took a normal delight.

With better understanding of music and man, the just and intelligent reaction was bound to come. César Franck, with all his mystical aspirations and ecstasies, was a full-sized and vital human being, formed and living in the round, and because he was such in his music, it has its power and beauty in the minds and the hearts of other men. It is such a Franck speaking out of his symphony that Dr. Muck calls to life, when he swells the finale as with myriad voices and with passion and power in exaltation and exultation; when he points high the dark tonal shadows and the mounting tonal lights of the first movement; when he intensifies the aspiration and torment of the allegretto until it pierces to the very quick of responsive mood. He would have Franck's symphony, as it really is, of all human doubt and struggle, spiritual ascent and spiritual triumph, and not of one dreaming and mystical organist. Divination is better than tradition.

Of the two intermezzi, one was familiar—Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring"; the other relatively new and strange—Smetana's tone-poem, "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows," heard but once before and fifteen years back at the Symphony Concerts. Each piece is a full-bodied, full-blooded, transparent and immediately pleasurable music, and upon both conductor and orchestra spent their songful sonorities, zest and command of rhythm, richness of color, and exhaustless plasticity of design and detail. Smetana's tone-poem rewarded such eloquence poorly; Goldmark's overture recompensed it largely; and the sources of the difference are not far to seek. The Bohemian's music would picture his native landscape—outspread meadow, thick woodland, circling hill, nodding trees, smiling turf and all in the hot glow of summer sunshine. Emotion rises at the sight and should fill the music with lofty mood. A polka—an elate and tireless polka—interrupts these meditations, and lo! all Bohemia is dancing upon its lawns and hillsides until the music exhausts itself in the whirl as though it were some patriotic and dervish-like rite of these excited Czechs. There is little imagination in the design, and not much more in the accomplishment. The "nature-picturing" and the mood that it quickens are expressed in tonal commonplace; only the excitement of the polka—and the rhythmic bite of the orchestra yesterday—save it from like fate.

On the other hand, the rich melody beginning Goldmark's overture, expanding into manifold song, and then steadily dominating it, seizes ear and imagination by its spontaneous beauty, intensity and fitness to the mood and the purpose of the music. It seems to have leapt in full harmonic and instrumental panoply from the composer's imagination, yet as richly he amplifies, transmutes and adorns it. Like the spring sap in the trees, it stirs and mounts in the listener's ear and fancy until it floods them even as it floods the music. Quick with invention and ardor, Goldmark sets his playful arabesques about it; runs away in his little excursions with subordinate motives; "springs" his craftsman's moment of suspense before he swings away into his gay finale and throughout keeps the pervading mood and the unflagging freshness of the whole. Once more invention and imagination carry the day as all the patriotic zeal in the world will not. Chabrier, cudgelling his brains for a classification of "España," finally called it a rhapsody. Goldmark, by as just a title, might have named his overture so.

H. T. P.



Chabrier

Reproduced by Request From the Celebrated Drawing by Detaille

BOSTON GLOBE

MAY 1,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Next to Last Program of the Season.

Franck's Noble Symphony Played With Wealth of Beauty.

The last Symphony rehearsal of the season but one brought a beautiful performance of Cesar Franck's noble symphony in D minor. This great work might well be heard once each year. Time does not tarnish its purity of inspiration, its spirituality, its expression of a lofty and triumphant faith. Adapting old models to a more plastic form, it was music beyond the comprehension of pedants as late as 25 years ago. The fountain of emotion within it was as the desert to their senses.

This symphony without the monumental chamber works—the incomparable quintet, the quartet and the trio—would have left a portrait of Franck, just, faithful, sympathetic in its revelation of the organist of Ste Clotilde, a dreamer, a seer of visions, one who found solace and strength from ceaseless labor in quiet contemplation of the things of the spirit. The music of a man beyond his time, one antipodal to materialism, yet surrounded by it, and judged by its standards, by the standards of the music of "Faust."

Often one can see the composer at his organ, evoking these harmonies, as in the passage for woodwind in the lento of the first movement. The effect of the first theme of the second movement, in plucked strings, repeated with the song of the English horn, is that of rapt and ecstatic communion. The culmination of the motives in the last movement is as the triumphal restatement of beliefs and convictions of soul that have moulded life, and now declare it a beautiful, complete and perfect thing.

As a work embodying the creative use of the cyclic idea of thematic development, it has its technical interest and significance to the analyst. But the interrelated employment of these themes reveals more inward and seizing beauty than the mere skill of the contrapuntist.

Smetana's symphonic poem, "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows," the fourth of the cycle of six poems, "My Country," has a simple folk character which Dvorak continued and developed after him. There are scenes of pastoral suggestion, tranquil in their pictures of nature, with peaceful streams flowing through verdant fields. There is the dancing of the simple peasants. The fugal subject introduced in the five-string choirs is one of improvisational beauty. It is unpretentious, honest music, rich in melody, colorful, pictorial and National in suggestion.

Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," was played in spirit of vernal inspiration. Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody, always sure of a brilliant performance at these concerts, closed the program.

The performance of the symphony was one worthy of its majesty of thought and transforming beauty. Dr Muck has brought the orchestra to a point of technical vertuosity, incomparable euphony, agreement, eloquence and passion in expression beyond which it would seem impossible to go.

There reasonably should have been the special tribute of the audience after the music of Franck.

TRANSCRIPT,
MAY 8, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE FINAL RITES OF THE ENDED SEASON

Such Tribute from the Audience as Dr. Muck Has Never Received for the Concerts Known Heretofore—The Just Occasion for It—Classic Pieces, Elder and Younger, in Which the Qualities of Conductor and Orchestra Passed as in Epitome

SINCE Mr. Gericke departed from the Symphony Orchestra, nine years ago, no audience at its concerts has shown such fervor toward the conductor as did that of yesterday afternoon toward Dr. Muck—and with such reason. As Mr. Gericke at the end of his second term had made the orchestra a more nearly perfect instrument than it had ever been before, so Dr. Muck at the end of the fifth year at his post, maintaining, amplifying and refining these perfections, has carried it to a range and height of expressive eloquence that it has never known before. In the season now ending, by the final swift and cumulating concentration of a gradual process five years long, the audiences of the Symphony Concerts seem at last to realize fully and deeply that week by week they listen to an orchestra unmatched in the world in technical and tonal sensibility and quality, in scope of responsive voice and imagination to whatever music is opened for it; and in transmission of substance and spirit, character and style by all the means of finesse and by all the resources of power, a clairvoyant, vitalizing and enkindling beauty.

The orchestra has become such because it plays in the image of him who leads it and who has gradually permeated it by the unique power—hidden in its processes, revealed in its results—that is the stamp of a great conductor. By his works, ripened, unhampered and unclouded in Boston as they never were in Berlin, Dr. Muck has proved the genius—for his qualities and faculties justify the word—that make him unsurpassed among the orchestral leaders of our time. There is no music into which he does not enter with penetrating understanding, responsive imagination, individualizing sense of style and full surrender of himself as imparting and devoted instrument of the composer. There is no artistry of large design and mounting progression, of euphonious detail, of pointing accent, of arresting modulation to which he is strange or inert. Pace and rhythm, the whole range of orchestral song, the underlying and informing melody that is as the soul within the body of the piece lock no secrets from him. With these things he first divines and then accomplishes—and both surely. His ear knows every beauty of tone; his imagination visions it; his guiding hand and his outflowing inspiration to the capacities of his men achieve it.

Out of this beauty pours eloquence that Dr. Muck bears into floods of power and passion; that he sharpens into vivid suggestion and illusive delineation; that he outspreads into glamorous at mosphere; that he refines into endless subtlety and delicacy; that he makes the voice of tonal drama, tonal romance, tonal picture and characterization and of the pure loveliness and exhilaration of music that is tonal pattern-weaving. Upon whatever his recreating force plays, for the instant it vitalizes. The whole field of music lies equally open to him; all the faculties of the great conductor dwell in him; genius crowns them; and self-mastery and self-devotion control them. The world now holds none to match him in his art and his calling as it holds no other band to match the orchestra upon which he plays as he has upbuilded and transformed it. Dr. Muck has his visions of the ideal orchestra and its ideal accomplishment, the like of which no ears have hitherto known, and he is nearer than most mortals to coming to the fulfilment of his ideal. And modestly and to himself he has dwelt and worked among us at the fulness of all his powers and will so live and work for years to come. Now, at last, at the end of a season, the like of which in achievement, the Symphony Orchestra has not before known, his audiences seem to know him for a great conductor and an illustrious man bestowed upon them again, as upon no other audiences in the world.

Yesterday this knowledge, this faith and these glories were fulfilled in Dr. Muck's ears and in the ears of all those that heard as they have never been before. The applause was long and fervent when he came first to his place, until the homage of his audience yielded to his eagerness to set to his work. At the end of the symphony—the Fifth Beethoven—there was the suspensive moment of pause in which thrilled hearers return to themselves out of their excited absorption in music and performance and then a flood of plaudits that would not be stayed until the conductor had returned once and twice; until he had stood with his men standing around him; until he had come back yet again into their circle. Even then, the applause subsided slowly and at the close of the concert—after the tonal pomps with which the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" ends—it rose in fuller and higher flood and with what seemed a note of personal regard and liking that was a new and rare sensation in such plaudits of assembled hundreds. Not long would the conductor, almost tremulous with the emotion of the instant keep it for himself. He turned and called to his encircling men; he shook Mr. Witek's hand as the proxy of them all with a relieving fervor; his glance slowly traversing the crescent of the orchestra spoke what was in his heart; the momentary hush of the audience swelled again into ardent clapping. And so [illegible] orchestra and conductor thus as on[illegible] public of Friday afternoons, whic[illegible] criterion of the concerts [illegible]

The music of the day—elder and younger classics and all, but one, familiar—seemed, as the performance ran its course, like an epitome in little of the qualities in orchestra and conductor that seal their distinctions and warrant such plaudits. The opening nearness of Beethoven's symphony seemed to leap into puissant and rugged being; the tonal strife and struggle that ensue smote the ear with its raining blows and then smoothed it with its recoils into spent and sombre brooding. Here were spiritual passion and spiritual drama in tones; yet how full and rich were the great chorals, how Beethovenish the rounded and songful phrases, how eloquent the transitions, how fluid the details and how stinging the progressions that conveyed them. The melancholy phrase of the Andante recurred in its wistful beauty of longing; and subtle moulding and a perfect evenness of repetition heightened its haunt. Above it and almost over t the stouter and soberer beauty of the melody went its conquering way, quickened and intensified by its own emitional life. Yet it was pace and accent that so vitalized and illuminated it. The scherzo went its way of restless mystery into the high suspense out of which springs the finale and the listening seemed as breathless as the music; while once more out of that finale, Dr. Muck reared, united and cumulated such a triumphant song—of Beethoven aflame as with the universal emotion of all the folk—as he is wont to set free in the finale of Brahms's first symphony and as he will some day release out of Beethoven's own "Ode to Joy." The beauty, the power and the passion of the symphony is not often so proclaimed.

The conductor's largeness and intensity of imagination; the rush and swirl of his rhythms; his sharp strokes of tonal delineation; his seeming emotional abandonment—yet with what control behind!—to the phantasmagoria of Mazeppa's ride to the flickering sweep of the harried hero's momentary emotions and to the sheer tonal bombast of the pageant-like transfiguring end recalled Liszt's tone-poem to its romantic life and glamor and thrill, without which it is as sound and fury signifying nothing. And once more the orchestra was as the conductor's voice understood, felt, multiplied. In the sharpest of contrasts, they recounted with pith and point, with the aptest of delineative stroke, and with an astute play of ironic humor, the traits, the adventures and the hapless end of Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel." Along the way they did little miracles of individual virtuosity. Clearly they set forth the structure of the complex rondo so that every convolution of its lines and every arabesque upon them fell into its place and accord. They missed not a shading of his tonal being nor a detail of his adventures. Yet did it all sound like a homely folk-piece—a tale told in tones. Orchestral characterization and delineation might hardly further go. Then, for end, the manifold tonal stream of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"—eddies of counterpoint and ripples of harmonic and instrumental color if the hearer will and truly so, but bearing upon its flood the poetry, the romance, the beauty, the beauty of the power that is the life and soul of music. The burgher folk strode through it; the youth danced to it; young illusions made young love in its passing song. It left us, for leave-taking, in the world of excellent and creating imagination which is the world that music makes for us.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER,

MAY 10, 1915

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA STARTS FOR THE FAIR

Entire Company of 110 Persons With Several Friends on Trip

The Boston Symphony Orchestra left yesterday afternoon on a trip to San Francisco, where it is to appear at the Exposition in a series of concerts. The trip of this party, numbering 110 persons and several friends, is one of the longest "jumps," as the theatrical people call it, which a great musical organization has ever made. To accommodate this party the B. & A. not only arranged for a special train from Boston clear through to Oakland Pier, opposite San Francisco, but is sending in charge of the party Charles E. Colony, City Ticket Agent, who is the man who made all the arrangements and piloted ex-President Taft in the more than 15,000-mile trip which he took from Boston to the Pacific Coast and back.

The train consisted of five Pullman sleepers, a private car and two baggage cars. In the private car were Dr. and Mrs. Muck, C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and John Sauerquell, the librarian. The train is due to arrive at San Francisco next Thursday morning, May 13.

The orchestra will give 13 concerts at the Panama-Pacific fair. The first one will be Friday evening, May 14, and the last one Wednesday evening, May 26.

THE MUSIC NEWS

Celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Thirteen Concerts at the Panama Pacific International Exposition

The celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in an extended series of concerts at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition for two weeks during the latter half of the month of May.

The coming to San Francisco of this, the greatest symphonic organization in existence, without question will be the most important musical event of the world during the coming year. The entire series of concerts will be heard in Festival Hall, on the Exposition grounds.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the famous Dr. Carl Muck, for many years conductor of Kaiser Wilhelm's Royal Opera, Berlin. Under the magic of the baton of this great master, the 104 musicians composing the orchestra, each one an artist of renown and each a master, chosen from all of the greatest musical organizations of the world, will weave such melodic harmonies as to make of the Exposition City, for the time, the musical capital of the world.

Following the invariable rule of this organization, the full strength of the orchestra of over 100 musicians will be heard during the fortnight of their engagement. In order that they might fill this engagement, it was necessary for Conductor Muck to omit two weeks of popular concerts in Boston. They will come and return to Boston on special trains, making no stops en route in either direction. Thus the only opportunity which the public will have for hearing them between the closing of their seasons of Boston Symphony concerts and the opening of the following season, will be at the Exposition at San Francisco. The supreme excellence of this organization is due largely to the fact that under no circumstances, no matter how far they may travel, has the management ever consented to decrease the full number composing the orchestra. This is the first time that the people of the Pacific slope ever have been given the opportunity of listening to this greatest of orchestras, the organization never before having been further west than Chicago and St. Louis. Repeated attempts in past years on the part of San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle and other centers to secure Conductor Muck and his melodists have been abortive, owing to the vast sum of money required, and to the fact that the eastern seaboard cities have insisted on monopolizing them.

It is said that it is costing the Exposition management a fabulous sum to secure the presence of the Boston Symphony people for this engagement of two weeks. The Exposition directors, however, took the position that the organization secured ought to be of such superlative merit as to stand on a par with the Panama-Pacific Exposition itself—the greatest in point of cost, comprehensiveness and artistic beauty ever given to the world; and the engagement of the Boston organization—only one of a number of similar triumphs, announcement of which will be made in a few days—was the logical result.

Commenting on this signal achievement, one of the most capable authorities on things musical in America, who is now in San Francisco, yesterday said:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra is acknowledged throughout the world to be the greatest orchestra that has ever existed. Collectively and individually, it is made up of the best musical ability that can be found in the known world. The leading players of its different sections, year by year, have been brought from Paris, Vienna, Berlin, London, Rome, Buda Pesth and other great centers of music; and in practically every instance, each man secured was the most important musician in his city. It is easily to be seen therefore that the orchestra contains a larger number of virtuosi than any other organization in the world.

"Among the thirty violinists in the orchestra, headed by Anton Witek, the concert master, are such masters as Roth, Hoffman, Rissland, Mahn, Berger and Gerardi. There are ten violas, ten 'cellos, eight basses, nine horns, four each of flutes, bassoons, trumpets and trombones, and three each of drums, oboes and clarinets, besides harps, tympani, tuba, bass clarinet and an organist and two librarians.

"This orchestra was composed 35 years ago by the man of wealth and culture who still is responsible for its maintenance, Major Lee Higginson, a grandson of the famous aide of Washington, "Light Horse Harry Lee," and one of the little group who on Tuesday were first to send the human voice from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific—at which time, along with President Wilson, he conferred with the Exposition officials. In its early years Major Higginson personally maintained the orchestra, many times with yearly deficits ranging from $50,000 to $75,000. Recently, in order to perpetuate the orchestra, he announced that he had created for it an endowment of $1,500,000.

"At San Francisco the orchestra will be under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, who was selected by Kaiser Wilhelm many years ago as the conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. Dr. Muck unquestionably stands pre-eminent as the greatest conductor of symphonic music in the world today. Eight years ago, Major Higginson, through his personal acquaintance with the Kaiser, induced him to loan Dr. Muck for two seasons to the Boston Symphony Orchestr After the conductor's return to Berlin, ever influence was brought to bear from year t year to induce him to come permanently Boston; but not until his contract with the Kaiser terminated was he permitted to return to America. This will be the greatest of many great musical events secured by the management of the Exposition at San Francisco."

# #

BOSTON GLOBE—
—SATURDAY. MAY 8.

LAST REHEARSAL.

Dr Muck and Orchestra Get Noteworthy Farewell.

Performance Is One of Supreme and Dazzling Virtuosity.

The final Symphony rehearsal of the season was one of marked spirit. Dr Muck conducted with an animation that swept all before it. The orchestra played with a supreme and dazzling virtuosity. The audience, sensible of another year's passing, and possibly of the tour which shortly will bring the organization to its first concerts in the extreme West, was roused to unusual enthusiasm, and applauded after Beethoven's fifth symphony with an ardor that denoted a special occasion.

Visitors at the Panama Exposition and the directors thereof may well count themselves favored. An orchestral performance such as that of yesterday would add glory to any concourse of Nations or of wonders. May the long journey across the country fail to lessen the authority, the fine abandon, the rhetorical eloquence of the interpretation of the symphony of Liszt's stormy old tone poem, "Mazeppa," of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Liszt's music, now in passages strangely old-fashioned, obvious, at times theatrical, was recreated at times with excessive brass, but was given dramatic fire and continuity. Always a master of the vitalizing effects gained through rhythm, Dr Muck imparted dignity to these measures, which, in the hands of the unperceiving, would become banal. The Struss music, an artistic descendant of the form Liszt brought forward scintillated in brilliance and satirical play.

The feature of the concert was the last movement of the symphony. It was a song of shouting, exultant victory. A performance of such overwhelming force, of such majesty and breadth, cannot be recalled in recent seasons. Dr Muck and the members of the orchestra will entrain tomorrow for San Francisco. May safe preservation, artistic success and pleasurable diversion all wait upon them.

TRANSCRIPT,
MAY 8, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE FINAL RITES OF THE ENDED SEASON

Such Tribute from the Audience as Dr. Muck Has Never Received for the Concerts Known Heretofore—The Just Occasion for It—Classic Pieces, Elder and Younger, in Which the Qualities of Conductor and Orchestra Passed as in Epitome

SINCE Mr. Gericke departed from the Symphony Orchestra, nine years ago, no audience at its concerts has shown such fervor toward the conductor as did that of yesterday afternoon toward Dr. Muck—and with such reason. As Mr. Gericke at the end of his second term had made the orchestra a more nearly perfect instrument than it had ever been before, so Dr. Muck at the end of the fifth year at his post, maintaining, amplifying and refining these perfections, has carried it to a range and height of expressive eloquence that it has never known before. In the season now ending, by the final swift and cumulating concentration of a gradual process five years long, the audiences of the Symphony Concerts seem at last to realize fully and deeply that week by week they listen to an orchestra unmatched in the world in technical and tonal sensibility and quality, in scope of responsive voice and imagination to whatever music is opened for it; and in transmission of substance and spirit, character and style by all the means of finesse and by all the resources of power, a clairvoyant, vitalizing and enkindling beauty.

The orchestra has become such because it plays in the image of him who leads it and who has gradually permeated it by the unique power—hidden in its processes, revealed in its results—that is the stamp of a great conductor. By his works, ripened, unhampered and unclouded in Boston as they never were in Berlin, Dr. Muck has proved the genius—for his qualities and faculties justify the word—that make him unsurpassed among the orchestral leaders of our time. There is no music into which he does not enter with penetrating understanding, responsive imagination, individualizing sense of style and full surrender of himself as imparting and devoted instrument of the composer. There is no artistry of large design and mounting progression, of euphonious detail, of pointing accent, of arresting modulation to which he is strange or inert. Pace and rhythm, the whole range of orchestral song, the underlying and informing melody that is as the soul within the body of the piece lock no secrets from him. With these things he first divines and then accomplishes—and both surely. His ear knows every beauty of tone; his imagination visions it; his guiding hand and his outflowing inspiration to the capacities of his men achieve it.

Out of this beauty pours eloquence that Dr. Muck bears into floods of power and passion; that he sharpens into vivid suggestion and illusive delineation; that he outspreads into glamorous at mosphere; that he refines into endless subtlety and delicacy; that he makes the voice of tonal drama, tonal romance, tonal picture and characterization and of the pure loveliness and exhilaration of music that is tonal pattern-weaving. Upon whatever his recreating force plays, for the instant it vitalizes. The whole field of music lies equally open to him; all the faculties of the great conductor dwell in him; genius crowns them; and self-mastery and self-devotion control them. The world now holds none to match him in his art and his calling as it holds no other band to match the orchestra upon which he plays as he has upbuilded and transformed it. Dr. Muck has his visions of the ideal orchestra and its ideal accomplishment, the like of which no ears have hitherto known, and he is nearer than most mortals to coming to the fulfilment of his ideal. And modestly and to himself he has dwelt and worked among us at the fulness of all his powers and will so live and work for years to come. Now, at last, at the end of a season, the like of which in achievement, the Symphony Orchestra has not before known, his audiences seem to know him for a great conductor and an illustrious man bestowed upon them again, as upon no other audiences in the world.

Yesterday this knowledge, this faith and these glories were fulfilled in Dr. Muck's ears and in the ears of all those that heard as they have never been before. The applause was long and fervent when he came first to his place, until the homage of his audience yielded to his eagerness to set to his work. At the end of the symphony—the Fifth Beethoven—there was the suspensive moment of pause in which thrilled hearers return to themselves out of their excited absorption in music and performance and then a flood of plaudits that would not be stayed until the conductor had returned once and twice; until he had stood with his men standing around him; until he had come back yet again into their circle. Even then, the applause subsided slowly and at the close of the concert—after the tonal pomps with which the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" ends—it rose in fuller and higher flood and with what seemed a note of personal regard and liking that was a new and rare sensation in such plaudits of assembled hundreds. Not long would the conductor, almost tremulous with the emotion of the instant keep it for himself. He turned and called to his encircling men; he shook Mr. Witek's hand as the proxy of them all with a relieving fervor; his glance slowly traversing the crescent of the orchestra spoke what was in his heart; the momentary hush of the audience swelled again into ardent clapping. And so[illegible] orchestra and conductor thus as on[illegible]ublic of Friday afternoons, whic[illegible] the criterion of the [illegible]erts [illegible]

The music of the day—elder and younger classics and all, but one, familiar—seemed, as the performance ran its course, like an epitome in little of the qualities in orchestra and conductor that seal their distinctions and warrant such plaudits. The opening nearness of Beethoven's symphony seemed to leap into puissant and rugged being; the tonal strife and struggle that ensue smote the ear with its raining blows ond then smoothed it with its recoils into spent and sombre brooding. Here were spiritual passion and spiritual drama in tones; yet how full and rich were the great chorals, how Beethovenish the rounded and songful phrases, how eloquent the transitions, how fluid the details and how stinging the progressions that conveyed them. The melancholy phrase of the Andante recurred in its wistful beauty of longing; and subtle moulding and a perfect evenness of repetition heightened its haunt. Above it and almost over t the stouter and soberer beauty of the melody went its conquering way, quickened and intensified by its own emitional life. Yet it was pace and accent that so vitalized and illuminated it. The scherzo went its way of restless mystery into the high suspense out of which springs the finale and the listening seemed as breathless as the music; while once more out of that finale, Dr. Muck reared, united and cumulated such a triumphant song—of Beethoven aflame as with the universal emotion of all the folk—as he is wont to set free in the finale of Brahms's first symphony and as he will some day release out of Beethoven's own "Ode to Joy." The beauty, the power and the passion of the symphony is not often so proclaimed.

The conductor's largeness and intensity of imagination; the rush and swirl of his rhythms; his sharp strokes of tonal delineation; his seeming emotional abandonment—yet with what control behind!—to the phantasmagoria of Mazeppa's ride to the flickering sweep of the harried hero's momentary emotions and to the sheer tonal bombast of the pageant-like transfiguring end recalled Liszt's tone-poem to its romantic life and glamor and thrill, without which it is as sound and fury signifying nothing. And once more the orchestra was as the conductor's voice understood, felt, multiplied. In the sharpest of contrasts, they recounted with pith and point, with the aptest of delineative stroke, and with an astute play of ironic humor, the traits, the adventures and the hapless end of Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel." Along the way they did little miracles of individual virtuosity. Clearly they set forth the structure of the complex rondo so that every convolution of its lines and every arabesque upon them fell into its place and accord. They missed not a shading of his tonal being nor a detail of his adventures. Yet did it all sound like a homely folk-piece—a tale told in tones. Orchestral characterization and delineation might hardly further go. Then, for end, the manifold tonal stream of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"—eddies of counterpoint and ripples of harmonic and instrumental color if the hearer will and truly so, but bearing upon its flood the poetry, the romance, the beauty, the beauty of the power that is the life and soul of music. The burgher folk strode through it; the youth danced to it; young illusions made young love in its passing song. It left us, for leave-taking, in the world of excellent and creating imagination which is the world that music makes for us.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER,

MAY 10, 1915

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA STARTS FOR THE FAIR

Entire Company of 110 Persons With Several Friends on Trip

The Boston Symphony Orchestra left yesterday afternoon on a trip to San Francisco, where it is to appear at the Exposition in a series of concerts. The trip of this party, numbering 110 persons and several friends, is one of the longest "jumps," as the theatrical people call it, which a great musical organization has ever made. To accommodate this party the B. & A. not only arranged for a special train from Boston clear through to Oakland Pier, opposite San Francisco, but is sending in charge of the party Charles E. Colony, City Ticket Agent, who is the man who made all the arrangements and piloted ex-President Taft in the more than 13,000-mile trip which he took from Boston to the Pacific Coast and back.

The train consisted of five Pullman sleepers, a private car and two baggage cars. In the private car were Dr. and Mrs. Muck, C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and John Sauerquell, the librarian. The train is due to arrive at San Francisco next Thursday morning, May 13.

The orchestra will give 13 concerts at the Panama-Pacific fair. The first one will be Friday evening, May 14, and the last one Wednesday evening, May 26.

THE MUSIC NEWS

Celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Thirteen Concerts at the Panama Pacific International Exposition

The celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in an extended series of concerts at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition for two weeks during the latter half of the month of May.

The coming to San Francisco of this, the greatest symphonic organization in existence, without question will be the most important musical event of the world during the coming year. The entire series of concerts will be heard in Festival Hall, on the Exposition grounds.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the famous Dr. Carl Muck, for many years conductor of Kaiser Wilhelm's Royal Opera, Berlin. Under the magic of the baton of this great master, the 104 musicians composing the orchestra, each one an artist of renown and each a master, chosen from all of the greatest musical organizations of the world, will weave such melodic harmonies as to make of the Exposition City, for the time, the musical capital of the world.

Following the invariable rule of this organization, the full strength of the orchestra of over 100 musicians will be heard during the fortnight of their engagement. In order that they might fill this engagement, it was necessary for Conductor Muck to omit two weeks of popular concerts in Boston. They will come and return to Boston on special trains, making no stops en route in either direction. Thus the only opportunity which the public will have for hearing them between the closing of their seasons of Boston Symphony concerts and the opening of the following season, will be at the Exposition at San Francisco. The supreme excellence of this organization is due largely to the fact that under no circumstances, no matter how far they may travel, has the management ever consented to decrease the full number composing the orchestra. This is the first time that the people of the Pacific slope ever have been given the opportunity of listening to this greatest of orchestras, the organization never before having been further west than Chicago and St. Louis. Repeated attempts in past years on the part of San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle and other centers to secure Conductor Muck and his melodists have been abortive, owing to the vast sum of money required, and to the fact that the eastern seaboard cities have insisted on monopolizing them.

It is said that it is costing the Exposition management a fabulous sum to secure the presence of the Boston Symphony people for this engagement of two weeks. The Exposition directors, however, took the position that the organization secured ought to be of such superlative merit as to stand on a par with the Panama-Pacific Exposition itself the greatest in point of cost, comprehensiveness and artistic beauty ever given to the world; and the engagement of the Boston organization—only one of a number of similar triumphs, announcement of which will be made in a few days—was the logical result.

Commenting on this signal achievement, one of the most capable authorities on things musical in America, who is now in San Francisco, yesterday said:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra is acknowledged throughout the world to be the greatest orchestra that has ever existed. Collectively and individually, it is made up of the best musical ability that can be found in the known world. The leading players of its different sections, year by year, have been brought from Paris, Vienna, Berlin, London, Rome, Buda Pesth and other great centers of music; and in practically every instance, each man secured was the most important musician in his city. It is easily to be seen therefore that the orchestra contains a larger number of virtuosi than any other organization in the world.

"Among the thirty violinists in the orchestra, headed by Anton Witek, the concert master, are such masters as Roth, Hoffman, Rissland, Mahn, Berger and Gerardi. There are ten violas, ten 'cellos, eight basses, nine horns, four each of flutes, bassoons, trumpets and trombones, and three each of drums, oboes and clarinets, besides harps, tympani, tuba, bass clarinet and an organist and two librarians.

"This orchestra was composed 35 years ago by the man of wealth and culture who still is responsible for its maintenance, Major Lee Higginson, a grandson of the famous aide of Washington, "Light Horse Harry Lee," and one of the little group who on Tuesday were first to send the human voice from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific—at which time, along with President Wilson, he conferred with the Exposition officials. In its early years Major Higginson personally maintained the orchestra, many times with yearly deficits ranging from $50,000 to $75,000. Recently, in order to perpetuate the orchestra, he announced that he had created for it an endowment of $1,500,000.

"At San Francisco the orchestra will be under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, who was selected by Kaiser Wilhelm many years ago as the conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. Dr. Muck unquestionably stands pre-eminent as the greatest conductor of symphonic music in the world today. Eight years ago, Major Higginson, through his personal acquaintance with the Kaiser, induced him to loan Dr. Muck for two seasons to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After the conductor's return to Berlin, eve influence was brought to bear from year year to induce him to come permanently Boston; but not until his contract with t Kaiser terminated was he permitted to return to America. This will be the greatest of many great musical events secured by the management of the Exposition at San Francisco."

BOSTON GLOBE—
—SATURDAY. MAY 8.

LAST REHEARSAL.

Dr Muck and Orchestra Get Noteworthy Farewell.

Performance Is One of Supreme and Dazzling Virtuosity.

The final Symphony rehearsal of the season was one of marked spirit. Dr Muck conducted with an animation that swept all before it. The orchestra played with a supreme and dazzling virtuosity. The audience, sensible of another year's passing, and possibly of the tour which shortly will bring the organization to its first concerts in the extreme West, was roused to unusual enthusiasm, and applauded after Beethoven's fifth symphony with an ardor that denoted a special occasion.

Visitors at the Panama Exposition and the directors thereof may well count themselves favored. An orchestral performance such as that of yesterday would add glory to any concourse of Nations or of wonders. May the long journey across the country fail to lessen the authority, the fine abandon, the rhetorical eloquence of the interpretation of the symphony of Liszt's stormy old tone poem, "Mazeppa," of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Liszt's music, now in passages strangely old-fashioned, obvious, at times theatrical, was recreated at times with excessive brass, but was given dramatic fire and continuity. Always a master of the vitalizing effects gained through rhythm. Dr Muck imparted dignity to these measures, which, in the hands of the unperceiving, would become banal. The Struss music, an artistic descendant of the form Liszt brought forward scintillated in brilliance and satirical play.

The feature of the concert was the last movement of the symphony. It was a song of shouting, exultant victory. A performance of such overwhelming force, of such majesty and breadth, cannot be recalled in recent seasons. Dr Muck and the members of the orchestra will entrain tomorrow for San Francisco. May safe preservation, artistic success and pleasurable diversion all wait upon them.

Address

MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BRINGS 34TH SEASON TO END

SYMPHONY HALL—Last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of May 7. The program: Beethoven, symphony No. 5 in C minor; Liszt, "Mazeppa" tone poem; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel" rondo; Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

The program summed up the achievement of the nineteenth century in orchestration. And it illustrated, in broad outline, the methods of nineteenth century musical structure. A fairer statement of what has been accomplished in the long period during which the world has been under the sway of the romantic movement could hardly be drawn up. There were represented in the fifth symphony on the one hand, and in the "Mazeppa" and "Till Eulenspiegel" pieces on the other, forms which have served the two chief classes of composers whom we know as romanticists. The first of these forms is the symphony, which Beethoven surveyed and bounded, and which Schubert, Schumann and Brahms gardened and landscaped to perfection. The second is the tone poem, which Liszt originated, and which Strauss and other contemporary composers have labored into various types of expression, biographical, autobiographical, philosophical and pictorial. Furthermore, there was indicated in the last number on the program, the opera form, one which, according to the observation of some, Wagner revolutionized, but which, according to that of others, he merely forced into particular grooves, into grooves nationalistic and flamboyantly romantic.

Played in any city of the world, such a program would mean a great deal in the way of social interpretation and historic comment. It would have objective interest of an important kind, to say the least, in any artistic locality. Played in Boston, it has something more than external and documentary meaning. It is an intimate revealing of three decades of civic aspiration. It reviews a space of time during which sensitive people of the community have been studying the European orchestral product, to find what it contains for their emotional chastening and their intellectual clarification.

Approval or revision? Encouragement of the forces that have ruled music for 100 years, or not? These are questions which Symphony listeners must have asked themselves in hearing the summary of the case for romanticism, as Dr. Muck and his men presented it on Friday afternoon.

A simple yes or no, certainly will not affect matters. That style of answer has been given many times since the Symphony orchestra began interpreting the classic and modern masters in Music hall the second generation back. Saying that we like or dislike the Straussian romanticism will change the situation no whit. If the symphony public is ever to express its conclusions about the right and wrong, the good and bad of orchestral sound, it must do so through its own composers. It must set men to building symphonic works and keep them at it, just as methodically as it keeps its artists rehearsing and playing for its pleasure three weeks of every winter month, and sends them traveling on a circuit of cities to the South the fourth week. It must put the making as well as the performing of music into its plans.

The reading of the music of the twenty-fourth rehearsal was extraordinary for its accuracy and its technical mastery, even in a season that has been distinguished for such traits. The fifth symphony was little short of letter perfect. Every traditional expression mark was heeded, here and there with an almost playful exactitude. The piece was presented with the simplicity of an overture, its four divisions sounding like contrasting passages in a short work, instead of like exhaustive studies in intellectual, sentimental, humorous and triumphant vein in a long one. Tune and tone had crystalline transparency, but at the same time idea and feeling, persuaded and moved. Liszt's symphonic poem was phrased with a style that made it seem like a song. Strauss' rondo was manipulated with an episodic cunning that made it a veritable recitation in words. Wagner's prelude was commanded with a dignified sonority that has hardly been attained before in a particularly sonorous year. Enthusiastic applause for conductor and players promised high public interest in concerts of next season.

JOURNAL—

-MONDAY, MAY 10,

SEE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OFF FOR THE COAST

300 at Station Say Affectionate Farewell to Musicians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its entire strength, left Boston yesterday afternoon from the South Station for San Francisco, where the orchestra will give a number of concerts at the Panama-Pacific Fair.

The company's popularity in Boston was shown by a crowd of more than 300 which gathered at the station. It was a strongly temperamental gathering and the affectionate farewells previous to the departure of the train and the many women who stood silently waving handkerchiefs, with tears streaming down their cheeks, resembled more the departure of soldiers to the front than the peaceful invasion of the Pacific coast by America's greatest body of musicians.

The company traveled in a special train of Pullman cars, which will be at their service during the entire trip. It consisted of five standard 16-section Pullman sleepers, a private car, a dining car and two baggage coaches. In the private car were Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck, C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and John Sauerquell, the librarian.

The train is due at Union Station, Chicago, at 3 o'clock this afternoon. There the members of the orchestra will have three hours of leisure in which the time will be their own while the special train is being switched around to the station of the Chicago and Northwestern railroad. At 7.05 o'clock this evening the train leaves Chicago as the second section of the Overland Limited and follows that train direct to San Francisco, going by way of Council Bluffs, Cheyenne and Ogden.

The party is due to arrive in San Francisco next Thursday morning. The orchestra will give 13 concerts at the Fair. The first will be given Friday evening, May 14 and the last Wednesday evening, May 26.

JOURNAL—

MAY 8, 1915.

SYMPHONY GIVING FINAL CONCERTS

Matinee Audience Enjoys Rare Program Played Brilliantly.

With tonight's concerts at Symphony Hall, the 34th season of the nonpareil Boston Symphony Orchestra will close; and for these closing concerts, the first of which was given yesterday, Dr. Muck has arranged a program of an Olympian character. With the possible exception of "Mazeppa," the symphonic poem by Liszt, it is music fit for the gods, and, all in all, a splendid example of the Teutonic genius that has ruled the world of music for the last century and a quarter.

Here is the program complete: Beethoven, smphony in C minor; Liszt, "Mazeppa;" Richard Strauss, rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks;" Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The Beethoven symphony, which dazzled Berlioz and prompted Balzac to refer to it as with bated breath in his most famous tragedy—if only this work were offered the season would end in superlative splendor, so full of grandeur is the symphony itself and so dramatic is the reading given by Dr. Muck. Hardly on a par with this towering composition, yet remarkable for their beauty and individuality, are the Strauss and Wagner numbers.

Yesterday the performance of the bristling Strauss rondo was fully as brilliant as that of the symphony which, a little while before, had been most enthusiastically applauded.

Dr. Muck and his hundred men indeed got a hearty send-off from the rehearsal patrons.

Tomorrow afternoon the orchestra will start for San Francisco, to be gone three weeks. It will give twelve concerts at the fair, the first next Friday night and the last on Wednesday night, May 26. These are being subscribed for—and, according to accounts, very generously. A 13th concert will

---

THE BOSTON GLOBE—MONDAY, MAY 10, 1915

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OFF TO SAN FRANCISCO.

Famous Boston Organization Will Give 13 Concerts At the Exposition This Month.

MEMBERS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON WAY TO SAN FRANCISCO.

Left to Right—Mrs Anton Witek, Anton Witek, 1st concert master; Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist; J. Malkin; Sylvain Noack, 2d concert master. Insert, Dr Carl Muck, leader.

Aboard a private train, consisting of five sleepers, a dining car and two baggage cars, the Boston Symphony Orchestra left the South Station shortly after 2 yesterday afternoon bound for San Francisco. There was a big gathering of musical people at the station to wave farewell to the famous organization.

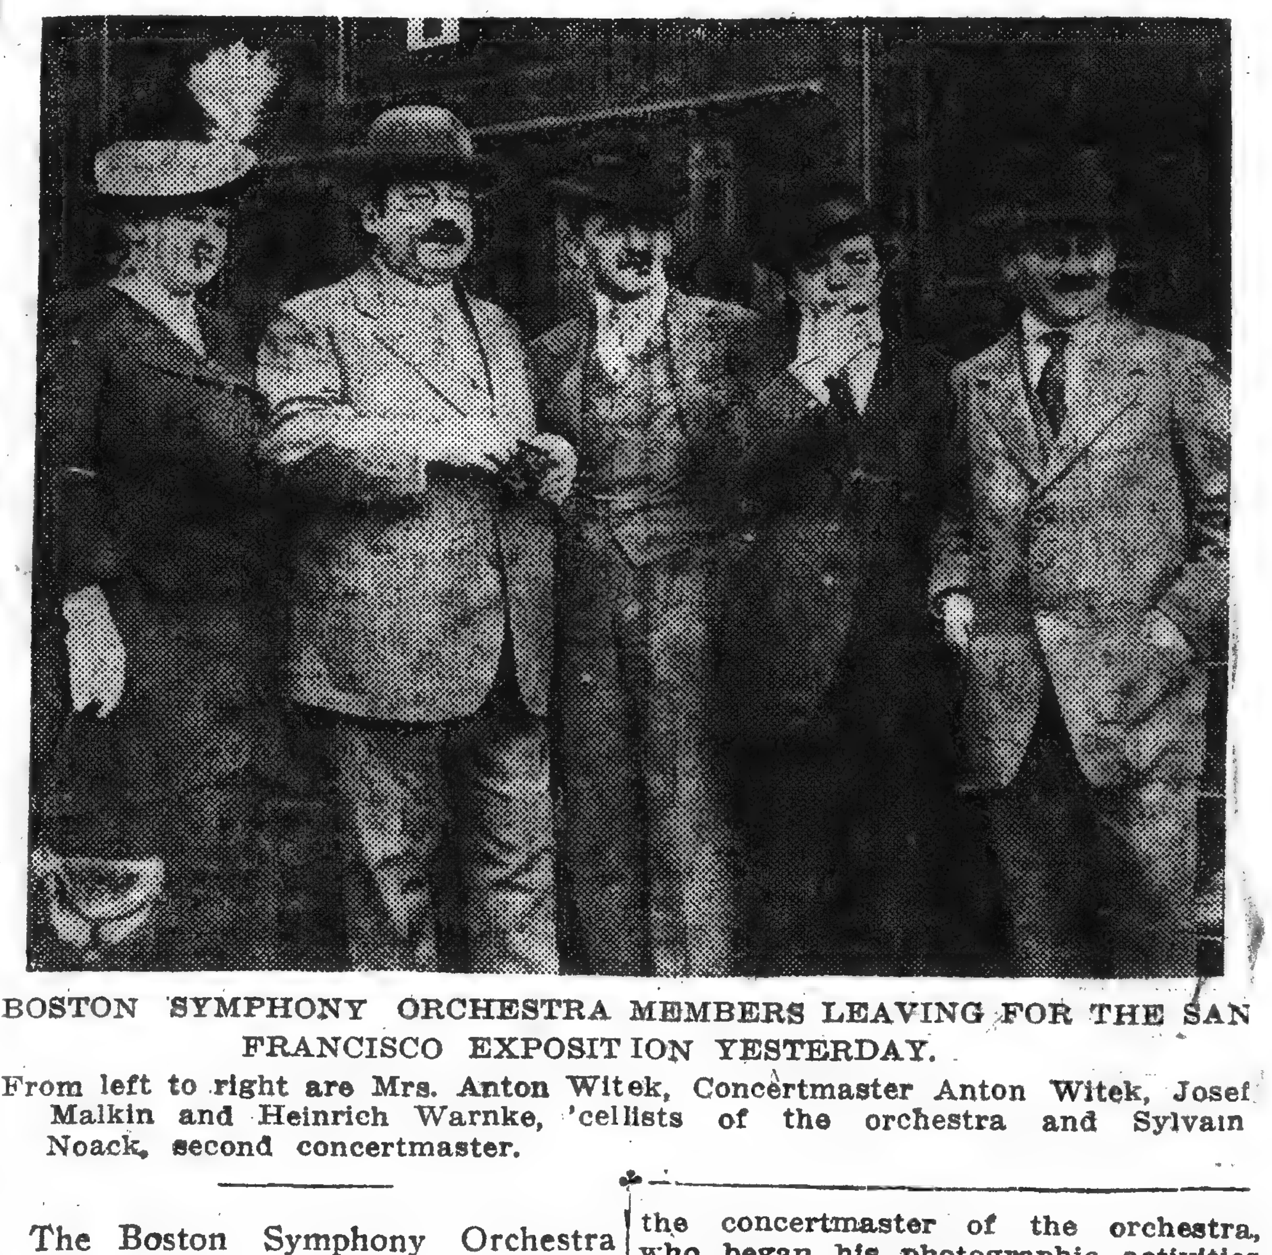
In one of the private cars were Dr and Mrs Muck, C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and John Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra. Dr and Mrs Muck will not return with the others the last of the month, but will remain in the West on a sight-seeing tour.

The train is due in Chicago at 3 today and in San Francisco on Thursday. The orchestra will give 13 concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, beginning May 14 and closing May 26. The last concert will be devoted to Wagnerian music and the place for its performance has not yet been settled. The other dozen concerts are in a subscription and will be given in Festival Hall.

BOSTON POST, MAY 10, 1915

Symphony Players Are Off for Frisco

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MEMBERS LEAVING FOR THE SAN FRANCISCO EXPOSITION YESTERDAY.

From left to right are Mrs. Anton Witek, Concertmaster Anton Witek, Josef Malkin and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists of the orchestra and Sylvain Noack, second concertmaster.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, with Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, Mrs. Muck, C. A. Ellis and William H. Brennan of Symphony Hall, took the 2:05 train from the South station yesterday afternoon for San Francisco, where they will give 13 concerts at the Pan-American Exposition.

RELATIVES AT STATION

In the private car with Dr. and Mrs. Muck were Messrs. Ellis and Brennan and John Sauerquell, librarian of the orchestra. In five cars ahead were the players, nearly all of whom carried cameras with them to take photographs at the exposition and of the far-famed Western scenery. One of the the concertmaster of the orchestra, who began his photographic activities by dodging about with several newspaper men who were actively engaged in "snapping" Doctor Muck.

Wives and other members of the families of the players were standing in a long row by the side of the train, bidding husbands, brothers and fathers farewell.

The San Francisco trip will take the place, this summer, of the usual return to Europe, which is the annual holiday of the majority of the players in the orchestra, many of whom rejoice in the prospect, at last, of seeing America.

The orchestra will travel to San Francisco practically without stop, save for three hours which will be spent in Chicago.

MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BRINGS 34TH SEASON TO END

SYMPHONY HALL—Last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of May 7. The program: Beethoven, symphony No. 5 in C minor; Liszt, "Mazeppa" tone poem; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel" rondo; Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

The program summed up the achievement of the nineteenth century in orchestration. And it illustrated, in broad outline, the methods of nineteenth century musical structure. A fairer statement of what has been accomplished in the long period during which the world has been under the sway of the romantic movement could hardly be drawn up. There were represented in the fifth symphony on the one hand, and in the "Mazeppa" and "Till Eulenspiegel" pieces on the other, forms which have served the two chief classes of composers whom we know as romanticists. The first of these forms is the symphony, which Beethoven surveyed and bounded, and which Schubert, Schumann and Brahms gardened and landscaped to perfection. The second is the tone poem, which Liszt originated, and which Strauss and other contemporary composers have labored into various types of expression, biographical, autobiographical, philosophical and pictorial. Furthermore, there was indicated in the last number on the program, the opera form, one which, according to the observation of some, Wagner revolutionized, but which, according to that of others, he merely forced into particular grooves, into grooves nationalistic and flamboyantly romantic.

Played in any city of the world, such a program would mean a great deal in the way of social interpretation and historic comment. It would have objective interest of an important kind, to say the least, in any artistic locality. Played in Boston, it has something more than external and documentary meaning. It is an intimate revealing of three decades of civic aspiration. It reviews a space of time during which sensitive people of the community have been studying the European orchestral product, to find what it contains for their emotional chastening and their intellectual clarification.

Approval or revision? Encouragement of the forces that have ruled music for 100 years, or not? These are questions which Symphony listeners must have asked themselves in hearing the summary of the case for romanticism, as Dr. Muck and his men presented it on Friday afternoon.

A simple yes or no, certainly will not affect matters. That style of answer has been given many times since the Symphony orchestra began interpreting the classic and modern masters in Music hall the second generation back. Saying that we like or dislike the Straussian romanticism will change the situation no whit. If the symphony public is ever to express its conclusions about the right and wrong, the good and bad of orchestral sound, it must do so through its own composers. It must set men to building symphonic works and keep them at it, just as methodically as it keeps its artists rehearsing and playing for its pleasure three weeks of every winter month, and sends them traveling on a circuit of cities to the South the fourth week. It must put the making as well as the performing of music into its plans.

The reading of the music of the twenty-fourth rehearsal was extraordinary for its accuracy and its technical mastery, even in a season that has been distinguished for such traits. The fifth symphony was little short of letter perfect. Every traditional expression mark was heeded, here and there with an almost playful exactitude. The piece was presented with the simplicity of an overture, its four divisions sounding like contrasting passages in a short work, instead of like exhaustive studies in intellectual, sentimental, humorous and triumphant vein in a long one. Tune and tone had crystalline transparency, but at the same time idea and feeling, persuaded and moved. Liszt's symphonic poem was phrased with a style that made it seem like a song. Strauss' rondo was manipulated with an episodic cunning that made it a veritable recitation in words. Wagner's prelude was commanded with a dignified sonority that has hardly been attained before in a particularly sonorous year. Enthusiastic applause for conductor and players promised high public interest in concerts of next season.

JOURNAL—

-MONDAY, MAY 10,

SEE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OFF FOR THE COAST

300 at Station Say Affectionate Farewell to Musicians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its entire strength, left Boston yesterday afternoon from the South Station for San Francisco, where the orchestra will give a number of concerts at the Panama-Pacific Fair.

The company's popularity in Boston was shown by a crowd of more than 300 which gathered at the station. It was a strongly temperamental gathering and the affectionate farewells previous to the departure of the train and the many women who stood silently waving handkerchiefs, with tears streaming down their cheeks, resembled more the departure of soldiers to the front than the peaceful invasion of the Pacific coast by America's greatest body of musicians.

The company traveled in a special train of Pullman cars, which will be at their service during the entire trip. It consisted of five standard 16-section Pullman sleepers, a private car, a dining car and two baggage coaches. In the private car were Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck, C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and John Sauerquell, the librarian.

The train is due at Union Station, Chicago, at 3 o'clock this afternoon. There the members of the orchestra will have three hours of leisure in which the time will be their own while the special train is being switched around to the station of the Chicago and Northwestern railroad. At 7.05 o'clock this evening the train leaves Chicago as the second section of the Overland Limited and follows that train direct to San Francisco, going by way of Council Bluffs, Cheyenne and Ogden.

The party is due to arrive in San Francisco next Thursday morning. The orchestra will give 13 concerts at the Fair. The first will be given Friday evening, May 14 and the last Wednesday evening, May 26.

JOURNAL—

MAY 8, 1915.

SYMPHONY GIVING FINAL CONCERTS

Matinee Audience Enjoys Rare Program Played Brilliantly.

With tonight's concerts at Symphony Hall, the 34th season of the nonpareil Boston Symphony Orchestra will close; and for these closing concerts, the first of which was given yesterday, Dr. Muck has arranged a program of an Olympian character. With the possible exception of "Mazeppa," the symphonic poem by Liszt, it is music fit for the gods, and, all in all, a splendid example of the Teutonic genius that has ruled the world of music for the last century and a quarter.

Here is the program complete: Beethoven, smphony in C minor; Liszt, "Mazeppa;" Richard Strauss, rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks;" Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The Beethoven symphony, which dazzled Berlioz and prompted Balzac to refer to it as with bated breath in his most famous tragedy—if only this work were offered the season would end in superlative splendor, so full of grandeur is the symphony itself and so dramatic is the reading given by Dr. Muck. Hardly on a par with this towering composition, yet remarkable for their beauty and individuality, are the Strauss and Wagner numbers.

Yesterday the performance of the bristling Strauss rondo was fully as brilliant as that of the symphony which, a little while before, had been most enthusiastically applauded.

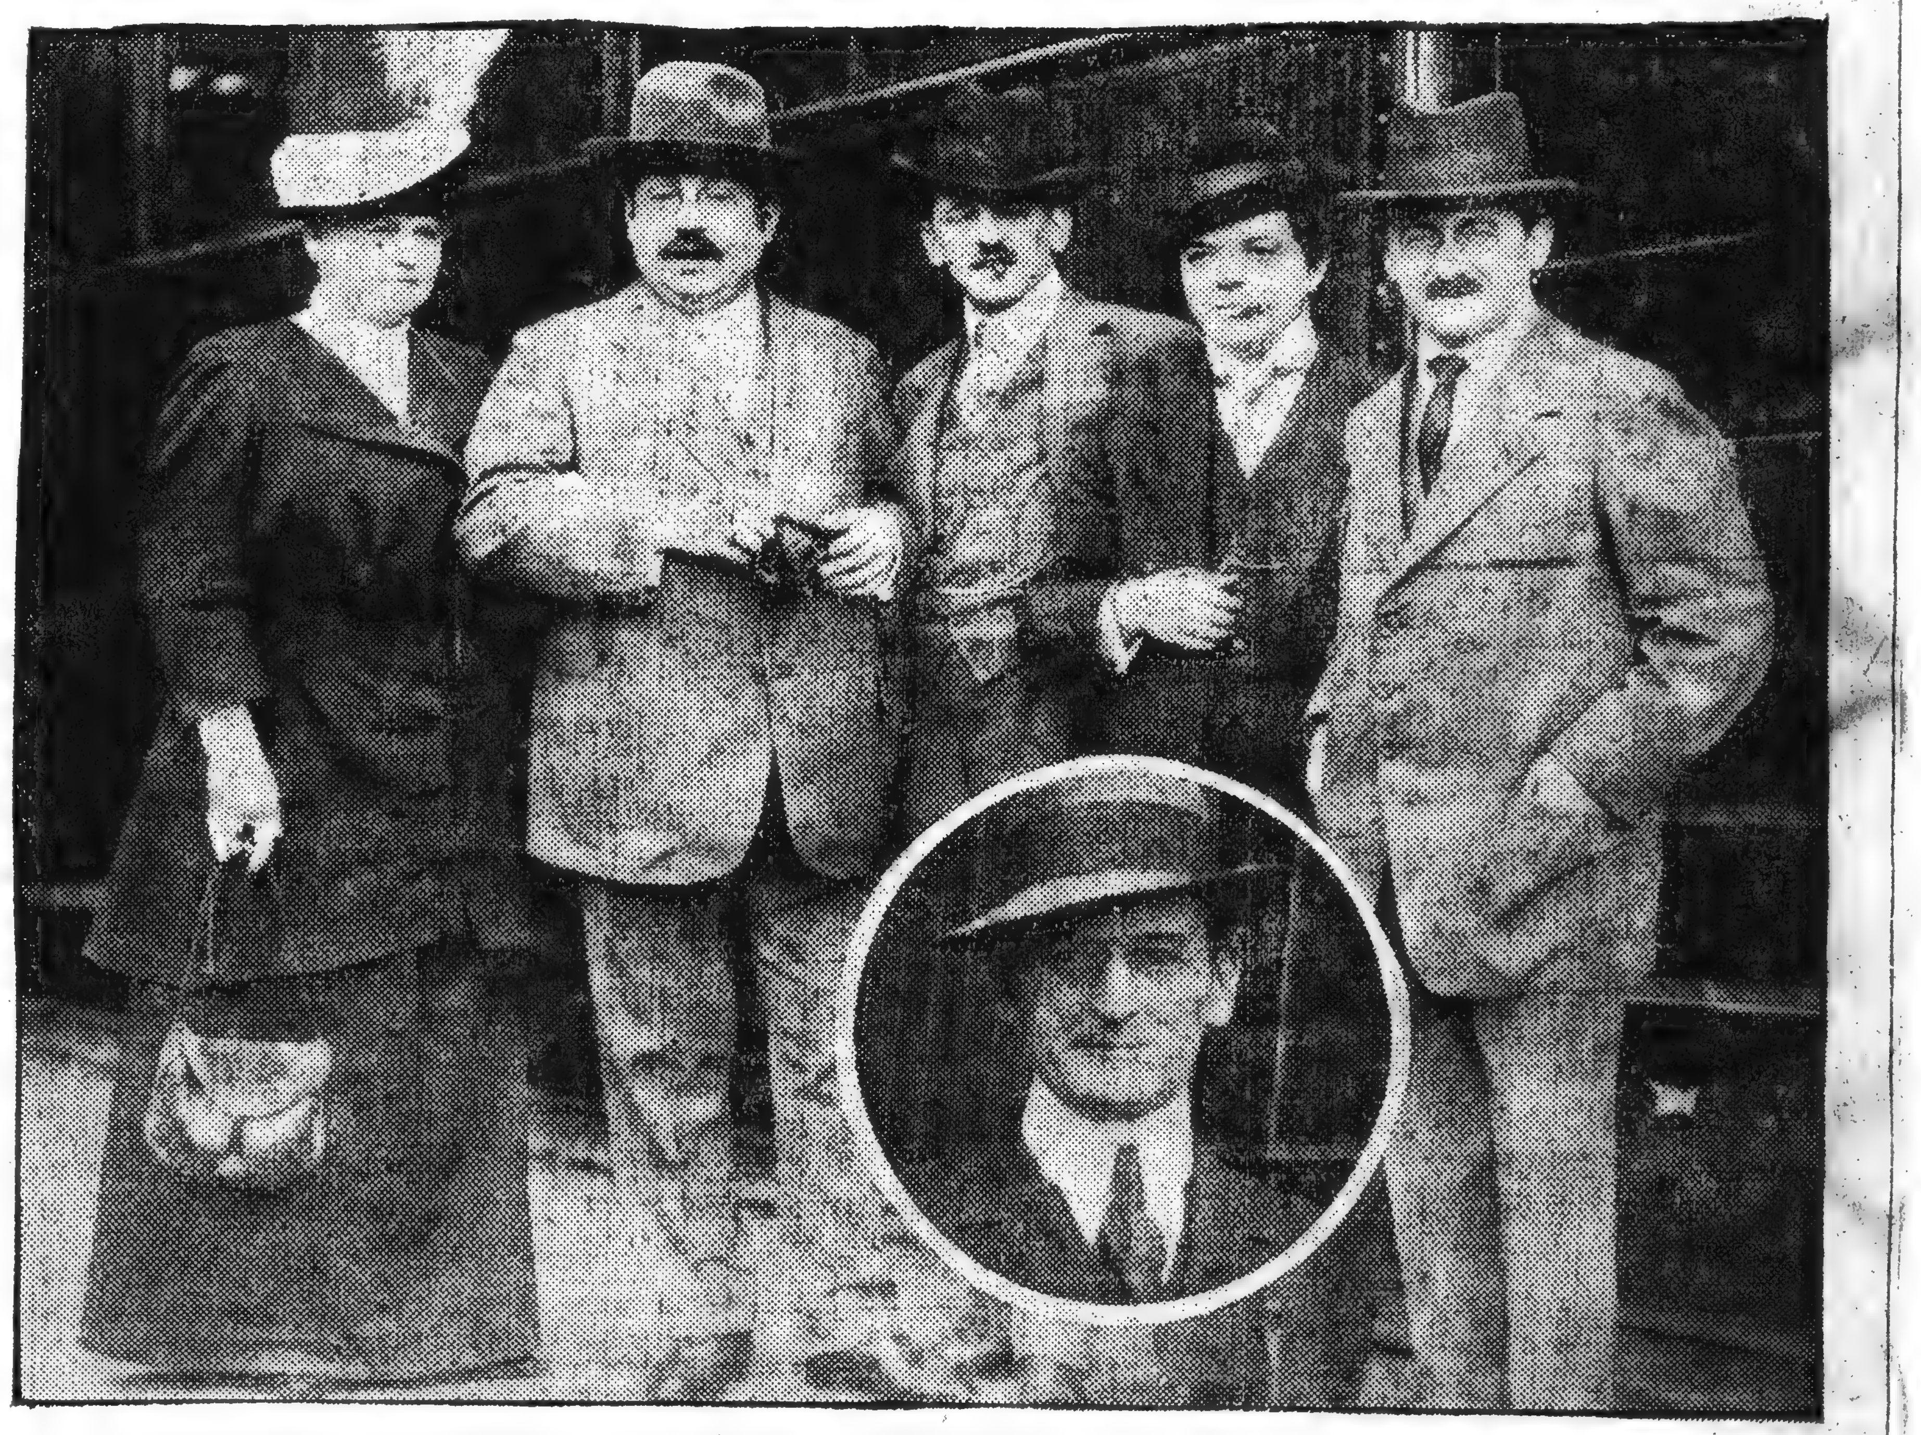
Dr. Muck and his hundred men indeed got a hearty send-off from the rehearsal patrons.

Tomorrow afternoon the orchestra will start for San Francisco, to be gone three weeks. It will give twelve concerts at the fair, the first next Friday night and the last on Wednesday night, May 26. These are being subscribed for—and, according to accounts, very generously. A 13th concert will hav [illegible]

THE BOSTON GLOBE—MONDAY, MAY 10, 1915

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OFF TO SAN FRANCISCO.

Famous Boston Organization Will Give 13 Concerts At the Exposition This Month.



MEMBERS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON WAY TO SAN FRANCISCO.

Left to Right—Mrs Anton Witek, Anton Witek, 1st concert master; Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist; J. Malkin; Sylvain Noack, 2d concert master. Insert, Dr Carl Muck, leader.

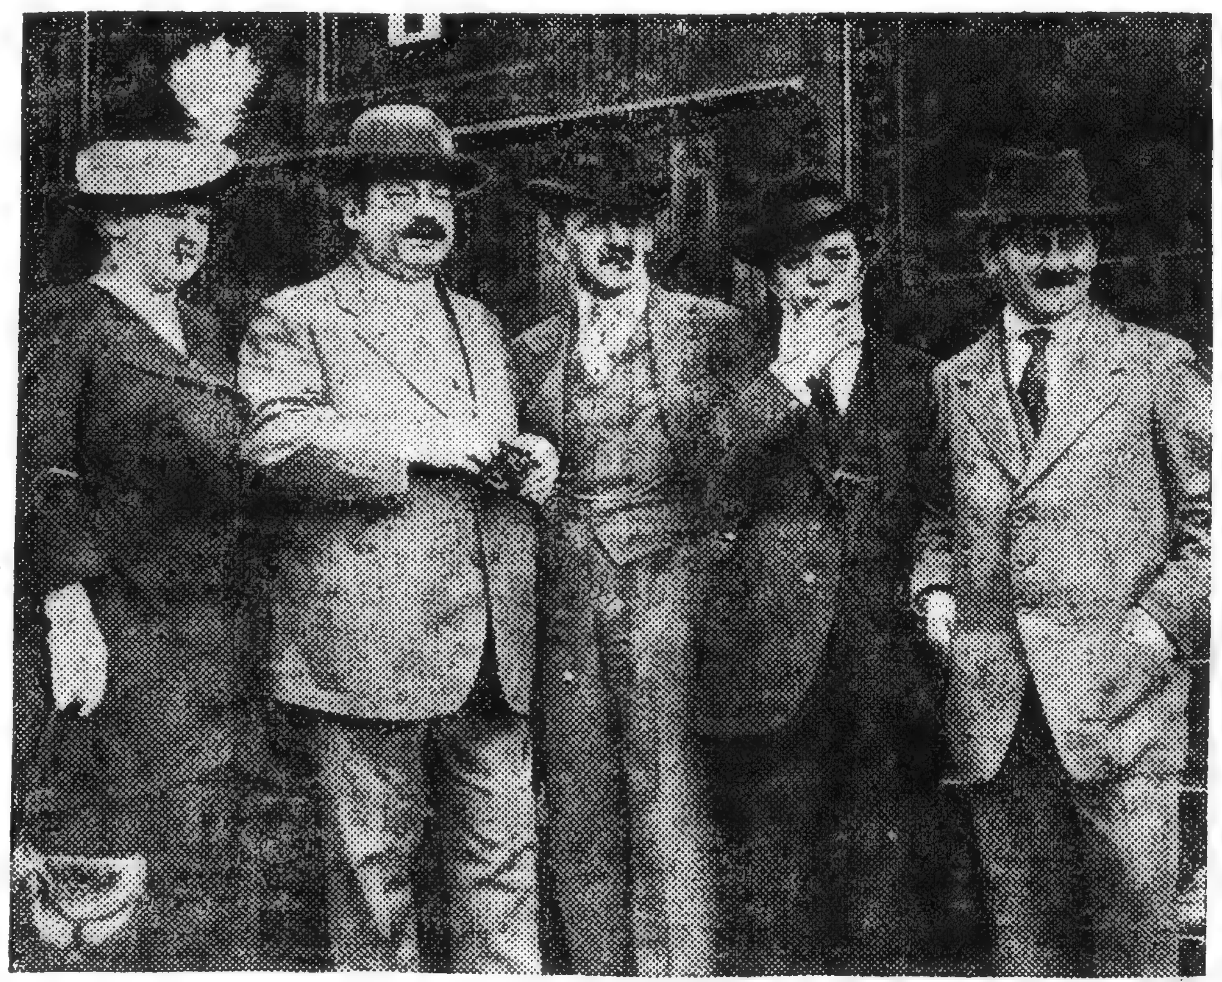
Aboard a private train, consisting of five sleepers, a dining car and two baggage cars, the Boston Symphony Orchestra left the South Station shortly after 2 yesterday afternoon bound for San Francisco. There was a big gathering of musical people at the station to wave farewell to the famous organization.

In one of the private cars were Dr and Mrs Muck, C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and John Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra. Dr and Mrs Muck will not return with the others the last of the month, but will remain in the West on a sight-seeing tour.

The train is due in Chicago at 3 today and in San Francisco on Thursday. The orchestra will give 13 concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, beginning May 14 and closing May 26. The last concert will be devoted to Wagnerian music and the place for its performance has not yet been settled. The other dozen concerts are in a subscription and will be given in Festival Hall.

BOSTON POST, MAY 10, 1915

Symphony Players Are Off for Friscc



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MEMBERS LEAVING FOR THE SAN FRANCISCO EXPOSITION YESTERDAY.

From left to right are Mrs. Anton Witek, Concertmaster Anton Witek, Josef Malkin and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists of the orchestra and Sylvain Noack, second concertmaster.

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony O chestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, with Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, Mrs. Muck, C. A. Ellis and William H. Brennan of Symphony Hall, took the 2:05 train from the South station yesterday afternoon for San Francisco, where they will give 13 concerts at the Pan-American Exposition.

RELATIVES AT STATION

In the private car with Dr. and Mrs. Muck were Messrs. Ellis and Brennan and John Sauerquell, librarian of the orchestra. In five cars ahead were the players, nearly all of whom carried cameras with them to take photographs at the exposition and of the far-famed Western scenery. One of the most [illegible] of these was Mr. Witek the concertmaster of the orchestra, who began his photographic activities by dodging about with several newspaper men who were actively engaged in "snapping" Doctor Muck.

Wives and other members of the families of the players were standing in a long row by the side of the train, bidding husbands, brothers and fathers farewell.

The San Francisco trip will take the place, this summer, of the usual return to Europe, which is the annual holiday of the majority of the players in the orchestra, many of whom rejoice in the prospect, at last, of seeing America.

The orchestra will travel to San Francisco practically without stop, save for three hours which will be spent in Chicago.

[160]

Address

MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BRINGS 34TH SEASON TO END

SYMPHONY HALL—Last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of May 7. The program: Beethoven, symphony No. 5 in C minor: Liszt, "Mazeppa" tone poem; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel" rondo; Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

The program summed up the achievement of the nineteenth century in orchestration. And it illustrated, in broad outline, the methods of nineteenth century musical structure. A fairer statement of what has been accomplished in the long period during which the world has been under the sway of the romantic movement could hardly be drawn up. There were represented in the fifth symphony on the one hand, and in the "Mazeppa" and "Till Eulenspiegel" pieces on the other, forms which have served the two chief classes of composers whom we know as romanticists. The first of these forms is the symphony, which Beethoven surveyed and bounded, and which Schubert, Schumann and Brahms gardened and landscaped to perfection. The second is the tone poem, which Liszt originated, and which Strauss and other contemporary composers have labored into various types of expression, biographical, autobiographical, philosophical and pictorial. Furthermore, there was indicated in the last number on the program, the opera form, one which, according to the observation of some, Wagner revolutionized, but which, according to that of others, he merely forced into particular grooves, into grooves nationalistic and flamboyantly romantic.

Played in any city of the world, such a program would mean a great deal in the way of social interpretation and historic comment. It would have objective interest of an important kind, to say the least, in any artistic locality. Played in Boston, it has something more than external and documentary meaning. It is an intimate revealing of three decades of civic aspiration. It reviews a space of time during which sensitive people of the community have been studying the European orchestral product, to find what it contains for their emotional chastening and their intellectual clarification.

Approval or revision? Encouragement of the forces that have ruled music for 100 years, or not? These are questions which Symphony listeners must have asked themselves in hearing the summary of the case for romanticism, as Dr. Muck and his men presented it on Friday afternoon.

A simple yes or no, certainly will not affect matters. That style of answer has been given many times since the Symphony orchestra began interpreting the classic and modern masters in Music hall the second generation back. Saying that we like or dislike the Straussian romanticism will change the situation no whit. If the symphony public is ever to express its conclusions about the right and wrong, the good and bad of orchestral sound, it must do so through its own composers. It must set men to building symphonic works and keep them at it, just as methodically as it keeps its artists rehearsing and playing for its pleasure three weeks of every winter month, and sends them traveling on a circuit of cities to the South the fourth week. It must put the making as well as the performing of music into its plans.

The reading of the music of the twenty-fourth rehearsal was extraordinary for its accuracy and its technical mastery, even in a season that has been distinguished for such traits. The fifth symphony was little short of letter perfect. Every traditional expression mark was heeded, here and there with an almost playful exactitude. The piece was presented with the simplicity of an overture, its four divisions sounding like contrasting passages in a short work, instead of like exhaustive studies in intellectual, sentimental, humorous and triumphant vein in a long one. Tune and tone had crystaline transparency, but at the same time idea and feeling, persuaded and moved. Liszt's symphonic poem was phrased with a style that made it seem like a song. Strauss' rondo was manipulated with an episodic cunning that made it a veritable recitation in words. Wagner's prelude was commanded with a dignified sonority that has hardly been attained before in a particularly sonorous year. Enthusiastic applause for conductor and players promised high public interest in concerts of next season.

JOURNAL—

-MONDAY, MAY 10,

SEE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OFF FOR THE COAST

300 at Station Say Affectionate Farewell to Musicians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its entire strength, left Boston yesterday afternoon from the South Station for San Francisco, where the orchestra will give a number of concerts at the Panama-Pacific Fair.

The company's popularity in Boston was shown by a crowd of more than 300 which gathered at the station. It was a strongly temperamental gathering and the affectionate farewells previous to the departure of the train and the many women who stood silently waving handkerchiefs, with tears streaming down their cheeks, resembled more the departure of soldiers to the front than the peaceful invasion of the Pacific coast by America's greatest body of musicians.

The company traveled in a special train of Pullman cars, which will be at their service during the entire trip. It consisted of five standard 16-section Pullman sleepers, a private car, a dining car and two baggage coaches. In the private car were Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck, C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and John Sauerquell, the librarian.

The train is due at Union Station, Chicago, at 3 o'clock this afternoon. There the members of the orchestra will have three hours of leisure in which the time will be their own while the special train is being switched around to the station of the Chicago and Northwestern railroad. At 7.05 o'clock this evening the train leaves Chicago as the second section of the Overland Limited and follows that train direct to San Francisco, going by way of Council Bluffs, Cheyenne and Ogden.

The party is due to arrive in San Francisco next Thursday morning. The orchestra will give 13 concerts at the Fair. The first will be given Friday evening, May 14 and the last Wednesday evening, May 26.

JOURNAL—

MAY 8, 1915.

SYMPHONY GIVING FINAL CONCERTS

Matinee Audience Enjoys Rare Program Played Brilliantly.

With tonight's concerts at Symphony Hall, the 34th season of the nonpareil Boston Symphony Orchestra will close; and for these closing concerts, the first of which was given yesterday, Dr. Muck has arranged a program of an Olympian character. With the possible exception of "Mazeppa," the symphonic poem by Liszt, it is music fit for the gods, and, all in all, a splendid example of the Teutonic genius that has ruled the world of music for the last century and a quarter.

Here is the program complete: Beethoven, smphony in C minor; Liszt, "Mazeppa;" Richard Strauss, rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks;" Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The Beethoven symphony, which dazzled Berlioz and prompted Balzac to refer to it as with bated breath in his most famous tragedy—if only this work were offered the season would end in superlative splendor, so full of grandeur is the symphony itself and so dramatic is the reading given by Dr. Muck. Hardly on a par with this towering composition, yet remarkable for their beauty and individuality, are the Strauss and Wagner numbers.

Yesterday the performance of the bristling Strauss rondo was fully as brilliant as that of the symphony which, a little while before, had been most enthusiastically applauded.

Dr. Muck and his hundred men indeed got a hearty send-off from the rehearsal patrons.

Tomorrow afternoon the orchestra will start for San Francisco, to be gone three weeks. It will give twelve concerts at the fair, the first next Friday night and the last on Wednesday night, May 26. These are being subscribed for—and, according to accounts, very generously. A 13th concert will [illegible]

THE BOSTON GLOBE—MONDAY, MAY 10, 1915

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OFF TO SAN FRANCISCO.

Famous Boston Organization Will Give 13 Concerts At the Exposition This Month.

MEMBERS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON WAY TO SAN FRANCISCO.

Left to Right—Mrs Anton Witek, Anton Witek, 1st concert master; Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist; J. Malkin; Sylvain Noack, 2d concert master. Insert, Dr Carl Muck, leader.

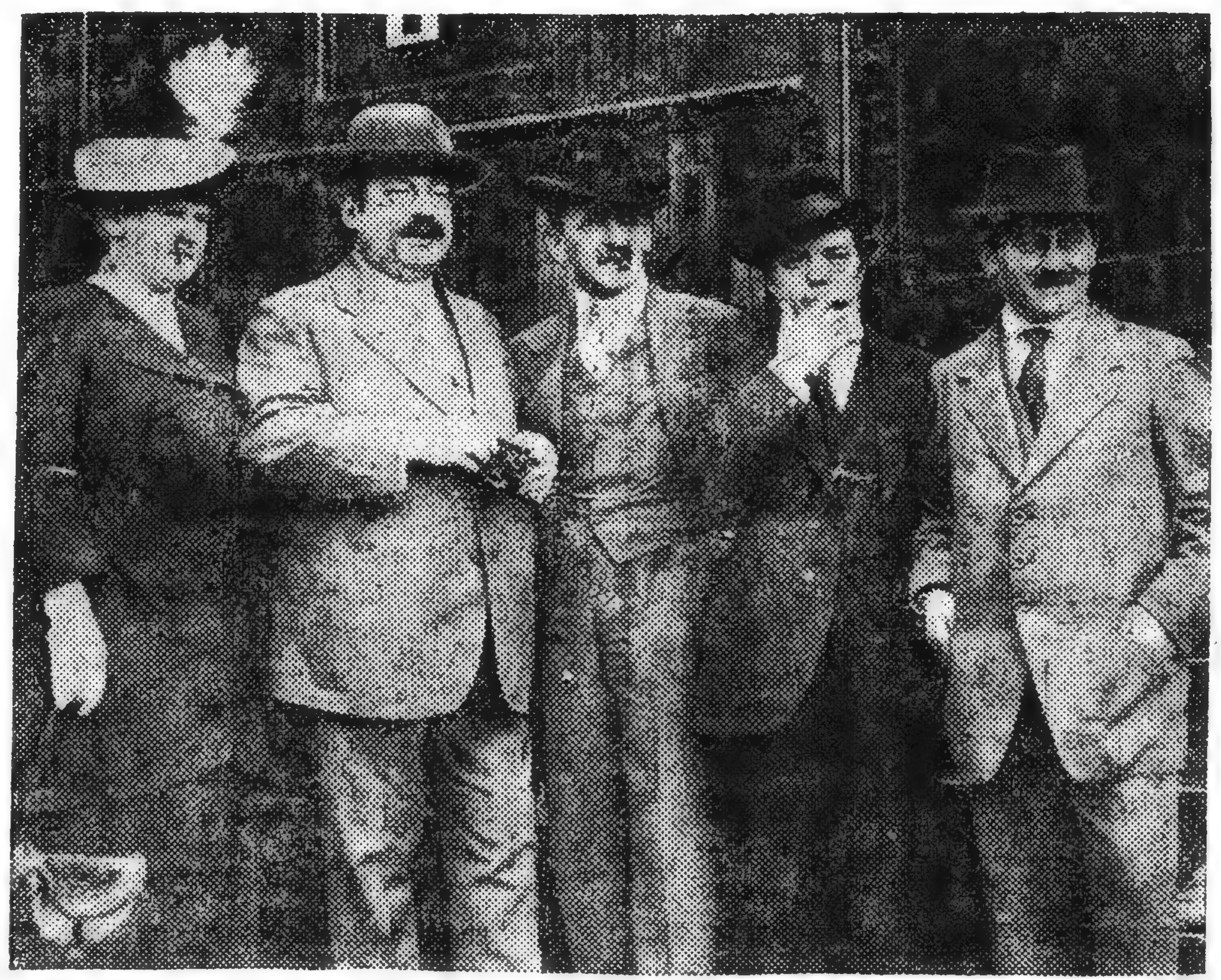
Aboard a private train, consisting of five sleepers, a dining car and two baggage cars, the Boston Symphony Orchestra left the South Station shortly after 2 yesterday afternoon bound for San Francisco. There was a big gathering of musical people at the station to wave farewell to the famous organization.

In one of the private cars were Dr and Mrs Muck, C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and John Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra. Dr and Mrs Muck will not return with the others the last of the month, but will remain in the West on a sight-seeing tour.

The train is due in Chicago at 3 today and in San Francisco on Thursday. The orchestra will give 13 concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, beginning May 14 and closing May 26. The last concert will be devoted to Wagnerian music and the place for its performance has not yet been settled. The other dozen concerts are in a subscription and will be given in Festival Hall.

BOSTON POST, MAY 10, 1915

Symphony Players Are Off for Frisco



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MEMBERS LEAVING FOR THE SAN FRANCISCO EXPOSITION YESTERDAY.

From left to right are Mrs. Anton Witek, Concertmaster Anton Witek, Josef Malkin and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists of the orchestra and Sylvain Noack, second concertmaster.

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, with Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, Mrs. Muck, C. A. Ellis and William H. Brennan of Symphony Hall, took the 2:05 train from the South station yesterday afternoon for San Francisco, where they will give 13 concerts at the Pan-American Exposition.

RELATIVES AT STATION

In the private car with Dr. and Mrs. Muck were Messrs. Ellis and Brennan and John Sauerquell, librarian of the orchestra. In five cars ahead were the players, nearly all of whom carried cameras with them to take photographs at the exposition and of the far-famed Western scenery. One of the [illegible] of these was Mr. Witek, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who began his photographic activities by dodging about with several newspaper men who were actively engaged in "snapping" Doctor Muck.

Wives and other members of the families of the players were standing in a long row by the side of the train, bidding husbands, brothers and fathers farewell.

The San Francisco trip will take the place, this summer, of the usual return to Europe, which is the annual holiday of the majority of the players in the orchestra, many of whom rejoice in the prospect, at last, of seeing America.

The orchestra will travel to San Francisco practically without stop, save for three hours which will be spent in Chicago.

[160]

BOSTON HERALD.

SATURDAY, MAY 8.

LAST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL OF THE SEASON

Concert One to Be Remembered Gratefully—Brilliant Closing Performance.

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It was the last of the 34th season. The program was as follows:

Beethoven........—Symphony in C minor, No. 5
Liszt..
"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem, No. 6 (after Victor Hugo).
Strauss....."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"
Wagner..
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg"

This concert was one to remember gratefully rather than one to discuss. The vocabulary of eulogy is more limited than that of blame. Swinburne with all his verbal wealth, high-sounding sentences and varied rhythms is never so tiresome as in his dithyrambs in praise of the Elizabethan dramatists. Heap adjective on adjective, weave phrases out-coloring Tyrian purple, and you cannot give an adequate idea of a musical composition or performance to him that did not hear it.

A brilliant season was brought to an extraordinarily brilliant end. Beethoven's symphony was played most eloquently. The conception was superb in its breadth; dramatic without singularity, affectation, extravagance; perfectly rounded, rich in beautifully expressive details. In the minds of some conductors the Finale after the first glorious outburst is a falling from the lofty height; but in this Finale Dr. Muck triumphed where some have been only laborious, and others have wholly failed. He not only maintained the interest; he so treated the various sections that they seemed indispensable to a stupendous whole. The final triumphal song for once was not an anticlimax.

Vividly picturesque was his interpretation of Liszt's "Mazeppa," which is as flamboyant as Victor Hugo's poem. The composition has the "panache" that is characteristic of the romantic music and painting inspired by "Jeune France." Mr. George Moore described Hugo's "Les Orientales," in which "Mazeppa" was published, as "an East of painted cardboard, tin daggers and a military band playing the 'Turkish Patrol' in the Palais Royal"; but he also wrote: "The verse is grand, noble, tremendous." The symphonic poem of Liszt should be played in this plumed spirit of romanticism. He did not write it with his tongue in his cheek. To him Mazeppa symbolized genius, persecuted, crushed, but at last rising superior, standing erect and victorious in royal might." All this was real to him. He expressed in music his convictions with the audacity of a melodramatic genius. There should be no sand-papering of the music descriptive of Mazeppa's wild ride; nor should the conductor shrink from the tonitruant delivery of the typical theme swayed by the thought that the motive might be called bombastic, or even vulgar. Here is the "panache" in all its romantic splendor. The Hungarian episode in the March-Finale, with its piquant instrumentation, is eminently Lisztian. Dr. Muck not only recognized the "panache" and gloried in it; as an interpreter, as a leader of his men, he wore it.

The performance of Strauss's Rondo, one of the most admirable of the composer's works—perhaps the one that is wholly excellent in its combination of beauty, humor, sentiment and bold imagination—was remarkably elastic and impressive. The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" brought a sonorous close, yet after the preceding compositions Wagner's instrumentation in this instance often seemed thick and turgid.

The great audience was enthusiastic. Applauded again and again as he came upon the stage, Dr. Muck was recalled with fervor several times after the symphony, and after Wagner's prelude there was a prolonged demonstration in his honor.

A few notes concerning the work of the season may not be amiss.

Forty-eight composers were represented with 101 orchestral pieces, concertos, arias, song, etc. Of these composers nine were French: Berlioz (1), Chabrier (2), Debussy (1), Franck (a Walloon, but naturalized Frenchman, 2), d'Indy (1), Lalo (2), Ravel (1), Ropartz (1), Saint-Saens (1).

Four Russian and Polish composers were represented: Borodin (1), Noskowski (1), Stravinsky (1), Tschaikowsky (1).

Three Italians: Bossi (1), Monteverdi; (1), Sinigaglia (1).

Enesco, a Roumanian by birth, might have been enumerated among the French.

Five works of Sibelius, the Finn, were played.

The three Americans were Chadwick, Converse, MacDowell.

The other composers were German, Austrian, Bohemian, Hungarian.

These composers led in number of works performed: Beethoven, 14; Brahms, 7; Mozart, 6; Sibelius, 5; Liszt, 4; Strauss, 4; Weber, 4.

These orchestral compositions were performed for the first time in Boston:

Symphonies—Korngold

Ropartz, Symphony No. 4, C major; Volbach, Symphony in B minor.

Symphonic Poems, etc.—Reger, Four Tone Poems (after Boecklin); Shoenberg, five pieces for orchestra; Strube, variations on an Original Theme, (first performance anywhere).

Concertos, etc.—D'Indy, Fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk-tunes, first time with orchestra; Klose, Prelude and Double Fugue for organ (choral at the end with trumpets and trombones).

These works were performed for the first time at these concerts: Franck, C., Chorale in A minor for organ; Fried, Adagio and Scherzo for wind instruments, two harps, and kettle-drums; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole; Stravinsky, Feuerwerk.

The soloists were as follows: Sopranos, Miss Gerhardt, Miss Hinkle; mezzo-soprano, Mme. Culp; baritone, Mr. Amato; pianists, Mr. Bauer, Mr. Borwick, Mr. Gabrilowitsch; organist, Mr. Marshall; violinists, Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Noack, Mr. Witek; violoncellists, Mr. Casals, Mr. Warnke.

Miss Hinkle and Messrs. Amato, Borwick and Casals appeared for the first time here at Symphony concerts. Messrs. Witek, Noack, Warnke and Marshall are members of the orchestra.

A season that will long be conspicuous in the annals of the orchestra will end tonight.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

MAY 8, 1915

LAST SYMPHONY GREAT TRIUMPH

FINAL PROGRAMME ENTIRELY ORCHESTRAL

But Ran From Grave to Gay, From Lively to Severe

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Beethoven. Symphony No. 5, C minor.
Liszt. "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem.
Strauss. "Till Eulenspiegel," Symphonic Poem.
Wagner. "The Mastersingers," Prelude.

Although the last programme was entirely orchestral it was by no means without contrast, for it ran from grave to gay, from lively to severe, and it was triumphantly successful almost from first to last. There is nothing new to read into Beethoven's fifth symphony. There is probably not a finer instance of figure development in the entire symphonic catalogue than that of the first movement of this work. It is interesting to trace, through the investigation of Beethoven's pocket-memorandum books, the fact that he did not at first think of the grandeur of this figure at all. He writes it down and develops it as a lively, chattering theme, and marks it "Presto." Only upon revision did he come to the idea of carrying it out as if Destiny were knocking at the door. It was somewhat exaggerated in the performance and it sometimes seemed as if Destiny intended to kick the door in.

The same four-noted figure is often begun rather raggedly, because of its abruptness. Von Bulow used to beat a measure before the beginning of the music, so as to get the swing of it into the minds of his men, but Dr. Muck does not need such a device with his superb orchestra. The whole first movement went with a vigor and virility that aroused great enthusiasm, even if we must find the reading too extreme.

The second movement also had its changes from its first inception. Nottebohm, in his transcriptions from the memorandum-books, shows that Beethoven at first contemplated a Minuet-like theme for this movement, and the brilliant and bold modulation at the end of the chief theme s absent altogether in the first sketch.

This movement is a fine display for the strings, which vary the theme from violins to contrabasses. It is needless to say how these string variations were performed. Our string orchestra is absolutely the best in the world at present.

Full Freedom

The Scherzo of this symphony is to our mind the first in which the full freedom of this movement is revealed. The scherzo of the second symphony is tentative, that of the third rollicking, the Minuet of the fourth symphony is an eccentric Scherzo, but in this Scherzo of the fifth symphony, all the possibilities of the new form are revealed. We believe that the bold passage of the contrabasses, in the Trio of this movement, was a defiance of the criticism of Von Weber, who had satirized the florid work of the contrabasses in the end of the fourth symphony. Our contrabasses played this part of the work without flaw.

The finale of this symphony has seemed to many as the true finale to the Heroic Symphony. The end of that symphony is rather bizarre, and its variations are not heroic, while this finale is certainly a fiery and more warlike one. Here Dr. Muck sounded a note of triumph that was most powerful. The work was applauded to the echo. The symphonies of Beethoven may not be as long as some of the modern ones, but they are somewhat broader and deeper.

Liszt's "Mazeppa" served to remind us that this composer's symphonic poems were nearly equal to Berlioz's Symphonies in being pioneers in the field of modern programme music. "Mazeppa" is a very exciting composition peppered up with piccolo, with wooden bow-strokes on the violin-strings, and with every other device of modern music. There are a good many fast trotters in the modern musical stable, such as the Walkyrie stallions, Brunnhilde's Grane, Berlioz's matched pair in the "Damnation of Faust," and many others, but none of them can out-pace this "Tartar of the Ukraine breed." We must Hugo, not Byron, and the Triumph at the close is the uprising of Truth after persecution. This triumph was grandly interpreted by a March that was barbaric in its splendor, which gave a conclusion to the work that was indescribably effective. Never have we heard such continuous enthusiasm at an afternoon concert. It began before the first number (when Dr. Muck appeared), and it lasted long after the last number, when the conductor was recalled again and again.

We confess to prizing Strauss's works of the middle period more highly than his later extremes. "Death and Transfiguration," "Zarathustra," "Don Quixotte," and "Till Eulenspiegel" appeal more to us than his self-worship in "Heldenleben," or his family life with double-fugues for breakfast, in the Sinfonia Domestica. "Till Eulenspiegel" is great in its portrayal of burly, mediaeval, German humor. It is wonderfully graphic too, and Till's crumpling up before his enemies is as clear as anything in the programme-music field.

Dramatic Effect

Dr. Muck played the work with unctuous comicality. All the way from Till's opening insouciance to his final squeaks at his execution there was elasticity, clearness and dramatic effect.

In every one of the works of this most successful concert the technique of our orchestra was displayed most vividly. One could make a long list of wonderful touches in this great final concert. The contrabasses in the Andante and Scherzo of the Symphony; the violin work in the first part of "Mazeppa"; the trombone and piccolo work, and the trumpet fanfares, in the last part of the same; the splendid work of the horn in the Till Eulenspiegel figure, are but a few of the excellences of a concert that will long be remembered, and we were glad to see the incessant tributes to Dr. Muck and our noble orchestra.

Wagner's Prelude to the "Meistersingers" is the greatest Prelude ever achieved. It brings the prelude almost into the domain of overture, both in its dimensions and shape. Splendid pomp was in the performance of the March in the Master-singer's Motive, sharp contrast in the sudden entrance of the Meistersinger motive in diminution and in its subsequent parody, eloquent beauty in the touches of the Prize-song and it was altogether a triumphant ending of a series of efforts which has carried the orchestra through a very trying season. Let us recall that there were moments at the beginning of the season when we doubted the possibility of gathering our orchestra together, when we feared that the Symphony Concerts might follow the Boston Opera into oblivion. We have had a great season, nevertheless, and our orchestra was never in finer condition. It was very apropos, however, that the climax should come thus in the final concert.

And now our musical heroes are to start upon their voyage into far distant climes. We are disappointed that their first great excursion was not made to Europe, during the old days of Peace, that England, Germany and France might have learned that we have an orchestra here that excels any of their own. But all the same we wish our young Jasons success in their adventurous journey. May they bring back the Golden Fleece. "Bon Voyage!"

SUNDAY GLOBE—MAY 9,

Musical Season in Review.

The season of music which closed with the Symphony concert last night has been one more conspicuous for interpretative than for creative merit. The new contemporaneous music which came to performance during the Winter, especially that in the larger forms, appeared likely to be of little enduring value. Compositions for orchestra by Schoenberg, Stravinsky and Korngold have been played. Stravinsky's "Fireworks" is an early work, written for an occasion, and not a just indication of the composer mature powers. Korngold's "Sinfonietta" combined with astounding precocity the promise of greater individuality in ideas. Schoenberg's Five pieces provoked ardent supporters, those who would not have posterity find them lacking in true discernment and those who found the music irritating, stupid, pathological.

The less revolutionary sextet of earlier years made it a pity that Schoenberg had not retained his first ideals, his first vitality of imagination and dramatic force. A pleasureable memory of the season was Emanuel Moor's suite of three preludes for solo violin. The first two of these were of a finely rhapsodical flavor and played in the vein by Mr Pochon.

Mr Grainger's music for piano in the folk vein had distinct character. Debussy's two pieces for the piano, especially the first, reveal again the fine-fibred imagination of the poet. There would have been interest in hearing Spendiarow's ballet played with a larger string choir than Mr Stier had at his disposal.

There were various new works in chamber music played by the Flonzaley, Kneisel and Zoellner quartets. With but slight exception they showed more labor than inspiration.

Following is a list of compositions played during the season for the first time in Boston. Those marked with three asterisks () were performed for the first time anywhere. BSO signifies Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aulin, Tor—Concerto A minor for violin, Emanuel Ondricek recital, March 10.

Bach-Gibson—Pastoral Suite for 11 wind instruments, Longy Club concert, Nov 25.

Beach, Mrs H. H. A.—Valse Fantasie for piano, recital by composer, Dec 16.

Brandts-Buys, J.—Romantische Serenade, Zoellner String Quartet, Dec 3.

Converse, Frederick S.—Song of World Adventures, concert by Choral Music Society, Stephen Townsend, conductor, Dec 9.

Debussy—Feuilles Mortes and Berceuse Heroique. Piano recital by George Copeland, Feb 18.

Foote, Arthur—The Wind and the Day, chorus for mixed voices, concert by Choral Music Society, Stephen Townsend, conductor, Dec 9.

Fried, Oscar—Adagio and Scherzo for wind instruments, harp and kettle drums, op. 2, Jan 16 (*B. S. O. concerts).

Glazounoff—Music to ballet, "Raymonda," Boston Theatre, Mlle Pavlowa and company, March 4.

Grainger, Percy—Colonial Song and Mock Morris Dance for piano, recital by composer, March 6. Shepherd's Hey and Irish Tune from County Derry for piano, played by the composer at concert with Miss Culp, Sunday afternoon, March 21.

Grieg—Three Norwegian folksongs: In Ola Valley, Cattle Call and Roetnamsknut for piano, played by Mr Grainger at his recital

Hubert, Jean—Music to operetta, "Weeping Pierrot and Laughing Pierrot," Maggie Teyte, John Campbell and George Mitchell, Jordan Hall, Feb 2, benefit Woman's Municipal League.

Juon, Paul—Idylle, Contemysterieuse and musette miniature for two violins and piano, recital by Emanuel and Ella Kalova Ondricek, Jordan Hall, March 10.

Klose, Friedrich—Prelude and double fugue for organ (choral with trumpets and trombones), B. S. O., April 2.

Kodaly, Zoltan—Quartet C major, op. 2, Kneisel Quartet, Nov 3.

Korngold, Erich—First and second movements sonata G major for violin and piano, recital by Josephine Durrell and Lee Pattison, Steinert Hall, April 1.

Sinfonietta for full orchestra, op. 5, B. S. O., April 9.

Lewis, Leo R.—May time, mixed chorus, concert by Choral Music Society, Stephen Townsend, conductor, Jordon Hall, Dec 9.

Mahler, Gustav—Songs of a Traveling Journeyman, B. S. O., Feb 5, Paul Draper, tenor.

Maquarre, A.—Au Clair de Lune, for violin, recital by Irma Seydel, Jordan Hall, March 1.

Marteau, Henri—Eight songs for voice and string quartet, recital Steinert Hall, May 5, Martha Atwood-Baker, assisted by Messrs Koessler, Pinfield, Blumenau and Steinke.

Mason, Daniel Gregory—Piano quartet, A major, op. 7, Kneisel Quartet, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, Dec 1.

Milhaud, Darius—Two movements from quartet, concert by the Flonzaley Quartet, Dec 10.

Moor, Emanuel—Suite of three preludes for violin solo, op. 100, played by Alfred Pochon, concert of Flonzaley Quartet, March 11.

Parker, Horatio—Oratorio, "Morven and the Grail," Handel and Haydn Centenary, April 11.

Prutting, Robert Henry—Pastel for violin, Miss Seydel's recital, Jordan Hall, March 1.

Ravel—Spanish Rhapsody, Nov 20. (*B. S. O. concerts).

Reger—Four Tone Poems for full orchestra, op. 128, March 26; B. S. O.

Ropartz, Guy—Symphony No. 4, C major; B. S. O., Oct 24.

Samazeuilh, G.—Quartet in D, Zoellner Quartet, Steinert Hall, Dec 3.

Schoenberg—Five Pieces for Orchestsa, op. 10, Dec 18, B. S. O. Sextet, D minor, op. 4, Verklaerte Nacht, concert by Kneisel Quartet, March 16.

Spendiarow, Alexander—Music to ballet, Seven Daughters of the Ghost King, Boston Theatre, March 8, Mlle Pavlowa and company.

Stravinsky—Fireworks, played Nov 1 at concert by New York Philharmonic Society and by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec 11.

Strube—Variations on an Original Theme, B. S. O., Feb 26.

Szymanowski, Karol—Four songs: An Kleine Maedchen, Christkindlein's Wiegenlied, Bestimmung, Einsiedel, recital by Paul Draper, Nov 25.

Tommasini, V.—Quartet, F major, Kneisel Quartet, Jan 5.

Volbach, Fritz—Symphony in B minor, op. 33, Dec 25, B. S. O. Quintet, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, piano, op. 24, Longy Club, Jan 20.

Weckerlin, J. B.—The Milkmaid of the Trianon, operetta, Maggie Teyte and John Campbell, Feb 2, Jordan Hall.

Wodell, Frederick W.—The American Flag, cantata for mixed chorus and orchestra, concert by People's Choral Union, Mr Wodell conductor, Jan 17.

Wooters, A.—Adagio and Scherzando, op. 77, for four flutes, Longy Club, Jan 20.

Chief among all the interpreters of music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor have remained the crowning feature of the season; an organization of incomparable euphony, plastic, expressive, eloquent, and Dr Muck a conductor combining to a remarkable degree a genius for exacting rehearsal and emotional interpretation.

No new singers of the first rank have been heard. The first appearance at concerts of the Symphony Orchestra by Mr Amato and Miss Hinkle disclosed some sad truths about the relative art of the usual singer of opera and of concert. Miss Braslau and Mme Delaunois should prove useful members of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr Botta, obviously ill at ease on the concert platform, showed better than the usual qualities of the Italian operatic tenor. Cantor Steinberg interested those conversant with the Hebraic ritual. Mr Draper unfortunately accepted appearances with the orchestra in Mahler's songs and particularly so in the Liszt "Faust," for which he lacks adequate voice. As an interpreter of lieder with piano he commands respect and admiration.

Of the new pianists, Mr Grainger gained instant attention for his lucid technic and poetic feeling. Mr Friedberg played some things, as certain pieces from Brahms, in an incomparable manner. His predisposition toward vocalization as he played was curious, at times disquieting. Miss Leginska interpreted Chopin with taste and individuality.

Mr Gittleson, an over-heralded violinist, played with the enthusiasm and much of the crude strength of youth. Perception, grace and true repose are as yet strangers to him. Serato was well spoken of by those who heard him. Mr Malkin, the new cellist at the first desk of the Symphony Orchestra, proved himself a valued soloist. Mr Casals accomplished beautiful and unprecedented things, to be associated with playing the violin rather than the cello.

Mr Mudgett's series of Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall again brought forward those among the chief singers, pianists, violinists to be obtained in this country. Mr Kreisler, sterling and triumphant artist that he is, filled the hall time after time, and each time his art remained a thing of noble beauty.

Mr Gabrilowitsch, not heard in Boston in several seasons, was an incomparable pianist, as musician, interpreter, poet.

The Boston Music School Settlement conducted a series of concerts at the Boston Theatre that presented excellent artists at a low price. A Sunday evening series of concerts at the Toy Theatre proved as short lived as had that at the Wilbur. The Tremont Temple concerts continued to flourish.

The season of opera under Mr Bevani's management leaned heavily upon Miss Fox and Miss Gentle as the chief singers, but came to its end in an unfortunate but the usual manner. Mr Castellano and Mr Ciccolini were new and effective tenors. The Aborn brothers came, offered three weeks of opera, some of it cheap at a dollar, some of it dear at any price, and departed. John Graham, an unusual baritone, and Morgan Kingston, a tenor of fine possibilities, strengthened the company.

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 25 1915

Est 884

ALTERATIONS TO BE MADE SHORTLY AT FESTIVAL HALL

Festival Hall at the exposition will be closed for eleven days, starting May 2d, for a number of alterations. This will necessitate, of course, a cessation of musical activities during that period. Principal among the alterations will be an increase in the seating capacity in preparation for the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starting May 14th. A balcony, fronted by a horseshoe of boxes, will be installed.

BOSTON HERALD.

SATURDAY, MAY 8,

LAST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL OF THE SEASON

Concert One to Be Remembered Gratefully—Brilliant Closing Performance.

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It was the last of the 34th season. The program was as follows:

Beethoven........—Symphony in C minor, No. 5
Liszt...
"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem, No. 6 (after Victor Hugo).
Strauss....."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"
Wagner...
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg"

This concert was one to remember gratefully rather than one to discuss. The vocabulary of eulogy is more limited than that of blame. Swinburne with all his verbal wealth, high-sounding sentences and varied rhythms is never so tiresome as in his dithyrambs in praise of the Elizabethan dramatists. Heap adjective on adjective, weave phrases out-coloring Tyrian purple, and you cannot give an adequate idea of a musical composition or performance to him that did not hear it.

A brilliant season was brought to an extraordinarily brilliant end. Beethoven's symphony was played most eloquently. The conception was superb in its breadth; dramatic without singularity, affectation, extravagance; perfectly rounded, rich in beautifully expressive details. In the minds of some conductors the Finale after the first glorious outburst is a falling from the lofty height; but in this Finale Dr. Muck triumphed where some have been only laborious, and others have wholly failed. He not only maintained the interest; he so treated the various sections that they seemed indispensable to a stupendous whole. The final triumphal song for once was not an anticlimax.

Vividly picturesque was his interpretation of Liszt's "Mazeppa," which is as flamboyant as Victor Hugo's poem. The composition has the "panache" that is characteristic of the romantic music and painting inspired by "Jeune France." Mr. George Moore described Hugo's "Les Orientales," in which "Mazeppa" was published, as "an East of painted cardboard, tin daggers and a military band playing the 'Turkish Patrol' in the Palais Royal"; but he also wrote: "The verse is grand, noble, tremendous." The symphonic poem of Liszt should be played in this plumed spirit of romanticism. He did not write it with his tongue in his cheek. To him Mazeppa symbolized genius, persecuted, crushed, but at last rising superior, standing erect and victorious in royal might." All this was real to him. He expressed in music his convictions with the audacity of a melodramatic genius. There should be no sand-papering of the music descriptive of Mazeppa's wild ride; nor should the conductor shrink from the tonitruant delivery of the typical theme swayed by the thought that the motive might be called bombastic, or even vulgar. Here is the "panache" in all its romantic splendor. The Hungarian episode in the March-Finale, with its piquant instrumentation, is eminently Lisztian. Dr. Muck not only recognized the "panache" and gloried in it; as an interpreter, as a leader of his men, he wore it.

The performance of Strauss's Rondo, one of the most admirable of the composer's works—perhaps the one that is wholly excellent in its combination of beauty, humor, sentiment and bold imagination—was remarkably elastic and impressive. The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" brought a sonorous close, yet after the preceding compositions Wagner's instrumentation in this instance often seemed thick and turgid.

The great audience was enthusiastic. Applauded again and again as he came upon the stage, Dr. Muck was recalled with fervor several times after the symphony, and after Wagner's prelude there was a prolonged demonstration in his honor.

A few notes concerning the work of the season may not be amiss.

Forty-eight composers were represented with 101 orchestral pieces, concertos, arias, song, etc. Of these composers nine were French: Berlioz (1), Chabrier (2), Debussy (1), Franck (a Walloon, but naturalized Frenchman, 2), d'Indy (1), Lalo (2), Ravel (1), Ropartz (1), Saint-Saens (1).

Four Russian and Polish composers were represented: Borodin (1), Noskowski (1), Stravinsky (1), Tschaikowsky (1).

Three Italians: Bossi (1), Monteverdi; (1), Sinigaglia (1).

Enesco, a Roumanian by birth, might have been enumerated among the French.

Five works of Sibelius, the Finn, were played.

The three Americans were Chadwick, Converse, MacDowell.

The other composers were German, Austrian, Bohemian, Hungarian.

These composers led in number of works performed: Beethoven, 14; Brahms, 7; Mozart, 6; Sibelius, 5; Liszt, 4; Strauss, 4; Weber, 4.

These orchestral compositions were performed for the first time in Boston: Symphonies—Korngold, [illegible] Ropartz, Symphony No. 4, C major; Volbach, Symphony in B minor.

Symphonic Poems, etc.—Reger, Four Tone Poems (after Boecklin); Shoenberg, five pieces for orchestra; Strube, variations on an Original Theme, (first performance anywhere).

Concertos, etc.—D'Indy, Fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk-tunes, first time with orchestra; Klose, Prelude and Double Fugue for organ (choral at the end with trumpets and trombones).

These works were performed for the first time at these concerts: Franck, C., Chorale in A minor for organ; Fried, Adagio and Scherzo for wind instruments, two harps, and kettle-drums; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole; Stravinsky, Feuerwerk.

The soloists were as follows: Sopranos, Miss Gerhardt, Miss Hinkle; mezzo-soprano, Mme. Culp; baritone, Mr. Amato; pianists, Mr. Bauer, Mr. Borwick, Mr. Gabrilowitsch; organist, Mr. Marshall; violinists, Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Noack, Mr. Witek; violoncellists, Mr. Casals, Mr. Warnke.

Miss Hinkle and Messrs. Amato, Borwick and Casals appeared for the first time here at Symphony concerts. Messrs. Witek, Noack, Warnke and Marshall are members of the orchestra.

A season that will long be conspicuous in the annals of the orchestra will end tonight.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

MAY 8, 1915

LAST SYMPHONY GREAT TRIUMPH

FINAL PROGRAMME ENTIRELY ORCHESTRAL

But Ran From Grave to Gay, From Lively to Severe

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Beethoven. Symphony No. 5, C minor.
Liszt. "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem.
Strauss. "Till Eulenspiegel," Symphonic Poem.
Wagner. "The Mastersingers," Prelude.

Although the last programme was entirely orchestral it was by no means without contrast, for it ran from grave to gay, from lively to severe, and it was triumphantly successful almost from first to last. There is nothing new to read into Beethoven's fifth symphony. There is probably not a finer instance of figure development in the entire symphonic catalogue than that of the first movement of this work. It is interesting to trace, through the investigation of Beethoven's pocket-memorandum books, the fact that he did not at first think of the grandeur of this figure at all. He writes it down and develops it as a lively, chattering theme, and marks it "Presto." Only upon revision did he come to the idea of carrying it out as if Destiny were knocking at the door. It was somewhat exaggerated in the performance and it sometimes seemed as if Destiny intended to kick the door in.

The same four-noted figure is often begun rather raggedly, because of its abruptness. Von Bulow used to beat a measure before the beginning of the music, so as to get the swing of it into the minds of his men, but Dr. Muck does not need such a device with his superb orchestra. The whole first movement went with a vigor and virility that aroused great enthusiasm, even if we must find the reading too extreme.

The second movement also had its changes from its first inception. Nottebohm, in his transcriptions from the memorandum-books, shows that Beethoven at first contemplated a Minuet-like theme for this movement, and the brilliant and bold modulation at the end of the chief theme s absent altogether in the first sketch.

This movement is a fine display for the strings, which vary the theme from violins to contrabasses. It is needless to say how these string variations were performed. Our string orchestra is absolutely the best in the world at present.

Full Freedom

The Scherzo of this symphony is to our mind the first in which the full freedom of this movement is revealed. The scherzo of the second symphony is tentative, that of the third rollicking, the Minuet of the fourth symphony is an eccentric Scherzo, but in this Scherzo of the fifth symphony, all the possibilities of the new form are revealed. We believe that the bold passage of the contrabasses, in the Trio of this movement, was a defiance of the criticism of Von Weber, who had satirized the florid work of the contrabasses in the end of the fourth symphony. Our contrabasses played this part of the work without flaw.

The finale of this symphony has seemed to many as the true finale to the Heroic Symphony. The end of that symphony is rather bizarre, and its variations are not heroic, while this finale is certainly a fiery and more warlike one. Here Dr. Muck sounded a note of triumph that was most powerful. The work was applauded to the echo. The symphonies of Beethoven may not be as long as some of the modern ones, but they are somewhat broader and deeper.

Liszt's "Mazeppa" served to remind us that this composer's symphonic poems were nearly equal to Berlioz's Symphonies in being pioneers in the field of modern programme music. "Mazeppa" is a very exciting composition peppered up with piccolo, with wooden bow-strokes on the violin-strings, and with every other device of modern music. There are a good many fast trotters in the modern musical stable, such as the Walkyrie stallions, Brunnhilde's Grane, Berlioz's matched pair in the "Damnation of Faust," and many others, but none of them can out-pace this "Tartar of the Ukraine breed." We must [illegible] Hugo, not Byron, and the Triumph at the close is the uprising of Truth after persecution. This triumph was grandly interpreted by a March that was barbaric in its splendor, which gave a conclusion to the work that was indescribably effective. Never have we heard such continuous enthusiasm at an afternoon concert. It began before the first number (when Dr. Muck appeared), and it lasted long after the last number, when the conductor was recalled again and again.

We confess to prizing Strauss's works of the middle period more highly than his later extremes. "Death and Transfiguration," "Zarathustra," "Don Quixotte," and "Till Eulenspiegel" appeal more to us than his self-worship in "Heldenleben," or his family life with double-fugues for breakfast, in the Sinfonia Domestica. "Till Eulenspiegel" is great in its portrayal of burly, mediaeval, German humor. It is wonderfully graphic too, and Till's crumpling up before his enemies is as clear as anything in the programme-music field.

Dramatic Effect

Dr. Muck played the work with unctuous comicality. All the way from Till's opening insouciance to his final squeaks at his execution there was elasticity, clearness and dramatic effect.

In every one of the works of this most successful concert the technique of our orchestra was displayed most vividly. One could make a long list of wonderful touches in this great final concert. The contrabasses in the Andante and Scherzo of the Symphony; the violin work in the first part of "Mazeppa"; the trombone and piccolo work, and the trumpet fanfares, in the last part of the same; the splendid work of the horn in the Till Eulenspiegel figure, are but a few of the excellences of a concert that will long be remembered, and we were glad to see the incessant tributes to Dr. Muck and our noble orchestra.

Wagner's Prelude to the "Meistersingers" is the greatest Prelude ever achieved. It brings the prelude almost into the domain of overture, both in its dimensions and shape. Splendid pomp was in the performance of the March in the Master-singer's Motive, sharp contrast in the sudden entrance of the Meistersinger motive in diminution and in its subsequent parody, eloquent beauty in the touches of the Prize-song, and it was altogether a triumphant ending of a series of efforts which has carried the orchestra through a very trying season. Let us recall that there were moments at the beginning of the season when we doubted the possibility of gathering our orchestra together, when we feared that the Symphony Concerts might follow the Boston Opera into oblivion. We have had a great season, nevertheless, and our orchestra was never in finer condition. It was very apropos, however, that the climax should come thus in the final concert.

And now our musical heroes are to start upon their voyage into far distant climes. We are disappointed that their first great excursion was not made to Europe, during the old days of Peace, that England, Germany and France might have learned that we have an orchestra here that excels any of their own. But all the same we wish our young Jasons success in their adventurous journey. May they bring back the Golden Fleece. "Bon Voyage!"

SUNDAY GLOBE—MAY 9,

Musical Season in Review.

The season of music which closed with the Symphony concert last night has been one more conspicuous for interpretative than for creative merit. The new contemporaneous music which came to performance during the Winter, especially that in the larger forms, appeared likely to be of little enduring value. Compositions for orchestra by Schoenberg, Stravinsky and Korngold have been played. Stravinsky's "Fireworks" is an early work, written for an occasion, and not a just indication of the composer mature powers. Korngold's "Sinfonietta" combined with astounding precocity the promise of greater individuality in ideas. Schoenberg's Five pieces provoked ardent supporters, those who would not have posterity find them lacking in true discernment and those who found the music irritating, stupid, pathological.

The less revolutionary sextet of earlier years made it a pity that Schoenberg had not retained his first ideals, his first vitality of imagination and dramatic force. A pleasureable memory of the season was Emanuel Moor's suite of three preludes for solo violin. The first two of these were of a finely rhapsodical flavor and played in the vein by Mr Pochon.

Mr Grainger's music for piano in the folk vein had distinct character. Debussy's two pieces for the piano, especially the first, reveal again the fine-fibred imagination of the poet. There would have been interest in hearing Spendiarow's ballet played with a larger string choir than Mr Stier had at his disposal.

There were various new works in chamber music played by the Flonzaley, Kneisel and Zoellner quartets. With but slight exception they showed more labor than inspiration.

Following is a list of compositions played during the season for the first time in Boston. Those marked with three asterisks () were performed for the first time anywhere. BSO signifies Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aulin, Tor—Concerto A minor for violin, Emanuel Ondricek recital, March 10.

Bach-Gibson—Pastoral Suite for 11 wind instruments, Longy Club concert, Nov 25.

Beach, Mrs H. H. A.—Valse Fantasie for piano, recital by composer, Dec 16.

Brandts-Buys, J.—Romantische Serenade, Zoellner String Quartet, Dec 3.

Converse, Frederick S.—Song of World Adventures, concert by Choral Music Society, Stephen Townsend, conductor, Dec 9.

Debussy—Feuilles Mortes and Berceuse Heroique. Piano recital by George Copeland, Feb 18.

Foote, Arthur—The Wind and the Day, chorus for mixed voices, concert by Choral Music Society, Stephen Townsend, conductor, Dec 9.

Fried, Oscar—Adagio and Scherzo for wind instruments, harp and kettle drums, op. 2, Jan 16 (*B. S. O. concerts).

Glazounoff—Music to ballet, "Raymonda," Boston Theatre, Mlle Pavlowa and company, March 4.

Grainger, Percy—Colonial Song and Mock Morris Dance for piano, recital by composer, March 6. Shepherd's Hey and Irish Tune from County Derry for piano, played by the composer at concert with Miss Culp, Sunday afternoon, March 21.

Grieg—Three Norwegian folksongs: In Ola Valley, Cattle Call and Roetnamsknut for piano, played by Mr Grainger at his recital [illegible]

Hubert, Jean—Music to operetta, "Weeping Pierrot and Laughing Pierrot," Maggie Teyte, John Campbell and George Mitchell, Jordan Hall, Feb 2, benefit Woman's Municipal League.

Juon, Paul—Idylle, Contemysterieuse and musette miniature for two violins and piano, recital by Emanuel and Ella Kalova Ondricek, Jordan Hall, March 10.

Klose, Friedrich—Prelude and double fugue for organ (choral with trumpets and trombones), B. S. O., April 2.

Kodaly, Zoltan—Quartet C major, op. 2, Kneisel Quartet, Nov 3.

Korngold, Erich—First and second movements sonata G major for violin and piano, recital by Josephine Durrell and Lee Pattison, Steinert Hall, April 1.

Sinfonietta for full orchestra, op. 5, B. S. O., April 9.

Lewis, Leo R.—May time, mixed chorus, concert by Choral Music Society, Stephen Townsend, conductor, Jordon Hall, Dec 9.

Mahler, Gustav—Songs of a Traveling Journeyman, B. S. O., Feb 5, Paul Draper, tenor.

Maquarre, A.—Au Clair de Lune, for violin, recital by Irma Seydel, Jordan Hall, March 1.

Marteau, Henri—Eight songs for voice and string quartet, recital Steinert Hall, May 5, Martha Atwood-Baker, assisted by Messrs Koessler, Pinfield, Blumenau and Steinke.

Mason, Daniel Gregory—Piano quartet, A major, op. 7, Kneisel Quartet, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, Dec 1.

Milhaud, Darius—Two movements from quartet, concert by the Flonzaley Quartet, Dec 10.

Moor, Emanuel—Suite of three preludes for violin solo, op. 100, played by Alfred Pochon, concert of Flonzaley Quartet, March 11.

Parker, Horatio—Oratorio, "Morven and the Grail," Handel and Haydn Centenary, April 11.

Prutting, Robert Henry—Pastel for violin, Miss Seydel's recital, Jordan Hall, March 1.

Ravel—Spanish Rhapsody, Nov 20. (*B. S. O. concerts).

Reger—Four Tone Poems for full orchestra op. 128, March 26; B. S. O.

Ropartz, Guy—Symphony No. 4, C major; B. S. O., Oct 24.

Samazeuilh, G.—Quartet in D, Zoellner Quartet, Steinert Hall, Dec 3.

Schoenberg—Five Pieces for Orchestsa, op. 10, Dec 18, B. S. O. Sextet, D minor, op. 4, Verklaerte Nacht, concert by Kneisel Quartet, March 16.

Spendiarow, Alexander—Music to ballet, Seven Daughters of the Ghost King, Boston Theatre, March 8, Mlle Pavlowa and company.

Stravinsky—Fireworks, played Nov 1 at concert by New York Philharmonic Society and by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec 11.

Strube—Variations on an Original Theme, B. S. O., Feb 26.

Szymanowski, Karol—Four songs: An Kleine Maedchen, Christkindlein's Wiegenlied, Bestinmung, Einsiedel, recital by Paul Draper, Nov 25.

Tommasini, V.—Quartet, F major, Kneisel Quartet, Jan 5.

Volbach, Fritz—Symphony in B minor, op. 33, Dec 25, B. S. O. Quintet, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, piano, op. 24, Longy Club, Jan 20.

Weckerlin, J. B.—The Milkmaid of the Trianon, operetta, Maggie Teyte and John Campbell, Feb 2, Jordan Hall.

Wodell, Frederick W.—The American Flag, cantata for mixed chorus and orchestra, concert by People's Choral Union, Mr Wodell conductor, Jan 17.

Wooters, A.—Adagio and Scherzando, op. 77, for four flutes, Longy Club, Jan 20.

Chief among all the interpreters of music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor have remained the crowning feature of the season; an organization of incomparable euphony, plastic, expressive, eloquent, and Dr Muck a conductor combining to a remarkable degree a genius for exacting rehearsal and emotional interpretation.

No new singers of the first rank have been heard. The first appearance at concerts of the Symphony Orchestra by Mr Amato and Miss Hinkle disclosed some sad truths about the relative art of the usual singer of opera and of concert. Miss Braslau and Mme Delaunois should prove useful members of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr Botta, obviously ill at ease on the concert platform, showed better than the usual qualities of the Italian operatic tenor. Cantor Steinberg interested those conversant with the Hebraic ritual. Mr Draper unfortunately accepted appearances with the orchestra in Mahler's songs and particularly so in the Liszt "Faust," for which he lacks adequate voice. As an interpreter of lieder with piano he commands respect and admiration.

Of the new pianists, Mr Grainger gained instant attention for his lucid technic and poetic feeling. Mr Friedberg played some things, as certain pieces from Brahms, in an incomparable manner. His predisposition toward vocalization as he played was curious, at times disquieting. Miss Leginska interpreted Chopin with taste and individuality.

Mr Gittleson, an over-heralded violinist, played with the enthusiasm and much of the crude strength of youth. Perception, grace and true repose are as yet strangers to him. Serato was well spoken of by those who heard him. Mr Malkin, the new cellist at the first desk of the Symphony Orchestra, proved himself a valued soloist. Mr Casals accomplished beautiful and unprecedented things, to be associated with playing the violin rather than the cello.

Mr Mudgett's series of Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall again brought forward those among the chief singers, pianists, violinists to be obtained in this country. Mr Kreisler, sterling and triumphant artist that he is, filled the hall time after time, and each time his art remained a thing of noble beauty.

Mr Gabrilowitsch, not heard in Boston in several seasons, was an incomparable pianist, as musician, interpreter, poet.

The Boston Music School Settlement conducted a series of concerts at the Boston Theatre that presented excellent artists at a low price. A Sunday evening series of concerts at the Toy Theatre proved as short lived as had that at the Wilbur. The Tremont Temple concerts continued to flourish.

The season of opera under Mr Bevani's management leaned heavily upon Miss Fox and Miss Gentle as the chief singers, but came to its end in an unfortunate but the usual manner. Mr Castellano and Mr Ciccolini were new and effective tenors. The Aborn brothers came, offered three weeks of opera, some of it cheap at a dollar, some of it dear at any price, and departed. John Graham, an unusual baritone, and Morgan Kingston, a tenor of fine possibilities, strengthened the company.

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR [illegible] 1915

Est

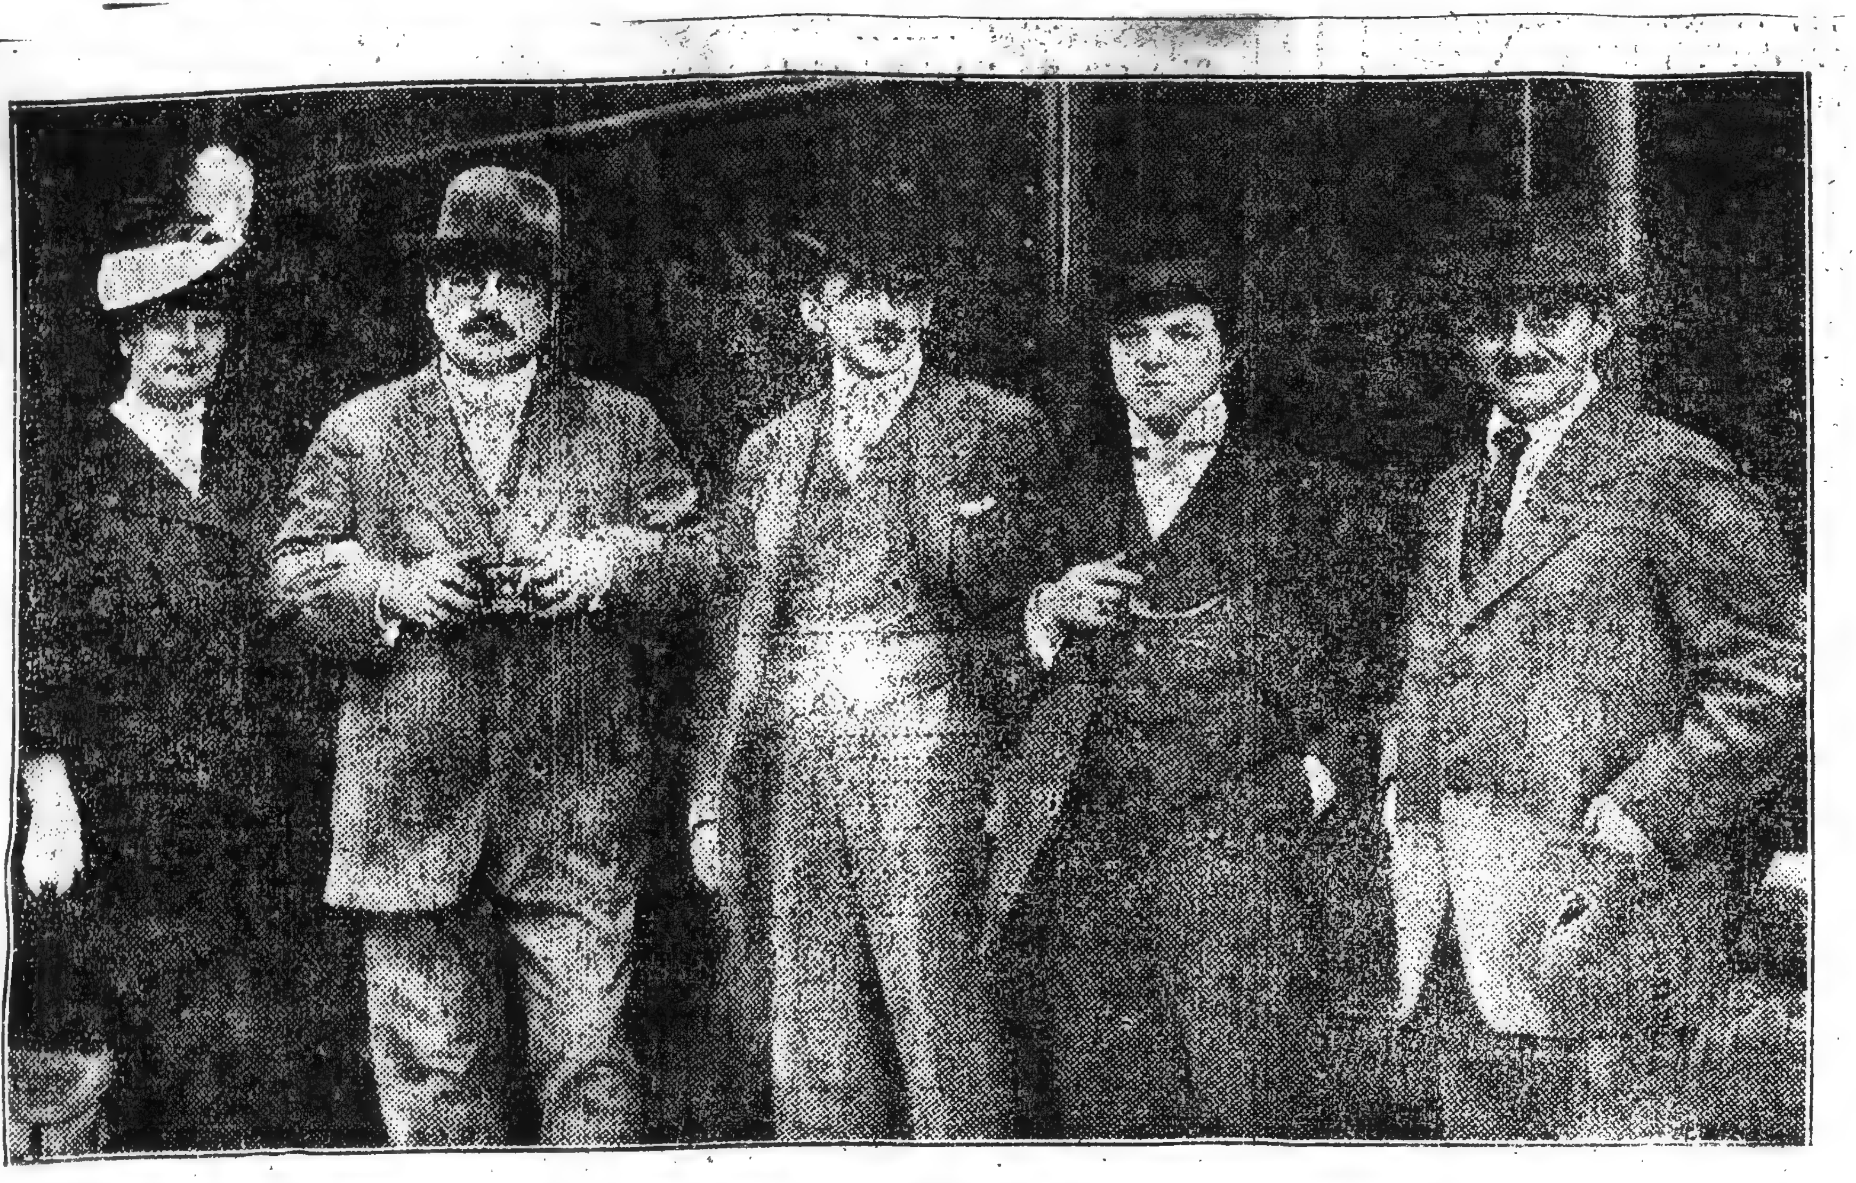
884

ALTERATIONS TO BE MADE SHORTLY AT FESTIVAL HALL

Festival Hall at the exposition will be closed for eleven days, starting May 2d, for a number of alterations. This will necessitate, of course, a cessation of musical activities during that period. Principal among the alterations will be an increase in the seating capacity in preparation for the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starting May 14th. A balcony, fronted by a horseshoe of boxes, will be installed.

Address

EVENING RECORD, MAY 10, 1915



From left to right ... and Heinrich Warnke, ... ation) West ... aster; Anton Witek, Josef Malkin

Examiner

From

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 22 1915

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

This is the last week of the season subscription sale of seats for the twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concerts commence on Friday evening, May 14, with four matinees. The organization, which includes one hundred of the world's best musicians, comes direct from Boston to the Exposition. Next Monday morning seats for two or more concerts will be on sale and on May 3 the sale for single concerts will begin. Mail orders, accompanied by remittances, should be addressed by W. H. Leahy, 343 Powell street.

Es... 1884

From HERALD BROOKLYN EDIT

Address: New York City

Date

For Boston Symphony Concerts.

Members of the board of women's auxiliary of the philharmonic concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held their annual spring meeting recently at the art room of the Brooklyn Institute, in Montague street. Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided, and much important business was transacted. It was reported that three-quarters of the old subscribers for last season had subscribed for next season and that the finances of the organization were in excellent shape. The dates for next season's concerts are as follows:—November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 17.

E... 1884

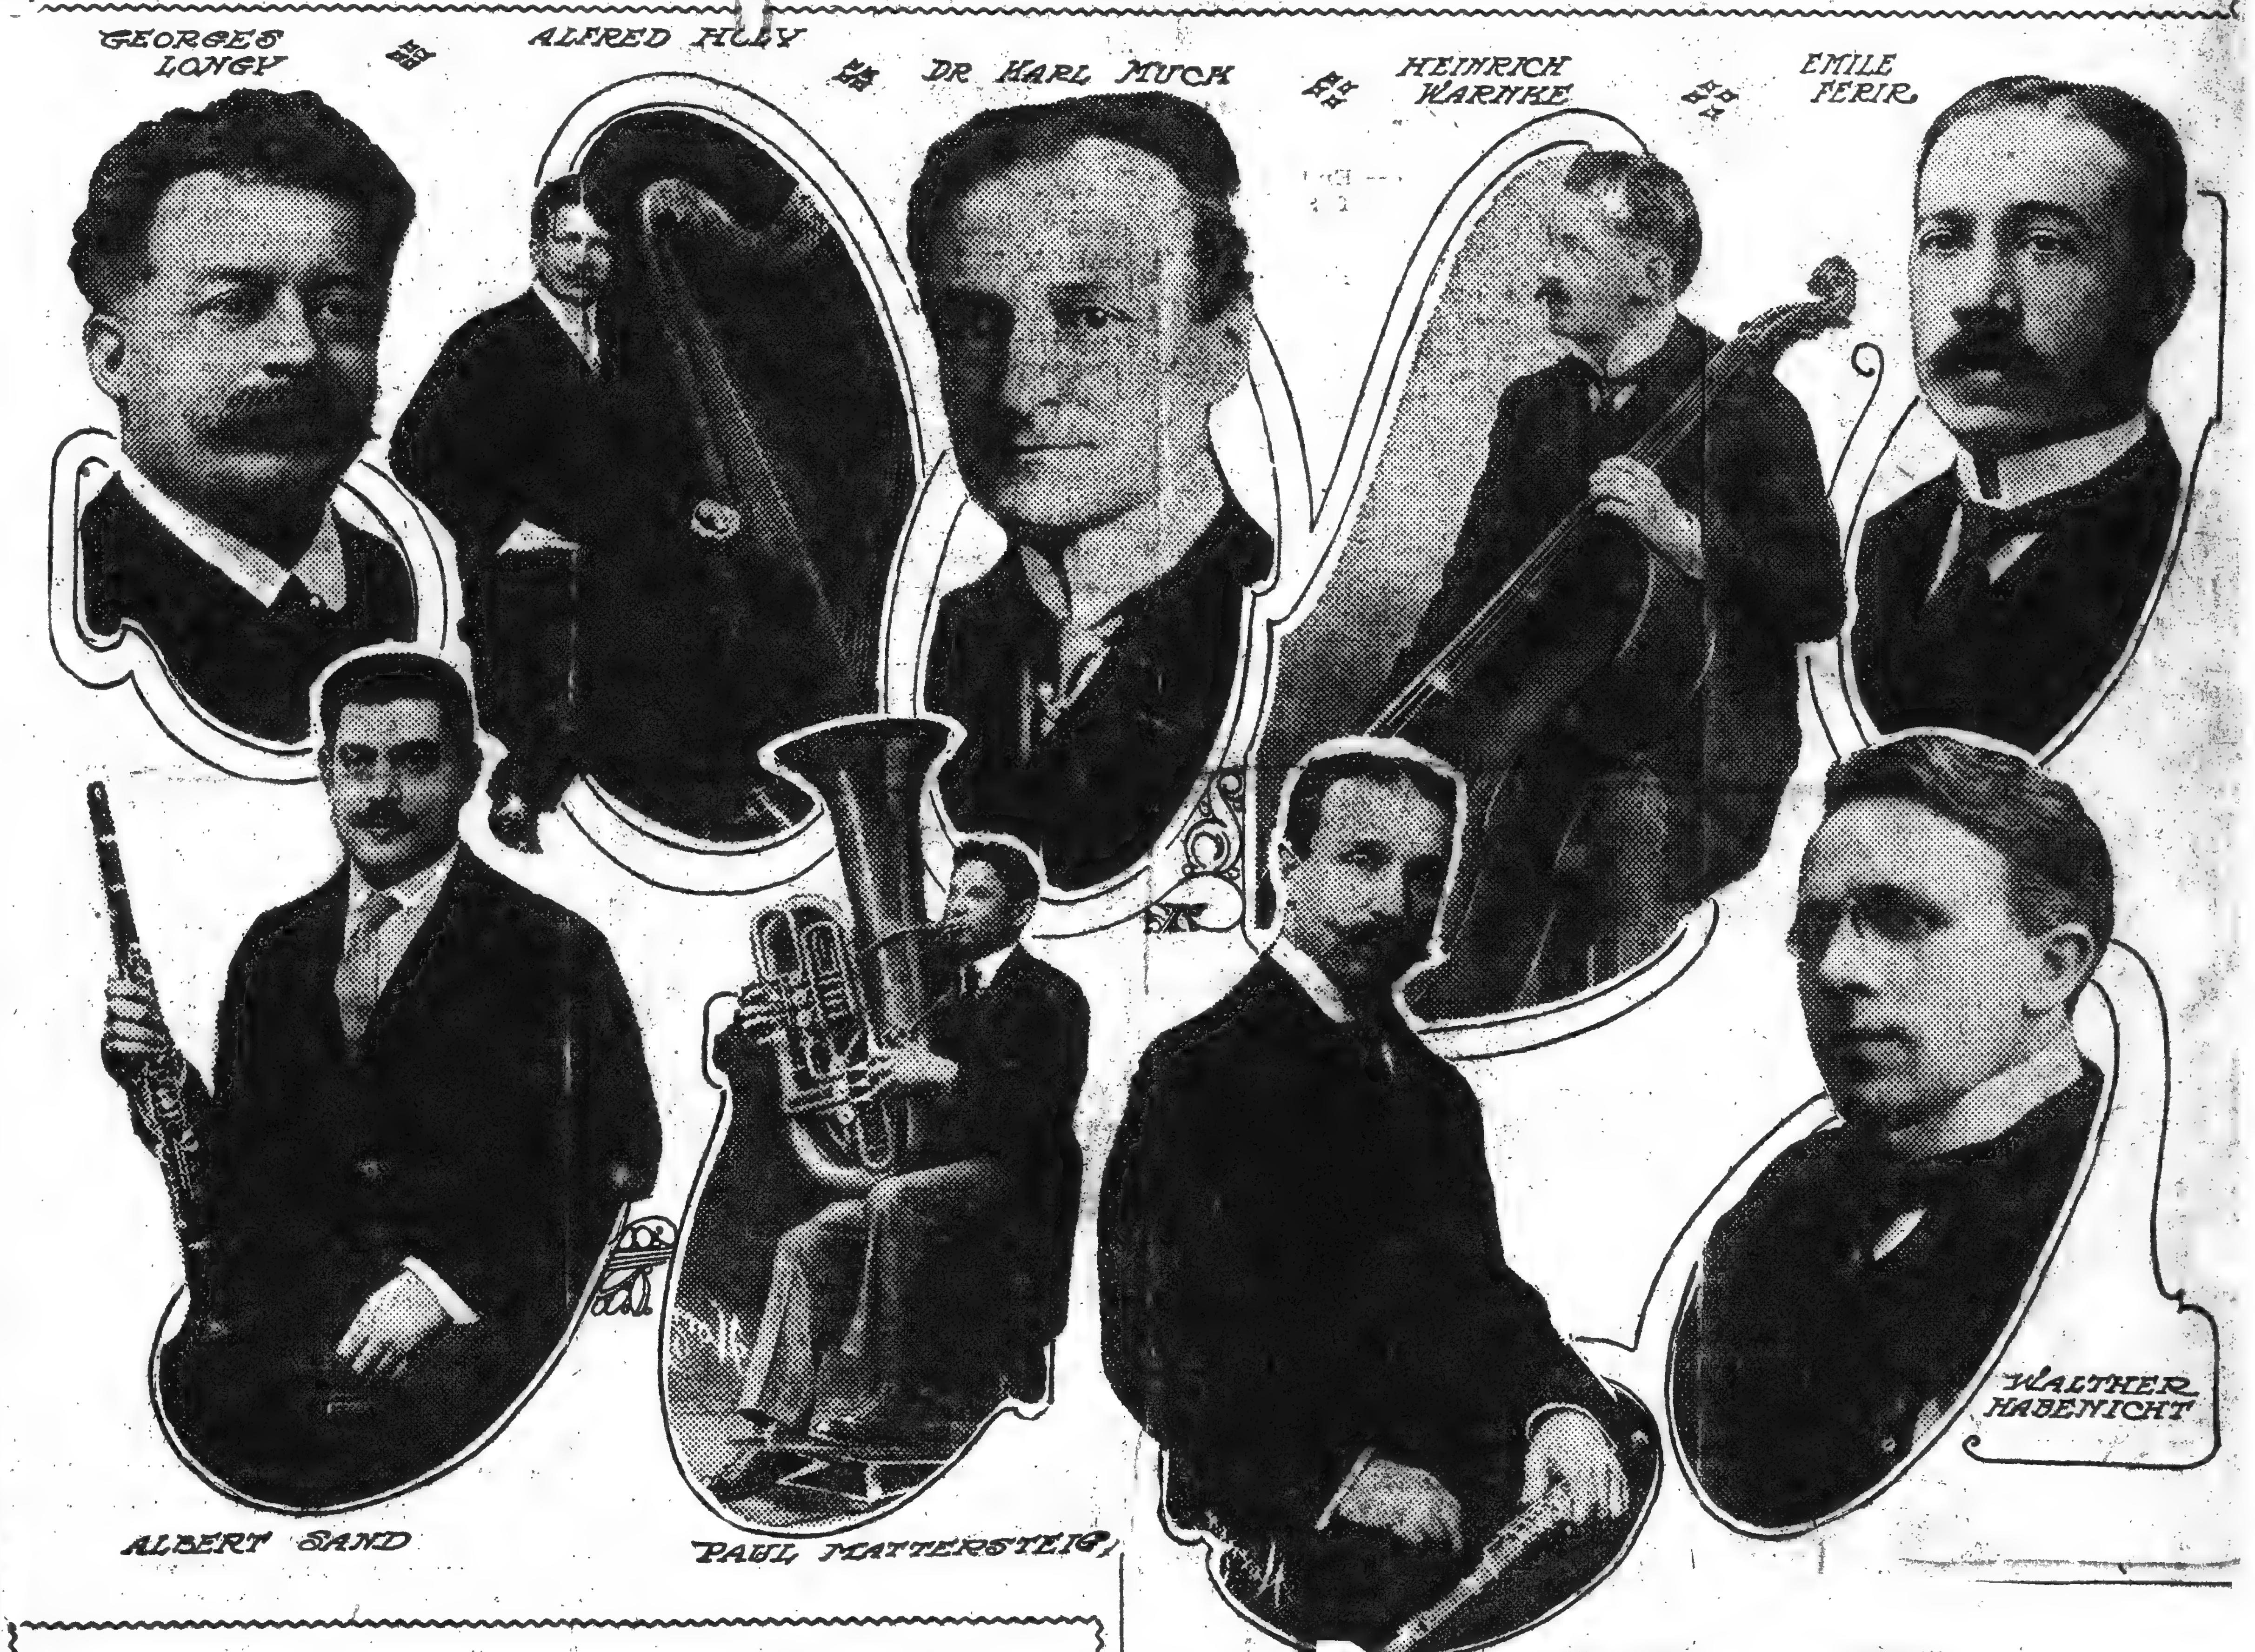
From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 24 1915

Established:

IN THE WORLD'S FINEST ORCHESTRA



Dr. Carl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony, and a group of his solo artists. Of those whose instruments do not appear in the picture. Longy is solo oboist, Habenicht leads the second violins and Ferir is viola soloist.

Symphony Me... Started Sun... On Record

To Give 13 Concerts ... Francisco and Then to Return for "Pops"

Fair skies and every auspicious circumstance attended the departure of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players who, with Dr. Carl Muck, conductor; Mrs. Muck, C. A. Ellis and William H. Brennan of Symphony Hall, left the South Station in a special train at 2:05 yesterday afternoon for San Francisco, where they will give 13 concerts.

Stipulations in the contract made by the Exposition management require that the players give no concerts either on the way out or returning from the Pacific Coast, so the trip will be made practically without a stop, with the exception of three hours which will be spent in Chicago.

At the conclusion of the Exposition engagement, with the exception of Mrs. Musk and one or two others who plan to stay over a short period in California, will return to Boston for the "Pops" season.

The trip is one of the longest "jumps" (in theatrical parlance), ever made by a great musical organization.

A veritable shower of roses and flowers of all kinds brought by relatives and friends, added a touch of color to the occasion, and the party, including those who had come to bid "bon voyage" to father, mother, brother or friend, completely filled the long station platform.

The San Francisco trip will take the place, this summer, of the usual voyage to Europe, which is the annual holiday of the majority of the players in the orchestra, many of whom rejoice in the prospect, at last, of really "seeing America."

Enthusiasm ran high and bouquets and handkerchiefs fluttered excitedly and farewells were shouted amid some tears, much laughter and a battle royal of flowers between some of the more demonstrative as the long special train puffed slowly out through the maze of tracks.

To accommodate the party the B. & A., not only arranged for a special train of five Pullman sleepers, a private car and two baggage cars from Boston to run clear through to Oakland Pier, opposite San Francisco, but is sending in charge of the party Charles E. Colony, city ticket agent, who made all the arrangements and piloted Ex-President Taft in the more than 13,000-mile trip which he made from Boston to the Pacific Coast and back.

In the private car on the rear end of the train were Messrs. Ellis and Brennan and John Sauerquell, librarian of the orchestra. In the sleepers ahead were the players, nearly all of whom carried cameras to "bring back a photographic record of our first real good look at America," as Witek expressed it.

The train is due to arrive at San Francisco next Thursday morning, May 13.

Boston Symphony Season Greatest Musical Event

INTEREST is keen in the coming series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall, commencing Friday evening, May 14, with four afternoons. The subscription sale, which has been progressing for three weeks, indicates a very large attendance.

On Monday morning the sale of seats for two or more concerts will begin at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, continuing for one week, after which seats for single concerts will be ready.

The function of the Boston Symphony Orchestra always has been to provide music of the highest class in the most perfect manner humanly possible. Such was the sole object of its founder, Henry L. Higginson, a wealthy Bostonian. Only by adhering steadfastly to this ideal since its foundation, thirty-three years ago, has the orchestra been able to hold its present position. It is now without a superior in the world. It is famous in all countries, accepted as a model to be followed by all others, an orchestra whose concerts are eagerly sought by all cities, and whose coming will be the greatest event in the history of instrumental music — San Fran...

... Europe. Not only the principals but a majority of the members were artists of European reputation before they came to Boston.

Its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of extraordinary personality and genius. From 1892 to 1912 he was principal conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and in 1910 the German Emperor gave him the title of "generalmusikdirector," the highest honor that can come to a musician in Germany. Formerly he had been chief conductor in Graz and Prague and had often appeared as "guest conductor" in St. Petersburg, Moscow, London, Paris, Madrid, Budapest and other cities. For two years he was one of the conductors of the famous Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna. Since 1901 he has conducted "Parsifal" at the Bayreuth Festivals, and within the last two years has been urged to accept the post of musical director of the Royal Operas in Vienna, Munich and Dresden.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Festival Hall for its twelve concerts is the biggest musical event of the Exposition year. The organization will jump direct from Boston and return to their home city without giving a single other

---

Examiner

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEATS.

The subscription sale of seats for the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall closed yesterday, after three weeks of active demand on the part of music lovers not alone of San Francisco, but from all over the country. Many orders for season tickets were received from Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle and other places on the Pacific Coast, likewise several requests from New York city, accompanied by the necessary funds. The New Yorkers are coming to the Exposition, and so difficult is it for them to procure seats when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in their home city that they are anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity of hearing the great organization on their trip west.

This morning seats for two or more concerts, beginning Friday evening, May 14, will be placed on sale at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, where they may be obtained all week. Next Monday seats for single concerts will be ready at the same place.

Est 1884

Address

EVENING RECORD, MAY 10, 1915

(Photo made by Record Photographer at the South Station)

Symphony Celebrities About to Start West

From left to right—Mrs. Anton Witek, wife of the orchestra's concert master; Anton Witek, Josef Malkin and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists; and Sylvain Noack, second concert master.

Examiner

From

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 23 1915

Est 1884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

This is the last week of the season subscription sale of seats for the twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concerts commence on Friday evening, May 14, with four matinees. The organization, which includes one hundred of the world's best musicians, comes direct from Boston to the Exposition. Next Monday morning seats for two or more concerts will be on sale and on May 3 the sale for single concerts will begin. Mail orders, accompanied by remittances, should be addressed by W. H. Leahy, 343 Powell street.

From HERALD BROOKLYN EDIT

Address: New York City

Date

Est York, 1884

For Boston Symphony rts.

Members of the board of ary of the philharmoni xili- Boston Symphony the annual spring me eir room of the B t tague stree sided, an transa

---

Symphony Men Started Sunday On Record Jump

To Give 13 Concerts in San Francisco and Then to Return for "Pops"

Fair skies and every auspicious circumstance attended the departure of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players who, with Dr. Carl Muck, conductor; Mrs. Muck, C. A. Ellis and William H. Brennan of Symphony Hall, left the South Station in a special train at 2:05 yesterday afternoon for San Francisco, where they will give 13 concerts.

Stipulations in the contract made by the Exposition management require that the players give no concerts either on the way out or returning from the Pacific Coast, so the trip will be made practically without a stop, with the exception of three hours which will be spent in Chicago.

At the conclusion of the Exposition engagement, with the exception of Mrs. Musk and one or two others who plan to stay over a short period in California, will return to Boston for the "Pops" season.

The trip is one of the longest "jumps" (in theatrical parlance), ever made by a great musical organization.

A veritable shower of roses and flowers of all kinds brought by relatives and friends, added a touch of color to the occasion, and the party, including those who had come to bid "bon voyage" to father, mother, brother or friend, completely filled the long station platform.

The San Francisco trip will take the place, this summer, of the usual voyage to Europe, which is the annual holiday of the majority of the players in the orchestra, many of whom rejoice in the prospect, at last, of really "seeing America."

Enthusiasm ran high and bouquets and handkerchiefs fluttered excitedly and farewells were shouted amid some tears, much laughter and a battle royal of flowers between some of the more demonstrative as the long special train puffed slowly out through the maze of tracks.

To accommodate the party the B. & A., not only arranged for a special train of five Pullman sleepers, a private car and two baggage cars from Boston to run clear through to Oakland Pier, opposite San Francisco, but is sending in charge of the party Charles E. Colony, city ticket agent, who made all the arrangements and piloted Ex-President Taft in the more than 13,000-mile trip which he made from Boston to the Pacific Coast and back.

In the private car on the rear end of the train were Messrs. Ellis and Brennan and John Sauerquell, librarian of the orchestra. In the sleepers ahead were the players, nearly all of whom carried cameras to "bring back a photographic record of our first real good look at America," as Witek expressed it.

The train is due to arrive at San Francisco next Thursday morning, May 13.

HE WORLD'S FINEST ORCHESTRA

uck, leader of the Boston Symphony, and a group of his solo artists. Of those whose instruments do not appear in the picture. Longy is solo oboist, Habenicht leads the second violins and Ferir is viola soloist.

GEORGES LONGY
ALFRED HOLY
DR KARL MUCK
HEINRICH WARNKE
EMILE FERIR
WALTHER HABENICHT
ALBERT SAND
PAUL MATTERSTEIG
ANDRE MAQUARRE

Eminent ins of San

by Very hamberlin,
Grand En-
tes of St.
Eminent master of Montreal,
A. Ham-aid.

ome

Albert tor of 8 Parison
ment.
t by Shea and e in and ling ate be-by he

---

oston Symphony Season Greatest Musical Event

INTEREST is keen in the coming series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall, commencing Friday evening, May 14, with four afternoons. The subscription sale, which has been progressing for three weeks, indicates a very large attendance.

On Monday morning the sale of seats for two or more concerts will begin at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, continuing for one week, after which seats for single concerts will be ready.

The function of the Boston Symphony Orchestra always has been to provide music of the highest class in the most perfect manner humanly possible. Such was the sole object of its founder, Henry L. Higginson, a wealthy Bostonian. Only by adhering steadfastly to this ideal since its foundation, thirty-three years ago, has the orchestra been able to hold its present position. It is now without a superior in the world. It is famous in all countries, accepted as a model to be followed by all others, an orchestra whose concerts are eagerly sought by all cities, and whose coming will be the greatest event in the history of instrumental music Europe. Not only the principals but a majority of the members were artists of European reputation before they came to Boston.

Its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of extraordinary personality and genius. From 1892 to 1912 he was principal conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and in 1910 the German Emperor gave him the title of "generalmusikdirector," the highest honor that can come to a musician in Germany. Formerly he had been chief conductor in Graz and Prague and had often appeared as "guest conductor" in St. Petersburg, Moscow, London, Paris, Madrid, Budapest and other cities. For two years he was one of the conductors of the famous Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna. Since 1901 he has conducted "Parsifal" at the Bayreuth Festivals, and within the last two years has been urged to accept the post of musical director of the Royal Operas in Vienna, Munich and Dresden.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Festival Hall for its twelve concerts is the biggest musical event of the Exposition year. The organization will jump direct from Boston and return to their home city without giving a single other

---

Examiner

San Francisco, Cal.

APR 2 3 1915

Est 1884

STON SYMPHONY SEATS.

The subscription sale of seats for the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall closed yesterday, after three weeks of active demand on the part of music lovers not alone of San Francisco, but from all over the country. Many orders for season tickets were received from Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle and other places on the Pacific Coast, likewise several requests from New York city, accompanied by the necessary funds. The New Yorkers are coming to the Exposition, and so difficult is it for them to procure seats when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in their home city that they are anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity of hearing the great organization on their trip west.

This morning seats for two or more concerts, beginning Friday evening, May 14, will be placed on sale at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, where they may be obtained all week. Next Monday seats for single concerts will be ready at the same pl

[162]

Address: San Francisco, Cal

Date APR

Estal

Sylvain Noack, second master of the Boston Symph

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOUGHT FOR DANCE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give twelve concerts at Festival Hall, commencing May 14, is a fairly well known institution. Nevertheless, the management received a letter a few years ago from a town a little over 100 miles from Boston, in which it was stated that a certain society in that town was planning to give a grand concert and ball on an evening in February. They were anxious to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which they heard was a good one, and thought they could go as far as paying $300 if the orchestra would play for the dancing as well as for the concert. A politely worded note was sent in which regret was expressed that on the night in question the orchestra was engaged in giving a concert in Carnegie Hall, New York, and would be unable to accept the engagement offered.

The hundred musicians of the orchestra include the foremost artists of the world and notable among them is Sylvain Noack, the second concertmaster, a Hollander who has been with the organization for six years. He is a first prize graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory and before he came to America was concertmaster of the symphony orchestra at Aix and famous as a player of chamber music.

The engagement of the Boston Symphany Orchestra promises to be the most notable event of recent years and the sale of season seats, which is now drawing to a close, is very encouraging to the management. A subscription sale for two or more seats will begin at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, next Monday morning, lasting for one week, after which seats for single concerts will be ready.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia

Date

lished:

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILAD

YOUNG HARPIST FROM HERE JOINS BOSTON SYMPHONY

THEODORE CELLA Photograph by Marceau.

Philadelphian, who has been selected by Doctor Muck to be harpist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is only 18 years old.

PHILADELPHIANS should feel complimented in the announcement that Doctor Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has selected as harpist for that organization Theodore Cella, 18 years old, of this city. Mr. Cella has played with the Boston Symphony at its last three concerts, and is its youngest member.

Doctor Muck, who recently had his attention called to the talent of this young man, indicated his desire to hear him play. When he was in this city on March 15, the last concert given here by the Boston Symphony, he had the opportunity. Immediately upon his return to Boston he telegraphed to Mr. Cella to go to that city to discuss the prospects of an engagement. The result was that he was asked to remain there for the end of this season, and to sign a contract for the next two seasons.

The Boston Symphony also will take Mr. Cella with them to San Francisco to play during the 13 concerts the orchestra will give at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. He expects in future to call Boston his home and thereby Philadelphia loses one of its talented young musicians.

Theodore Cella comes of a musical family in the southern part of this city. He has made a study of the harp from the time he was old enough to reach the compass of the strings. He has played here a number of times during last winter, at the Academy of Music, the Metropolitan Opera House and at various private musicals, at which his playing has always produced a favorable impression. For several years he has been studying the harp with one of the most eminent teachers of that instrument in New York. Visitors at Atlantic City last summer will remember his solo work as a member of the Martini Orchestra.

Mr. Cella not only is a finished harpist, but also is a composer from dainty small numbers to elaborate concertos, one of which was played last season by the Martini Orchestra; and much is expected of him in the future in the way of composition for this instrument. He has a reputation of being one of the most talented harpists in this city. He is the third son of Joseph Cella, all four of the brothers being musicians and all well known in the musical life of this city.

---

standards the Boston Symphony has become famous in all musical countries and is accepted as a model to be followed by all others.

Its roster today consists of 100 musicians, drawn largely from the leading orchestras of Europe, many of whom had individual reputations as artists in Europe. A New York critic said of their concerted efforts, "It is not only a virtuous orchestra, but an orchestra of virtuosi." Five of the very distinguished men are Anton Witek, concert master; Walther Habenicht, leader of second violins; Alfred Holy, harpist; Otto Urack, assistant conductor, and Andre Maquarre, first flute, the five representing the three nationalities of German, Bohemian and French.

The day has gone by when the second violin of an orchestra can be composed of less competent players than those of the first section, for modern music makes as strenuous a demand on one as on the other, and, in fact, the two violin sections are interchangeable. Otto Urack, also one of the principal cellists of the orchestra, leads the men at such times as Dr. Muck may be indisposed, and during his first season in Boston was called upon to conduct twenty of the most important concerts. Urack also is a composer of promise.

The brass section alone virtually comprises a small band, and to secure this section fittingly always is a hard task for any orchestra. Not only must brass players be accomplished musicians, but they must be able to draw from their instruments a tone which will melt into the tones of the wood winds and strings, and as modern writers are continually scoring for more elaborate brass work than ever before, the matter of adjustment is becoming more delicate.

The double quartet of horns is now famous throughout America. The trumpets are headed by Gustave Heim, who first won laurels as leader of the headquarters band of the German expedition to Peking in 1900.

The head of the trombones is Modeste Alloc, a Belgian.

From Examiner

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 25 1915

Establ 384

It is four years since I last heard the Boston Symphony. Dr. Karl Muck was the director then as now. He is a man who combines delicacy and strength in the most remarkable manner. It is a nervous strength, not the quiet Titanism of Richter; but I never saw a director who could draw the tone, as it were, during the whole duration of his beat, more vitally than he can. Gericke gave me the impression of a martinet, quietly authoritative and a trifle academic; Fiedler, I thought, had less personality than either his predecessor or his successor. But Muck has culture in the true sense of the word, not the "Kultur" of blood and iron, but the urbanity one finds in the great German litterateurs from Lessing Heine. When he played "Tod and Verklarung," there was something in his pure and elevated idealism which reminded me of Jean Paul Richter and his Beethoven sent me back to the greatest German of them all, the world-poet, Goethe.

By the way, I notice that some exasperated patriot in the East blames Doctor Muck because of the compositions set down for performance in Festival Hall, thirty-two are by men classified as German, and only twenty by composers of other nationality. But common fairness forces one to recognize that Germany loomed larger in the musical culture of the world during the century from Mozart onward than any other nation. No good comes of blinking patent facts. Since the rise of Caesar Franck, Saint Saens and Debussy, Gallic culture may be said to vie on equal terms with that of Germany; nor must we forget that England has its Elgar, its Bantock and Cyril Scott, and America its MacDowell, its Chadwick and Edgar Stillman Kelley. That MacDowell and Chadwick should be the only Americans represented in the Boston-San Francisco concerts of the Boston Symphony is matter for regret, perhaps. But the arrangement represents Doctor Muck's ideal of what is fair, and his judgment is entitled to respect.

May 14 is the date of the first concert, and for twelve successive days we shall have orchestral concerts in Festival Hall the like of which cannot be offered by proud Berlin or brilliant Paris or mighty London.

* * *

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 2

Estal 384

Concert Series

Not alone are musical circles interested in the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but society folk as well will be abundantly represented in the audiences that assemble to do homage to music on the eight evenings and four afternoons of the engagement. The series will open Friday evening, May 14, in Festival Hall at the Exposition. The list of season subscribers is very large and among the purchasers of boxes and seats are the following:

Mrs. William Sproule, Mrs. Joseph A. Donohoe, Mrs. William B. Bourn, Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mrs. Sara M. Gerstle, Mrs. Hannah Gerstle, Mrs. Louis F. Monteagle, Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mrs. L. Schwabacher, Mrs. Leon Sloss, Mrs. M. C. Sloss, Mrs. M. A. Gunst, Mrs. L. M. Robbins, Mrs. C. F. Kohl, Mrs. A. B. Spreckels, Mrs. Henry Crocker, Mrs. James Otis, Miss F. Grenhood, Gordon Blanding, Alden Anderson, Allen I. Kittle, John Rothschild, Judge Frank H. Dunne, Walter Bliss, D. J. Guggenheim, John B. Casserly, John Parrott, Mortimer Fleishhacker, Dr. A. Barkan, G. D. Grant, E. J. Wickson, Edmond Godchaux, Herbert Fleishhacker, Dr. E. Rixford, R. M. Eyre, Louis Sloss, J. K. Armsby.

* * *

The marriage of Miss Mary Sullivan and Frank

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 25 191

Esta 384

Society Is Interested in Symphony Concerts

Not only are musical circles deeply interested in the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall, commencing Friday evening, May 14th, but society folk also will be abundantly represented in the audiences that assemble on the eight evenings and four afternoons of the engagement. The list of season subscribers is large, and among the purchasers of boxes and seats are the following:

MESDAMES

William Sproule
Joseph A. Donohoe
William B. Bourn
William H. Crocker
Sara M. Gerstle
Hannah Gerstle
Louis F. Monteagle
Henry T. Scott
L. Schwabacher
Leon Sloss
M. C. Sloss
M. A. Gunst
L. M. Robbins
C. F. Kohl
A. B. Spreckels
Henry Crocker
James Otis

Miss F. Greenhood

MESSRS.

Gordon Blanding
Alden Anderson
Allen I. Kittle
John Rothschild
Frank H. Dunne
Walter Bliss
D. J. Guggenheim
G. D. Grant
E. J. Wickson
Edmond Godchaux
Herbert Fleishhacker
Dr. E. Rixford
R. M. Eyre
Louis Sloss

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 25 1915

, 188

SEASON SALE OF BOSTON PLAYERS OPENS TOMORROW

Subscription for the Famous Orchestra Shows Enthusiasm—Brass Section Alone Is Remarkable.

The title of "General musik director," bestowed upon Dr. Karl Muck in 1910 by the German Emperor, is the highest honor that can come to a musician in Germany. This is the man that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has for its leader, and the season of twelve concerts in Festival Hall, to begin May 14th, is creating great interest in San Francisco and the surrounding communities. Tomorrow morning the sale of seats for two or more concerts will begin at 343 Powell street and will continue for a week. After that seats for the single concerts will be ready.

Manager W. H. Leahy has been handling the subscription sale for three weeks or more, and the indications are for a very large attendance. The function of this orchestra has been for thirty-three years to give music of the highest class in the most perfect manner humanly possible, and the ideal has been maintained ever since the establishment of the organization which has

[163]

Address: San Francisco, Cal

Date APR

Estal

Sylvain Noack, second concert master of the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOUGHT FOR DANCE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give twelve concerts at Festival Hall, commencing May 14, is a fairly well known institution. Nevertheless, the management received a letter a few years ago from a town a little over 100 miles from Boston, in which it was stated that a certain society in that town was planning to give a grand concert and ball on an evening in February. They were anxious to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which they heard was a good one, and thought they could go as far as paying $300 if the orchestra would play for the dancing as well as for the concert. A politely worded note was sent in which regret was expressed that on the night in question the orchestra was engaged in giving a concert in Carnegie Hall, New York, and would be unable to accept the engagement offered.

The hundred musicians of the orchestra include the foremost artists of the world and notable among them is Sylvain Noack, the second concertmaster, a Hollander who has been with the organization for six years. He is a first prize graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory and before he came to America was concertmaster of the symphony orchestra at Aix and famous as a player of chamber music.

The engagement of the Boston Symphany Orchestra promises to be the most notable event of recent years and the sale of season seats, which is now drawing to a close, is very encouraging to the management. A subscription sale for two or more seats will begin at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, next Monday morning, lasting for one week, after which seats for single concerts will be ready.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia

Date

lished:

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILAD

YOUNG HARPIST FROM HERE JOINS BOSTON SYMPHONY

THEODORE CELLA Photograph by Marceau.

Philadelphian, who has been selected by Doctor Muck to be harpist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is only 18 years old.

PHILADELPHIANS should feel complimented in the announcement that Doctor Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has selected as harpist for that organization Theodore Cella, 18 years old, of this city. Mr. Cella has played with the Boston Symphony at its last three concerts, and is its youngest member.

Doctor Muck, who recently had his attention called to the talent of this young man, indicated his desire to hear him play. When he was in this city on March 15, the last concert given here by the Boston Symphony, he had the opportunity. Immediately upon his return to Boston he telegraphed to Mr. Cella to go to that city to discuss the prospects of an engagement. The result was that he was asked to remain there for the end of this season, and to sign a contract for the next two seasons.

The Boston Symphony also will take Mr. Cella with them to San Francisco to play during the 13 concerts the orchestra will give at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. He expects in future to call Boston his home and thereby Philadelphia loses one of its talented young musicians.

Theodore Cella comes of a musical family in the southern part of this city. He has made a study of the harp from the time he was old enough to reach the compass of the strings. He has played here a number of times during last winter, at the Academy of Music, the Metropolitan Opera House and at various private musicals, at which his playing has always produced a favorable impression. For several years he has been studying the harp with one of the most eminent teachers of that instrument in New York. Visitors at Atlantic City last summer will remember his solo work as a member of the Martini Orchestra.

Mr. Cella not only is a finished harpist, but also is a composer from dainty small numbers to elaborate concertos, one of which was played last season by the Martini Orchestra; and much is expected of him in the future in the way of composition for this instrument. He has a reputation of being one of the most talented harpists in this city. He is the third son of Joseph Cella, all four of the brothers being musicians and all well known in the musical life of this city.

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 2

Estal 384

Concert Series

Not alone are musical circles interested in the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but society folk as well will be abundantly represented in the audiences that assemble to do homage to music on the eight evenings and four afternoons of the engagement. The series will open Friday evening, May 14, in Festival Hall at the Exposition. The list of season subscribers is very large and among the purchasers of boxes and seats are the following:

Mrs. William Sproule, Mrs. Joseph A. Donohoe, Mrs. William B. Bourn, Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mrs. Sara M. Gerstle, Mrs. Hannah Gerstle, Mrs. Louis F. Monteagle, Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mrs. L. Schwabacher, Mrs. Leon Sloss, Mrs. M. C. Sloss, Mrs. M. A. Gunst, Mrs. L. M. Robbins, Mrs. C. F. Kohl, Mrs. A. B. Spreckels, Mrs. Henry Crocker, Mrs. James Otis, Miss F. Grenhood; Gordon Blanding, Alden Anderson, Allen I. Kittle, John Rothschild, Judge Frank H. Dunne, Walter Bliss, D. J. Guggenheim, John B. Casserly, John Parrott, Mortimer Fleishhacker, Dr. A. Barkan, G. D. Grant, E. J. Wickson, Edmond Godchaux, Herbert Fleishhacker, Dr. E. Rixford, R. M. Eyre, Louis Sloss, J. K. Armsby.

* * *

The marriage of Miss Mary Sullivan and Frank

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 25 191

Esta 8

Society Is Interested in Symphony Concerts

Not only are musical circles deeply interested in the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall, commencing Friday evening, May 14th, but society folk also will be abundantly represented in the audiences that assemble on the eight evenings and four afternoons of the engagement. The list of season subscribers is large, and among the purchasers of boxes and seats are the following:

MESDAMES

William Sproule	M. C. Sloss
Joseph A. Donohoe	M. A. Gunst
William B. Bourn	L. M. Robbins
William H. Crocker	C. F. Kohl
Sara M. Gerstle	A. B. Spreckels
Hannah Gerstle	Henry Crocker
Louis F. Monteagle	James Otis
Henry T. Scott
L. Schwabacher	Miss F. Greenhood
Leon Sloss

MESSRS.

Gordon Blanding	G. D. Grant
Alden Anderson	E. J. Wickson
Allen I. Kittle	Edmond Godchaux
John Rothschild	Herbert Fleishhacker
Frank H. Dunne	Dr. E. Rixford
Walter Bliss	R. M. Eyre
D. J. Guggenheim	Louis Sloss

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 25 1915

E , 188

SEASON SALE OF BOSTON PLAYERS OPENS TOMORROW

Subscription for the Famous Orchestra Shows Enthusiasm—Brass Section Alone Is Remarkable.

The title of "General musik director," bestowed upon Dr. Karl Muck in 1910 by the German Emperor, is the highest honor that can come to a musician in Germany. This is the man that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has for its leader, and the season of twelve concerts in Festival Hall, to begin May 14th, is creating great interest in San Francisco and the surrounding communities. Tomorrow morning the sale of seats for two or more concerts will begin at 343 Powell street and will continue for a week. After that seats for the single concerts will be ready.

Manager W. H. Leahy has been handling the subscription sale for three weeks or more, and the indications are for a very large attendance. The function of this orchestra has been for thirty-three years to give music of the highest class in the most perfect manner humanly possible, and the ideal has been maintained ever since the establishment of the organization, which has other attractions standards the Boston Symphony has become famous in all musical countries and is accepted as a model to be followed by all others.

Its roster today consists of 100 musicians, drawn largely from the leading orchestras of Europe, many of whom had individual reputations as artists in Europe. A New York critic said of their concerted efforts, "It is not only a virtuous orchestra, but an orchestra of virtuosi." Five of the very distinguished men are Anton Witek, concert master; Walther Habenicht, leader of second violins; Alfred Holy, harpist; Otto Urack, assistant conductor, and Andre Maquarre, first flute, the five representing the three nationalities of German, Bohemian and French.

The day has gone by when the second violin of an orchestra can be composed of less competent players than those of the first section, for modern music makes as strenuous a demand on one as on the other, and, in fact, the two violin sections are interchangeable. Otto Urack, also one of the principal cellists of the orchestra, leads the men at such times as Dr. Muck may be indisposed, and during his first season in Boston was called upon to conduct twenty of the most important concerts. Urack also is a composer of promise.

The brass section alone virtually comprises a small band, and to secure this section fittingly always is a hard task for any orchestra. Not only must brass players be accomplished musicians, but they must be able to draw from their instruments a tone which will melt into the tones of the wood winds and strings, and as modern writers are continually scoring for more elaborate brass work than ever before, the matter of adjustment is becoming more delicate.

The double quartet of horns is now famous throughout America. The trumpets are headed by Gustave Heim, who first won laurels as leader of the headquarters band of the German expedition to Peking in 1900.

The head of the trombones is Modeste Alloc, a Belgian.

From

Address San Francisco, Cal

Date APR 25 1915

Establ 384

It is four years since I last heard the Boston Symphony. Dr. Karl Muck was the director then as now. He is a man who combines delicacy and strength in the most remarkable manner. It is a nervous strength, not the quiet Titanism of Richter; but I never saw a director who could draw the tone, as it were, during the whole duration of his beat, more vitally than he can. Gericke gave me the impression of a martinet, quietly authoritative and a trifle academic; Fiedler, I thought, had less personality than either his predecessor or his successor. But Muck has culture in the true sense of the word, not the "Kultur" of blood and iron, but the urbanity one finds in the great German litterateurs from Lessing Heine. When he played "Tod and Verklarung," there was something in his pure and elevated idealism which reminded me of Jean Paul Richter and his Beethoven sent me back to the greatest German of them all, the world-poet, Goethe.

By the way, I notice that some exasperated patriot in the East blames Doctor Muck because of the compositions set down for performance in Festival Hall, thirty-two are by men classified as German, and only twenty by composers of other nationality. But common fairness forces one to recognize that Germany loomed larger in the musical culture of the world during the century from Mozart onward than any other nation. No good comes of blinking patent facts. Since the rise of Caesar Franck, Saint Saens and Debussy, Gallic culture may be said to vie on equal terms with that of Germany; nor must we forget that England has its Elgar, its Bantock and Cyril Scott, and America its MacDowell, its Chadwick and Edgar Stillman Kelley. That MacDowell and Chadwick should be the only Americans represented in the Boston-San Francisco concerts of the Boston Symphony is matter for regret, perhaps. But the arrangement represents Doctor Muck's ideal of what is fair, and his judgment is entitled to respect.

May 14 is the date of the first concert, and for twelve successive days we shall have orchestral concerts in Festival Hall the like of which cannot be offered by proud Berlin or brilliant Paris or mighty London.

* * *

[163]

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 23 1915

Sylvain Noack, second concert master of the Boston Symphony.

Estal

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOUGHT FOR DANCE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give twelve concerts at Festival Hall, commencing May 14, is a fairly well known institution. Nevertheless, the management received a letter a few years ago from a town a little over 100 miles from Boston, in which it was stated that a certain society in that town was planning to give a grand concert and ball on an evening in February. They were anxious to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which they heard was a good one, and thought they could go as far as paying $300 if the orchestra would play for the dancing as well as for the concert. A politely worded note was sent in which regret was expressed that on the night in question the orchestra was engaged in giving a concert in Carnegie Hall, New York, and would be unable to accept the engagement offered.

The hundred musicians of the orchestra include the foremost artists of the world and notable among them is Sylvain Noack, the second concertmaster, a Hollander who has been with the organization for six years. He is a first prize graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatory and before he came to America was concertmaster of the symphony orchestra at Aix and famous as a player of chamber music.

The engagement of the Boston Symphany Orchestra promises to be the most notable event of recent years and the sale of season seats, which is now drawing to a close, is very encouraging to the management. A subscription sale for two or more seats will begin at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, next Monday morning, lasting for one week, after which seats for single concerts will be ready.

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 24 1915

Estal 384

Concert Series

Not alone are musical circles interested in the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but society folk as well will be abundantly represented in the audiences that assemble to do homage to music on the eight evenings and four afternoons of the engagement. The series will open Friday evening, May 14, in Festival Hall at the Exposition. The list of season subscribers is very large and among the purchasers of boxes and seats are the following:

Mrs William Sproule, Mrs. Joseph A. Donohoe, Mrs. William B. Bourn, Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mrs. Sara M. Gerstle, Mrs. Hannah Gerstle, Mrs. Louis F. Monteagle, Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mrs. L. Schwabacher, Mrs. Leon Sloss, Mrs. M. C. Sloss, Mrs. M. A. Gunst, Mrs. L. M. Robbins, Mrs. C. F. Kohl, Mrs. A. B. Spreckels, Mrs. Henry Crocker, Mrs. James Otis, Miss F. Grenhood; Gordon Blanding, Alden Anderson, Allen I. Kittle, John Rothschild, Judge Frank H. Dunne, Walter Bliss, D. J. Guggenheim, John B. Casserly, John Parrott, Mortimer Fleishhacker, Dr. A. Barkan, G. D. Grant, E. J. Wickson, Edmond Godchaux, Herbert Fleishhacker, Dr. E. Rixford, R. M. Eyre, Louis Sloss, J. K. Armsby.

* * *

The marriage of Miss Mary Sullivan and Frank

LIC LEDGER

Philadelphia

lished:

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILAD

YOUNG HARPIST FROM HERE JOINS BOSTON SYMPHONY

THEODORE CELLA Photograph by Marceau.

Philadelphian, who has been selected by Doctor Muck to be harpist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is only 18 years old.

PHILADELPHIANS should feel complimented in the announcement that Doctor Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has selected as harpist for that organization Theodore Cella, 18 years old, of this city. Mr. Cella has played with the Boston Symphony at its last three concerts, and is its youngest member.

Doctor Muck, who recently had his attention called to the talent of this young man, indicated his desire to hear him play. When he was in this city on March 15, the last concert given here by the Boston Symphony, he had the opportunity. Immediately upon his return to Boston he telegraphed to Mr. Cella to go to that city to discuss the prospects of an engagement. The result was that he was asked to remain there for the end of this season, and to sign a contract for the next two seasons.

The Boston Symphony also will take Mr. Cella with them to San Francisco to play during the 13 concerts the orchestra will give at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. He expects in future to call Boston his home and thereby Philadelphia loses one of its talented young musicians.

Theodore Cella comes of a musical family in the southern part of this city. He has made a study of the harp from the time he was old enough to reach the compass of the strings. He has played here a number of times during last winter, at the Academy of Music, the Metropolitan Opera House and at various private musicals, at which his playing has always produced a favorable impression. For several years he has been studying the harp with one of the most eminent teachers of that instrument in New York. Visitors at Atlantic City last summer will remember his solo work as a member of the Martini Orchestra.

Mr. Cella not only is a finished harpist, but also is a composer from dainty small numbers to elaborate concertos, one of which was played last season by the Martini Orchestra; and much is expected of him in the future in the way of composition for this instrument. He has a reputation of being one of the most talented harpists in this city. He is the third son of Joseph Cella, all four of the brothers being musicians and all well known in the musical life of this city.

---

om CHRONICLE

'ress: San Francisco, Cal.

APR 25 1915

84

ociety Is terested in mphony Concerts

Not only are musical circles deeply interested in the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall, commencing Friday evening, May 14th, but society folk also will be abundantly represented in the audiences that assemble on the eight evenings and four afternoons of the engagement. The list of season subscribers is large, and among the purchasers of boxes and seats are the following:

MESDAMES

William Sproule	M. C. Sloss
Joseph A. Donohoe	M. A. Gunst
William B. Bourn	L. M. Robbins
William H. Crocker	C. F. Kohl
Sara M. Gerstle	A. B. Spreckels
Hannah Gerstle	Henry Crocker
Louis F. Monteagle	James Otis
Henry T. Scott
L. Schwabacher	Miss F. Greenhood
Leon Sloss

MESSRS.

Gordon Blanding	G. D. Grant
Alden Anderson	E. J. Wickson
Allen I. Kittle	Edmond Godchaux
John Rothschild	Herbert Fleishhacker
Frank H. Dunne	Dr. E. Rixford
Walter Bliss	R. M. Eyre
D. J. Guggenheim	Louis Sloss

CHRONICLE

s: San Francisco, Cal.

APR 25 1915

, 1884

ASON SALE OF BOSTON PLAYERS OPENS TOMORROW

scription for the Famous Orchestra Shows Enthusiasm—Brass Section Alone Is Remarkable.

The title of "General musik director," bestowed upon Dr. Karl Muck in 1910 by the German Emperor, is the highest honor that can come to a musician in Germany. This is the man that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has for its leader, and the season of twelve concerts in Festival Hall, to begin May 14th, is creating great interest in San Francisco and the surrounding communities. Tomorrow morning the sale of seats for two or more concerts will begin at 343 Powell street and will continue for a week. After that seats for the single concerts will be ready.

Manager W. H. Leahy has been handling the subscription sale for three weeks or more, and the indications are for a very large attendance. The function of this orchestra has been for thirty-three years to give music of the highest class in the most perfect manner humanly possible, and the ideal has been maintained ever since the establishment of the organization, which has standards the Boston Symphony has become famous in all musical countries and is accepted as a model to be followed by all others.

Its roster today consists of 100 musicians, drawn largely from the leading orchestras of Europe, many of whom had individual reputations as artists in Europe. A New York critic said of their concerted efforts, "It is not only a virtuous orchestra, but an orchestra of virtuosi." Five of the very distinguished men are Anton Witek, concert master; Walther Habenicht, leader of second violins; Alfred Holy, harpist; Otto Urack, assistant conductor, and Andre Maquarre, first flute, the five representing the three nationalities of German, Bohemian and French.

The day has gone by when the second violin of an orchestra can be composed of less competent players than those of the first section, for modern music makes as strenuous a demand on one as on the other, and, in fact, the two violin sections are interchangeable. Otto Urack, also one of the principal cellists of the orchestra, leads the men at such times as Dr. Muck may be indisposed, and during his first season in Boston was called upon to conduct twenty of the most important concerts. Urack also is a composer of promise.

The brass section alone virtually comprises a small band, and to secure this section fittingly always is a hard task for any orchestra. Not only must brass players be accomplished musicians, but they must be able to draw from their instruments a tone which will melt into the tones of the wood winds and strings, and as modern writers are continually scoring for more elaborate brass work than ever before, the matter of adjustment is becoming more delicate.

The double quartet of horns is now famous throughout America. The trumpets are headed by Gustave Heim, who first won laurels as leader of the headquarters band of the German expedition to Peking in 1900.

The head of the trombones is Modeste Alloc, a Belgian.

From

Address San Francisco, Cal

Date APR 25 1915

Establ 384

It is four years since I last heard the Boston Symphony. Dr. Karl Muck was the director then as now. He is a man who combines delicacy and strength in the most remarkable manner. It is a nervous strength, not the quiet Titanism of Richter; but I never saw a director who could draw the tone, as it were, during the whole duration of his beat, more vitally than he can. Gericke gave me the impression of a martinet, quietly authoritative and a trifle academic; Fiedler, I thought, had less personality than either his predecessor or his successor. But Muck has culture in the true sense of the word, not the "Kultur" of blood and iron, but the urbanity one finds in the great German litterateurs from Lessing Heine. When he played "Tod and Verklarung," there was something in his pure and elevated idealism which reminded me of Jean Paul Richter and his Beethoven sent me back to the greatest German of them all, the world-poet, Goethe.

By the way, I notice that some exasperated patriot in the East blames Doctor Muck because of the compositions set down for performance in Festival Hall, thirty-two are by men classified as German, and only twenty by composers of other nationality. But common fairness forces one to recognize that Germany loomed larger in the musical culture of the world during the century from Mozart onward than any other nation. No good comes of blinking patent facts. Since the rise of Caesar Franck, Saint Saens and Debussy, Gallic culture may be said to vie on equal terms with that of Germany; nor must we forget that England has its Elgar, its Bantock and Cyril Scott, and America its MacDowell, its Chadwick and Edgar Stillman Kelley. That MacDowell and Chadwick should be the only Americans represented in the Boston-San Francisco concerts of the Boston Symphony is matter for regret, perhaps. But the arrangement represents Doctor Muck's ideal of what is fair, and his judgment is entitled to respect.

May 14 is the date of the first concert, and for twelve successive days we shall have orchestral concerts in Festival Hall the like of which cannot be offered by proud Berlin or brilliant Paris or mighty London.

* * *

[163]

Address

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date APR 28 1915

Establis

ANNOUNCE NEXT SEASON'S PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS

The Women's Auxiliary Board of Philharmonic Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held its spring business meeting at 11 A. M. to-day in the art room of the Brooklyn Institute at the Academy of Music, Mrs. Camden C. Dike presiding and Mrs. Benjamin Price, formerly Mrs. M. Lupton, secretary. Those present were Mrs. Otto Goepel, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. James F. Waterman, Mrs. Frank M. Avery, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Elisha T. Everett, Miss Ella W. Hall, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. V. Jervis, Mrs. Charles S. Prey, Mrs. Tyler W. Wardell and Mrs. Julian Ross.

Report was given on the concerts held last season, and announcement was made of a large waiting list of persons who desired to subscribe. It was stated that seventy-five per cent. of the old subscribers had resubscribed for the coming season. It was decided to continue the auxiliary, although it is not necessary to foster the interest of the concerts. The treasurer's report of receipts for the winter was made, and these dates for next season announced: Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 18 and March 17. Soloists were not announced.

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 26 1915

Ests 84

3

MANY TO HEAR FETE OF MUSIC

After a most successful season sale for the twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall, the sale of seats for two or more concerts began this morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, with an immense demand. No musical event of recent years has excited such interest as has the coming of this famous organization, the finest of its kind in the world, and orders for season seats were received from such far distant points as New York City.

On account of the large audiences which will attend these concerts, beginning Friday evening, May 14, it will be necessary to enlarge the seating capacity of Festival Hall, and that already spacious auditorium will be closed for the eleven days beginning next Monday, to permit of the installation of a balcony and a horseshoe of boxes.

The sale of seats for single concerts will commence next Monday morning at the Exposition box office.

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 29 1915

Es 1884

FAMED MUSICIANS TO VISIT THE CITY

Much Interest in Approaching Concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As the date of the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall draws nearer, greater becomes the interest in this really wonderful musical event, and when Dr. Karl Muck raises his baton over the world-famed organization in this city for the first time Friday evening, May 14th, he will be greeted by an audience worthy of this occasion.

It was Ysaye who said a few years ago that there was no orchestra with which he liked to play so much as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the same time there was no orchestra which he dreaded so much. There is no orchestra in the world that has among its first violins so many men who rank high among virtuosi. Witek, like his predecessors in the chair of the concert master, is one of the very great violinists of the world. Noack, who sits beside him as second concert master, although just in his thirties, was famous in Europe before he came to Boston. Other men in the first violins who could prosper greatly as virtuosos, if they chose, are Roth, Hoffman, Theodorowicz and Bak. The leader of the second violins, Walter Habenicht, who came to Boston two [illegible] was concert master of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra, and sat at the second desk of the first violins of the Festival Orchestra in Bayreuth.

It is this fact that makes an appearance with the orchestra such a trying test for even so great a man as Ysaye.

Arture Toscanini, the great conductor of the Metropolitan Operahouse, once remarked to a friend that he would be willing to give up six months of his career in order to, as he termed it, "play with" the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date

Es 384

New York's Unsurpassed Orchestra.

AMONG the eminent soloists already engaged for next season's Carnegie Hall concerts of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, are the singers Emmy Destinn, Lucrezia Bori, and Julia Culp; the violinists and 'cellists, Fritz Kreisler, Arrigo Serato, Maximilian Pilzer, Leo Schulz, and Pablo Casals; and the pianists, Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Percy Grainger, Ernest Hutcheson, Yolando Mérö, and Ernest Schelling.

There is every indication that the Philharmonic concerts will have record audiences next season. The books open at Carnegie Hall next Monday for new subscribers. Josef Stransky has been engaged for three more seasons. Under him these concerts have attained unprecedented popularity, partly because of the excellent performances and partly because of the enticing programmes from which good music is not excluded simply because it happens to be popular.

As an orchestra, the New York Philharmonic is second to none in the world, the equal in every way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to which, in fact, it is superior in the brass department. It also has no equal in the matter of leaders of each group of instruments—an important matter in view of the expressive melodic passages for solo instruments so often occurring in modern music. There have been weak spots, too, in the past, but as Manager Leifels announces:

"Eleven new men will play in the Philharmonic Orchestra next season. Conductor Josef Stransky has made these changes in accordance with his policy of freeing the orchestra absolutely from all players who could not stand the severest critical test. Most of the new members of the Philharmonic Society will be younger men. The string section is the most affected, there being four changes among the first violins, and four among the seconds."

To enjoy the advantages of the low subscription rates, it is not necessary to subscribe for all of the Philharmonic concerts given during the season. There are separate series of Sunday afternoon, Friday afternoon, Thursday evening, and Saturday evening concerts. Of these, the Sunday afternoon and Saturday evening programmes are of the most popular character. The Friday afternoon concerts have the same programmes as those of Thursday evening. Usually the Friday audiences are the larger; but those who can attend in the evening would do well to go on Thursdays, when the audiences show the most enthusiasm, which reacts on the conductor and the players and makes them do their best.

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date APR 26 1915

Estal 4

Heavy Ticket Sales for Boston Symphony

The subscription sale of seats for the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall closed yesterday, after three weeks of active demand on the part of music lovers, not alone of San Francisco but from all over the country.

This morning seats for two or more concerts, the first of which will be Friday evening, May 14th, will be placed on sale at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, where they may be obtained all week. Next Monday seats for single concerts will be ready at the same place.

[1.4]

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Establ 84

JOINS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Theodore Cella, of Family of Musicians, Has Grateful Distinction.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has engaged Theodore Cella, 18 years of age, who is a harpist of unusual accomplishments, as a member of that organization. Cella, who is a native Philadelphian, has, during the past two years, frequently played here in concert, not only at the Academy of Music and the Metropolitan Opera House, but in many private musicales. His unusual talent was brought to the attention of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and by appointment he heard Cella play last March. Muck was so impressed with the young man that upon return to Boston the famous conductor telegraphed for the harpist to come to that city, and he was at once engaged to play the remainder of the season with the Symphony, and to go with the orchestra to San Francisco for a series of concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. In addition, Cella was asked to sign a contract with the Boston Symphony to play with it during the coming two seasons.

THEODORE CELLA.

Cella is the youngest member of the Boston Orchestra. He comes of a family of musicians who live in the southern part of this city. He made a study of the harp from the time he was old enough to compass the strings. He has been studying, for a number of years, with one of the most eminent harp teachers in New York city, and visitors to Atlantic City the past summer will remember Cella's fine solo work with Martini's Orchestra.

Cella is a composer, and one of his concertos was played last season by the Martini Orchestra. He is the third son of Joseph Cella, who is a fine performer on the violin. Amieda Cella, 23 years of age, the oldest son, has long been recognized as one of the best harpists of this city, as well as a skillful performer on the violin. Romeo Cella, the second one, 20 years of age, is a finished 'cellist. The youngest son, Herman Cella, only 16 years of age, displays, like his brothers, unusual talent and is at present studying

---

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Established:

PHILA HARPIST IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

Theodore Cella, Only 18, Will Accompany Orchestra to San Francisco.

A Philadelphia musician, Theodore Cella, who is only eighteen years of age, will be among the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to make the trip to the Panama-Pacific Exposition this month. The orchestra will give thirteen concerts there.

Cella, who lives at 642 Carpenter Street, is a member of a family of musicians. He obtained his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last season through an appeal made by "The Press" to Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor. Dr. Muck readily recognized the talent of the young man and a contract was signed.

Theodore Cella is considered a wonderfully talented harpist. Also, he is a remarkable composer, considering his age. He is a son of Joseph Cella, an Italian, himself a talented violinist. The father has been playing in this city several years and his sons were born here.

The oldest son, Amieda Cella, also a harpist of great skill and a violinist as well, has been heard here frequently in recitals. The second son, Romeo, twenty years old, is a fine 'cellist. Musicians have lauded him highly. Theodore Cella is the third son. The youngest is Herman Cella, sixteen years old. He is developing rapidly as a pianist.

Address

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date APR 2 8 1915

Establis

ANNOUNCE NEXT SEASON'S PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS

The Women's Auxiliary Board of Philharmonic Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held its spring business meeting at 11 A. M. to-day in the art room of the Brooklyn Institute at the Academy of Music, Mrs. Camden C. Dike presiding and Mrs. Benjamin Price, formerly Mrs. M. Lupton, secretary. Those present were Mrs. Otto Goepel, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. James F. Waterman, Mrs. Frank M. Avery, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Elisha T. Everett, Miss Ella W. Hall, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. V. Jervis, Mrs. Charles S. Prey, Mrs. Tyler W. Wardell and Mrs. Julian Ross.

Report was given on the concerts held last season, and announcement was made of a large waiting list of persons who desired to subscribe. It was stated that seventy-five per cent. of the old subscribers had resubscribed for the coming season. It was decided to continue the auxiliary, although it is not necessary to foster the interest of the concerts. The treasurer's report of receipts for the winter was made, and these dates for next season announced: Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 18 and March 17. Soloists were not announced.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 2 6 1

Ests 84

MANY TO HEAR FETE OF MUSIC

After a most successful season sale for the twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall, the sale of seats for two or more concerts began this morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, with an immense demand. No musical event of recent years has excited such interest as has the coming of this famous organization, the finest of its kind in the world, and orders for season seats were received from such far distant points as New York City.

On account of the large audiences which will attend these concerts, beginning Friday evening, May 14, it will be necessary to enlarge the seating capacity of Festival Hall, and that already spacious auditorium will be closed for the eleven days beginning next Monday, to permit of the installation of a balcony and a horseshoe of boxes.

The sale of seats for single concerts will commence next Monday morning at the Exposition box office.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date

Es 1884

FAMED MUSICIANS TO VISIT THE CITY

Much Interest in Approaching Concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As the date of the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall draws nearer, greater becomes the interest in this really wonderful musical event, and when Dr. Karl Muck raises his baton over the world-famed organization in this city for the first time Friday evening, May 14th, he will be greeted by an audience worthy of this occasion.

It was Ysaye who said a few years ago that there was no orchestra with which he liked to play so much as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the same time there was no orchestra which he dreaded so much. There is no orchestra in the world that has among its first violins so many men who rank high among virtuosi. Witek, like his predecessors in the chair of the concert master, is one of the very great violinists of the world. Noack, who sits beside him as second concert master, although just in his thirties, was famous in Europe before he came to Boston. Other men in the first violins who could prosper greatly as virtuosos, if they chose, are Roth, Hoffman, Theodorowicz and Bak. The leader of the second violins, Walter Habenicht, who came to Boston two years ago, was concert master of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra, and sat at the second desk of the first violins of the Festival Orchestra in Bayreuth.

It is this fact that makes an appearance with the orchestra such a trying test for even so great a man as Ysaye.

Arture Toscanini, the great conductor of the Metropolitan Operahouse, once remarked to a friend that he would be willing to give up six months of his career in order to, as he termed it, "play with" the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Es 884

New York's Unsurpassed Orchestra.

AMONG the eminent soloists already engaged for next season's Carnegie Hall concerts of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, are the singers Emmy Destinn, Lucrezia Bori, and Julia Culp; the violinists and 'cellists, Fritz Kreisler, Arrigo Serato, Maximilian Pilzer, Leo Schulz, and Pablo Casals; and the pianists, Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Percy Grainger, Ernest Hutcheson, Yolando Mérö, and Ernest Schelling.

There is every indication that the Philharmonic concerts will have record audiences next season. The books open at Carnegie Hall next Monday for new subscribers. Josef Stransky has been engaged for three more seasons. Under him these concerts have attained unprecedented popularity, partly because of the excellent performances and partly because of the enticing programmes from which good music is not excluded simply because it happens to be popular.

[illegible] the New York Philharmonic is second to none in the world, the equal in every way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to which, in fact, it is superior in the brass department. It also has no equal in the matter of leaders of each group of instruments—an important matter in view of the expressive melodic passages for solo instruments so often occurring in modern music. There have been weak spots, too, in the past, but as Manager Leifels announces:

"Eleven new men will play in the Philharmonic Orchestra next season. Conductor Josef Stransky has made these changes in accordance with his policy of freeing the orchestra absolutely from all players who could not stand the severest critical test. Most of the new members of the Philharmonic Society will be younger men. The string section is the most affected, there being four changes among the first violins, and four among the seconds."

To enjoy the advantages of the low subscription rates, it is not necessary to subscribe for all of the Philharmonic concerts given during the season. There are separate series of Sunday afternoon, Friday afternoon, Thursday evening, and Saturday evening concerts. Of these, the Sunday afternoon and Saturday evening programmes are of the most popular character. The Friday afternoon concerts have the same programmes as those of Thursday evening. Usually the Friday audiences are the larger; but those who can attend in the evening would do well to go on Thursdays, when the audiences show the most enthusiasm, which reacts on the conductor and the players and makes them do their best.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 2 6 1915

Estal 4

Heavy Ticket Sales for Boston Symphony

The subscription sale of seats for the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall closed yesterday, after three weeks of active demand on the part of music lovers, not alone of San Francisco but from all over the country.

This morning seats for two or more concerts, the first of which will be Friday evening, May 14th, will be placed on sale at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, where they may be obtained all week. Next Monday seats for single concerts will be ready at the same place.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Establ 84

JOINS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Theodore Cella, of Family of Musicians, Has Grateful Distinction.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has engaged Theodore Cella, 18 years of age, who is a harpist of unusual accomplishments, as a member of that organization. Cella, who is a native Philadelphian, has, during the past two years, frequently played here in concert, not only at the Academy of Music and the Metropolitan Opera House, but in many private musicales. His unusual talent was brought to the attention of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and by appointment he heard Cella play last March. Muck was so impressed with the young man that upon return to Boston the famous conductor telegraphed for the harpist to come to that city, and he was at once engaged to play the remainder of the season with the Symphony, and to go with the orchestra to San Francisco for a series of concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. In addition, Cella was asked to sign a contract with the Boston Symphony to play with it during the coming two seasons.

THEODORE CELLA.

Cella is the youngest member of the Boston Orchestra. He comes of a family of musicians who live in the southern part of this city. He made a study of the harp from the time he was old enough to compass the strings. He has been studying, for a number of years, with one of the most eminent harp teachers in New York city, and visitors to Atlantic City the past summer will remember Cella's fine solo work with Martini's Orchestra.

Cella is a composer, and one of his concertos was played last season by the Martini Orchestra. He is the third son of Joseph Cella, who is a fine performer on the violin. Amieda Cella, 23 years of age, the oldest son, has long been recognized as one of the best harpists of this city, as well as a skillful performer on the violin. Romeo Cella, the second one, 20 years of age, is a finished 'cellist. The youngest son, Herman Cella, only 16 years of age, displays, like his brothers, unusual talent and is at present studying the piano forte. The family resides at No. 642 Carpenter street.

Fro
Address:
Date

Established:/

PHILA HARPIST IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

Theodore Cella, Only 18, Will Accompany Orchestra to San Francisco.

A Philadelphia musician, Theodore Cella, who is only eighteen years of age, will be among the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to make the trip to the Panama-Pacific Exposition this month. The orchestra will give thirteen concerts there.

Cella, who lives at 642 Carpenter Street, is a member of a family of musicians. He obtained his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last season through an appeal made by "The Press" to Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor. Dr. Muck readily recognized the talent of the young man and a contract was signed.

Theodore Cella is considered a wonderfully talented harpist. Also, he is a remarkable composer, considering his age. He is a son of Joseph Cella, an Italian, himself a talented violinist. The father has been playing in this city several years and his sons were born here.

The oldest son, Amieda Cella, also a harpist of great skill and a violinist as well, has been heard here frequently in recitals. The second son, Romeo, twenty years old, is a fine 'cellist. Musicians have lauded him highly. Theodore Cella is the third son. The youngest is Herman Cella, sixteen years old. He is developing rapidly as a pianist.

Phila. Harpist to Go to Coast

As a result of exceptional talent displayed during engagements in this city, despite the fact that he is only eighteen years old, Theodore Cella has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its term of concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

From Examiner

Address San Francisco, Cal

Date 3 0 1915

Esta 188

MUSIC LOVERS ARE DELIGHTED

Coming of Boston Symphony to Be Musical Event; Barrere Concert To-Day.

The coming of the Boston Symphony has impressed music lovers in San Francisco as no musical event has ever impressed them before.

The fame of the organization, its indorsement by uthorities of every nationality, its evolution under a series of conductors of the first rank, all tend to this end.

Ysaye declared that of all the orchestras with which he played the Boston Symphony gave him the greatest pleasure. And he well might say so, for every member of the organization is a master of the instrument which he plays. Witek, the concertmaster, is a violinist of the first rank; his colleague, Noack, was famous in Europe. First violins like Roth, Theodorowicz and Bak would command the respect of connoisseurs anywhere.

Walther Habenicht, the leader of the second violins, was concertmaster of the Kiel Philharmonic and occupied the second desk among the first violins at the Bayreuth festivals.

Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, said he would give six months of his life to be able to "play with" the Boston Symphony.

The first concert will be given in Festival Hall on May 14. The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts, now concluding, has been very large and seats for single concerts will be ready on Monday morning, May 3, at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

From

Address San Francisco, Cal

Date

Estab 84

* * *

NOT alone are musical circles deeply interested in the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall, commencing Friday evening, May 14, but society folk as well will be abundantly represented in the audiences that assemble to do homage to music on the eight evenings and four afternoons of the engagement. The list of season subscribers is very large, and among the purchasers of boxes and seats are the following:

Mesdames—
Sproule, William
Donohoe, Joseph A.
Bourn, William B.
Crocker, William H.
Gerstle, Sara M.
Gerstle, Hannah
Monteagle, Louis F.
Scott, Henry T.
Schwabacher, L.
Sloss, Leon
Sloss, Judge M. C.
Gunst, M. A.
Robbins, L. M.
Kohl, C. F.
Spreckels, A. B.
Crocker, Henry
Otis, James
Greenhood, Miss F.

Messrs.—
Blanding, Gordon
Anderson, Alden
Kittle, Allen I.
Rothschild, John
Dunne, Judge Frank H.
Bliss, Walter
Guggenheim, D. J.
Cassorly, John B.
Parrott, John
Fleishhacker, Mortimor
Barkan, Dr. A.
Grant, G. D.
Wickson, E. J.
Godchaux, Edmond
Fleishhacker, Herbert
Rixford, Dr. E.
Eyre, R. M.
Sloss, Louis
Armsby, J. K.

* * *

THE annual [illegible] given by Kappa

BOSTON POST,
FRIDAY, MAY 14,

FRISCO GREETS HUB SYMPHONY

Mayor Gives Address—Advance Sale Large

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., May 13.—San Francisco, in the person of Mayor Rolph, gave warm welcome to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its arrival by ferry at Oakland this morning at 11.

He greeted Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis and made a short speech to members of the orchestra. The first concert will be given tomorrow, and the advance sale for the series of 12 concerts is very large.

BOSTON POST,
SATURDAY, MAY 15,

FIRST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

SAN FRANCISCO, May 14.—The artistic climax of the Panama Pacific Exposition was reached tonight when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 100 strong, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave the first of a series of 12 subscription concerts in Festival Hall. For the orchestra, the interior of the hall was largely remodeled, incrasing its capacity by a balcony and boxes, from 2500 to 4000. Every seat was filled by the audience whose brilliance was unequalled since the days of the Metropolitan opera. Society turned out in full force, while artistic and professional circles were fully represented.

Festival Hall, most picturesque in exterior and interior, and the changes completed just before the concert, made it acoustically almost perfect. Dr. Muck was greeted on entrance by applause and after each number.

BOSTON GLOBE—
MAY 14, 1915

WELCOMED BY MAYOR.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Arrives in San Francisco and Will Give Its First Concert Tonight.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 13—San Francisco in the person of Mayor Rolph gave a warm welcome to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its arrival this morning. He greeted Dr Muck and Mr Ellis and made a short speech to the members of the orchestra. The first concert will be given tomorrow evening. The advance sale for the series of 12 concerts has been very large.

BOSTON HERALD,
FRIDAY, MAY 14, 1915.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT SAN FRANCISCO

SAN FRANCISCO, May 13—The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived direct from Boston in a special train at 11 o'clock this forenoon to give a series of symphony concerts in Festival Hall. Mayor Rolph and President Levison of the music commission met them on arrival and Mayor Rolph extended a warm welcome to Dr. Muck and members. The first concert for tomorrow night is sold out.

ADVERTISER, FRIDAY
MORNING, MAY 14,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARRIVE AT FAIR

Mayor Rolph and Prominent Citizens Give Boston Men Royal Reception

SAN FRANCISCO, May 13.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which arrived here today by special train, was given a royal welcome by Mayor James Rolph jr. and a delegation of prominent citizens. The party left Boston last Sunday via the B. & A. and New York Central roads, and all the members from Dr. Muck down expressed enthusiastic delight at the treatment accorded them in the various cities on the route.

The orchestra will remain in San Francisco and give concerts at the Exposition for two weeks, returning by the same special train, arriving in Boston on May 31.

BOSTON JOURNAL
—FRIDAY, MAY 14,

'FRISCO WELCOMES BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mayor Rolph Makes Speech to Players at Oakland Ferry.

San Francisco, May 13.—Mayor Rolph gave an official greeting to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when they arrived here this morning. The mayor met the orchestra at the Oakland ferry. After Dr. Muck, the conductor, and C. E. Ellis, the manager, had been presented to him, Rolph made a little speech of welcome.

The orchestra has come to San Francisco by special invitation to give a series of 12 concerts at the fair. The first will take place tomorrow night. A heavy advance sale is reported.

Public interest in the visit of the famous orchestra is so keen that in all probability an extra concert will be given in some big hall in the city before the Bostonians leave for home.

SUNDAY POST,
MAY 16, 1915

From all accounts which have reached us up to the present time, the Metropolitan Opera or Boston Symphony Orchestra has been greeted with much acclaim at the San Francisco exposition, where, in addition to the concerts already given, it will play each day through the coming week, and where the concerts are being heavily patronized. It may be added here that, contrary to reports, the Musical Union of San Francisco had not the slightest objection, on the part of the local heads or members, to the Boston Symphony visit; that other orchestras which desired to make the trip to San Francisco found that they could not close enough engagements on the route to make such a visit possible—to say nothing of any guarantee for their concerts in San Francisco; that the Boston orchestra was selected by parties in San Francisco from all the orchestras in the United States for this visit, and that, again contrary to published report, Mr. Higginson did not pay part of the expenses of the trip, for the Symphony Orchestra of Boston is so well paid for its visit that a handsome profit will remain to recompense Mr. Higginson for the unusually heavy deficit which, as a result of the war, has confronted him at the close of the subscription concerts in Boston. True, there were interested parties, not in San Francisco, who endeavored, as one might say, to put a spoke in the wheel of the Boston orchestra, partly through the press. These efforts were fruitless and emphasized the more the ability and the reputation of the local organization.

eached
Metro-ny Oruch ac-osition, erts al-
h day where patron-at, con-
Union of test ob-al heads mphony ich de-rancisco enough ke such of any in San chestra
Fran-in the d that,
ort, Mr.
the exmphony aid for fit will gginson which, nfronted ion con-were inancisco, say, to Boston
e press.
emphahe repu-
on.

SUNDAY POST,

MAY 16, 1915

FRISCO PRAISE FOR SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck and His Players Lauded on Coast

Following is some comment of San Francisco newspapers on the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Panama Exposition, Friday night:

Chronicle—The world's greatest orchestra was brought to us last night, and we knew the difference, though the programme was not new, it was made so by a performance which probably no other organization save the Boston orchestra, could summon.

Bulletin—They told us the Boston Symphony Orchestra was perfection . . . and after last night's opening concert, there is nothing to do but repeat what we have been told.

Call—It is a wonderful orchestra that Dr. Muck has brought from Boston for us. In perfection of composite skill and direction, it is an instrument in itself more thrilling and inspiring than any single instrument in the catalogue may be.

Examiner—It was an ovation with which the audience greet

From GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date

THE COMBATANTS IN MUSIC.

In spite of the incontrovertible fact that national lines should not be drawn in the commonwealth of a there has been a good deal of comment, speculati and gossip this year in regard to performances of music of the nations at war. Any one can understa why France and Belgium should not care to h Brahms and Wagner, while England could listen them without too much resentment. There is no pate reason why "Carmen" and "Mignon" should offend people of Berlin, though Vienna and Budapest mig turn a deaf ear to Tchaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsako But, as we all know, the combat in music has be carried into America.

Especially apt now is the summary of the ho concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who eminent conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, is known to be frankly pro-German in his sympathies. During the earlier part of the season Dr. Muck noticeably neglected the music of the Triple Entente for the music of Germany and Austria-Hungary. When that fact was pointed out in the public press of Boston Dr. Muck altered his course. The completed list of the works performed at the twenty-four concerts now makes interesting reading.

Beethoven leads with fourteen compositions and Brahms follows with seven. Then comes Mozart with six. In the case of these leaders it is, however, important to note that all their works performed are not instrumental pieces. Beethoven's total is swollen by four songs, Brahms's by three, and Mozart's by one opera air. Liszt, Strauss, and Weber, of countries in the Teutonic alliance, score four works each; Bach, Dvorak, and Haydn three each. But between the six and the four comes the five, and the only composer in the five class is the Finn, Sibelius. That is a notable achievement for a living composer who is far from being accepted as yet in toto, and Sibelius is a subject of the czar, but, it is understood, a sympathizer with the Germans.

Turning from the Teutons and their supporters, the New Yorker, bombarded with Tchaikowsky, war or no war, in his own town, finds just one Tchaikowsky work on the Boston list. The other Russians represented are Borodin and Stravinsky, and there is one Pole, Noskowski, each contributing a single work. The French composers number Berlioz, Chabrier, Debussy, d'Indy, Lalo, Ravel, Ropartz, and Saint-Saëns, to whom may be added as virtually French César Franck, a Belgian, and Enesco, a Roumanian. These all figure with one work each save Chabrier, Franck, and Lalo, who rise to two. Both the Lalo compositions, however, are concertos played by soloists, and the single Saint-Saëns piece is an opera air. English music was untouched, unless one regards Handel as English.

An emerging curiosity in the somewhat curious list is the probably unprecedented neglect of Wagner, represented by only two compositions, the "Faust Overture" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which is hardly to be expected from a German programme maker now that Wagner more than any other is looked on as the representative composer of the Fatherland, in spite of the fact that he was once a revolutionist and a fugitive in Switzerland. The sole Tchaikowsky work is not the "1812" overture. And thereby hangs a tale. Probably never has that deafening composition been ignored so generally as this year. The tonal duel between the Russian national hymn and the "Marseillaise," ending in the extinction of the latter, would hardly be acceptable in the countries of the Triple Entente, and Germans are not credited with enough sense of humor to make it the piece of the hour in the Fatherland. But even in New York performances of it have been limited to an opera concert or two.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date 3 0 1915
Established: L

INTEREST HIGH IN SYMPHONY

As the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall grows nearer greater becomes the interest in this wonderful musical event. When Dr. Carl Muck raises his baton here on Friday evening, May 14, he will be greeted by an audience worthy of this occasion.

The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts, now concluding, has been very large and seats for single concerts will be ready Monday morning, May 3, at the Exposition boxoffice, 343 Powell street.

It was Ysaye who said a few years ago that there was no orchestra with which he liked to play so much as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the same time there was no orchestra which he dreaded so much. There is no orchestra in the world that has among its first violins so many men who rank high among virtuosi. There is not a man in the ranks of the first violins who is not a better violinist than the average touring soloist.

Some interesting tales might be told of things that have happened at rehearsals of the orchestra, when famous visiting virtuosi have been applauded with hardly a perfunctory tapping of bows on violins. On the other hand, there have been occasions when the whole orchestra got up and cheered the soloist.

Arture Toscanini, the great conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, once remarked to a friend that he would be willing to give up six months of his career in order to, as he termed it, "play with" the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alden Anderson
A. F. Agard
V. B. Appleton
Dr. T. J. Argust
J. K. Armsby
Mrs. Arno
Mrs. Blanche Ashley
Mary Ayres
Dr. A. Barkan
E. Baerwald
Fred A. Baker
Martha D. Baker
Miss E. Beronic
D. Berry
Allen Bier
Gordon Blanding
W H Blatchly
Walter Bliss
G. G. Blymyer
Mrs. W. B. Bourn
Mrs. E. Bowman
Mrs. G. F. Bowman
Mrs. John F. Boyd
E. E. Brice
Walter Brooks
Mrs. W. S. Burnett
Leandro Campanari
John B. Casserly
Mrs. W. H. Crocker
Mrs. Henry Crocker
Mrs. M. R. Carroll
Mrs. W. H. Chapman
T. M. Childs
Miss A. Clement
S. Coffin
C. W. Conlisk
Helen E. Cowell
R. A. Curran
Judge F. H. Dunne
Baron de Nicolics
Mrs. L. V. N. Denman
Mrs. J. A. Donohoe
E. B. Dunham
R. M. Eyre
A. Eloesser
F. P. Farquhar
A. W. Foster
Herbert Fleishhacker
Mortimer Fleishhacker
Henry Fortman
Nathan Firestone
Mrs. Hannah Gerstle
Mrs. Sarah H. Gerstle
Edmond Godchaux
Mrs. A. A. Gerst
Miss Gilbert
Mrs. Sara S. Goodrich
Chauncey S. Goodrich
G. D. Grant
W. H. Graves
Emil Greenbaum
Miss F. Greenhood
Jessie Gregory
D. J. Guggenheim
Mrs. M. A. Gunst
E. S. Heller
E. M. Hecht
Sir Henry Heyman
Mrs. G. P. Hague
J. C. Haight
A. B. Hammond
R. E. Hartley
Mrs. A. Hasbrouck
L. M. Hayes
Mrs. H. C. Hellman
J. Henry
Mrs. J. C. Henkonius
J. A. Hillman
David Hirschler
Fred J. Housley
Miss I. G. Hughes
E. C. Hutchison
P. J. Jacoby
Miss A. G. Jewell
I. H. Johnson
Allen I. Kittle
Mrs. C. F. Kohl
L. M. Kaiser
A. R. Knell
W. B. Kollmyer
Mrs. Theo. Kytka
Mrs. A. L. Longfeld
Emma E. La Motte
L. O. Levison
Arthur Lewis
W. A. Liebenam
Mrs. Sophie Lilienthal
Miss C. H. Lindley
Miss Folva Low
Mrs. F. L. MacBennett
Lewis S. Mace
Mrs. A. Mack
Miss A. B. McBoyle
David McClure
John D. McKee
G. S. McManns
Mrs. Manheim
Roland Marx
William Melander
Mrs. G. Millberry
Henry G. Meyer
Carrie B. Millett
Mrs. J. T. Monges
D. B. Moody
Mrs. L. F. Monteagle
Miss Ella Morgan
I. F. Morrow
Dr. A. H. Morse
Blanche Morse
Dora H. Morse
M. S. Neugass
Mrs. James Otis
Mrs. Elenor Owens
Eliza Olds
Miss H. Osmers
John Parrott
Gertrude Pauson
Miss M. Passmore
Mary Earle Payne
W. J. Phelps
Ella E. Potter
George S. Potter
L. H. Rand
Miss Edith
nard
Mrs. L. Rehf
Dr. E. Rixford
Mrs. L. M. R
Dr. Julius R stern
John Rothsch
J. D. Ruggles
A. H. R. Schmidt
F. S. Scheinstein
Mrs. L. Schwabacker
Mrs. Henry T. Scott
Mrs. Jessie S. Seal
Mrs. S. Simon
Mrs. Leon Sloss
Louis Sloss
Mrs. M. C. Sloss
F. M. Slosson
Helen T. Spencer
Mrs. A. B. Spreckels
Mrs. William Sproule
Mrs. E. H. Steele
Mrs. J. Stein
L. H. Steinagger
Mrs. J. F. Stone
Mrs. H. Roy Stovel
Mrs. George Stowe
Mrs. James Ellis Tucker
Frederic Torrey
S. Trask
Melville S. Toplitz
W. M. Todd
R. A. Thompson
H. R. Techau
Harry Unna
M. L. Van Dykes
Mrs. F. H. Varney
Miss F. Volkmann
J. R. Wade
Mrs. E. T. W
Mrs. H. H. V
Mrs Dr. G. E ple
A. W. Wilson
Francis W. W
Miss Wolker
Glen Woods
Edgar Wooldrid
J. B. Wright

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 1915
Es 1884

and 2 bassoons.

Boston Symphony

As the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall grows nearer, greater becomes the interest in this musical event and when Dr. Karl Muck raises his baton over the world famed organization in this city for the first time, Friday evening, May 14, he will be greeted by a great audience. The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts, now concluding, has been large and seats for single concerts will be ready Monday morning, May 3, at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

It was Ysaye who said a few years ago that there was no orchestra with which he liked to play so much as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the same time there was no orchestra which he dreaded so much. There is no orchestra in the world that has among its first violins so many men who rank high among virtuosi.

Witek, the concert master, is one of the great violinists of the world; Neack, second concert master, was famous in Europe before he came to Boston. Other men in the first violins who could prosper greatly as virtuosi if they chose, are Roth, Hoffman, Theodorowicz and Bak.

The leader of the second violins, Walther Habenicht, was second concert master of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra and first violin of the Festival Orchestra in Bayreuth.

It is this fact that makes an appearance with the orchestra such a trying test for even so great a man as Ysaye. The visiting virtuoso can not fool any of the men who are accompanying him. Arturo Toscanini, the great conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, once remarked to a friend that he would be willing to give up six months of his career in order to, as he termed it, the Boston Sym

---

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 3 0 1915
Establis

Georges Longy, leader of the wood-wind section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

G. LONGY ADDS TO ORCHESTRA FAME

Wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give twelve concerts at Festival Hall, beginning May 14, goes, it is preceded by the fame of its wood wind section. The wood wind section comprises the oboes, the flutes, the clarinets and the bassoons, and in the Boston Symphony Orchestra there are four each of these instruments.

The solo players of its flutes, clarinets and oboes are French, because France is supreme in its school of wood wind players. The bassoons, however, are Germans, for the Boston Symphony uses German horns.

The leader of the wood wind section is always the first oboe, and in Georges Longy, who for sixteen years has held this position, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has one of the most remarkable players in the world.

The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts, now progressing, is very large. The sale of seats for single concerts will begin Monday morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street. Those who have taken boxes or groups of seats for the season include the following:

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisc
Date
Established: Lond
Est 1884

Boston Symphony Lures Smart Set

No musical event of recent years has excited the interest that the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Festival Hall has occasioned. The series of twelve concerts, the first of which will take place Friday evening, May 14, will bring out a succession of brilliant audiences and the list of season subscribers is full of notable names.

Those who have taken boxes and groups of seats for the season include the following:

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 1915
Establi 84

gency.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The interest aroused by the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is very large and the subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts, now concluding, is very gratifying to W. H. Leahy, who is in charge of the local engagement. The sale of seats for single concerts will begin Monday morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, where mail orders, accompanied by check made payable to Mr. Leahy, will receive prompt attention.

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date 1915
Estat 84

Mrs. E. M. Savercool.

Seats on Sale To-Day For Boston Symphony

Tickets for Single Concerts May Be Had; First Recital May 14.

The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded last evening, the demand having been very heavy all the week. This morning at 9 o'clock seats for single concerts will be ready at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

The series of twelve concerts, four of which are scheduled for the afternoons, will begin Friday evening, May 14, and the organization with 108 people, including the managerial force, will come direct from Boston in a special train, playing nowhere else while on the way, and leaving for their home city at midnight after the last concert, playing again in Boston on the following Monday.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date 1 1915

Music Season Pauses to Await Boston Symphony

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

MUSIC here will now enter upon a little time of holding its breath in anticipation of the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on May 14. After tomorrow's concerts Festival Hall will close and the Greenbaum season end; Thursday's important choral event at Berkeley will be the last of its for the season, and the People's Opera Company and the Central Musicales will have the home field pretty much to themselves.

BRAHMS' "REQUIEM."

The production of Brahms' "Requiem" in Harmon Gymnasium, Berkeley, on Thursday night, May 6, is among the really important choral events of the year. Paul Steindorff has undertaken to present the most difficult and beautiful choral composition in the literature of modern music. The "Requiem" has never been heard adequately in its entirety hereabouts, its complexities having stood in the way of its proper presentation.

The chorus which will sing it is comprised of the various choral bodies which have remained together for many seasons under Steindorff.

This requiem is placed side by side with the Bach Passions, Beethoven's Mass in D major or Boah's B minor Mass, at the summit of devotional music. It is a "triumphlied," suggesting the victory of life rather than the ascendancy of death. It begins with "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted," follows with "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy," sings of the coming of Christ, breaks into a glory of tone on the words "The Redeemed of the Lord shall return again and come rejoicing," and then offers a chorus in which it has been said "the perfect peace of heaven is reflected," in the words and music, "How lovely are thy dwellings, O Lord of Hosts." One of its most tender numbers was written to the memory of Brahms' mother, and the words are "As one whom his mother comforteth, so I comfort you."

Spiritual exaltation is the mood of the final chorus on the words "The trumpet shall sound."

The baritone is assigned two solos with chorus, and the soprano sings the "As one whom." Mme. Johanna Kristoffy and Lowell Redfield are the artists. The piano score will be played by Mrs. Lowell Redfield and Steindorff's orchestra will play the score.

Address

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SUNDAY POST,

MAY 16, 1915

FRISCO PRAISE FOR SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck and His Players Lauded on Coast

Following is some comment of San Francisco newspapers on the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Panama Exposition, Friday night:

Chronicle—The world's greatest orchestra was brought to us last night, and we knew the difference, though the programme was not new, it was made so by a performance which probably no other organization save the Boston orchestra, could summon.

Bulletin—They told us the Boston Symphony Orchestra was perfection . . . and after last night's opening concert, there is nothing to do but repeat what we have been told.

Call—It is a wonderful orchestra that Dr. Muck has brought from Boston for us. In perfection of composite skill and direction, it is an instrument in itself more thrilling and inspiring than any single instrument in the catalogue may be.

Examiner—It was an ovation with which the audience greeted Dr. Muck ... symphony. They ... knew him for

---

From GLOBE

Address: New York

Date

THE COMBATANTS IN MUSIC.

In spite of the incontrovertible fact that national lines should not be drawn in the commonwealth of art, there has been a good deal of comment, speculation, and gossip this year in regard to performances of the music of the nations at war. Any one can understand why France and Belgium should not care to hear Brahms and Wagner, while England could listen to them without too much resentment. There is no patent reason why "Carmen" and "Mignon" should offend the people of Berlin, though Vienna and Budapest might turn a deaf ear to Tchaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff. But, as we all know, the combat in music has been carried into America.

Especially apt now is the summary of the home concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose eminent conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, is known to be frankly pro-German in his sympathies. During the earlier part of the season Dr. Muck noticeably neglected the music of the Triple Entente for the music of Germany and Austria-Hungary. When that fact was pointed out in the public press of Boston Dr. Muck altered his course. The completed list of the works performed at the twenty-four concerts now makes interesting reading.

Beethoven leads with fourteen compositions and Brahms follows with seven. Then comes Mozart with six. In the case of these leaders it is, however, important to note that all their works performed are not instrumental pieces. Beethoven's total is swollen by four songs, Brahms's by three, and Mozart's by one opera air. Liszt, Strauss, and Weber, of countries in the Teutonic alliance, score four works each; Bach, Dvorak, and Haydn three each. But between the six and the four comes the five, and the only composer in the five class is the Finn, Sibelius. That is a notable achievement for a living composer who is far from being accepted as yet in toto, and Sibelius is a subject of the czar, but, it is understood, a sympathizer with the Germans.

Turning from the Teutons and their supporters, the New Yorker, bombarded with Tchaikowsky, war or no war, in his own town, finds just one Tchaikowsky work on the Boston list. The other Russians represented are Borodin and Stravinsky, and there is one Pole, Noskowski, each contributing a single work. The French composers number Berlioz, Chabrier, Debussy, d'Indy, Lalo, Ravel, Ropartz, and Saint-Saëns, to whom may be added as virtually French César Franck, a Belgian, and Enesco, a Roumanian. These all figure with one work each save Chabrier, Franck, and Lalo, who rise to two. Both the Lalo compositions, however, are concertos played by soloists, and the single Saint-Saëns piece is an opera air. English music was untouched, unless one regards Handel as English.

An emerging curiosity in the somewhat curious list is the probably unprecedented neglect of Wagner, represented by only two compositions, the "Faust Overture" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which is hardly to be expected from a German programme maker now that Wagner more than any other is looked on as the representative composer of the Fatherland, in spite of the fact that he was once a revolutionist and a fugitive in Switzerland. The sole Tchaikowsky work is not the "1812" overture. And thereby hangs a tale. Probably never has that deafening composition been ignored so generally as this year. The tonal duel between the Russian national hymn and the "Marseillaise," ending in the extinction of the latter, would hardly be acceptable in the countries of the Triple Entente, and Germans are not credited with enough sense of humor to make it the piece of the hour in the Fatherland. But even in New York performances of it have been limited to an opera concert or two.

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date 3 0 1915

Established: L

INTEREST HIGH IN SYMPHONY

As the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall grows nearer greater becomes the interest in this wonderful musical event. When Dr. Carl Muck raises his baton here on Friday evening, May 14, he will be greeted by an audience worthy of this occasion.

The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts, now concluding, has been very large and seats for single concerts will be ready Monday morning, May 3, at the Exposition boxoffice, 343 Powell street.

It was Ysaye who said a few years ago that there was no orchestra with which he liked to play so much as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the same time there was no orchestra which he dreaded so much. There is no orchestra in the world that has among its first violins so many men who rank high among virtuosi. There is not a man in the ranks of the first violins who is not a better violinist than the average touring soloist.

Some interesting tales might be told of things that have happened at rehearsals of the orchestra, when famous visiting virtuosi have been applauded with hardly a perfunctory tapping of bows on violins. On the other hand, there have been occasions when the whole orchestra got up and cheered the soloist.

Arture Toscanini, the great conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, once remarked to a friend that he would be willing to give up six months of his career in order to, as he termed it, "play with" the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alden Anderson
A. F. Agard
V. B. Appleton
Dr. T. J. Argust
J. K. Armsby
Mrs. Arno
Mrs. Blanche Ashley
Mary Ayres
Dr. A. Barkan
E. Baerwald
Fred A. Baker
Martha D. Baker
Miss E. Beronic
D. Berry
Allen Bier
Gordon Blanding
W H Blatchly
Walter Bliss
G. G. Blymyer
Mrs. W. B. Bourn
Mrs. E. Bowman
Mrs. G. F. Bowman
Mrs. John F. Boyd
E. E. Brice
Walter Brooks
Mrs. W. S. Burnett
Leandro Campanari
John B. Casserly
Mrs. W. H. Crocker
Mrs. Henry Crocker
Mrs. M. R. Carroll
Mrs. W. H. Chapman
T. M. Childs
Miss A. Clement
S. Coffin
C. W. Conlisk
Helen E. Cowell
R. A. Curran
Judge F. H. Dunne
Baron de Nicolics

Emma T. La Motte
L. O. Levison
Arthur Lewis
W. A. Liebenam
Mrs. Sophie Lilienthal
Miss C. H. Lindley
Miss Folva Low
Mrs. F. J. MacBennett
Lewis S. Mace
Mrs. A. Mack
Miss A. B. McBoyle
David McClure
John D. McKee
G. S. McManns
Mrs. Manheim
Roland Marx
William Melander
Mrs. G. Millberry
Henry G. Meyer
Carrie B. Millett
Mrs. J. T. Monges
D. B. Moody
Mrs. L. F. Monteagle
Miss Ella Morgan
I. F. Morrow
Dr. A. H. Morse
Blanche Morse
Dora H. Morse
M. S. Neugass
Mrs. James Otis
Mrs. Elenor Owens
Eliza Olds
Miss H. Osmers
John Parrott
Gertrude Pauson
Miss M. Passmore
Mary Earle Payne
W. J. Phelps
Ella E. Potter
George S. Potter

Mrs. L. V. N. Denman
Mrs. J. A. Donohoe
E. B. Dunham
R. M. Eyre
A. Eloesser
F. P. Farquhar
A. W. Foster
Herbert Fleishhacker
Mortimer Fleishhacker
Henry Fortman
Nathan Firestone
Mrs. Hannah Gerstle
Mrs. Sarah H. Gerstle
Edmond Godchaux
Mrs. A. A. Gerst
Miss Gilbert
Mrs. Sara S. Goodrich
Chauncey S. Goodrich
G. D. Grant
W. H. Graves
Emil Greenbaum
Miss F. Greenhood
Jessie Gregory
D. J. Guggenheim
Mrs. M. A. Gunst
E. S. Heller
E. M. Hecht
Sir Henry Heyman
Mrs. G. P. Hague
J. C. Haight
A. B. Hammond
R. E. Hartley
Mrs. A. Hasbrouck
L. M. Hayes
Mrs. H. C. Hellman
J. Henry
Mrs. J. C. Henkonius
J. A. Hillman
David Hirschler
Fred J. Housley
Miss I. G. Hughes
E. C. Hutchison
P. J. Jacoby
Miss A. G. Jewell
I. H. Johnson
Allen I. Kittle
Mrs. C. F. Kohl
L. M. Kaiser
A. R. Knell
W. B. Kollmyer
Mrs. Theo. Kytka
Mrs. A. L. Longfeld

L. H. Rand
Miss Edith
nard
Mrs. L. Rehf
Dr. E. Rixford
Mrs. L. M. R
Dr. Julius R stern
John Rothsch
J. D. Ruggles
A. H. R. Schmidt
F. S. Scheinstein
Mrs. L. Schwabacker
Mrs. Henry T. Scott
Mrs. Jessie S. Seal
Mrs. S. Simon
Mrs. Leon Sloss
Louis Sloss
Mrs. M. C. Sloss
F. M. Slosson
Helen T. Spencer
Mrs. A. B. Spreckels
Mrs. William Sproule
Mrs. E. H. Steele
Mrs. J. Stein
L. H. Steinagger
Mrs. J. F. Stone
Mrs. H. Roy Stovel
Mrs. George Stowe
Mrs. James Ellis Tucker
Frederic Torrey
S. Trask
Melville S. Toplitz
W. M. Todd
R. A. Thompson
H. R. Techau
Harry Unna
M. L. Van Dykes
Mrs. F. H. Varney
Miss F. Volkmann
J. R. Wade
Mrs. E. T. Walker
Mrs. H. H. Watson
Mrs Dr. G. H. Whipple
A. W. Wilson
Francis W. Wolfe
Miss Wolker
Glen Woods
Edgar Wooldridge
J. B. Wright

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 1 1915

1884 and 2 bassoons.

Boston Symphony

As the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall grows nearer, greater becomes the interest in this musical event and when Dr. Karl Muck raises his baton over the world famed organization in this city for the first time, Friday evening, May 14, he will be greeted by a great audience. The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts, now concluding, has been large and seats for single concerts will be ready Monday morning, May 3, at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

It was Ysaye who said a few years ago that there was no orchestra with which he liked to play so much as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the same time there was no orchestra which he dreaded so much. There is no orchestra in the world that has among its first violins so many men who rank high among virtuosi.

Witek, the concert master, is one of the great violinists of the world; Neack, second concert master, was famous in Europe before he came to Boston. Other men in the first violins who could prosper greatly as virtuosi if they chose, are Roth, Hoffman, Theodorowicz and Bak.

The leader of the second violins, Walther Habenicht, was second concert master of the Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra and first violin of the Festival Orchestra in Bayreuth.

It is this fact that makes an appearance with the orchestra such a trying test for even so great a man as Ysaye. The visiting virtuoso can not fool any of the men who are accompanying him. Arturo Toscanini, the great conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, once remarked to a friend that he would be willing to give up six months of his career in order to, as he termed it, "play with" the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Francisco,

---

om CALL

dress: San Francisco, Cal.

te APR 3 0 1915

Georges Longy, leader of the wood-wind section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

G. LONGY ADDS TO ORCHESTRA FAME

Wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give twelve concerts at Festival Hall, beginning May 14, goes, it is preceded by the fame of its wood wind section. The wood wind section comprises the oboes, the flutes, the clarinets and the bassoons, and in the Boston Symphony Orchestra there are four each of these instruments.

The solo players of its flutes, clarinets and oboes are French, because France is supreme in its school of wood wind players. The bassoons, however, are Germans, for the Boston Symphony uses German horns.

The leader of the wood wind section is always the first oboe, and in Georges Longy, who for sixteen years has held this position, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has one of the most remarkable players in the world.

The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts, now progressing, is very large. The sale of seats for single concerts will begin Monday morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street. Those who have taken boxes or groups of seats for the season include the following:

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 1 1915

Boston Symphony Lures Smart Set

No musical event of recent years has excited the interest that the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Festival Hall has occasioned. The series of twelve concerts, the first of which will take place Friday evening, May 14, will bring out a succession of brilliant audiences and the list of season subscribers is full of notable names.

Those who have taken boxes and groups of seats for the season include the following:

---

om BULLETIN

ldress: San Francisco, Cal.

te MAY 1 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The interest aroused by the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is very large and the subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts, now concluding, is very gratifying to W. H. Leahy, who is in charge of the local engagement. The sale of seats for single concerts will begin Monday morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, where mail orders, accompanied by check made payable to Mr. Leahy, will receive prompt attention.

Examiner

ress San Francisco, Cal.

Mrs. E. M. Savercool.

Seats on Sale To-Day For Boston Symphony

Tickets for Single Concerts May Be Had; First Recital May 14.

The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded last evening, the demand having been very heavy all the week. This morning at 9 o'clock seats for single concerts will be ready at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

The series of twelve concerts, four of which are scheduled for the afternoons, will begin Friday evening, May 14, and the organization with 108 people, including the managerial force, will come direct from Boston in a special train, playing nowhere else while on the way, and leaving for their home city at midnight after the last concert, playing again in Boston on the following Monday.

---

1 1915

Music Season Pauses to Await Boston Symphony

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

MUSIC here will now enter upon a little time of holding its breath in anticipation of the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on May 14. After tomorrow's concerts Festival Hall will close and the Greenbaum season end; Thursday's important choral event at Berkeley will be the last of its sort for the season, and the People's Opera Company and the Central Musicales will have the home field pretty much to themselves.

BRAHMS' "REQUIEM."

The production of Brahms' "Requiem" in Harmon Gymnasium, Berkeley, on Thursday night, May 6, is among the really important choral events of the year. Paul Steindorff has undertaken to present the most difficult and beautiful choral composition in the literature of modern music. The "Requiem" has never been heard adequately in its entirety hereabouts, its complexities having stood in the way of its proper presentation.

The chorus which will sing it is comprised of the various choral bodies which have remained together for many seasons under Steindorff.

This requiem is placed side by side with the Bach Passions, Beethoven's Mass in D major or Boah's B minor Mass, at the summit of devotional music. It is a "triumphlied," suggesting the victory of life rather than the ascendancy of death. It begins with "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted," follows with "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy," sings of the coming of Christ, breaks into a glory of tone on the words "The Redeemed of the Lord shall return again and come rejoicing," and then offers a chorus in which it has been said "the perfect peace of heaven is reflected," in the words and music, "How lovely are thy dwellings, O Lord of Hosts." One of its most tender numbers was written to the memory of Brahms' mother, and the words are "As one whom his mother comforteth, so I comfort you."

Spiritual exaltation is the mood of the final chorus on the words "The trumpet shall sound."

The baritone is assigned two solos with chorus, and the soprano sings the "As one whom." Mme. Johanna Kristoffy and Lowell Redfield are the artists. The piano score will be played by Mrs. Lowell Redfield and Steindorff's orchestra will play the score.

From Address Examiner San Francisco
Date MAY

FINEST MUSIC IN WORLD TO BE HERE SOON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Recitals at Exposition Will Begin at Festival Hall May 14

BACKED BY AN AMERICAN

Organization Is Known to Music Lovers as Absolutely the Best One in Existence

BY REDFERN MASON

San Francisco will have its first hearing of the greatest orchestra in the world on Friday, May 14. To call the Boston Symphony by that name is no bombast; it is merely the assertion of a truth vouched for by the musical authorities of many countries. Germany has had the leading hand in the formation of the organization. Men like Henschel, Nikisch, Gericke, Fiedler and Muck have helped in its development.

But the work of these men would have been impossible if it had not been for the truly patriotic enthusiasm and generosity of an American banker, Henry Lee Higginson. Mr. Higginson is, of course, a man of wealth; but he is not a money magnate. Indeed, compared with the Astors and the Vanderbilts, the Goulds and the Rockefellers, he is a poor man. But the idea possessed him of enriching Boston with an orchestra which should be the pride of the country. He knew that it would not pay, as a financial venture; indeed, year after year, he has made good the ever-threatening deficit. That was the price he paid for living up to his ideal of an American citizen.

FAME SPREADS ABROAD.

The fame of the orchestra spread abroad. Ysaye said he would rather play with it than with any other orchestra in the world. Kriesler and Paderewski accounted it a privilege to be heard with it. The untried virtuoso faced the phalanx of Bostonians with a nervousness he could not always disguise. To win their plaudits at a rehearsal was a thing to be proud of; to be received by them with coldness was a sign of grave augury.

By degrees the various instrumental choirs were built up to as near perfection as can be hoped for in anything human. The process was one of experiment and elimination.

When a good French horn player was found, be it in Paris, or Dresden, or Buda Pesth he was brought across the ocean. The best men of the orchestral world were sought out.

EACH MEMBER SOLOIST.

The result is that to-day the Boston Symphony is an orchestra every member of which is an eminent soloist on the instrument which he plays. The men do no outside work: they play solely with the Boston Symphony; they rehearse daily: they are sure of a good living as long as they remain in the orchestra, and they are pensioned when they become too old for active service.

Here is no contamination of the cabaret, no fear lest the orchestra should suspend operations, no dread of dismissal if increasing years should bring with it loss of facility.

To look through the list of leaders is an inspiration. The concert-master, Witek, is a soloist of the first rank; Walther Habenicht, who heads the second violins, was concert-master of the Kiel Philharmonic; the solo viola is Emil Ferir; Heinrich Warnke leads the 'cellists. Georges Longy, the solo oboe, established the lub of reed players which is one of Boston's most delightful musical institutions. The first flutist is Andre Maquarre; Albert San has preminence among the clarinettists, nd so on.

S COSMOPOLITAN BODY.

A more cosmopolitan body than he Boston Symphony does not exist n the ranks of music. The Germans ead the list in point of numbers ith forty-five players; America omes second with fifteen; the Ausrians number eleven; there are six Iollanders, five Frenchmen, four Belgians, three Russians, three Bohemians, three Italians, two Englishen, one Pole and one Croatian. Dr. Iuck, the director, is a Bavarian.

The making of the programmes for e twelve concerts in Festival Hall as been a labor of love. All the eat schools of music, from Bach awards, are represented. The great iennese composers are largely, but ot excessively, drawn upon; modern rance and Italy are given their due; merica is represented by Chadwick d MacDowell; there will be Ruan and Italian programmes.

In a word, the series of concerts ill be an illustrative exposition of e art of music as it has grown and versified during the last two cen-

---

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 2 1915

SOCIETY is busily planning to hear as many concerts while the Boston Symphony orchestra is playing at Festival Hall as possible. There was a veritable rush to procure season boxes and seats as soon as they were placed on sale. During the twelve days the orchestra will be here much entertaining will be done in connection with the concerts. There will be luncheon parties before the matinee and tea at the Exposition afterward. There will be dinners before the night concerts and the usual number of summer parties later.

No musical society event of recent years has excited the interest that the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has occasioned. The series of twelve concerts, the first of which will take place Friday evening, May 14, will bring out a succession of brilliant audiences. The list of season subscribers is full of notable names

---

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date 1915

MANY TO HEAR RECITAL SERIES

The sale of seats for single concerts for the engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began this morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, with a demand that kept the ticket sellers rushed to their utmost capacity. No musical event of recent years has excited the interest that has been occasioned by the coming of this famous organization to Festival Hall. The series of twelve concerts, four of which are scheduled for the afternoons, will begin Friday evening, May 14, and the organization, which includes 108 people, will come direct from Boston in a special train.

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 4 1915

RUSH FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Big Sale of Season Tickets for Boston Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall opened yesterday morning, and until closing time at the exposition box office, 343 Powell street, it was necessary to run two separate windows to accomodate purchasers.

Two clerks were kept busy all day filling mail orders, and it is predicted that the engagement of this famous organization will be the biggest event in the musical history of California.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 4 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRAISED BY WIRE

Charles S. Fee heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home town Saturday and sent W. H. Leahy, who will manage the organization during the coming series of concerts at Festival Hall, the following wire:

"It was my privilege tonight to attend the farewell concert for the season of the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, prior to its departure for San Francisco. It was a marvelous performance, enjoyed by an enthusiastic audience of more than 4000 people."

The sale of seats for single concerts, the first of which takes place Friday evening of next week, commenced yesterday morning at 343 Powell street.

[16]

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 6 1915

FAMOUS ARTISTS IN BIG ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Organization Is Coming With Musicians of World Fame.

Five world-famous artists who have helped make the Boston Symphony Orchestra the most famous organzation of its kind will be with the orchestra when it opens its series of twelve concerts in Festival Hall at the exposition, May 14th. They are Anton Witek, concert master; Walther Habernicht, leader of the second violins; Alfred Holy, harpist; Otto Urack, assistant conductor, and Andre Maquerre, first flute. Witek and Holy are Bohemians, Urack and Habernicht German and Maquerre French. All were famous virtuosi before they came to America, and each has increased his fame since.

Witek was for many years concert master of the celebrated Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin and Habernicht was formerly concert master of the Symphony Orchestra at Kiel. Urack, who is one of the principal cellists of the orchestra in addition to being assistant conductor, is a composer of great promise. He was called upon to lead the Boston Symphony during his first season with the organization, in 1912-1913. Alfred Holy is the successor to Heinrich Schuebecker, who was for years harpist with the orchestra. He came from Vienna, where he had been the first harpist with the Philharmonic Orchestra and of the Royal Opera. Andre Maquerre, the flutist, has won several prizes in the Paris Conservatory and has been with the Boston Symphony since 1898. In addition to his solo and concert work, he is one of the leaders of the "pop" concerts.

The engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be the most notable musical event of the exposition season. Mail orders are pouring in for seats, and yesterday there was a line at the Powell-street headquarters waiting to secure seats.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 5 1915

Praise for Boston Symphony Orchestra

Charles S. Fee Tells of Wonderful Musical Organization to Be Heard at Exposition.

W. H. Leahy has received a wire from Charles S. Fee, Southern Pacific official, praising the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to appear shortly in Festival Hall at the exposition. Fee's telegram follows:

> It was my privilege this evening to attend the farewell concert for the season of the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra prior to their departure for San Francisco. It was a marvelous performance and enjoyed by an enthusiastic audience of over 4000 persons. The music loving people of San Francisco and California, than whom none are more appreciative, have a great treat in store, and I am sure that they will be given an enthusiastic reception.

The sale of seats for single concerts, the first of which takes place Friday evening of next week, is being conducted at 343 Powell street. So great has been the demand that it has been found necessary to run two ticket windows, and Impresario Leahy feels confident that the season of this great organization will be the most important musical event in the history of California.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 7 1915

NOTED ARTISTS TO PLAY HERE

Wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra—which will give a series of twelve concerts at Festival Hall beginning May 14—goes, it is preceded by the fame of its wood-wind sect , which from all accounts is une led by that of any orchestra in th world. The wood-wind section comp s the oboes, the flutes, the clar ts and the bassoons, and in the Boston Symphony Orchestra there are four each of these instruments.

The leader of the wood-wind section is always the first oboe, and in Georges Longy, who for sixteen years has held this position, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has one of the most remarkable players in the world.

The second oboe is Clement Lenom, a first-prize graduate of the Paris Conservatoire; and the fourth oboe, who also plays the English horn, is Friedrich Mueller.

The flutes are on a par with the oboes. The leader of the flutes is Andre Maquarre, one of the conductors of the "Pop" concerts which the Boston Symphony gives in the spring, and also one of the most distinguished graduates of the Paris Conservatoire. The second flute is Arthur Brooke, an Englishman; the third flute is Albert Chevrot, and the fourth flute and piccolo is Arthur Bettles, an American and a pupil of Maquarre.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 7 1915
Established:

Albert Sand, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SPARES NO PAINS

That nothing is left undone to get the finest results from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a series of twelve concerts at Festival Hall beginning May 14, is illustrated by an incident which happened a number of years ago. Mr. Gericke was then conductor of the orchestra, and he got an idea that if the entire string choir had instruments of the same make he would secure a homogeneity of tone such as he had never been able to obtain before. The suggestion had only to be made and Mr. Higginson ordered from a certain celebrated firm of violin makers in Vienna thirty violins, ten violas, ten cellos and eight double basses.

The cost was enormous and Mr. Gericke's experiment was a complete failure. Many of these instruments are stored away in the loft of Symphony Hall, Boston, covered with dust, and some have been sold to other orchestras, but the money invested in them was practically lost.

It is, however, experiments like this which have made the Boston Symphony what it is—the most expensive in the world. If there is a new instrument of popular make from which better results are expected, that instrument is bought immediately. The storeroom in Symphony Hall is cluttered up with brass instruments and newfangled wood-wind instruments and strange tympani which have been purchased and on trial found wanting. No expense has ever been spared, and it is felt that if one experiment out of a dozen is successful the expense involved in the failures is more than justified.

And it is the same with musicians.

A conductor of the orchestra may know of a particularly fine artist in Europe. He informs the management that he wants him, and more often than not the contract is made by cable. All this costs money, but results justify it.

One of the many noted players with this famous organization is Albert Sand, the clarinet soloist, who ranks among the world's foremost artists on his chosen instrument.

The public is taking a tremendous interest in the engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the corps of ticket sellers at 343 Powell street is kept busy every day from 9 in the morning till 10 at night. Mail orders, accompanied by check, addressed to W. H. Leahy, will receive prompt attention.

From Examiner
Address San Francisco. Cal
Date MAY - 2 1915

FINEST MUSIC IN WORLD TO BE HERE SOON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Recitals at Exposition Will Begin at Festival Hall May 14

BACKED BY AN AMERICAN

Organization Is Known to Music Lovers as Absolutely the Best One in Existence

BY REDFERN MASON

San Francisco will have its first hearing of the greatest orchestra in the world on Friday, May 14. To call the Boston Symphony by that name is no bombast; it is merely the assertion of a truth vouched for by the musical authorities of many countries. Germany has had the leading hand in the formation of the organization. Men like Henschel, Nikisch, Gericke, Fiedler and Muck have helped in its development.

But the work of these men would have been impossible if it had not been for the truly patriotic enthusiasm and generosity of an American banker, Henry Lee Higginson. Mr. Higginson is, of course, a man of wealth; but he is not a money magnate. Indeed, compared with the Astors and the Vanderbilts, the Goulds and the Rockefellers, he is a poor man. But the idea possessed him of enriching Boston with an orchestra which should be the pride of the country. He knew that it would not pay, as a financial venture; indeed, year after year, he has made good the ever-threatening deficit. That was the price he paid for living up to his ideal of an American citizen.

FAME SPREADS ABROAD.

The fame of the orchestra spread abroad. Ysaye said he would rather play with it than with any other orchestra in the world. Kriesler and Paderewski accounted it a privilege to be heard with it. The untried virtuoso faced the phalanx of Bostonians with a nervousness he could not always disguise. To win their plaudits at a rehearsal was a thing to be proud of; to be received by them with coldness was a sign of grave augury.

By degrees the various instrumental choirs were built up to as near perfection as can be hoped for in anything human. The process was one of experiment and elimination.

When a good French horn player was found, be it in Paris, or Dresden, or Buda Pesth he was brought across the ocean. The best men of the orchestral world were sought out.

EACH MEMBER SOLOIST.

The result is that to-day the Boston Symphony is an orchestra every member of which is an eminent soloist on the instrument which he plays. The men do no outside work; they play solely with the Boston Symphony; they rehearse daily; they are sure of a good living as long as they remain in the orchestra, and they are pensioned when they become too old for active service.

Here is no contamination of the cabaret, no fear lest the orchestra should suspend operations, no dread of dismissal if increasing years should bring with it loss of facility.

To look through the list of leaders is an inspiration. The concert-master, Witek, is a soloist of the first rank; Walther Habenicht, who heads the second violins, was concert-master of the Kiel Philharmonic; the solo viola is Emil Ferir; Heinrich Warnke leads the 'cellists. Georges Longy, the solo oboe, established the club of reed players which is one of Boston's most delightful musical institutions. The first flutist is Andre Maquarre; Albert San has preminence among the clarinettists, and so on.

S COSMOPOLITAN BODY.

A more cosmopolitan body than he Boston Symphony does not exist n the ranks of music. The Germans ead the list in point of numbers with forty-five players; America omes second with fifteen; the Ausrians number eleven; there are six Hollanders, five Frenchmen, four Belgians, three Russians, three Bohemians, three Italians, two Englishmen, one Pole and one Croatian. Dr. Muck, the director, is a Bavarian.

The making of the programmes for e twelve concerts in Festival Hall as been a labor of love. All the eat schools of music, from Bach wards, are represented. The great iennese composers are largely, but ot excessively, drawn upon; modern rance and Italy are given their due; merica is represented by Chadwick d MacDowell; there will be Rusan and Italian programmes.

In a word, the series of concerts ll be an illustrative exposition of e art of music as it has grown and versified during the last two cen-

---

Examiner
San Francisco, Cal.
MAY - 2 1915

OCIETY is busily planning to hear as many concerts while the Bosn Symphony orchestra is playing Festival Hall as possible. There as a veritable rush to procure sean boxes and seats as soon as they ere placed on sale. During the elve days the orchestra will be re much entertaining will be done in connection with the concerts. There will be luncheon parties before the matinee and tea at the Exposition afterward. There will be dinners before the night concerts and the usual number of summer parties later.

musical society event of recent years has excited the interest that the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has occasioned. The series of twelve concerts, the first of which will take place Friday evening, May 14, will bring out a succession of brilliant audiences. The list of season subscribers is full of notable names

---

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date 3 1915

MANY TO HEAR RECITAL SERIES

The sale of seats for single concerts for the engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began this morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street, with a demand that kept the ticket sellers rushed to their utmost capacity. No musical event of recent years has excited the interest that has been occasioned by the coming of this famous organization to Festival Hall. The series of twelve concerts, four of which are scheduled for the afternoons, will begin Friday evening, May 14, and the organization, which includes 108 people, will come direct from Boston in a special train.

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 4 1915

RUSH FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Big Sale of Season Tickets for Boston Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall opened yesterday morning, and until closing time at the exposition box office, 343 Powell street, it was necessary to run two separate windows to accomodate purchasers.

Two clerks were kept busy all day filling mail orders, and it is predicted that the engagement of this famous organization will be the biggest event in the musical history of California.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 4 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRAISED BY WIRE

Charles S. Fee heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home town Saturday and sent W. H. Leahy, who will manage the organization during the coming series of concerts at Festival Hall, the following wire:

"It was my privilege tonight to attend the farewell concert for the season of the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, prior to its departure for San Francisco. It was a marvelous performance, enjoyed by an enthusiastic audience of more than 4000 people."

The sale of seats for single concerts, the first of which takes place Friday evening of next week, commenced yesterday morning at 343 Powell street.

[167

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 6 1915

FAMOUS ARTISTS IN BIG ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Organization Is Coming With Musicians of World Fame.

Five world-famous artists who have helped make the Boston Symphony Orchestra the most famous organzation of its kind will be with the orchestra when it opens its series of twelve concerts in Festival Hall at the exposition, May 14th. They are Anton Witek, concert master; Walther Habernicht, leader of the second violins; Alfred Holy, harpist; Otto Urack, assistant conductor, and Andre Maquerre, first flute. Witek and Holy are Bohemians, Urack and Habernicht German and Maquerre French. All were famous virtuosi before they came to America, and each has increased his fame since.

Witek was for many years concert master of the celebrated Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin and Habernicht was formerly concert master of the Symphony Orchestra at Kiel. Urack, who is one of the principal cellists of the orchestra in addition to being assistant conductor, is a composer of great promise. He was called upon to lead the Boston Symphony during his first season with the organization, in 1912-1913. Alfred Holy is the successor to Heinrich Schuebecker, who was for years harpist with the orchestra. He came from Vienna, where he had been the first harpist with the Philharmonic Orchestra and of the Royal Opera. Andre Maquerre, the flutist, has won several prizes in the Paris Conservatory and has been with the Boston Symphony since 1898. In addition to his solo and concert work, he is one of the leaders of the "pop" concerts.

The engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be the most notable musical event of the exposition season. Mail orders are pouring in for seats, and yesterday there was a line at the Powell-street headquarters waiting to secure seats.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 5 1915

Praise for Boston Symphony Orchestra

Charles S. Fee Tells of Wonderful Musical Organization to Be Heard at Exposition.

W. H. Leahy has received a wire from Charles S. Fee, Southern Pacific official, praising the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to appear shortly in Festival Hall at the exposition. Fee's telegram follows:

> It was my privilege this evening to attend the farewell concert for the season of the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra prior to their departure for San Francisco. It was a marvelous performance and enjoyed by an enthusiastic audience of over 4000 persons. The music loving people of San Francisco and California, than whom none are more appreciative, have a great treat in store, and I am sure that they will be given an enthusiastic reception.

The sale of seats for single concerts, the first of which takes place Friday evening of next week, is being conducted at 343 Powell street. So great has been the demand that it has been found necessary to run two ticket windows, and Impresario Leahy feels confident that the season of this great organization will be the most important musical event in the history of California.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 7 1915

NOTED ARTISTS TO PLAY HERE

Wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra—which will give a series of twelve concerts at Festival Hall beginning May 14—goes, it is preceded by the fame of its wood-wind sect , which from all accounts is un- led by that of any orchestra in th world. The wood-wind section com es the oboes, the flutes, the clar ts and the bassoons, and in the Boston Symphony Orchestra there are four each of these instruments.

The leader of the wood-wind section is always the first oboe, and in

---

Georges Longy, who for sixteen years has held this position, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has one of the most remarkable players in the world.

The second oboe is Clement Lenom, a first-prize graduate of the Paris Conservatoire; and the fourth oboe, who also plays the English horn, is Friedrich Mueller.

The flutes are on a par with the oboes. The leader of the flutes is Andre Maquarre, one of the conductors of the "Pop" concerts which the Boston Symphony gives in the spring, and also one of the most distinguished graduates of the Paris Conservatoire. The second flute is Arthur Brooke, an Englishman; the third flute is Albert Chevrot, and the fourth flute and piccolo is Arthur Bettles, an American and a pupil of Maquarre.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 7 1915
Established:

Albert Sand, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SPARES NO PAINS

That nothing is left undone to get the finest results from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a series of twelve concerts at Festival Hall beginning May 14, is illustrated by an incident which happened a number of years ago. Mr. Gericke was then conductor of the orchestra, and he got an idea that if the entire string choir had instruments of the same make he would secure a homogeneity of tone such as he had never been able to obtain before. The suggestion had only to be made and Mr. Higginson ordered from a certain celebrated firm of violin makers in Vienna thirty violins, ten violas, ten cellos and eight double basses.

The cost was enormous and Mr. Gericke's experiment was a complete failure. Many of these instruments are stored away in the loft of Symphony Hall, Boston, covered with dust, and some have been sold to other orchestras, but the money invested in them was practically lost.

It is, however, experiments like this which have made the Boston Symphony what it is—the most expensive in the world. If there is a new instrument of popular make from which better results are expected, that instrument is bought immediately. The storeroom in Symphony Hall is cluttered up with brass instruments and newfangled wood-wind instruments and strange tympani which have been purchased and on trial found wanting. No expense has ever been spared, and it is felt that if one experiment out of a dozen is successful the expense involved in the failures is more than justified.

And it is the same with musicians.

A conductor of the orchestra may know of a particularly fine artist in Europe. He informs the management that he wants him, and more often than not the contract is made by cable. All this costs money, but results justify it.

One of the many noted players with this famous organization is Albert Sand, the clarinet soloist, who ranks among the world's foremost artists on his chosen instrument.

The public is taking a tremendous interest in the engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the corps of ticket sellers at 343 Powell street is kept busy every day from 9 in the morning till 10 at night. Mail orders, accompanied by check, addressed to W. H. Leahy, will receive prompt attention.

From Herald
Address New York
Date [illegible]

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra."

In the introduction to his book on "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Houghton-Mifflin Company), Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe frankly states that his work is not that of a musical critic, but of an editor. Perhaps that is the reason why the general reader will find it so interesting, for, while musical criticism has its enthusiastic readers among professional people, it is often sadly wearisome to the amateur. Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, to whom America owes what Mr. Emil Paur has described as the best orchestra in the world, spent four years as a young man in Europe, devoting most of his time to the study of music in Vienna. Returning to America in 1860, he fought in the Civil War and at its close went into business. The time came when he could afford to retire and lead a life of comparative leisure, but he chose to continue work and realize the dream of his life, the establishment of an orchestra. The statement of Mr. Higginson, which appeared under the heading "In Re the Boston Symphony Orchestra," written while plans for the enterprise were still in process of formation, is extremely interesting now, as showing how many of its promises have been fulfilled. The first concert was given on October 22, 1881, under the leadership of Mr. (now Sir) Georg Henschel, and the programme contained numbers by Beethoven, Gluck, Haydn and other classical writers, with Miss Annie Louise Cary as soloist. From the first the Symphony concerts have been the fashion in Boston, a fact which has not interfered with their merit, but has given food to the grumblers. Beginning with seventy performers, the orchestra now consists of a hundred, and it has had six leaders, Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler and Muck, of whom Gericke and Muck have served twice. There have been more than four hundred and fifty soloist, some of the more popular, like Mme. Schumann-Heink and Adamowski, having appeared many times. There is an interesting account of the opening, in 1900, of the new Symphony Hall in Boston, when, on the appearance of Mr. Higginson on the platform, the entire audience rose to its feet. The author has many amusing anecdotes to relate of the vagaries of musical taste some fifty years ago, but one can hardly imagine a duet upon themes from "Maritana," arranged for mouth harmonica and the great organ, a performance described by Mr. W. F. Apthorpe, the musical critic, as "an adventurous combination." It is also a surprise to read Mr. Higginson's opinion of Wagner's music. He may have changed in later years, but in 1883 he considered it noisy and far too strong in its appeal to the senses. There is an interesting appendix containing the names of all the men who have played in the orchestra, the répertoire and other matters connected with the organization.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 8 1915

Boston Symphony

Next Friday evening will witness the first of a series of twelve concerts to be given at Festival Hall by the world famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it is safe to say that the magnificent and spacious auditorium, in which a balcony seating nearly 1000 people has just been completed, will house an audience worthy of the occasion when Dr. Muck raises his baton over the hundred artists of the organization.

Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is neither in appearance nor character according to the time honored tradition of a celebrated musician. When meeting him casually one would take him for anything but a musician, and the first guess might be that he was a military officer. His face, deeply marked with scars of student duels, is one which is not easily forgotten. Large, keen eyes and eaglelike nose and a small, thin lipped mouth above jaws which show any amount of determination, his face is certainly an index of his unusual personality.

A bit of a dandy in dress, his clothes always betray the fact that he has a most excellent tailor. He always gives the impression of enormous force under absolute control, and in this case the impression is correct. Muck is decidedly a man of the world, although society, as such, has few charms for him. His title of doctor was won after three years' hard work in the universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic, and he is the holder of the German degree of doctor juris. In his career in Europe he has been drawn into court circles and is a close friend of the German emperor. As general musical director of the royal theaters of Prussia he is a member of the imperial court.

His interests are by no means confined to music, although in his art he is an indefatigable worker. He takes a keen interest in current events and is thoroughly posted in literature and art.

Although he is really a most kindly, thoughtful and considerate man, there is a certain Satanic aspect about him which often misleads those who do not know him well. In his hours of ease he is a most delightful companion, but when there is work to be done he demands the utmost effort on the part of those under him, as he himself always gives the best. He is a stern disciplinarian, an untiring drillmaster, and Felix Weingartner, the great German conductor, said in Boston last winter that Muck was absolutely the most conscientious man he had ever known. He leaves nothing to chance when it comes to musical performances, but everything is worked out absolutely in rehearsal as it must go in concert.

---

There will be four afternoon performances during the series, on Saturdays and Sundays, and seats for all concerts may be obtained at 343 Powell street, where mail orders, addressed to W. H. Leahy, and accompanied by check, will receive prompt attention.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Wins Conservatory Prize.

BOSTON, May 7.—The prize of a grand piano, which is annually offered by the Mason & Hamlin Company to the most proficient senior or graduate student of the New England Conservatory of Music, was won in competition Monday afternoon by Howard M. Goding, of East Dedham, Mass. There were seven contestants, each of whom played the same programme before a trio of judges consisting of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ernest Schelling, and Wallace Goodrich, dean of the Conservatory faculty.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 8 1915

THE first of a series of twelve concerts in Festival Hall by the world-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Friday evening, and, from sale indications, the magnificent and spacious auditorium, in which a balcony seating nearly 1000 people has just been completed, will house an audience worthy of the occasion when Dr. Muck raises his baton over the hundred artists of the organization.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does not in appearance bear any resemblance to the celebrated musician of tradition. At first guess one might call him a military officer. His face, deeply marked with the scars of student duels, is one not easily forgotten. He has large, keen eyes, an eagle-like nose, a small, thin-lipped mouth, and jaws betokening great determination.

A bit of a dandy in dress, his clothes are evidence that he has a most excellent tailor. He gives the impression of enormous force under absolute control, and in this case the impression is correct. Muck is decidedly a man of the world, although society, as such, has few charms for him. His title of doctor was won after three years hard work in the Universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic, and he is the holder of the German degree of Doctor Juris. In his career in Europe he has been drawn into court circles, and is a close friend of the German Emperor. As General Music Director of the Royal Theaters of Prussia, he is a member of the Imperial Court.

Although he is really a most kindly, thoughtful and considerate man, there is a certain Satanic aspect about him which often misleads those who do not know him well. In his hours of ease he is a most delightful companion, but when there is work to be done he demands the utmost effort on the part of those under him, as he himself always gives the best. He is a stern disciplinarian, an untiring drill-master. Felix Weingartner, the great German conductor, said in Boston last winter that Muck was absolutely the most conscientious man he had ever known. He leaves nothing to chance when it comes to musical performances, but everything is worked out absolutely in rehearsal as it must go in concert.

There will be four afternoon performances during the series, on Saturdays and Sundays, and seats for all concerts may be obtained at 343 Powell street, where mail orders, addressed to W. H. Leahy and accompanied by check will receive prompt attention.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 9 1915

Local Music Notes

The American Federation of Musicians will meet at Old Faithful Inn, on Thursday and on that occasion Max Bendix, leader of the exposition orchestra, will give a special programme in consideration of the musicianly audience. Also present will be many members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will commence its series of twelve concerts on the following evening, May 14th.

* * * *

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal
Date MAY 1 0 19

BOSTON TO S. F. SYMPHONY TRIP

Orchestra Will Cross Continent Twice to Give Concerts at Fair.

A special train left Boston yesterday afternoon carrying the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the managerial staff, a total of 108 persons, and will arrive in this city Thursday morning, giving a rest of one day prior to the series of twelve concerts to be given in Festival Hall at the Exposition.

The organization will again take the train at midnight after the last concert, arriving in Boston in time for a special concert on Decoration Day, the whole trip constituting one of the most remarkable known in musical history.

The sale of seats, now progressing at 343 Powell street, is large. San Franciscans and Cailfornians generally are quick to take advantage of the wonderful treat. Notwithstanding the immense amount of railroading necessary, the prices charged are less than in Eastern cities, where seats always range from $1 to $3, while here the charges are from 75 cents to $2.50. In Eastern cities in addition there is always an auction sale for subscription seats, and the premiums obtained are large. In San Francisco the subscription price was remarkably reasonable.

This reduction in prices has been made possible by the tremendous seating capacity of Festival Hall which, with the new and commodious balcony, will comfortably hold 4,000 persons.

CALL
San Francisco, Cal.
MAY 1 0 1915

11

Boston Symphony On Way to Play Here

Following the announcement of its program for twelve classical concerts in Festival Hall, the Boston Symphony odchestra is on its way from the East today. The great musical ensemble, consisting of 108 persons, is due to arrive Thursday. The first concert will be given Friday. Festival Hall has been fitted up to accommodate 4000 persons.

MAJOR PRAISES AEROSCOPE

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 0 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY STARTS FOR COAST

Great Orchestra Is Speeding West on Special Train for Series of Concerts.

A special train left Boston yesterday afternoon at 2:05, carrying the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its managerial staff, a total of 108 persons, and will arrive in this city Thursday morning, giving the musicians a rest of one day prior to the series of twelve concerts to be given at Festival Hall at the exposition.

The organization will again take its train at midnight after the last concert, arriving in Boston in time for a programme on Decoration day, the whole trip constituting one of the most remarkable known in musical history.

The sale of seats, now progressing at 343 Powell street, is very large, and shows that San Franciscans and Californians are quick to take advantage of the wonderful treat. Notwithstanding the immense amount of travel necessary for the engagement, the prices charged are less than in Eastern cities. In San Francisco the subscription price was remarkably reasonable.

This reduction in prices has been made possible by the tremendous seating capacity of Festival Hall, which, with the new and commodious balcony, will comfortably hold 4000 people. Mail orders are pouring in from all over the country.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 1 1915

Society Interested In Symphony Season

Society is taking the keenest interest in the series of twelve concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Festival Hall, beginning Friday evening, and it is safe to say that when Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor of the world famous organization, raises his baton over the 100 artists for the first time in this city he will be greeted by an audience like that which assembles on the first night of a real grand opera season.

The concerts will begin at 8:30 o'clock in the evenings and at 2:30 in the afternoons, and seats are on sale at 343 Powell street, where mail orders enclosing check addressed to W. H. Leahy receive prompt attention.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 1 1915

New Exposition Gate for Symphony Concerts

Special Provisions to Be Made for Autos During Boston Orchestra Engagement.

The series of twelve concerts to be given at Festival Hall at the exposition by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starting next Friday night, has created keen interest.

It is announced that for the benefit of those attending the concerts in automobiles a special entrance to the exposition will be afforded at a point on Chestnut street, directly opposite Festival Hall and near the foot of Pierce street.

The concerts will begin at 8:30 o'clock in the evenings and 2:30 in the afternoons.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION HAS

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 2 1915

Boston Orchestra Is Coming West on Time

Symphony Musicians Will Arrive Tomorrow Morning and Give First Concert Friday Night.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wired W. H. Leahy, the local impresario, yesterday that the special train carrying Dr. Karl Muck and his hundred artists was traveling on schedule time, and left Omaha at 8:05 in the morning. At 9:50 tomorrow morning the train is expected at the Oakland mole, allowing the musicians one day of rest before beginning their series of concerts at the exposition.

Festival Hall, where the first of the twelve concerts will be given Friday evening, has a new balcony fronted by a horseshoe of boxes. The hall will [illegible] a seating capacity of [illegible]

Reservations may be made at the exposition box office, 343 Powell st.

Piedmont Librarian

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 2 1915

Boston Symphony Is Due Here Tomorrow

Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his 100 musicians, are due on their special train at the Oakland mole tomorrow forenoon at 9:50 o'clock, allowing them one day of rest before beginning the series of concerts in Festival Hall Friday night. The hall has been reconstructed inside and will have a seating capacity of 4000.

ANTON WITEK is concert master and Walther Habenicht leader of the second violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Elizabeth Latham is a San Francisco girl, who is making a name for herself in New York in concert work, and will return home in June to give a song recital.

Anton Wit
Walther Habenicht

THE PROGRAMME

Beethoven and Brahms to followed by Mendelssohn a Dowell tomorrow afternoon, programme on Sunday after ploiting Caesar Franck and I modern methods, as placed a classic programme, chaste w music of the three Bs—Bach, ven and Brahms—and these c ers balance or contrast with T night's programme of Wag wonders. And so on through ders. And so on through the

The appetite is likely to be wh by what it feeds upon.

Dr. Muck admits a preferenc the classics, although he is, a said, "one of the old set," figl the battles of Liszt, Wagner and Strauss. But the Strauss of later days makes Dr. Muck turn a quizzical look to heaven and causes him to say, "Such composition is anti-music. Still, I play them all."

AMERICAN COMPOSERS.

As for American composition, Dr. Muck says we have already had big composers, and that more are coming. MacDowell, who is biggest in his smaller works, is greatly admired by the former director of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and Chadwick is doing big things, he says, one of which, a suite for orchestra, "ymphonic Sketches," will be played by the Boston symphonists here. Still another American composer, Dr. Clapp, has made a deep appeal to Dr. Muck. Dr. Clapp is a young man, not yet 30, who is at the head of the music department of Dartmouth College, and one of whose symphonic compositions the Boston Symphony Orchestra has but recently offered.

This is the programme which will be played tonight in Festival Hall as the first of the offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Beethoven ....
Symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica"
Brahms ....
Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56a (Chorale Sancti Antoni)
Richard Strauss ....
"Don Juan," Tone Poem (after Lenau), Op. 20.
Weber....Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe"

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 191

Establi

BOSTON ARTISTS DUE TOMORROW

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wired W. H. Leahy, the local impresario, this morning that the special train carrying Dr. Karl Muck and the hundred artists of the world-famed organization was traveling on schedule time, and left Ogden at 10:45, Mountain Time. At 9:50 tomorrow morning the train will pull in to the Oakland Mole, allowing the musicians one day of rest after their long trip across the continent before beginning their series of concerts at the Exposition.

Festival Hall, where the first of the twelve concerts will be given tomorrow evening, has been in the hands of carpenters, electricians and decorators for the past ten days, and in its remodeled state, with a new balcony, fronted by a horse-shoe of boxes, it will have a seating capacity of nearly four thousand. There has been an immense demand for seats for all the concerts, and reservations may be made at the Exposition Box Office, 343 Powell street.

---

om CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date

84

Symphony Orchestra Is to Arrive Today

Special Train Is Bringing Noted Boston Musicians for Series of Concerts at Exposition.

Dr. Karl Muck and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive this morning to fill an engagement at the exposition. They will be met at the Ferry building by Mayor Rolph and exposition officials. The orchestra members have made the trip from Boston on a special train, which has been on schedule time all the way.

W. H. Leahy, local representative, received a wire yesterday from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, that all the members are in the best of spirits and looking forward with a great deal of pleasure to their engagement in Festival Hall, which opens tomorrow night. The sale of seats, progressing at 343 Powell street, is large for the entire season.

CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco
Date M

FINISHED ARTISTS SERVE IN UNIS

Every Man in the Boston Symphony Is a Soloist of Experience and Talent.

Next Friday night will mark a great event in the history of San Francisco's most important music occasions. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at hand, and the extended capacity of Festival Hall will place in the balcony alone 1000 people. The audience will be one worthy of the occasion, both as to quality and quantity, and hundreds will welcome Dr. Karl Muck as he raises his baton over his organization of 100 men for the first time in this city.

This leader has a very striking and forceful personality, though not generally considered to be the traditional type of the musician. His military bearing is impressive and his face bears many scars of student duels. His determination is colossal, and for that reason Dr. Muck is a stern disciplinarian, exacting as indefatigable work from his me as himself gives—and that is Felix Weingartner, the famous man conductor, said of Muck tha is the most conscientious man Weingartner has ever known. He acquired the title of Doctor after three years' hard work in the universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic, and Muck is also holder of the German degree of Doctor Juris.

Ranking next to Dr. Muck is Anton Witek, the concert master and head of the string section. He relieves Muck at the baton at times when the latter is indisposed, and is himself famous in Berlin as a virtuoso, and is one of the really great violinists of the world. Witek, for sixteen years previous to coming to America, was concert master of the famous Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin.

Walther Habenicht is principal of the second violins, this section being as important at this day of musical ment as the first violins, for they must frequently do the same work and alternate scores. Habenicht came to America three years ago to be with the Boston Symphony, though he had never before sat in the second violin section. He had been concert master and principal soloist in the Opera and Symphony Orchestra in Kiel, Germany, and he sits at the second desk of the first violins in the Festival Orchestra at Beyreuth.

The position of second desk with the first violins in this orchestra is occupied by Sylvain Noack, a first-prize graduate of the Conservatory of Amsterdam. He has been with the Boston Symphony six years and in Europe was not only concert master with two symphony orchestras in Holland, but had won a reputation principally as a chamber music artist.

Today's development of orchestrated music makes the wind section be as important as the strings, nevertheless, the tone of the orchestra is still given by the strings, and this section of the Boston Symphony comprises fifty-eight artists, divided into sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, ten violas, ten cellos and eight contrabasses. The sale of single seats will begin tomorrow morning at the exposition box office, 3 Powell street, where Manager H. Leahy is in charge of all estra affairs.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 4 1915

Established: L

Monett for San Francisco.

PEACE HERE WITH HARMONIOUS BAND

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Are Ready for Season.

FIRST CONCERT TONIGHT

Cosmopolitan Organization Is Soothed on Trip by Gentle Art of Pinochle.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

FORTY-NINE Germans, two Englishmen, nine Austrians, four Italians, four Hungarians, three Russians, five Belgians, four Frenchmen, fifteen Americans and four Hollanders arrived intact yesterday morning after having traveled together across the continent. Their cosmopolitan elements were undisturbed, no ethnic difficulties had divided them and they landed here the most harmonious organization in the world today. They had played pinochle most of the time.

It was the Boston Symphony orchestra. Since last Sunday it has been speeding across this great land without a single stop save that which was necessary in Chicago when some train switching was involved.

TWELVE CONCERTS.

Dr. Karl Muck and his wife took up their headquarters at the Fairmont Hotel, and the hundred musicians whise cosmopolitanism is merged by the genius of Director Muck into a homogeneous whole, found places to remain during their historic stay in San Francisco—to stay, that is, except when they are enegaged in playing twelve consecutive concerts on twelve consecutive days in Festival Hall, whither the enterprise of "Doc" William H. Leahy and the acquiescence of the exposition officials have brought them.

Dr. Muck is authority for the statement that not in the musical history of the world has a like pilgrimage been made.

"It has not even been thought of," he said last night. It remained for the exposition metropolis to achieve this unique distinction in addition to the other wonders of your wonderful city."

The noted conductor had just returned from Festival Hall and was full of superlatives.

DR. MUCK SYMPATHIZES.

"What would you advise?" I asked "an alleged critic to do under the circumstances? He must attend twelve concerts on consecutive days—symphony concerts, filled to the brim with the world's greatest overtures. Suppose the alleged critic's chief capacity for criticism rises out of a prodigious appetite for music, how is he to keep that appetite eager before a series of such enormous banquets?"

Dr. Karl Muck smiled. His shrewd face lit up sympathetically, and he answered:

"Well, you must remember it's pretty hard on me, too!"

However, if you have read his programme you must have been struck with the variety thereof and by the fact that no two similar schedules of orchestral offerings are placed close together.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date AY 1 4 1915

Estab 884

GREAT BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play for the first time in San Francisco at Festival Hall tonight at 8:30 o'clock. Dr. Karl Muck and his hundred artists held a rehearsal in the reconstructed auditorium in the Exposition grounds this forenoon and pronounced the acoustics perfect.

For the accommodation of those attending the concerts in automobiles or carriages, special turnstiles have been installed at the Exposition directly opposite the entrance to Festival Hall in Chestnut street at the foot of Pierce. The walk between this entrance and the doors of Festival Hall will be covered with an awning.

On account of the great seating capacity of the new Festival Hall, it has been found possible to provide a block of seats at $2, and the demand for reservations for all of the concerts is very large at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

Tonight's program is as follows:

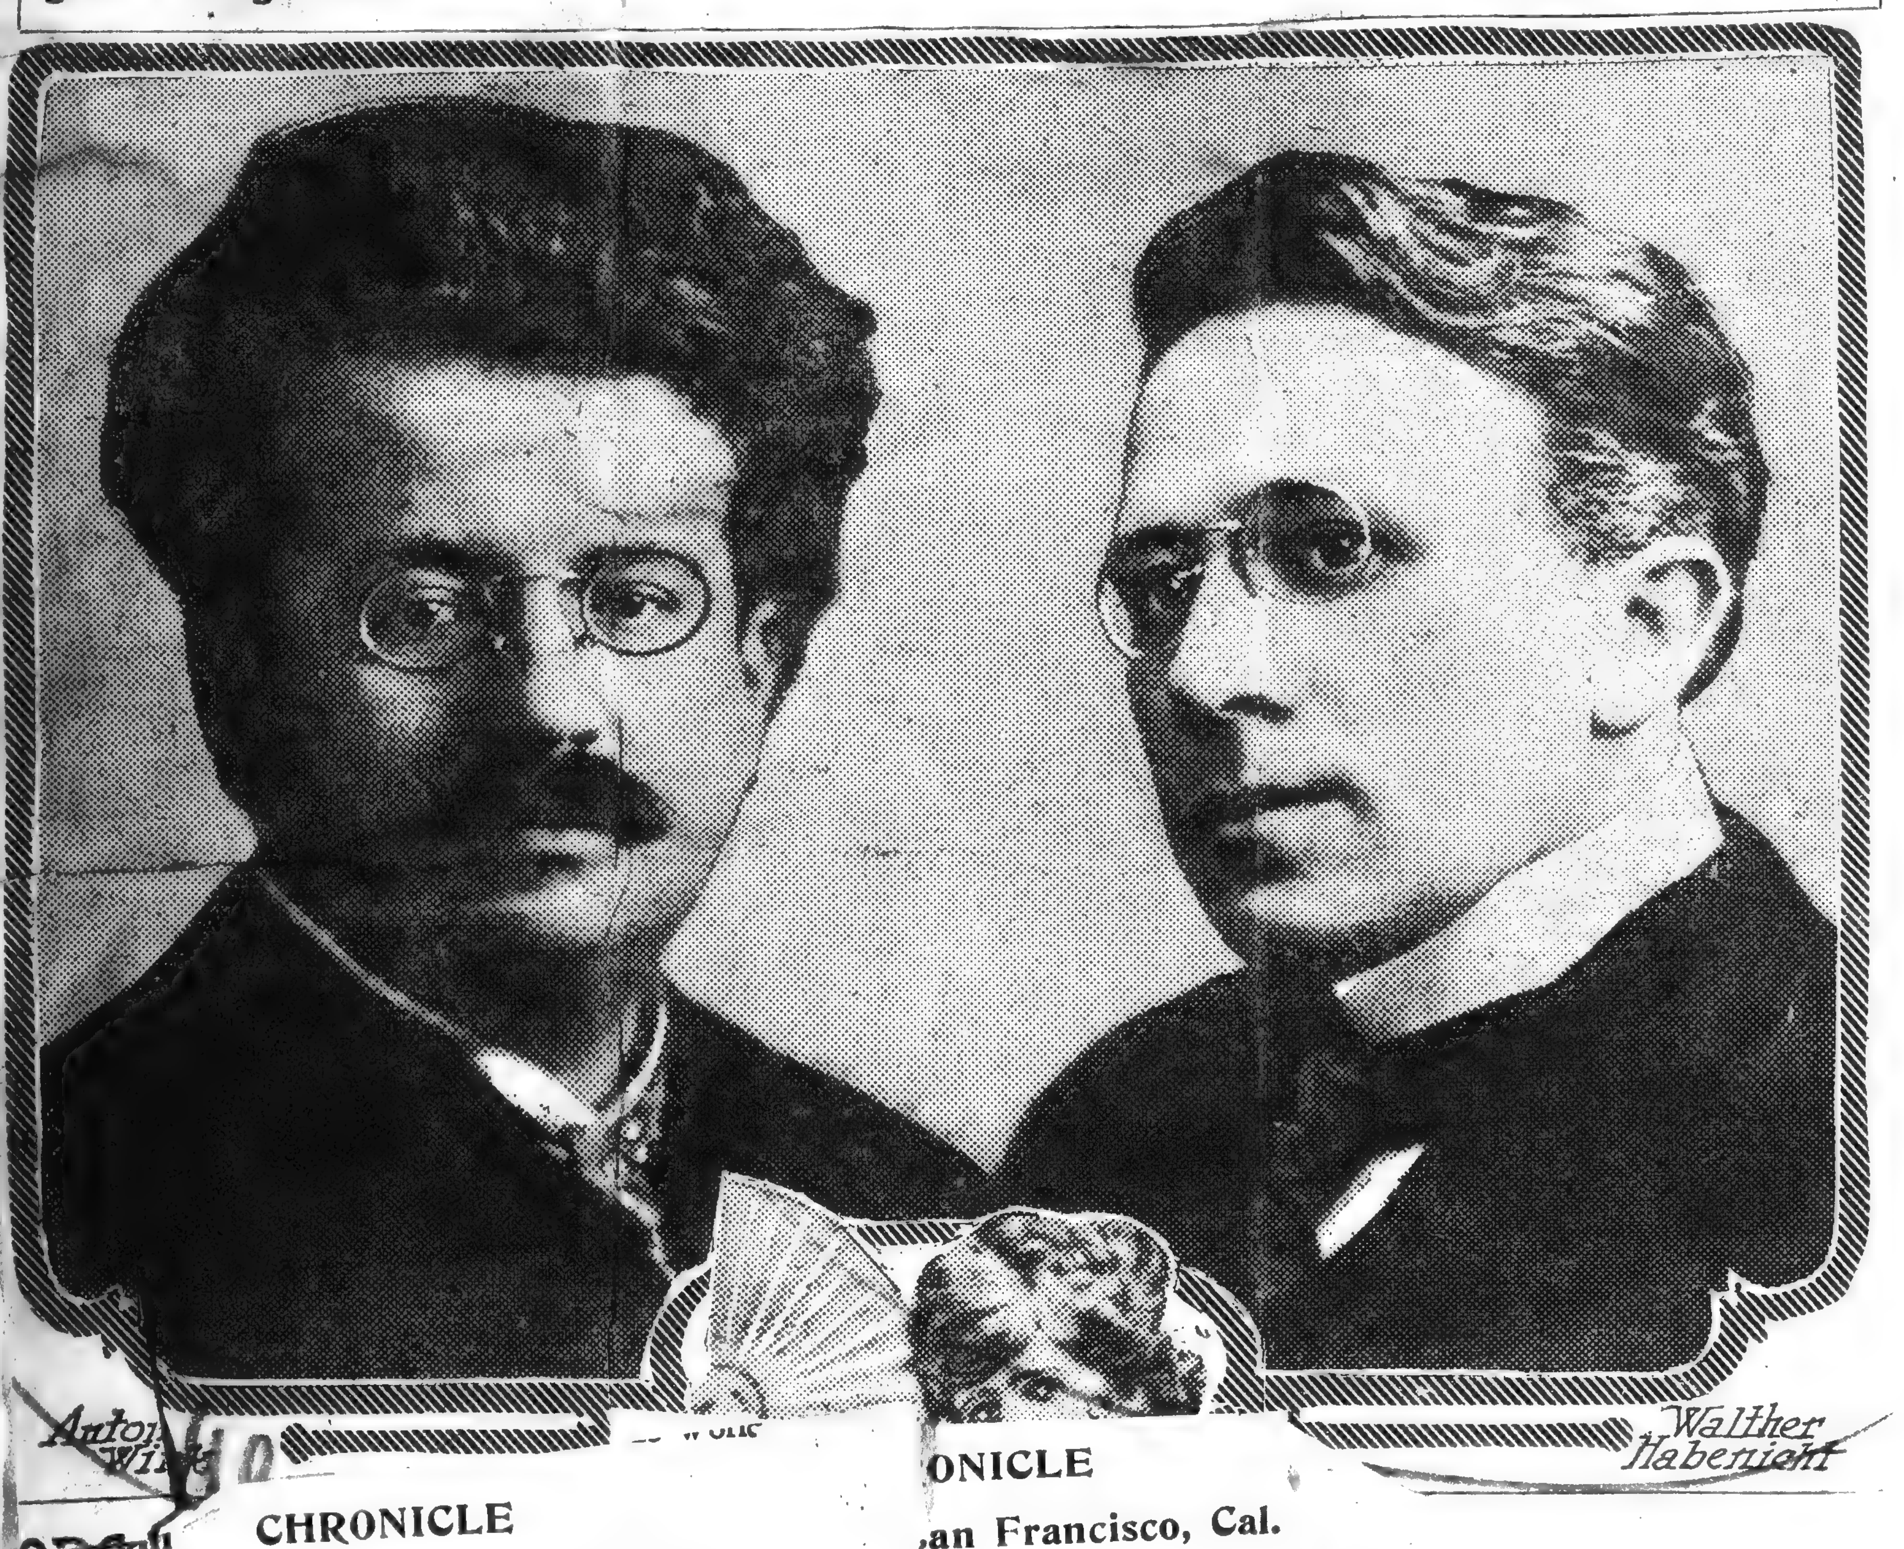
Symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, op. 55, "Eroica" .... Beethoven
1—Allegro con brio. 2—Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. 3—Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio. 4—Finale: Allegro molto.
Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, op 56a (Chorale Sancti Antoni)....Brahms
"Don Juan," tone poem (after Lenau), op. 20 ....Richard Strauss
Overture to the opera, "Euryanthe"....Weber

The second concert of the series will be given tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 o'clock with the following program:

Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage." op. 27.........Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony No. 6 in G major, "Surprise".Haydn
1—Adagio cantabile e vivaco assai. 2—Andante. 3—Menuetto. 4—Allegro di molto.
Suite No. 2 in E minor, "Indian," op. 48 .... MacDowell
1—Legend: Not fast; with much dignity and character; twice as fast; with decision. 2—Love song; not fast; tenderly. 3—In war time; with rough vigor; almost savagely. 4—Dirge: Dirge like, mournfully. 5—Village festival: Swift and light.
"Hungaria," symphonic poem, No. 9....Liszt

"Only One Mother for

ANTON WITEK is concert master and Walther Habenicht leader of the second violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Elizabeth Latham is a San Francisco girl, who is making a name for herself in New York in concert work, and will return home in June to give a song recital.



CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY - 9

FINISHED ARTISTS SERVE IN UNISON

York, 1884

Every Man in the Boston Symphony Is a Soloist of Experience and Talent.

Next Friday night will mark a great event in the history of San Francisco's most important music occasions. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at hand, and the extended capacity of Festival Hall will place in the balcony alone 1000 people. The audience will be one worthy of the occasion, both as to quality and quantity, and hundreds will welcome Dr. Karl Muck as he raises his baton over his organization of 100 men for the first time in this city.

This leader has a very striking and forceful personality, though not generally considered to be the traditional type of the musician. His military bearing is impressive and his face bears many scars of student duels. His determination is colossal, and for that reason Dr. Muck is a stern disciplinarian, exacting as indefatigable work from his men as himself gives—and that is [illegible] Felix Weingartner, the famous [illegible] man conductor, said of Muck that [illegible] is the most conscientious man Weingartner has ever known. He acquired the title of Doctor after three years' hard work in the universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic, and Muck is also holder of the German degree of Doctor Juris.

Ranking next to Dr. Muck is Anton Witek, the concert master and head of the string section. He relieves Muck at the baton at times when the latter is indisposed, and is himself famous in Berlin as a virtuoso, and is one of the really great violinists of the world. Witek, for sixteen years previous to coming to America, was concert master of the famous Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin.

Walther Habenicht is principal of the second violins, this section being as important at this day of musical [illegible]ment as the first violins, for they must frequently do the same work and alternate scores. Habenicht came to America three years ago to be with the Boston Symphony, though he had never before sat in the second violin section. He had been concert master and principal soloist in the Opera and Symphony Orchestra in Kiel, Germany, and he sits at the second desk of the first violins in the Festival Orchestra at Beyreuth.

The position of second desk with the first violins in this orchestra is occupied by Sylvain Noack, a first-prize graduate of the Conservatory of Amsterdam. He has been with the Boston Symphony six years and in Europe was not only concert master with two symphony orchestras in Holland, but had won a reputation principally as a chamber music artist.

Today's development of orchestrated music makes the wind section be as important as the strings, nevertheless, the tone of the orchestra is still given by the strings, and this section of the Boston Symphony comprises fifty-eight artists, divided into sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, ten violas, ten cellos and eight contrabasses. The sale of single seats will begin tomorrow morning at the exposition box office, 3 Powell street, where Manager H. Leahy is in charge of all hestra affai an Francisco, Cal.

---

ONICLE
MAY 14
onett for San Francisco.

ACE HERE WITH HARMONIOUS BAND

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Are Ready for Season.

FIRST CONCERT TONIGHT

Cosmopolitan Organization Is Soothed on Trip by Gentle Art of Pinochle.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

FORTY-NINE Germans, two Englishmen, nine Austrians, four Italians, four Hungarians, three Russians, five Belgians, four Frenchmen, fifteen Americans and four Hollanders arrived intact yesterday morning after having traveled together across the continent. Their cosmopolitan elements were undisturbed, no ethnic difficulties had divided them and they landed here the most harmonious organization in the world today. They had played pinochle most of the time.

It was the Boston Symphony orchestra. Since last Sunday it has been speeding across this great land without a single stop save that which was necessary in Chicago when some train switching was involved.

TWELVE CONCERTS.

Dr. Karl Muck and his wife took up their headquarters at the Fairmont Hotel, and the hundred musicians whise cosmopolitanism is merged by the genius of Director Muck into a homogeneous whole, found places to remain during their historic stay in San Francisco—to stay, that is, except when they are enegaged in playing twelve consecutive concerts on twelve consecutive days in Festival Hall, whither the enterprise of "Doc" William H. Leahy and the acquiescence of the exposition officials have brought them.

Dr. Muck is authority for the statement that not in the musical history of the world has a like pilgrimage been made.

"It has not even been thought of," he said last night. It remained for the exposition metropolis to achieve this unique distinction in addition to the other wonders of your wonderful city."

The noted conductor had just returned from Festival Hall and was full of superlatives.

DR. MUCK SYMPATHIZES.

"What would you advise?" I asked "an alleged critic to do under the circumstances? He must attend twelve concerts on consecutive days—symphony concerts, filled to the brim with the world's greatest overtures. Suppose the alleged critic's chief capacity for criticism rises out of a prodigious appetite for music, how is he to keep that appetite eager before a series of such enormous banquets?"

Dr. Karl Muck smiled. His shrewd face lit up sympathetically, and he answered:

"Well, you must remember it's pretty hard on me, too!"

However, if you have read his programme you must have been struck with the variety thereof and by the fact that no two similar schedules of orchestral offerings are placed close together.

THE PROGRAMMES.

Beethoven and Brahms tonight are followed by Mendelssohn and MacDowell tomorrow afternoon, a French programme on Sunday afternoon, exploiting Caesar Franck and Dukas, modern methods, as placed against classic programme, chaste with the music of the three Bs—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—and these composers balance or contrast with Tuesday night's programme of Wagnerian wonders. And so on through wonders. And so on through the series.

The appetite is likely to be whetted by what it feeds upon.

Dr. Muck admits a preference for the classics, although he is, as he said, "one of the old set," fighting the battles of Liszt, Wagner and Strauss. But the Strauss of later days makes Dr. Muck turn a quizzical look to heaven and causes him to say, "Such composition is anti-music. Still, I play them all."

AMERICAN COMPOSERS.

As for American composition, Dr. Muck says we have already had big composers, and that more are coming. MacDowell, who is biggest in his smaller works, is greatly admired by the former director of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and Chadwick is doing big things, he says, one of which, a suite for orchestra, "Symphonic Sketches," will be played by the Boston symphonists here. Still another American composer, Dr. Clapp, has made a deep appeal to Dr. Muck. Dr. Clapp is a young man, not yet 30, who is at the head of the music department of Dartmouth College, and one of whose symphonic compositions the Boston Symphony Orchestra has but recently offered.

This is the programme which will be played tonight in Festival Hall as the first of the offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Beethoven ....
Symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica"
Brahms ....
Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56a (Chorale Sancti Antoni)
Richard Strauss ....
"Don Juan," Tone Poem (after Lenau), Op. 20.
Weber....Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe"

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date AY 1 4 1915

Estab 884

GREAT BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play for the first time in San Francisco at Festival Hall tonight at 8:30 o'clock. Dr. Karl Muck and his hundred artists held a rehearsal in the reconstructed auditorium in the Exposition grounds this forenoon and pronounced the acoustics perfect.

For the accommodation of those attending the concerts in automobiles or carriages, special turnstiles have been installed at the Exposition directly opposite the entrance to Festival Hall in Chestnut street at the foot of Pierce. The walk between this entrance and the doors of Festival Hall will be covered with an awning.

On account of the great seating capacity of the new Festival Hall, it has been found possible to provide a block of seats at $2, and the demand for reservations for all of the concerts is very large at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

Tonight's program is as follows:

Symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, op. 55, "Eroica" .... Beethoven
1—Allegro con brio. 2—Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. 3—Scherzo: Allegro vivace, Trio. 4—Finale: Allegro molto.
Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, op 56a (Chorale Sancti Antoni)....Brahms
"Don Juan," tone poem (after Lenau), op. 20 ....Richard Strauss
Overture to the opera, "Euryanthe"....Weber

The second concert of the series will be given tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 o'clock with the following program:

Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," op. 27.........Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony No. 6 in G major, "Surprise".Haydn
1—Adagio cantabile e vivaco assai. 2—Andante. 3—Menuetto. 4—Allegro di molto.
Suite No. 2 in E minor, "Indian," op. 48 .... MacDowell
1—Legend: Not fast; with much dignity and character; twice as fast; with decision. 2—Love song; not fast; tenderly. 3—In war time; with rough vigor; almost savagely. 4—Dirge: Dirge like, mournfully. 5—Village festival: Swift and light.
"Hungaria," symphonic poem. No. 9....Liszt

"Only One Mother for

BULLETIN
San Francisco, Cal.
MAY 191

OSTON ARTISTS DUE TOMORROW

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wired W. H. Leahy, the local impresario, this morning that the special train carrying Dr. Karl Muck and the hundred artists of the world-famed organization was traveling on schedule time, and left Ogden at 10:45, Mountain Time. At 9:50 tomorrow morning the train will pull in to the Oakland Mole, allowing the musicians one day of rest after their long trip across the continent before beginning their series of concerts at the Exposition.

Festival Hall, where the first of the twelve concerts will be given tomorrow evening, has been in the hands of carpenters, electricians and decorators for the past ten days, and in its remodeled state, with a new balcony, fronted by a horse-shoe of boxes, it will have a seating capacity of nearly four thousand. There has been an immense demand for seats for all the concerts, and reservations may be made at the Exposition Box Office, 343 Powell street.

CHRONICLE
San Francisco, Cal.

mphony Orchestra Is to Arrive Today

Special Train Is Bringing Noted Boston Musicians for Series of Concerts at Exposition.

Dr. Karl Muck and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive this morning to fill an engagement at the exposition. They will be met at the Ferry building by Mayor Rolph and exposition officials. The orchestra members have made the trip from Boston on a special train, which has been on schedule time all the way.

W. H. Leahy, local representative, received a wire yesterday from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, that all the members are in the best of spirits and looking forward with a great deal of pleasure to their engagement in Festival Hall, which opens tomorrow night. The sale of seats, progressing at 343 Powell street, is large for the entire season.

Address

Add

BULLETIN

o, Cal.

Date

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 15 1915

Esta 1884

ORCHESTRA FROM BOSTON WINS AUDIENCE

Festival Hall Nearly Filled With Music Lovers, Who Wildly Applaud.

DR. MUCK GIVEN OVATION

Acoustics of Big Room Are Greatly Improved by Folds of Felt.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

Though the programme was not new, it was made to seem so by a performance which probably no other organization save the Boston Symphony Orchestra could summon. Festival Hall was not quite full last night, but it was nearly so. The balcony and galleries, newly placed in the big building, were quite full. The audience, in short, was a nice demonstration of that appreciation which is due to the forces which brought the great Boston orchestra across the continent to play twelve times for us.

Dr. Karl Muck—slender, wiry, dynamic, self-controlled and masterful—is a new type of conductor to us. He is like those impressive persons with soft, low voices, full of vital energy repressed, yet abounding. When he does achieve an emotional climax it is tumultuous, yet controlled. His beat is of brief extent; he uses his left hand sparingly, and there is a conservation of force which goes into his slightly moved baton and carries the instrumentalists irresistibly. When he waves it laterally over his orchestra there comes an overwhelming volume of tone, or, if need be, a tone of tenderest pianissimo utterly perfect in balance and beauty.

GREATNESS EXHIBITED.

Beethoven's "Eroica" exhibited at once the full measure of this orchestra's bigness and its director's greatness; the "off-beat accents," the serenity of attack, in which now a single section and now the entire orchestra participated; the mellow, fluent quality of the brasses, particularly the beauty of the French horn melody under the figuration of delicate violin harmonies—these were some of the elements of a performance of the Third symphony which revealed a Beethoven new to those San Francisco music lovers who have had to stay at home.

The world's greatest orchestra was brought to us last night, and we knew the difference.

Celtically one may say that all eyes were turned on the acoustics of Festival Hall last night, and none, no doubt was more anxious than Dr. Karl Muck himself.

The trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra across the country would be robbed of its real effectiveness if the acoustics were no better than they have in Festival Hall—for the very excellences which differentiate the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its inferiors would be precisely those qualities which poor acoustics would smother—clarity of attack, agreement in quitting chords, delicacy of tone coloring, shading and the achievement of that homogeneous tone which makes an orchestra a unit—sometimes.

HALL IS IMPROVED.

It is pleasant, therefore, to record that Festival Hall has been vastly improved. Great folds of felt above the orchestra, a heavy curtain stretched before the lower section of the pipe organ; curtains hanging from the "proscenium arch" and the installation of the balconies crowded with humanity served as "sound absorbers" nicely, and rendered of shorter spell the former bewildering duration of tone wherein the sonorous brasses were wont to swallow up the lighter tones of strings and slender woodwind.

Of course with the correction of this former annoying tone duration, has come a fault which is much less distressing: I mean a subduing of the brightness of the orchestral tones, deadened slightly by the presence of the folds on folds of absorbing felt. But of echo and of undue life of staccato notes, from where I sat, there was none to be observed, and the relief should be great to those who have the success of this big venture most at heart.

SECTIONS PROVE FITNESS.

Brahms' delicious variations of a Haydn theme (did Haydn really write it?) were given following the Beethoven number, and then from this classic treat, our leader introduced us to Strauss. We have met before, 'tis true, but never under such happy circumstances. In this number every individual section of the orchestra was heard in a way to prove its fitness to belong from Concert Master A. Witek to the manipulator of the tympany drums. The latter, in truth, and owing to a still slightly tricky hall, were sometimes too much in evidence. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" closed the programme with a wealth of melody made warm with the director's romantically eloquent baton.

This is the programme for this afternoon:

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy ....
Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27.
Haydn ....
Symphony No. 6, in G major, "Surprise."
I. Adagio cantabile e vivaco assai.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto.
IV. Allegro di molto.
MacDowell ....
Suite, No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," Op. 48.
I. Legend: Not fast; with much dignity and character. Twice as fast: with decision.
II. Love Song: not fast; tenderly.
III. In war time: with rough vigor; almost savagely.
IV. Dirge: Dirge-like, mournfully.
V. Village Festival: swift and light.
Liszt...."Hungaria": Symphonic Poem, No. 9

INDICTMENT FOR SMUGGLING.

Y. Nakane, a merchant of Tokio, was indicted yesterday by the Federal Grand Jury on the charge of smuggling 2048 pearls. He is charged with bring the gems on the Tanyo Maru by concealing them in a toy dog.

GREAT BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HERE AT LAST

World's Finest Orchestra Is Greeted by Mayor Rolph at Ferry; Crossed Continent on Special Train.

BY EARNEST J. HOPKINS.

EVERYTHING about the arrival here today of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seemed unprecedented. First, of course, the orchestra itself is unprecedented, as we will hear for ourselves tomorrow night. Then, the 108 musicians whizzed through direct from Boston—an unprecedented jaunt for an orchestra—in unprecedented time, namely, from 2 p. m. last Sunday to just 10:30 this morning.

Dr. Karl Muck, the vigorous-appearing youngish director, didn't object much to getting his picture taken—another precedent gone. C. A. Ellis, who manages the Boston Symphony when he isn't arranging tours for great solo artists, came along with the orchestra; Ellis is the managerial source from whom all good things flow to San Francisco, but he hasn't been here himself in years. Even W. E. Walter, the press man of the orchestra, is not the ordinary press agent; he is a brother of Eugene Walter, the playwright, and himself is a writer of ability.

MAYOR GREETS THEM.

The visitors were greeted at Oakland pier by several enthusiasts, and again at the Ferry, where Mayor Rolph addressed them while they stood with bare heads. They applauded the Mayor, as he will them tomorrow night.

Anton Witek, the concert-master, is here, but Sylvain Noack, second concertmaster and leader of the second violins, isn't, for the reason that he is getting married in Salt Lake. Noack seized the opportunity to take unto himself a bride, and will arrive here tomorrow in time for the concert.

FUN ON TRIP.

Mrs. Muck accompanied her husband. Dr. Muck refused to leave the rear platform, and now knows by heart every hill and river between this city and Boston.

The musicians played pinochle across the continent, changing to auction bridge in certain States.

The players of the brasses had to keep their "lip" in shape, so they sneaked off into the baggage cars and other cubby-holes, between games, and mournfully tooted at the passing stations. Last night there was a stop at a city consisting mainly of a watertank, and the eminent leader of the trumpets, with a couple of famous trombonists, got off and rendered "Waltz Me Around Again, Willie," to the great edification of the natives, who had only just heard that song and thought it was new.

BIG SEASON IS HERE.

George W. Stewart, Exposition director of music, greeted Dr. Muck today, and the first question asked by the conductor was, "How are the acoustics?" Stewart was able to assure him that the new balcony in Festival Hall, with a little adjustment, had improved the acoustics greatly, and that now conditions were practically perfect.

Just before leaving Boston there was a concert at which 1500 [illegible] people tried to get into the only 500 seats that were for sale. The resulting scene is not unlikely to be duplicated here tomorrow night, though Festival Hall seats 4000 and has a lot of standing-room. The coming of this orchestra to San Francisco is considered the greatest musical event in years.

The program for tomorrow night is as follows:

"Eroica" symphony........Beethoven
Variations on a theme by Handel.. ....Brahms Tone-poem, "Don Juan"....R. Strauss
"Euryanthe" Overture.........Weber

NOTED CONDUCTOR AND WIFE

Dr. Karl Muck, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. Muck, caught by The Bulletin photographer as they responded to greetings on the ferry boat today.

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 14 1915

Established:

The Bulletin

GREAT SYMPHONY TONIGHT ALL ARRANGEMENTS MADE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra the most famous organization of the kind in the world, will play for the first time in San Francisco at Festival Hall this evening at 8:30. Dr. Karl Muck and his hundred artists held a rehearsal in the reconstructed auditorium in the Exposition grounds this morning and pronounced the acoustics perfect.

For the accommodation of those attending the concerts in automobiles or carriages, special turnstiles have been installed at the Exposition directly opposite the entrance to Festival Hall on Chestnut street, at the foot of Pierce. The walk between this entrance and the doors of Festival Hall will also be covered with an awning to afford protection in the event of inclement weather.

On account of the great seating capacity of the new Festival Hall, it has been found possible to provide a block of seats at $2, and the demand for reservations for all of the concerts is very large at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

Tonight's program is as follows:

Symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica"..........Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56a (Chorale Santi Antoni)......................Brahms
"Don Juan," Tone Poem (after Lenau), Op. 20.........Richard Strauss
Overture to the opera, "Euryanthe".........................Weber

The second concert of the series will be given tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 with the following program:

Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op 27.................. .... Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony, No. 6, in G major, "Surprise"........................ Haydn
I. Adagio cantabile e vivaco assai.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto.
IV. Allegro di molto.
Suite, No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," Op. 48....................Macdowell
I. Legend: Not fast; with much dignity and character. Twice as fast: with decision.
II. Love Song; not fast; tenderly.
III. In war time; with rough vigor; almost savagely.
IV. Dirge: Dirge-like, mournfully.
V. Village Festival: Swift and light.
Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria," No. 9

s, and erture

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 3 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY MUSICIANS ARRIVE FOR FAIR CONCERTS

Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck. Call-Post photo.

Aggregation of 100 Artists Here on Special Train, Get S. F. Welcome

Led by Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 artist America's premier musical organiz tion of its kind, arrived today fro Boston for a series of concerts in Fe tival Hall at the Exposition.

The party of famous musicia made the trip to this city on a sp cial train. This is the first time sin its foundation in 1881 that the sym phony orchestra has made such a tri and is the biggest "jump" on recor for a musical organization. No sto were made across the continent a no other cities will hear the celebrate musicians before their return to Boston.

MUSICIANS GREETED

The party was greeted at the Oakland ferry by George W. Stewart, Exposition director of music; W. H. Leahy, local manager of the orchestra, and Mayor Rolph. Mayor Rolph greeted the musicians in the name of San Francisco.

Eight evening concerts and four matinees will be given in Festival Hall by the orchestra before its return May 25.

"This trip is unusual," said Dr. Muck, who was accompanied by Mrs. Muck, "but we feel that no better trip could be made this year than to San Francisco, which seems to be the center of everything in the world of art. I hear that the people here are earnest supporters of musical organizations. If we receive your appreciation we will be satisfied."

ALL GREAT MUSICIANS

The orchestra includes its entire personnel of great musicians, among whom are Anton Witek, concertmaster and one of the most famous violin virtuosos in the world; Sylvain Noack, second concertmaster; Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, 'cellists; Emil Ferir, leader of the viola section; Andre Maquarre, first flute; Georges Longy, first oboe; Albert Sand, first clarinet, and Alfred Holy and Theodore Cella, harpists.

"Acoustics" was the sole topic of conversation of the musicians as they crossed the bay.

"With proper acoustics and one rehearsal to become accustomed to the hall, we will be able to render the best for San Franciscans," said Dr. Muck. "In the East we know every hole and cranny in every hall, but we will have to become accustomed to our surroundings here."

FIRST CONCERT TOMORROW

The orchestra is under the management of Charles A. Ellis. The first program will be rendered in Festival Hall tomorrow night beginning at 8:30 o'clock. There will be matinees Saturday and Sunday at 2:30 o'clock

---

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 5
Establ

To Sell Single Seats for Boston Symphony

The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded last evening, the demand having been very heavy all the week. This morning at 9 o'clock seats for single concerts will be ready at the exposition box office, 343 Powell street, and the inquiry will undoubtedly tax the ticket sellers, for no musical event of recent years has excited the interest, not only in San Francisco, but in all parts of the State, that has been occasioned by the coming of this famous organization to Festival Hall.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 [illegible] 1915
Establishe

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CHIEF ENJOYS TOUR OF JOY ZONE

Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck took a trip along the Joy Zone yesterday and found much to entertain them after their long journey across the continent. They were enthusiastic about the Submarines and Neptune's Labyrinth, and they declared their ride in the aeroplane one of the most enjoyable experiences they ever had. The realism of the Dayton Flood, with its torrent of rushing waters, was also favorably commented upon. They finished their exploration of the Zone with a visit to the Alligator Farm.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Announcing the recent departure for San Francisco of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Herald comments on the fact that a striking feature of the season that has escaped notice, as follows:

"The orchestra is composed of Germans, Austrians, French, Belgians, Dutch, Russians, Italians, Bohemians, English, Americans. Many of the players have relatives and friends in actual warfare. Some have had cause to mourn. Musicians are proverbially nervous and excitable, if not so irritable as the traditional poet. Yet during this trying season, under a conductor whose sympathies are known to every one as naturally frankly pro-German, there has been the utmost harmony in rehearsal and in private intercourse. If there was discussion, it was amicable. The men of the various nations and the conductor worked together in full artistic concord. As a result the season of 1914-15 will long be conspicuous in the annals of the orchestra. The exhibition of self-restraint, of tact, of forbearance, may well be a lesson to men in other and less nerve-rasping walks of life."

Continuing, the Herald points out that the Lusitania slaughter was in the mind of every hearer at the orchestra's last concert in Boston, and goes on to say:

"Every one knew that the conductor and the majority of the orchestra are Germans. The programme was made up of compositions by Germans, for Liszt, though a Hungarian by birth, is ranked among German composers. Yet the demonstrations of approval were unprecedented. Conductor and orchestra were applauded to the skies. For the audience realized that in art there should be no prejudice of nationality. Thus the behaviour of the audience was as praiseworthy as the performance on the platform. It is not easy to think of a similar scene under the same conditions in any European city in these evil days."

k, 1884

CALL AND POST

MONDAY, MAY 17, 1915

ENTHRALL 3000 BY MUSIC OF SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra chose for its fourth concert in Festival Hall yesterday afternoon the devout music of Caesar Franck's symphony in D minor for its first number.

More than 3000 persons sat spellbound in their places, while these wonder-working Bostonians, with their horns and piccolos, their violins and wood-wind instruments unlocked the gates of music's paradise.

The over-soul of music, one critic called the playing of Dr. Muck's musicians.

BAFFLES DESCRIPTION

Pre-heavenly harmonies, another said, seeking, groping helplessly for words that would describe, ever so inadequately, the rapture and soul-full sentiments stirred in the human heart by these players.

The devoutest music penned since Palestrina, writes a third.

All must agree that word symbols are as far from revealing what this music really is, as the music, perhaps, fall yet short of satisfying the longings of the enraptured soul.

On one point, however, all who heard the Boston Symphony play Father Franck's great symphony yesterday eagerly agreed. That muses themselves must have conspired to bring Dr. Muck and his players here and give San Francisco lovers of music so generous a taste of man's highest achievement in musical orchestration.

WRITTEN BY BELGIAN

The tenderness, the solemnity, the devout beauty of Franck's symphony in D minor were all brought out under the master touch of Dr. Muck. To such as knew the fact that Father Franck, the writer of this symphony, was a Belgian, and that his great gift to mankind was being interpreted and its magic beauties unlocked by a German, can only have enhanced the real worth of musical art. It knows no national boundary lines, nor the blasting heat of angry kings.

Further delight was created by the second movement in which the English horn notes were heard, and a spell of sadness and tenderness was woven through the wizardry of the violinists.

A similar impression was shown in the Adagietto from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite No. 1. To this was added a wealth of warmth and color. The interpretation of this number by the Boston orchestra was a revelation to many who had already heard it.

"ESPANA" CLOSES PROGRAM

The grotesque was brought out in Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," which afforded opportunity for individual work of each section of the orchestra.

The program closed with Chabrier's "Espana," which reached a lofty plane in Spanish music.

The fourth concert of the series will be given by the orchestra in Festival Hall tonight at 8:30 o'clock. Attendants are requested to be in their seats by that time, as no one will be seated while numbers are being rendered. The program for tonight follows:

Brahm's Symphony, No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68; J. S. Bach Suite for flute and strings in B minor, No. 2; Solo, flute, Andre Marquarre; J. S. Bach symphony (Shepard's music) from the Christmas oratorio; Beethoven overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.

Yesterday's audience gave fresh evidence, in its size and enthusiasm, of San Franciscans' appreciation of orchestral music at its best.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 13 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY MUSICIANS ARRIVE FOR FAIR CONCERTS

Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck. Call-Post photo.

Aggregation of 100 Artists Here on Special Train, Get S. F. Welcome

Led by Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 artists, America's premier musical organization of its kind, arrived today from Boston for a series of concerts in Festival Hall at the Exposition.

The party of famous musicians made the trip to this city on a special train. This is the first time since its foundation in 1881 that the symphony orchestra has made such a trip and is the biggest "jump" on record for a musical organization. No stops were made across the continent and no other cities will hear the celebrated musicians before their return to Boston.

MUSICIANS GREETED

The party was greeted at the Oakland ferry by George W. Stewart, Exposition director of music; W. H. Leahy, local manager of the orchestra, and Mayor Rolph. Mayor Rolph greeted the musicians in the name of San Francisco.

Eight evening concerts and four matinees will be given in Festival Hall by the orchestra before its return May 25.

"This trip is unusual," said Dr. Muck, who was accompanied by Mrs. Muck, "but we feel that no better trip could be made this year than to San Francisco, which seems to be the center of everything in the world of art. I hear that the people here are earnest supporters of musical organizations. If we receive your appreciation we will be satisfied."

ALL GREAT MUSICIANS

The orchestra includes its entire personnel of great musicians, among whom are Anton Witek, concertmaster and one of the most famous violin virtuosos in the world; Sylvain Noack, second concertmaster; Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, 'cellists; Emil Ferir, leader of the viola section; Andre Maquarre, first flute; Georges Longy, first oboe; Albert Sand, first clarinet, and Alfred Holy and Theodore Cella, harpists.

"Acoustics" was the sole topic of conversation of the musicians as they crossed the bay.

"With proper acoustics and one rehearsal to become accustomed to the hall, we will be able to render the best for San Franciscans," said Dr. Muck. "In the East we know every hole and cranny in every hall, but we will have to become accustomed to our surroundings here."

FIRST CONCERT TOMORROW

The orchestra is under the management of Charles A. Ellis. The first program will be rendered in Festival Hall tomorrow night beginning at 8:30 o'clock. There will be matinees Saturday and Sunday at 2:30 o'clock.

CHRONICLE
: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 15

To Sell Single Seats for Boston Symphony

The subscription sale of seats for two or more concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded last evening, the demand having been very heavy all the week. This morning at 9 o'clock seats for single concerts will be ready at the exposition box office, 343 Powell street, and the inquiry will undoubtedly tax the ticket sellers, for no musical event of recent years has excited the interest, not only in San Francisco, but in all parts of the State, that has been occasioned by the coming of this famous organization to Festival Hall.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 15 1915

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CHIEF ENJOYS TOUR OF JOY ZONE

Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck took a trip along the Joy Zone yesterday and found much to entertain them after their long journey across the continent. They were enthusiastic about the Submarines and Neptune's Labyrinth, and they declared their ride in the aeroplane one of the most enjoyable experiences they ever had. The realism of the Dayton Flood, with its torrent of rushing waters, was also favorably commented upon. They finished their exploration of the Zone with a visit to the Alligator Farm.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Announcing the recent departure for San Francisco of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Herald comments on the fact that a striking feature of the season that has escaped notice, as follows:

"The orchestra is composed of Germans, Austrians, French, Belgians, Dutch, Russians, Italians, Bohemians, English, Americans. Many of the players have relatives and friends in actual warfare. Some have had cause to mourn. Musicians are proverbially nervous and excitable, if not so irritable as the traditional poet. Yet during this trying season, under a conductor whose sympathies are known to every one as naturally frankly pro-German, there has been the utmost harmony in rehearsal and in private intercourse. If there was discussion, it was amicable. The men of the various nations and the conductor worked together in full artistic concord. As a result the season of 1914-15 will long be conspicuous in the annals of the orchestra. The exhibition of self-restraint, of tact, of forbearance, may well be a lesson to men in other and less nerve-rasping walks of life."

Continuing, the Herald points out that the Lusitania slaughter was in the mind of every hearer at the orchestra's last concert in Boston, and goes on to say:

"Every one knew that the conductor and the majority of the orchestra are Germans. The programme was made up of compositions by Germans, for Liszt, though a Hungarian by birth, is ranked among German composers. Yet the demonstrations of approval were unprecedented. Conductor and orchestra were applauded to the skies. For the audience realized that in art there should be no prejudice of nationality. Thus the behaviour of the audience was as praiseworthy as the performance on the platform. It is not easy to think of a similar scene under the same conditions in any European city in these evil days."

CALL AND POST

MONDAY, MAY 17, 1915

ENTHRALL 3000 BY MUSIC OF SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra chose for its fourth concert in Festival Hall yesterday afternoon the devout music of Caesar Franck's symphony in D minor for its first number.

More than 3000 persons sat spellbound in their places, while these wonder-working Bostonians, with their horns and piccolos, their violins and wood-wind instruments unlocked the gates of music's paradise.

The over-soul of music, one critic called the playing of Dr. Muck's musicians.

BAFFLES DESCRIPTION

Pre-heavenly harmonies, another said, seeking, groping helplessly for words that would describe, ever so inadequately, the rapture and soul-full sentiments stirred in the human heart by these players.

The devoutest music penned since Palestrina, writes a third.

All must agree that word symbols are as far from revealing what this music really is, as the music, perhaps, fall yet short of satisfying the longings of the enraptured soul.

On one point, however, all who heard the Boston Symphony play Father Franck's great symphony yesterday eagerly agreed. That muses themselves must have conspired to bring Dr. Muck and his players here and give San Francisco lovers of music so generous a taste of man's highest achievement in musical orchestration.

WRITTEN BY BELGIAN

The tenderness, the solemnity, the devout beauty of Franck's symphony in D minor were all brought out under the master touch of Dr. Muck. To such as knew the fact that Father Franck, the writer of this symphony, was a Belgian, and that his great gift to mankind was being interpreted and its magic beauties unlocked by a German, can only have enhanced the real worth of musical art. It knows no national boundary lines, nor the blasting heat of angry kings.

Further delight was created by the second movement in which the English horn notes were heard, and a spell of sadness and tenderness was woven through the wizardry of the violinists.

A similar impression was shown in the Adagietto from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite No. 1. To this was added a wealth of warmth and color. The interpretation of this number by the Boston orchestra was a revelation to many who had already heard it.

"ESPANA" CLOSES PROGRAM

The grotesque was brought out in Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," which afforded opportunity for individual work of each section of the orchestra.

The program closed with Chabrier's "Espana," which reached a lofty plane in Spanish music.

The fourth concert of the series will be given by the orchestra in Festival Hall tonight at 8:30 o'clock. Attendants are requested to be in their seats by that time, as no one will be seated while numbers are being rendered. The program for tonight follows:

Brahm's Symphony, No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68; J. S. Bach Suite for flute and strings in B minor, No. 2; Solo, flute, Andre Marquarre; J. S. Bach symphony (Shepard's music) from the Christmas oratorio; Beethoven overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.

Yesterday's audience gave fresh evidence, in its size and enthusiasm, of San Franciscans' appreciation of orchestral music at its best.

Address San F[illegible]

Date

Established: Lon

BOSTONIANS ARRIVE FOR FAIR SERIES

Dr. Karl Muck and the Famous Symphony Orchestra to Oper Concert Season This Evening

LEADER IS GENUINE ARTIST

Talks of His Music Ideals and of Last Work Left Us by Great Masters of Harmony

DR. KARL MUCK, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which arrived here yesterday for a series of concerts at the Exposition, and Mrs. Muck.

BY REDFERN MASON.

The director of the orchestra has this in common with the actor; that thousands of people know him through his art who have never exchanged a word with him. For the man who conducts the works of the great masters not only interprets them, but reveals himself.

I had known Dr. Karl Muck through the medium of Beethoven and Bach and come under the spell of his artistic personality. Yesterday we met face to face. It was at the Fairmont. According to tradition, we ought to have rapturized over the scene which spread before our eyes. But we ignored it as completely as St. Bernard ignored the beauties which surrounded his famous monastery. Our talk was of music, of the glory that is Bach and the grandeur that is Beethoven.

Dr. Muck might be of the race of Von Moltke; but the humor of his glance and quiet irony in the play of his lips are suggestive of Heinrich Heine. Moreover, he has "plenty of nose," and that means authority. Wherever you met him, you would pick out Dr. Muck as a personality. His deep brow is lined with thought; but absorption in the classics has not made him coldly academic; the play of his features bespeaks a nature genial and full of sympathy.

HAS NEED OF HIS GIFTS.

And the leader of the Boston symphony has need of all the gifts with which God has endowed him. The successor of Nikisch and Gericke must be a master of the art of music; he must be able to kindle enthusiasm; he must have the diplomacy of a Talleyrand, the honesty and kindness of a true paterfamilias. What wonder then that the Bostonians love and respect him?

Judge then of the state of mind of the guardians of the orchestra when, in the beginning of the war, Dr. Muck, who was in Berlin at the time, tendered his services to the German government and, for four weeks, was actually in the service. Henry Lee Higginson wired him that, if he stayed away, the Boston Symphony must be disbanded. C. A. Ellis crossed the ocean as quickly as the fastest liner would carry him and laid the whole situation before him. Not only was the artistic future of the organization in jeopardy; but the players themselves, a hundred of the finest instrumentalists in the world, were face to face, not merly wth the loss of their positions, but with actual penury; for the Boston Symphony is a non-union organization and it would be impossible for its members to obtain places in any other orchestra.

GERMANY'S LOSS OUR GAIN.

Dr. Muck's heart was with his country. He wanted to fight. But the thought of the loss to art and the sufferings to so many families which the cessation of the activities of the Boston Symphony would involve outweighed every other consideration. He returned to America and Germany's loss is our gain.

His presence was sorely needed. The Symphony is a body composed of many nationalities. All the warring races form part of it. So he talked with them. "My friends," he said, "our nations are at war; but we are musicians and in a neutral country. If we would make music, we must be in harmony with one another. We must refrain from the bitterness of debate and do our duty to the organization of which we form part and the country in which we dwell."

"And all has been peaceful," said the doctor. "I was a little nervous in crossing the continent, lest too close proximity should cause trouble; but everybody was affable; everybody was considerate, and we enjoyed the journey.

"It is a great undertaking, this giving of twelve concerts in as many days. Some of the works we had not played for a long time and all had to be rehearsed. We have done our best to prepare for the people of San Francisco a series of programmes which shall be good and comprehensive."

BEETHOVEN IN FIRST PLACE.

"You start with the 'Eroica' and end with the 'Leonora, No. 3'" I interpolated.

"Ah, yes, of course, the works of Beethoven stand high in our affections. I hope you love your Mozart, too, your Haydn and Bach. These are the fathers of music. Love them and you will easily understand the rest. It makes me smile," continued Dr. Muck ruminatively, "when I see our young men attempting to start composing where Strauss and Reger left off, forgetful of the fact that these very men steeped themselves in Bach and the great Viennese masters before they began to write."

I told Dr. Muck of the young people who write to me that they "know nothing about harmony" but can improvise so that it "sounds like Debussy." A smile that was grimly tolerant crossed the musician's face, and we recalled the fact that Beethoven studied theory for twelve years before he felt himself able to compose "with a free spirit."

LET THEM STUDY BACH.

"If they want modernism, let them study Bach," said Dr. Muck. "The great old cantor was forever experimenting. But America does not know Bach. Look into the wonderful series of chorales published in the fifty odd volumes of the Bach Gesellschaft. There you will find progressions as daring as any of those of the moderns, but always the expression of a law-abiding spirit. Bach was like Haydn in this respect, that because he knew the rules, he could win from them new means of expression. But our young men imagine that the way of progress is the way of revolution. Art follows the path of development, not of anarchy.

"It is much more difficult to give a perfect performance of Mozart or Beethoven than of the impressionistic moderns; for the music of these men is logical; it is architectural; part fits into part, and every detail must be sung exquisitely. Yet I do not believe that we should cling too literally to the text of the masters as to be the slaves of conditions from which they would gladly have emancipated themselves.

"Take the great first theme of the 'Eroica,' for instance. Beethoven could not give it wholly to the horns, as he wanted to do, but had to distribute it. But to-day the horns can play the whole theme. Then why not let them do so? But to change the instrumental color, as some innovators wish to do, seems to me inartistic and an affront to the genius of the composer. Besides there is no finality to such proceedings. If Beethoven is to be reorchestrated today, why not again twenty years hence?"

Dr. Muck was keenly interested in the orchestral situation in San Fran-

MAYOR ROLPH GREETS MUSICIANS AT FERRY

The Boston Symphony, 108 musicians, arrived in San Francisco yesterday morning, and from now until Tuesday, May 25, they will be San Franciscans. Mayor Rolph was at the Ferry building to greet them; George W. Stewart was there to assure Dr. Karl Muck that the acoustics of Festival Hall are satisfactory, and the general public was there to look on.

The musicians enjoyed the trip and all save one made the journey without a break. The exception was Silvain Noack, the violinist, who stopped at Salt Lake City to take a wife. He will be with us to-night in time for the first concert.

Never before has the Boston Symphony traveled so far, and a good many of them had no notion that there was so much land between the Atlantic and the Pacific. But the trip was a pleasant one. Talk about the war was barred; the men played pinochle, and, as the train was a special chartered solely for the symphony, those who wanted to practice could do so.

C. A. Ellis, manager with the orchestra, has accompanied the organization; so, too, has W. E. Walter, the press agent.

To-night our great twelve-day festival begins. Festival Hall holds 4,000 people and it is expected that it will be filled. Because of the demand a block of the $2 seats has been set aside.

For the accommodation of those attending the concerts of the symphony orchestra in automobiles or carriages, special turnstiles have been installed at the Exposition directly opposite the entrance to Festival Hall on Chestnut street at the foot of Pierce. The walk between this entrance and the doors of Festival Hall will also be covered with an awning to afford protection to patrons in the event of inclement weather.

To-night's programme will open with the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven; it will include the [illegible] tions written by Brahms [illegible] the Anthony" chorale of Haydn and the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, and will conclude with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

Postal Bids Wanted.

partment at Washington, Postmaster Charles W. Fay yesterday advertised for bids for the contracts for mail wagon delivery and collection, amounting to $40,000 for the three-year term.

INSERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

By Redfern Mason

IF San Francisco were a little Old World town of a century ago the crier of the place would sally forth to the public square and address the citizens in terms like these:

"Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! This evening, a little after the eighth hour, in the Festival Hall of our glorious exposition, will be heard the Boston Symphony. It is the greatest orchestra in all the world, and His Honor Mayor Rolph earnestly wills it that all good dames and their men folk, likewise those of the younger sort of both sexes who are of an age for such entertainments, shall show themselves sensible of the great good fortune which has befallen us by being present to hearken to their music. Moreover, His Worship greatly desireth that the people, so many as conveniently can do so, shall attend each and all of the twelve concerts to be holden; for it is little likely to be their luck soon to hear such music again."

And the crier would have been telling the literal truth. Never in this land has there been such an orchestra as this Boston Symphony, and it is doubtful whether proud Europe herself can show its peer.

The currency of English speech has been so debased by the excesses of newspaperese that words which will make the importance of the coming of Dr. Muck and his Bostonians stand out in its proper relief are almost unfindable. So I must again summon the town crier to my aid. I see him in my mind's eye, standing at the meeting of the ways, where Market and Kearny streets intersect, delivering his message to the passersby:

"The choicest players of the world have joined their talents to make this orchestra. Proud France has sent her men skilled in the magic of reeds; there are fiddlers the like of whom, in equal number, you will seek in vain in gay Vienna and superb Berlin; never was heard such magic of horns or such hallowed sound of trombones as these men make."

O O O

THEN he would tell how the Boston Symphony came to be what it is. He would rehearse the tale of Boston's lowly estate in the '80s, and how one Henry Lee Higginson, a banker not too rich in this world's goods but wealthy in God's gifts of idealism and enthusiasm, had a vision, and, being a practical man as well as a dreamer of dreams, set to work with all his might, and with the passing of days made it the living reality which now delights the world.

"Hearken to me, fellow-citizens of San Francisco!" he would say: "such a goodly happening as this which has befallen you and me may never occur again. It has cost sixty-five thousand golden dollars to bring this orchestra across the plains and over the mountains from New England to this fair State of California. We must look at it, therefore, that we show ourselves worthy of what has been done for us. When the fair is no more than a memory the playing of these men will be to many of us its golden crown.

"Think of the men of genius who have toiled to make the Boston Symphony what it is. First came George Henschel, singer and composer, one of the chosen people of music. Then Wilhelm Gericke, a tone-wizard with the spirit of a soldier, disciplined the musical cohort into splendid obedience. Arthur Nikisch added the flame of his genius, and, last of all, the Kaiser of Germany, the lord of all the German folk, sent his trusty henchman, Karl Muck, to weld the men into such an artistic unity as the people from whose loins sprang Bach and Beethoven must bow down before.

"Teuton and Muscovite, Briton and Frenchman, Magyar and Belgian, make harmony together in this inviolable phalanx of tonal warriors. Here racial dissonance is forgotten in the harmonies of the masters."

O O O

AND if my crier were the moralizer of the tale I should wish him to be he would exhort his hearers to incite the players to noblest efforts by the priceless gift of enthusiasm:

"You and I are on our trial. Not to give the Boston Symphony the greeting which is their due would be to prove ourselves insensible clods and to stand esthetically disgraced in the eyes of our fellow-countrymen. For many have longed to hear these prophets of the art of song and have not heard them. Let us show them that we love them and they will repay us in symphonic coin not to be measured in coin of gold.

"If we listen aright there will be stirred within us such a divine discontent that we shall not rest satisfied till we have created, here on the Pacific Coast, such an orchestra of our own that the people of Australia and the islands of the sea will send to beg the boon of its coming. I cherish the hope that there may be one among us who will do for San Francisco what Mr. Higginson has done for Boston. What a crown of achievement that would be for some industrial captain, who, satiated with material success, looks around for an undertaking the realization of which would link his name with the immortals of the western world!

"Here in California is the new Hellas. Who will be the man to make it possible for us to realize our destiny in the realm of music? The golden apples of the Hesperides are ours from the bounty of nature. But the nobler fruit of art must be of our own cultivation. Let us go, then, to Festival Hall, hear the gospel which is Mozart, and come away to put in practice that gospel by dint of an impassioned and triumphant emulation.

"During these twelve days San Francisco will be the musical capital of all the Americas, the gladsomest spot in the whole of this anguished world. 'To understand is to equal.' Let us give Dr. Muck and his associates the gift of loving appreciation. Let us fill Festival Hall till it will hold no more, and let the atmosphere of the place be tremulous with constructive joy. For, according to the measure of our gifts, so shall we receive."

SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 19, 1915.

SYMPHONISTS FILL FESTIVAL HALL WITH WAGNER

German Composer and Dr. Muck Draw Largest Audience Ever Seen in City.

POSER FOR MUSICIANS

Thirty Violinists Join in One Tone That a Kreisler Might Covet.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

Waguerian music in concert, divorced utterly from dramatic action and all that pertains to the theater, and given in the abstract, so to say, was the lure that drew the first entirely "sold out house" that Festival Hall has known. The seats were not only all occupied, but standing-room was at a premium.

Could Wagner have seen this more than half a century ago when the Jockey Club was hissing his "Tannhauser" into a brief oblivion, he might have given less time to defending his music and more to writing it. Instead of volumes of literature we might have another masterpiece. He would have been assured of the future of his work, for Bach, Beethoven, Brahms nor Strauss nor Caesar Franck could summon such attendance and attention as last night were given to the master worker in dramatic music.

AN IMMENSE AUDIENCE.

Those in a position to know assert that last night's audience and receipts were the largest that have yet been assembled to listen to a symphony orchestra in America. If this be true, it is certainly to the credit of our city and a vindication of our good taste and discrimination.

Every concert given thus far by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been the medium of new revealments. Last night's programme played by Dr. Muck and his hundred men presented two numbers that emphasized the dynamic versatility of the orchestra. The prelude to "Lohengrin" and the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" were the offerings.

The ethereal harmonies of the violins in the "Lohengrin" prelude have never been played so delicately and softly for us, and by contrast the gradually developed climax has never seemed so overwhelming.

POSER FOR THE EXPERTS.

In the development of this sonorous accumulation of tone, an infinite variety of shading was laid on with most delicate touch, and the music ebbed and flowed and shimmered, always gaining in height and power until the tumultuous climax was thundered from livid trumpets and clamorous horns. I give you something to speculate upon concerning this remarkable orchestra. This is the poser:

Thirty violinists conjoin in a tone of such softness that a Kreisler might covet it, and warmed by a color and beauty that the Russian Elman might be proud to own as his own; yet not one of the violinists assisting in producing this composite perfection would be capable of the tone alone. Mutually complementing each other, these musical personalities under Dr. Muck's welding baton are not as one man—they combine the excellencies of thirty, and their individual faults are brushed away by the guiding hand of the genius that holds the baton.

HAND OF THE MASTER.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers" was an exhibition of the independence of each section of the orchestra and their interdependence in the web of counterpoint which is the admiration of the pedants in music and the wonder of us all.

But the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" seemed greatest to me. It was as played by the Boston symphonists an apocalypse unveiling the destruction of Walhalla and the future of music. Here Dr. Muck was as near to vehemence as his orderly conception of beauty in music would permit, and those of us who had hoped to hear a chaos of tone in the "Tannhauser" climax found it here in magnified and splendid relation to the composition itself and to the programme in its entirety.

Tonight's schedule will include compositions by German, American and Finnish composers. Sibelius is lia," "The Swan of Tuonela" and his better known "Finlandia" will be played. George W. Chadwick is the American composer, and his "Symphonic Sketches" will be played. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony will be interpreted. This is Beethoven's gayest composition in symphonic form. Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" will be the opening number.

SAN FRANCISCO EXAMINER—

—WEDNESDAY, MAY 19, 1915.

ALL THRILLED BY WAGNER'S MIGHTY ART

Bostonians Heard in Concert That Fills Festival Hall and Offers Untold Delight

OVER 4,000 ARE PRESENT

BY REDFERN MASON

After the comparatively slim audience of the Monday night—there were some 2,500 present, when there should have been 4,000—we must have been on our trial last night. If so, I think the Boston Symphony will acquit us, for Festival Hall was full to overflowing. I noted one empty box of three seats; but people were standing up at the back of the hall and in the galleries in hundreds.

For it was a Wagner night, and Wagner has always ben a favorite with the people. Nay, they accepted him when musicians looked askance at him. For the public judges with the heart and cares nothing for theory or aesthetic tendencies.

UNINSPIRED AT FIRST.

And the more Wagnerian Wagner is, the more the public likes him. Last night we began with the "Rienzi" overture, which is blatant and bombastic. The audience listened dutifully, much in the same manner as Dr. Muck conducted; but not ever the voice of the 'cellos in the famous "Prayer" could make them enthusiastic. "Rienzi" might please Wagner's wife; but San Franciscans prefer the music which was inspired by the Wesendonck. But that came later.

First we had to hear the "Flying Dutchman" overture and rejoice over the realistic storm which Dame Nature taught Wagner how to write what time he was battling with the North sea and listening to tales of Vanderdecken. Berloiz said that same storm was one long crescendo in arpeggios of the diminished seventh. But again the public was wiser and applauded where the craftsman shook his head.

The music first really gripped us last night when the reeds began to sing the "Pilgrim's Song" in the "Tannhauser" overture. They played it as you would expect the Bostonians to play it. Then the strings began to weave traceries and the violas broke in, full-voiced and ecstatic, with the Venus music. It was the "Bacchanale" version of the overture to which we listened, the one Wagner wrote because Paris would not tolerate opera without a ballet. Fetis, the modish critic of those times, turned up his nose at it and said there was only one tune in it, "And what a tune!" But Gounod, wiser than he, exclaimed "Would that I had made such a failure." To-day "Tannhauser" is a favorite in Paris, or, at least, it is, if Chauvinism has not operated against it. Last night's performance was a wonderful one. When the bass clarinet—I think it is the bass clarinet—sang "Geliebter, komm," I thought I had never heard a lovelier sensuality of tone.

"LOHENGRIN" PRELUDE GIVEN.

After this riot of the sense we listened to the prelude to "Lohengrin" and rejoiced when the violins, in seraphic harmony, brought the Holy Grail down heaven to earth. You may seek the wide world over, but I doubt whether you will find strings to play that music as we heard it last night. Incidentally, I ought to remark that the idea of "divided" strings in high positions is not Wagner's invention. Old Scarlatti did the same thing a hundred years earlier.

By this time the audience was tense with appreciative eagerness. But the best was yet to come. The second part of the concert opened wih the "Tristan" Vorspiel; it included the prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the Siegfried's Funeral March followed and the evening's exposition of the gospel according

INSPIRED LOVE MUSIC.

"Tristan" is the most inspired love music ever penned, and the Vorspiel is its quintessence. That twin-theme, no more to be parted than the ivy and vine which grew on the lovers' grave, sang with moving eloquence. I thought of old Burton's phrase about kisses which "cling like ivy." It seemed apt to describe these tonal protestations and entwinings. I do not marvel that Minna was jealous of Mathilde. The woman who could make a man write music like that was little likely to bring peace to the conjugal hearth.

After this cloying atmosphere, it was a relief to breathe in the merriment, the bracing irony, the sane and normal love of the overture to "Die Meistersinger." How we loved the stirring sonorities of trumpet of trombone, and how we enjoyed the crabbed counterpoint in which Wagner ridiculed Hanslick and his like, fellows who will not admit that anything can be right unless it has been done before by the masters. A prayer against narrow-mindedness and conceit should be part of the critic's litany.

ress
Fro
4 '15

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

By Redfern Mason

IF San Francisco were a little Old World town of a century ago the crier of the place would sally forth to the public square and address the citizens in terms like these:

"Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! This evening, a little after the eighth hour, in the Festival Hall of our glorious exposition, will be heard the Boston Symphony. It is the greatest orchestra in all the world, and His Honor Mayor Rolph earnestly wills it that all good dames and their men folk, likewise those of the younger sort of both sexes who are of an age for such entertainments, shall show themselves sensible of the great good fortune which has befallen us by being present to hearken to their music. Moreover, His Worship greatly desireth that the people, so many as conveniently can do so, shall attend each and all of the twelve concerts to be holden; for it is little likely to be their luck soon to hear such music again."

And the crier would have been telling the literal truth. Never in this land has there been such an orchestra as this Boston Symphony, and it is doubtful whether proud Europe herself can show its peer.

The currency of English speech has been so debased by the excesses of newspaperese that words which will make the importance of the coming of Dr. Muck and his Bostonians stand out in its proper relief are almost unfindable. So I must again summon the town crier to my aid. I see him in my mind's eye, standing at the meeting of the ways, where Market and Kearny streets intersect, delivering his message to the passersby:

"The choicest players of the world have joined their talents to make this orchestra. Proud France has sent her men skilled in the magic of reeds; there are fiddlers the like of whom, in equal number, you will seek in vain in gay Vienna and superb Berlin; never was heard such magic of horns or such hallowed sound of trombones as these men make."

O O O

THEN he would tell how the Boston Symphony came to be what it is. He would rehearse the tale of Boston's lowly estate in the '80s, and how one Henry Lee Higginson, a banker not too rich in this world's goods but wealthy in God's gifts of idealism and enthusiasm, had a vision, and, being a practical man as well as a dreamer of dreams, set to work with all his might, and with the passing of days made it the living reality which now delights the world.

"Hearken to me, fellow-citizens of San Francisco!" he would say; "such a goodly happening as this which has befallen you and me may never occur again. It has cost sixty-five thousand golden dollars to bring this orchestra across the plains and over the mountains from New England to this fair State of California. We must look at it, therefore, that we show ourselves worthy of what has been done for us. When the fair is no more than a memory the playing of these men will be to many of us its golden crown.

"Think of the men of genius who have toiled to make the Boston Symphony what it is. First came George Henschel, singer and composer, one of the chosen people of music. Then Wilhelm Gericke, a tone-wizard with the spirit of a soldier, disciplined the musical cohort into splendid obedience. Arthur Nikisch added the flame of his genius, and, last of all, the Kaiser of Germany, the lord of all the German folk, sent his trusty henchman, Karl Muck, to weld the men into such an artistic unity as the people from whose loins sprang Bach and Beethoven must bow down before.

"Teuton and Muscovite, Briton and Frenchman, Magyar and Belgian, make harmony together in this inviolable phalanx of tonal warriors. Here racial dissonance is forgotten in the harmonies of the masters."

O O O

AND if my crier were the moralizer of the tale I should wish him to be he would exhort his hearers to incite the players to noblest efforts by the priceless gift of enthusiasm:

"You and I are on our trial. Not to give the Boston Symphony the greeting which is their due would be to prove ourselves insensible clods and to stand esthetically disgraced in the eyes of our fellow-countrymen. For many have longed to hear these prophets of the art of song and have not heard them. Let us show them that we love them and they will repay us in symphonic coin not to be measured in coin of gold.

"If we listen aright there will be stirred within us such a divine discontent that we shall not rest satisfied till we have created, here on the Pacific Coast, such an orchestra of our own that the people of Australia and the islands of the sea will send to beg the boon of its coming. I cherish the hope that there may be one among us who will do for San Francisco what Mr. Higginson has done for Boston. What a crown of achievement that would be for some industrial captain, who, satiated with material success, looks around for an undertaking the realization of which would link his name with the immortals of the western world!

"Here in California is the new Hellas. Who will be the man to make it possible for us to realize our destiny in the realm of music? The golden apples of the Hesperides are ours from the bounty of nature. But the nobler fruit of art must be of our own cultivation. Let us go, then, to Festival Hall, hear the gospe which is Mozart, and come away to p in practice that gospel by dint of an impassioned and triumphant emulation.

"During these twelve days San Francisco will be the musical capital of all the Americas, the gladsomest spot in the whole of this anguished world. 'To understand is to equal.' Let us give Dr. Muck and his associates the gift of loving appreciation. Let us fill Festival Hall till it will hold no more, and let the atmosphere of the place be tremulous with constructive joy. For, according to the measure of our gifts, so shall we receive."

SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 19, 1915.

SYMPHONISTS FILL FESTIVAL HALL WITH WAGNER

German Composer and Dr. Muck Draw Largest Audience Ever Seen in City.

POSER FOR MUSICIANS

Thirty Violinists Join in One Tone That a Kreisler Might Covet.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

Wagnerian music in concert, divorced utterly from dramatic action and all that pertains to the theater, and given in the abstract, so to say, was the lure that drew the first entirely "sold out house" that Festival Hall has known. The seats were not only all occupied, but standing-room was at a premium.

Could Wagner have seen this more than half a century ago when the Jockey Club was hissing his "Tannhauser" into a brief oblivion, he might have given less time to defending his music and more to writing it. Instead of volumes of literature we might have another masterpiece. He would have been assured of the future of his work, for Bach, Beethoven, Brahms nor Strauss nor Caesar Franck could summon such attendance and attention as last night were given to the master worker in dramatic music.

AN IMMENSE AUDIENCE.

Those in a position to know assert that last night's audience and receipts were the largest that have yet been assembled to listen to a symphony orchestra in America. If this be true, it is certainly to the credit of our city and a vindication of our good taste and discrimination.

Every concert given thus far by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been the medium of new revealments. Last night's programme played by Dr. Muck and his hundred men presented two numbers that emphasized the dynamic versatility of the orchestra. The prelude to "Lohengrin" and the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" were the offerings.

The ethereal harmonies of the violins in the "Lohengrin" prelude have never been played so delicately and softly for us, and by contrast the gradually developed climax has never seemed so overwhelming.

POSER FOR THE EXPERTS.

In the development of this sonorous accumulation of tone, an infinite variety of shading was laid on with most delicate touch, and the music ebbed and flowed and shimmered, always gaining in height and power until the tumultuous climax was thundered from livid trumpets and clamorous horns. I give you something to speculate upon concerning this remarkable orchestra. This is the poser:

Thirty violinists conjoin in a tone of such softness that a Kreisler might covet it, and warmed by a color and beauty that the Russian Elman might be proud to own as his own; yet not one of the violinists assisting in producing this composite perfection would be capable of the tone alone. Mutually complementing each other, these musical personalities under Dr. Muck's welding baton are not as one man—they combine the excellencies of thirty, and their individual faults are brushed away by the guiding hand of the genius that holds the baton.

HAND OF THE MASTER.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers" was an exhibition of the independence of each section of the orchestra and their interdependence in the web of counterpoint which is the admiration of the pedants in music and the wonder of us all.

But the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" seemed greatest to me. It was as played by the Boston symphonists an apocalypse unveiling the destruction of Walhalla and the future of music. Here Dr. Muck was as near to vehemence as his orderly conception of beauty in music would permit, and those of us who had hoped to hear a chaos of tone in the "Tannhauser" climax found it here in magnified and splendid relation to the composition itself and to the programme in its entirety.

Tonight's schedule will include compositions by German, American and Finnish composers. Sibelius is lia," "The Swan of Tuonela" and his better known "Finlandia" will be played. George W. Chadwick is the American composer, and his "Symphonic Sketches" will be played. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony will be interpreted. This is Beethoven's gayest composition in symphonic form. Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" will be the opening number.

SAN FRANCISCO EXAMINER—

—WEDNESDAY, MAY 19, 1915.

ALL THRILLED BY WAGNER'S MIGHTY ART

Bostonians Heard in Concert That Fills Festival Hall and Offers Untold Delight

OVER 4,000 ARE PRESENT

BY REDFERN MASON

After the comparatively slim audience of the Monday night—there were some 2,500 present, when there should have been 4,000—we must have been on our trial last night. If so, I think the Boston Symphony will acquit us, for Festival Hall was full to overflowing. I noted one empty box of three seats; but people were standing up at the back of the hall and in the galleries in hundreds.

For it was a Wagner night, and Wagner has always ben a favorite with the people. Nay, they accepted him when musicians looked askance at him. For the public judges with the heart and cares nothing for theory or aesthetic tendencies.

UNINSPIRED AT FIRST.

And the more Wagnerian Wagner is, the more the public likes him. Last night we began with the "Rienzi" overture, which is blatant and bombastic. The audience listened dutifully, much in the same manner as Dr. Muck conducted; but not ever the voice of the 'cellos in the famous "Prayer" could make them enthusiastic. "Rienzi" might please Wagner's wife; but San Franciscans prefer the music which was inspired by the Wesendonck. But that came later.

First we had to hear the "Flying Dutchman" overture and rejoice over the realistic storm which Dame Nature taught Wagner how to write what time he was battling with the North sea and listening to tales of Vanderdecken. Berloiz said that same storm was one long crescendo in arpeggios of the diminished seventh. But again the public was wiser and applauded where the craftsman shook his head.

The music first really gripped us last night when the reeds began to sing the "Pilgrim's Song" in the "Tannhauser" overture. They played it as you would expect the Bostonians to play it. Then the strings began to weave traceries and the violas broke in, full-voiced and ecstatic, with the Venus music. It was the "Bacchanale" version of the overture to which we listened, the one Wagner wrote because Paris would not tolerate opera without a ballet. Fetis, the modish critic of those times, turned up his nose at it and said there was only one tune in it, "And what a tune!" But Gounod, wiser than he, exclaimed "Would that I had made such a failure." To-day "Tannhauser" is a favorite in Paris, or, at least, it is, if Chauvinism has not operated against it. Last night's performance was a wonderful one. When the bass clarinet—I think it is the bass clarinet—sang "Geliebter, komm," I thought I had never heard a lovelier sensuality of tone.

"LOHENGRIN" PRELUDE GIVEN.

After this riot of the sense we listened to the prelude to "Lohengrin" and rejoiced when the violins, in seraphic harmony, brought the Holy Grail down heaven to earth. You may seek the wide world over, but I doubt whether you will find strings to play that music as we heard it last night. Incidentally, I ought to remark that the idea of "divided" strings in high positions is not Wagner's invention. Old Scarlatti did the same thing a hundred years earlier.

By this time the audience was tense with appreciative eagerness. But the best was yet to come. The second part of the concert opened wih the "Tristan" Vorspiel; it included the prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the Siegfried's Funeral March followed and the evening's exposition [illegible] the gospel according [illegible] the "Parsifal"

INSPIRED LOVE MUSIC.

"Tristan" is the most inspired love music ever penned, and the Vorspiel is its quintessence. That twin-theme, no more to be parted than the ivy and vine which grew on the lovers' grave, sang with moving eloquence. I thought of old Burton's phrase about kisses which "cling like ivy." It seemed apt to describe these tonal protestations and entwinings. I do not marvel that Minna was jealous of Mathilde. The woman who could make a man write music like that was little likely to bring peace to the conjugal hearth.

After this cloying atmosphere, it was a relief to breathe in the merriment, the bracing irony, the sane and normal love of the overture to "Die Meistersinger." How we loved the stirring sonorities of trumpet of trombone, and how we enjoyed the crabbed counterpoint in which Wagner ridiculed Hanslick and his like, fellows who will not admit that anything can be right unless it has been done before by the masters. A prayer against narrow-mindedness and conceit should be part of the critic's litany.

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 17 1915

Established: L

DEVOUT MUSIC IS GIVEN BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BY REDFERN MASON

If you would enter the kingdom music you must become as little ch dren. To listen to the Boston Sy phony in the mental attitude of Pococurante is to miss half beauty. But if you can heark large-eyed, like the little girl who being told the story of Red Ridi Hood, the music will tell you thin hidden from the supercilious a critical.

The conviction that this was came over me yesterday afternoon I was listening to the Cesar Fran Symphony, the devoutest mus penned since Palestrina. I could n prove my assertions, perhaps, but am sure to the point of certitude th this score is a spiritual confession of faith not less sincere than the Confessions of St. Augustine. Old "Father" Franck was a profoundly religious man. "It is impossible to write good counterpoint unless you are pure of heart," he said, and, while this statement may not be literally true, for Wagner wrote marvelous counterpoint in "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," nevertheless it is assuredly true that such spiritual melody as Cesar Franck's was never penned by any but an innocent and holy man.

LED WITH LOVE FOR WORK.

So we sat in our places in Festival Hall and let the devout rapture of the music sink into our souls. Dr. Muck led with as manifest a love for the work as if Franck had been a German, not a Belgian, and I thanked the high gods that the merciless war cannot rob us of this inspired music. Weighed in the balance of the muses, that little three-note phrase which sings throughout the symphony is of more worth than all the death-dealing skill that is ruining Europe today.

After the symphony we had a philosophic Scherzo, to wit, the overture written by Paul Dukas to the "Apprenti Soricer." It is a sort of musical allegory, telling how passion, seductively ingratiating in its first advances, becomes an enslaving master with indulgence, and in the end a merciless tyrant. "But would one guess that, if one listened as a little child?" you may ask. To that reasonable objection I reply that the boy who reads "The Pilgrim's Progress" as a story may not appreciate the allegory at first; but its meaning will come home to him sooner or later, and it will do so with all the greater force because he first regarded Christian and Faithful and Giant Despair and Evangelist as real persons, not abstractions.

HAS SINISTER ALLUREMENT.

You do not need to know the story to recognize the sinister allurement of that theme for bassoons. It begins with fascination, and eventually, with the scream of trumpets, the squealing of piccolos, and the serrated song of violins, puts on a Macabre-like menace. If Berlioz had not written his "Fantastic" Symphony, and Saint Saens his "Danse Macabre," Dukas would never have composed this overture.

I wish I could express in words the vertiginous riot of that music as the Bostonians played it. It was orchestral virtuosity of an unsurpassable kind.

But it was a relief to turn to the pastoral sweetness of Bizet's "Aresienne" suite. Bizet is one of the great ones of music, and this score is as grateful to the spirit as one of the finest canvasses of Corot. Never did wood-wind sing more mellifluously or tell a tale of longing and tender melancholy more eloquently. We would have liked the Adagietto repeated; but the laws of the Boston Symphony are like the laws of the Medes and the Persians, not to be changed, and that is aesthetically as it should be.

ENDS WITH "ESPANA."

The concert ended with Chabrier's glowing "Espana." Men have talked of France, as if it were decadent. But a decadent country does not create or its people love music like this. Incidentally it is interesting to note that though the facture of the work is Gallic, the material, the tunes of which the orchestral web is fabricated, are the folk-dances of the Spanish peasantry. You many imagine how the orchestra revelled in those incisive rhythms, and how the tonal picture blazed with color. Dr. Muck brought out the lovely detail like the exquisite master of miniature that he is. But he is a miniaturist who can also think in ample forms; he has the rare gift of combining delicacy and force.

To-night the programme will be devoted to the three B's, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. The Bach will be the "Shepherds' Music" from the "Christmas Oratorio" and the Suite in B minor for flute and strings; Brahms' First Symphony will be played, and Beethoven's magnificent overture to "Egmont."

Yesterday's audience was another splendid gathering. San Franciscans have risen nobly to the occasion.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 16 1915

DR. MUCK'S GENIUS SHINES IN BIG PROGRAMME

Second Symphony Concert Is Heard by Enthusiastic Music Lovers.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

Two expressions of genius, at least, marked yesterday's programmes at Festival Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its second schedule of wonder-music under Dr. Karl Muck's crisp and undebatable leadership. One was found in the assembling of the programme—and the other in its interpretation. It is nothing short of a flash of genius that envisages Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Haydn's archaically charming "Surprise" symphony and Liszt's almost hysterical "Hungaria." It is true that both Mendelssohn and MacDowell took turns at interpreting moods of the sea, but, save in the name, there is nothing else in common, and while Haydn, in biblical language, begat Beethoven, and Beethoven begat Schumann and Schumann begat Brahms and Brahms begat a numerous progeny, including Liszt and others who have gone astray, it is certain that a distance immeasurable parts Grandpa Haydn from the able Liszt.

A brooding beauty hovers over the opening measures of Mendelssohn's "Sea." It is not at all the vast expanse which MacDowell precipitated, so to say, in his little sea sketch. It is without storm or tumult or tempest; but as peaceful as are always the moods of gentle Felix. The orchestra showed again what it was capable of in pianissimo passages, though in this there were reaches that stretched closer to silence in the Haydn symphony than in the Mendelssohn tone poem. Haydn put the huge audience in splendid humor. We laughed in the andante and wanted to dance in the minuet movement. The former was the refinement of tonal and dynamic control and the latter was the last expresion of rhythmic perfection. To the andante was brought the result of many rehearsals for first violins, so that the thirty players in that section conjoined in the production of a unison tone so delicate, brief and vibrant that it wouldn't even drown the humming of the wings of a dragon fly. As for the minuet, Du Maupasant must have heard some such interpretation of the third movement of Haydn's G major symphony just befor he wrote his quaint Paris story of the ancient ballet dancer and her decrepit partner who enjoyed a brief hour of rejuvenation and danced as never they danced before.

Naturally the MacDowell "Indian Suite" is monotonous, rhythmically; naturally, too, it is interesting melodically, and still more to be expected is the fact that it is remarkable harmonically. Whether it is Indian throughout does not matter, but there may be found a commentary which adaptors of essentially alien music should note in the circumstance that the best movement of the suite—the last—was the least obviously Indian.

Today's programme, beginning at 2:30, will be as follows:

Cesar Franck...........Symphony in D minor
I. Lento. Allegro non tropps.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Dukas....................."L'Apprenti Sorcier"
(The Sorcerer's Apprentice), Scherzo (after a ballade of Goethe).
Bizet............Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1
Music to Alphonse Daudet's play.
I. Prelude.
II. Minuetto.
III. Adagietto.
IV. Carillon.
Chabrier...Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 15 1915

GREAT OVATION GIVEN BOSTON SYMPHONISTS

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

They had told us that the Boston ymphony Orchestra was perfection; d we whose musical experience has een confined to the West had beeved them, as well as we could, ever having heard orchestral perfecion and having nothing to go by: o today, after last night's opening oncert at Festival Hall, there is othing to do but repeat what we ave been told, with a better unerstanding—the Boston Symphony rchestra is perfection.

Perfection is now perceived to mean an unmarred suavity; unity among a hundred musicians to a degree that is absolute and incredible; and yet independence of the individual player, miraculously preserved within the limits of this unity, so that the deeds of separate artists—Witek and Noack, the violinists; Maquarre, the flutist; Longy, the oboist; Warnke and Malkin, the 'cellists; Sadony, the bassoon player, and that wonderful horn section led by Wendler and Jaenicke—somehow jut out in recollection, without in the least marring the impression that the orchestra really consists of the single personality of that most quiet and overwhelming of conductors, Dr. Karl Muck.

UNITY AND INDIVIDUALITY.

That is the orchestral paradox—slavery and freedom at one and the same time. Never has this paradox been brought home to us as in last night's concert. The Marxians have shouted that this conditon was possible on earth, and we have not believed them. It is easier to believe that if a man sinks his individuality in a collective whole, all thought of individuality is thereby sacrificed. But if you perceive the aroma of joy over every phrase of last night's music, it only remains to realize that this joy comes to each man in doing his share—that is it, doing his share—of the magnificent whole; and you get a vision of a whole world that acts in perfect rhythm and ensemble, and thereby gains for its members a joy that friction or disaccord cannot bring. Whether or not such a world would need a Dr. Muck at its head is still the thing to argue about.

"EROICA" SYMPHONY.

Beethoven's deep-felt adoration of heroism was laid bare to us in the "Eroica" symphony. The funeral march movement was seen once more to be the height of his high work. But the whole thing was new—new because Beethoven has not been so played before when we have been privileged to listen. The sharp-tapping rhythms, simple melodic phrases and calm, impressive orchestral variety were set forth in a way that will not soon be forgotten.

Then we had Brahms' variations on a Haydn theme; the theme, by the way, being merely the excuse and starting point for a revel of the Brahms complexity and cryptic humor. These variations are a Britannica of orchestration; it seemed that no instrument failed to have its chance, and that each was used in the manner best suited to its own personality. On previous hearings this piece has seemed understanding; it is curious to recall that now, seeing it was the most deeply enjoyed portion of last night's concert.

THEATRICAL STRAUSS.

The Strauss "Don Juan" brought us to the theatrical, just when the sublime and the intellectual had been sated. This isn't the most Straussian Strauss; Wagner with a sense of humor might have written it; it is character-drawing rather than psychology, and you saw the daredevil, moody, urbane, irrepressible scapegrace, rioting triumphantly through his lawless erotic adventures. Here the soloists had their obvious opportunity, and there was a beautiful violin solo by Witek, a flute solo, a brilliant passage for the 'celli, some delicious horn work and some flaming thrusts by the trumpets, to carry away and gloat over while young. It was all very stagey and supremely brilliant, with something about it for the deeper judgment to reject.

The romantic Weber overture to "Euryanthe" concluded the concert.

Never, after hearing this orchestra, will San Francisco be satisfied with a second-rate organization. If I had a million dollars——

SPLENDID PROGRAMS.

Here are the programs for this afternoon and tomorrow:

Today at 2:30 o'clock:

Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage". Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
"Surprise" Symphony..........Haydn
Indian Suite................Macdowell
"Hungaria," symphonic poem...Liszt

Tomorrow at 2:30 o'clock (French program):

D minor symphony....Cesar Franck
"L'Apprenti Sorcier" (scherzo).......................Dukas
"L'Arlesienne" Suite...........Bizet
Rhapsody, "Espana".........Chabrier

Club Women Coming

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 15 1915

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT RIOT OF HARMONY

By ARTHUR L. PRICE

While listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Festival hall, it was most agreeable to think that one was in the Exposition grounds. It was appropriate that such a unified and perfectly assembled tone of sound should be heard in so brilliant a setting. Of course, once in Festival Hall, one might as well be anywhere, but it was pleasant to think that about the hall in which one sat and heard the splendid orchestra which Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, has merged into one great strument, were the structures and grounds of the Jewel City. It was a happy thought to have the orchestra come in the first place, and a suitable and consistent development to have the concerts given in the ideal city of festival and culture. Why does not a tone-poet or a symphony composer prepare a great musical composition on an exposition?

BAY SECTION RESPONDS

San Francisco responded fittingly to the enterprise of the Boston Symphony—not only San Francisco, but all the bay section came in its musical and cultural masses, and from distant points outside and inside the state gathered last night to greet the musicians that came from Boston. More than 3500 were in the audience that filled the newly arranged in Festival Hall. It must have been an inspiring audience to the orchestra, and surely the orchestra was inspiring to the audience. One read the names of the members of the Boston orchestra and wondered just how much the historic Boston people had to do with forming its personnel. For there was not a Cabot, or a Lodge, or a Lowell, or a Lawrence, or an Adams, or an Emerson, a Hollmes or a Quincy in the list. The only real old Boston name that appears on the program is that of Philip Hale, and he represents the literary, not the musical, side of the venture. Mr. Hale writes the historical and descriptive notes in the program, without which too many would be tossed about recklessly on the sea of beautiful tones, without knowing which esthetic straw they had best clutch.

GERMAN NAMES PREDOMINATE

As a matter of fact, the list of orchestra members reads for the most part like a roster of the landwehr, but the music is neutral and universal. The opening number was the German Beethoven's symphony on the French national hero, Napoleon.

The program for last evening included four numbers. As it isn't the etiquette of a symphony orchestra to respond with its fiddles and drums and horns to an encore, the program stayed at four numbers. There was plenty of incentive for an encore, if it had been the acceptable thing. Dr. Muck was called back time after time at the conclusion of the symphony, which opened the program, and at the end of the evening. He gracefully included his players in the reception and signaled to them to stand in response to the applause that filled the vast arched hall. That pleased the audience. The director of an orchestra is the central figure and is the man of transcending importance, but the players who merge their splendid talents in the great effect that is produced, are worthy of all recognition.

A MUSICAL ENTITY

It is a wonderful orchestra that Dr. Muck has brought from Boston for us. An orchestra such as his is not a combination of violins, violas, basses, bassoons, flutes and oboes and English horns, but is a new instrument entirely, just as an organ is not a combination of an electric motor and a number of high standing pipes, but is an intimate animated musical entity. And Dr. Muck is the master who plays the instrument with tenderness, vigor, authority, power.

The numbers presented last evening began with Beethoven's Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica," said to be his musical conception of Napoleon. The second number was Brahm's variation on a theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56a, which is partly mathematical music that seems to have been concocted in a remarkable studio, and partly sheer beautiful music. This was followed by Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20, a composition of great excitement and thrills and beauty, and the evening concluded with Weber's overture to the opera of "Euryanthe," probably better known to the casual concert goer than the other numbers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Festival Hall on afternoons and evenings during the coming week. In its perfection of composite skill and direction, this orchestra is an instrument in itself, more thrilling and inspiring than any single instrument in the musical catalogue may be. As the Bostonians might say, the commingling of the men and their instruments in the orchestra produces "an oversoul music" that is sublime.

From Examiner

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 17 1915

Established: L

DEVOUT MUSIC IS GIVEN BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BY REDFERN MASON.

If you would enter the kingdom of music you must become as little children. To listen to the Boston Symphony in the mental attitude of a Pococurante is to miss half its beauty. But if you can hearken large-eyed, like the little girl who is being told the story of Red Riding Hood, the music will tell you things hidden from the supercilious and critical.

The conviction that this was so came over me yesterday afternoon as I was listening to the Cesar Franck Symphony, the devoutest music penned since Palestrina. I could not prove my assertions, perhaps, but I am sure to the point of certitude that this score is a spiritual confession of faith not less sincere than the Confessions of St. Augustine. Old "Father" Franck was a profoundly religious man. "It is impossible to write good counterpoint unless you are pure of heart," he said, and, while this statement may not be literally true, for Wagner wrote marvelous counterpoint in "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," nevertheless it is assuredly true that such spiritual melody as Cesar Franck's was never penned by any but an innocent and holy man.

LED WITH LOVE FOR WORK.

So we sat in our places in Festival Hall and let the devout rapture of the music sink into our souls. Dr. Muck led with as manifest a love for the work as if Franck had been a German, not a Belgian, and I thanked the high gods that the merciless war cannot rob us of this inspired music. Weighed in the balance of the muses, that little three-note phrase which sings throughout the symphony is of more worth than all the death-dealing skill that is ruining Europe today.

After the symphony we had a philosophic Scherzo, to wit, the overture written by Paul Dukas to the "Apprenti Soricer." It is a sort of musical allegory, telling how passion, seductively ingratiating in its first advances, becomes an enslaving master with indulgence, and in the end a merciless tyrant. "But would one guess that, if one listened as a little child?" you may ask. To that reasonable objection I reply that the boy who reads "The Pilgrim's Progress" as a story may not appreciate the allegory at first; but its meaning will come home to him sooner or later, and it will do so with all the greater force because he first regarded Christian and Faithful and Giant Despair and Evangelist as real persons, not abstractions.

HAS SINISTER ALLUREMENT.

You do not need to know the story to recognize the sinister allurement of that theme for bassoons. It begins with fascination, and eventually, with the scream of trumpets, the squealing of piccolos, and the serrated song of violins, puts on a Macabre-like menace. If Berlioz had not written his "Fantastic" Symphony, and Saint Saens his "Danse Macabre," Dukas would never have composed this overture.

I wish I could express in words the vertiginous riot of that music as the Bostonians played it. It was orchestral virtuosity of an unsurpassable kind.

But it was a relief to turn to the pastoral sweetness of Bizet's "Aresienne" suite. Bizet is one of the great ones of music, and this score is as grateful to the spirit as one of the finest canvasses of Corot. Never did wood-wind sing more mellifluously or tell a tale of longing and tender melancholy more eloquently. We would have liked the Adagietto repeated; but the laws of the Boston Symphony are like the laws of the Medes and the Persians, not to be changed, and that is aesthetically as it should be.

ENDS WITH "ESPANA."

The concert ended with Chabrier's glowing "Espana." Men have talked of France, as if it were decadent. But a decadent country does not create or its people love music like this. Incidentally it is interesting to note that though the facture of the work is Gallic, the material, the tunes of which the orchestral web is fabricated, are the folk-dances of the Spanish peasantry. You many imagine how the orchestra revelled in those incisive rhythms, and how the tonal picture blazed with color. Dr. Muck brought out the lovely detail like the exquisite master of miniature that he is. But he is a miniaturist who can also think in ample forms; he has the rare gift of combining delicacy and force.

To-night the programme will be devoted to the three B's, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. The Bach will be the "Shepherds' Music" from the "Christmas Oratorio" and the Suite in B minor for flute and strings; Brahms' First Symphony will be played, and Beethoven's magnificent overture to "Egmont."

Yesterday's audience was another splendid gathering. San Franciscans have risen nobly to the occasion.

NICLE

San Francisco, Cal.

te MAY 16

DR. MUCK'S GENIUS SHINES IN BIG PROGRAMME

Second Symphony Concert Is Heard by Enthusiastic Music Lovers.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

Two expressions of genius, at least, marked yesterday's programmes at Festival Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its second schedule of wonder-music under Dr. Karl Muck's crisp and undebatable leadership. One was found in the assembling of the programme—and the other in its interpretation. It is nothing short of a flash of genius that envisages Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Haydn's archaically charming "Surprise" symphony and Liszt's almost hysterical "Hungaria." It is true that both Mendelssohn and MacDowell took turns at interpreting moods of the sea, but, save in the name, there is nothing else in common, and while Haydn, in biblical language, begat Beethoven, and Beethoven begat Schumann and Schumann begat Brahms and Brahms begat a numerous progeny, including Liszt and others who have gone astray, it is certain that a distance immeasurable parts Grandpa Haydn from the able Liszt.

A brooding beauty hovers over the opening measures of Mendelssohn's "Sea." It is not at all the vast expanse which MacDowell precipitated, so to say, in his little sea sketch. It is without storm or tumult or tempest; but as peaceful as are always the moods of gentle Felix. The orchestra showed again what it was capable of in pianissimo passages, though in this there were reaches that stretched closer to silence in the Haydn symphony than in the Mendelssohn tone poem. Haydn put the huge audience in splendid humor. We laughed in the andante and wanted to dance in the minuet movement. The former was the refinement of tonal and dynamic control and the latter was the last expresion of rhythmic perfection. To the andante was brought the result of many rehearsals for first violins, so that the thirty players in that section conjoined in the production of a unison tone so delicate, brief and vibrant that it wouldn't even drown the humming of the wings of a dragon fly. As for the minuet, Du Maupasant must have heard some such interpretation of the third movement of Haydn's G major symphony just befor he wrote his quaint Paris story of the ancient ballet dancer and her decrepit partner who enjoyed a brief hour of rejuvenation and danced as never they danced before.

Naturally the MacDowell "Indian Suite" is monotonous, rhythmically; naturally, too, it is interesting melodically, and still more to be expected is the fact that it is remarkable harmonically. Whether it is Indian throughout does not matter, but there may be found a commentary which adaptors of essentially alien music should note in the circumstance that the best movement of the suite—the last—was the least obviously Indian.

Today's programme, beginning at 2:30, will be as follows:

Cesar Franck..........Symphony in D minor
  I. Lento. Allegro non troppe.
  II. Allegretto.
  III. Allegro non troppo.
Dukas....................."L'Apprenti Sorcier"
  (The Sorcerer's Apprentice), Scherzo (after a ballade of Goethe).
Bizet.............Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1
  Music to Alphonse Daudet's play.
  I. Prelude.
  II. Minuetto.
  III. Adagietto.
  IV. Carillon.
Chabrier...Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 15 1915

Estab

GREAT OVATION GIVEN BOSTON SYMPHONISTS

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

They had told us that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was perfection; and we whose musical experience has been confined to the West had believed them, as well as we could, never having heard orchestral perfection and having nothing to go by; so today, after last night's opening concert at Festival Hall, there is nothing to do but repeat what we have been told, with a better understanding—the Boston Symphony Orchestra is perfection.

Perfection is now perceived to mean an unmarred suavity; unity among a hundred musicians to a degree that is absolute and incredible; and yet independence of the individual player, miraculously preserved within the limits of this unity, so that the deeds of separate artists—Witek and Noack, the violinists; Maquarre, the flutist; Longy, the oboist; Warnke and Malkin, the 'cellists; Sadony, the bassoon player, and that wonderful horn section led by Wendler and Jaenicke—somehow jut out in recollection, without in the least marring the impression that the orchestra really consists of the single personality of that most quiet and overwhelming of conductors, Dr. Karl Muck.

UNITY AND INDIVIDUALITY.

That is the orchestral paradox—slavery and freedom at one and the same time. Never has this paradox been brought home to us as in last night's concert. The Marxians have shouted that this conditon was possible on earth, and we have not believed them. It is easier to believe that if a man sinks his individuality in a collective whole, all thought of individuality is thereby sacrificed. But if you perceive the aroma of joy over every phrase of last night's music, it only remains to realize that this joy comes to each man in doing his share—that is it, doing his share—of the magnificent whole; and you get a vision of a whole world that acts in perfect rhythm and ensemble, and thereby gains for its members a joy that friction or disaccord cannot bring. Whether or not such a world would need a Dr. Muck at its head is still the thing to argue about.

"EROICA" SYMPHONY.

Beethoven's deep-felt adoration of heroism was laid bare to us in the "Eroica" symphony. The funeral march movement was seen once more to be the height of this high work. But the whole thing was new—new because Beethoven has not been so played before when we have been privileged to listen. The sharp-tapping rhythms, simple melodic phrases and calm, impressive orchestral variety were set forth in a way that will not soon be forgotten.

Then we had Brahms' variations on a Haydn theme; the theme, by the way, being merely the excuse and starting point for a revel of the Brahms complexity and cryptic humor. These variations are a Britannica of orchestration; it seemed that no instrument failed to have its chance, and that each was used in the manner best suited to its own personality. On previous hearings this piece has seemed understanding; it is curious to recall that now, seeing it was the most deeply enjoyed portion of last night's concert.

THEATRICAL STRAUSS.

The Strauss "Don Juan" brought us to the theatrical, just when the sublime and the intellectual had been sated. This isn't the most Straussian Strauss; Wagner with a sense of humor might have written it; it is character-drawing rather than psychology, and you saw the daredevil, moody, urbane, irrepressible scapegrace, rioting triumphantly through his lawless erotic adventures. Here the soloists had their obvious opportunity, and there was a beautiful violin solo by Witek, a flute solo, a brilliant passage for the 'celli, some delicious horn work and some flaming thrusts by the trumpets, to carry away and gloat over while young. It was all very stagey and supremely brilliant, with something about it for the deeper judgment to reject.

The romantic Weber overture to "Euryanthe" concluded the concert.

Never, after hearing this orchestra, will San Francisco be satisfied with a second-rate organization. If I had a million dollars——

SPLENDID PROGRAMS.

Here are the programs for this afternoon and tomorrow:

Today at 2:30 o'clock:

Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage".Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
"Surprise" Symphony.........Haydn
Indian Suite...............Macdowell
"Hungaria," symphonic poem...Liszt

Tomorrow at 2:30 o'clock (French program):

D minor symphony....Cesar Franck
"L'Apprenti Sorcier" (scherzo)..........................Dukas
"L'Arlesienne" Suite...........Bizet
Rhapsody, "Espana".........Chabrier

Club Women Coming

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 15 1915

884

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT RIOT OF HARMONY

By ARTHUR L. PRICE

While listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Festival hall, it was most agreeable to think that one was in the Exposition grounds. It was appropriate that such a unified and perfectly assembled tone of sound should be heard in so brilliant a setting. Of course, once in Festival Hall, one might as well be anywhere, but it was pleasant to think that about the hall in which one sat and heard the splendid orchestra which Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, has merged into one great strument, were the structures and grounds of the Jewel City. It was a happy thought to have the orchestra come in the first place, and a suitable and consistent development to have the concerts given in the ideal city of festival and culture. Why does not a tone-poet or a symphony composer prepare a great musical composition on an exposition?

BAY SECTION RESPONDS

San Francisco responded fittingly to the enterprise of the Boston Symphony—not only San Francisco, but all the bay section came in its musical and cultural masses, and from distant points outside and inside the state gathered last night to greet the musicians that came from Boston. More than 3500 were in the audience that filled the newly arranged in Festival Hall. It must have been an inspiring audience to the orchestra, and surely the orchestra was inspiring to the audience. One read the names of the members of the Boston orchestra and wondered just how much the historic Boston people had to do with forming its personnel. For there was not a Cabot, or a Lodge, or a Lowell, or a Lawrence, or an Adams, or an Emerson, a Holmes or a Quincy in the list. The only real old Boston name that appears on the program is that of Philip Hale, and he represents the literary, not the musical, side of the venture. Mr. Hale writes the historical and descriptive notes in the program, without which too many would be tossed about recklessly on the sea of beautiful tones, without knowing which esthetic straw they had best clutch.

GERMAN NAMES PREDOMINATE

As a matter of fact, the list of orchestra members reads for the most part like a roster of the landwehr, but the music is neutral and universal. The opening number was the German Beethoven's symphony on the French national hero, Napoleon.

The program for last evening included four numbers. As it isn't the etiquette of a symphony orchestra to respond with its fiddles and drums and horns to an encore, the program stayed at four numbers. There was plenty of incentive for an encore, if it had been the acceptable thing. Dr. Muck was called back time after time at the conclusion of the symphony, which opened the program, and at the end of the evening. He gracefully included his players in the reception and signaled to them to stand in response to the applause that filled the vast arched hall. That pleased the audience. The director of an orchestra is the central figure and is the man of transcending importance, but the players who merge their splendid talents in the great effect that is produced, are worthy of all recognition.

A MUSICAL ENTITY

It is a wonderful orchestra that Dr. Muck has brought from Boston for us. An orchestra such as his is not a combination of violins, violas, basses, bassoons, flutes and oboes and English horns, but is a new instrument entirely, just as an organ is not a combination of an electric motor and a number of high standing pipes, but is an intimate animated musical entity. And Dr. Muck is the master who plays the instrument with tenderness, vigor, authority, power.

The numbers presented last evening began with Beethoven's Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica," said to be his musical conception of Napoleon. The second number was Brahm's variation on a theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56a, which is partly mathematical music that seems to have been concocted in a remarkable studio, and partly sheer beautiful music. This was followed by Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20, a composition of great excitement and thrills and beauty, and the evening concluded with Weber's overture to the opera of "Euryanthe," probably better known to the casual concert goer than the other numbers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Festival Hall on afternoons and evenings during the coming week. In its perfection of composite skill and direction, this orchestra is an instrument in itself, more thrilling and inspiring than any single instrument in the musical catalogue may be. As the Bostonians might say, the commingling of the men and their instruments in the orchestra produces "an oversoul music" that is sublime.

[174]

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 17 1915

Establ

MUSIC OF FRANCE CAPTURES BIG AUDIENCE

Boston Symphonists Heard in Modern Works by Gallic Composers.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

With each rehearing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the consciousness of the auditor is expanded to make room for its new conceptions of the possibilities of instrumental music. Each recital has been a deeper, finer revealment, and each offering has led us at least a step farther up the heights where vistas are vast and where only genius lives and creates.

It was a brutal remark, perhaps, but there was a grim germ of truth in what a neighbor of mine said to her friend—and which I overheard—yesterday in Festival Hall after the Chabrier Rhapsody had shouted itself to silence. This is what she remarked:

"It seems as though the orchestras we have had and heard have just been for the purpose of showing us how the 'tunes' were supposed to 'go.'"

THE REAL DIFFERENCE.

The difference is not so much in the matter of the individuals comprising the orchestra—for we have many of the finest at home. The difference is a matter of conductor and rehearsals. It is, in short, the difference between a permanent orchestra organized for symphony and an orchestra with which the presentation of symphony is merely casual and a "high spot" between cafe, theater and cabaret engagements.

If the coming of Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have no other result (I except the eternal memories of its pre-heavenly harmonies) than to show San Francisco the abysmal difference between the great and the nearly great in music, and to persuade us in favor of a really "permanent" orchestra and a director of genuine distinction—as such—it will have accomplished that for which it was dedicated by Higginson, its founder. It will have spread the gospel of great music.

Caesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor was the first of yesterday's offerings. With material almost as bald of apparent possibilities as Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the first movement opened in sober, solemn, yet spiritual beauty.

A TENDER SONG.

It was agreeable to note how instantly the entire orchestra adopted the mood of the magnetic director. No waiting to "warm up" was here, but a spirit as immediate as that which animates the thoroughbred everywhere. A tender song which found its most congenial place in the heart of the wood winds and a vigorous theme (a scale passage) were some of the elements which Franck toyed with and developed and made beautiful. The conclusion of the movement brought out, to a greater degree than we have yet heard, the solidity of the orchestra's tone, and the bright major chord at the close was as a firm and beautiful promise.

If the second movement was the most popular it was perhaps because of the languid melody much given to the sultry tones of the English horn; to the harp's delicate tracery of harmony and to the whispering strings which sang of a soul state in exquisite peace with the world and God. This movement, tempered with tender sadness in places, was an exhibition of silence made audible. With every violinist to right and left of the leader's hands bowing his strings, there yet resulted a conjoined tone of such softness as few players are able to secure on their single violin; and, paradoxically, the music seemed the stiller because of the multitude engaged in suppressing noise.

MARVELOUS COLORING.

The third movement was best, but that was because it was made up mainly of the preceding two movements, and a single hearing of the work cannot possibly be expected to yield complete conception of the formal perfection of this most beatific symphony. In review its greatness develops.

If tone was reduced to its lowest dimensions in the second movement of the Franck symphony, it was given its most marvelous coloring in the Adagietto from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite No. 1. Here with equal repression of volume there was added a warmth and color with only a great virtuoso like Kreisler or Elman, or else a great number of players under a virtuoso conductor, can paint in sound's symmetrical vibrations. This movement was luminous and limpid like the surface of a Corot landscape. How many times have we heard the Bizet Suite? Innumerable times, you say. That's because you didn't hear Dr. Muck's interpretation yesterday. If you had you would agree that we have heard it but once.

Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" served the manifold purpose of making the audience laugh at the grotesqueries in the sorcerer's shop; thrill at the blunt dissonances in which Dukas revels, and finally to exhibit the individual virtuosity of each section of [illegible] at Dukas' humor. It seems sinister, and sometimes as though he were sardonically laughing. It is never the rollicking, robust humor of Beethoven or the melancholy merriment of Chopin.

Chabrier's "Espana" brought the programme to a close with an apotheosis of Spanish music, as frenzied almost as Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody in climacteric madness.

It was truly a great programme played marvelously.

Indeed, yesterday was France's at the exposition, so far as music was concerned, for reluctantly we had to part with Gabriele Pares' French band last night. The farewell concert was given in Festival Hall to a large audience and to big enthusiasm, dampened by the thought that this splendid body of musicians was about to leave us for—how long? The French band has placed itself in a unique niche by the refinement of its tone quality and the high standard of its gallic programmes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth concert of the series at Festival Hall tonight at 8:30 sharp and those attending are requested by the management to be in their seats at that time, as no one will be seated while Dr. Muck is conducting the famous organization of one hundred artists. The programme is as follows:

Brahms Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68; J. S. Bach Suite for flute and strings in B minor, No. 2: (Solo, flute, Andre Maquarre); J. S. Bach Symphony (Shepherds' music) from the Christmas oratorio; Beethoven overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 18 1915

Es 384

* * * *

The actual presence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city is an event which will cause constant satisfaction. The coming of Dr. Muck to America in 1906 created a standard for orchestral work which has not been excelled. He has inspired the body as no other leader ever has and at the end of his leave of absence to this country, by permission of the German Emperor, the leave was extended, though it was not possible to engage Dr. Muck as permanent conductor for the orchestra until 1912. He has placed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the unassailable position of being the finest in the world.

Matinees at Festival Hall will be given today and next Saturday and Sunday, with performances every night except Saturday and Sunday. Tuesday night, May 25th, will be the last performance.

* * * *

From NEWS
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 14 1915

Est .884

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAS NO WAR SPIRIT

The harmonious qualities of music were exemplified today with the lodging in San Francisco of 49 Germans, two Englishmen, nine Austrians, four Russians, five Belgians, four Frenchmen, 15 Americans and four Hollanders, all intact after a trip across the continent together as the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Germans and the English and the French and the Austrians played pinochle together without the slightest of hard feelings. Their noted conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, will direct them in a series of concerts at Festival Hall on the Exposition grounds, beginning tonight, for 12 night concerts and four afternoon ones.

San Francisco Chroni

DR. KARL MUCK, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, who arrived yesterday morning with the famous instrumental organization, after a trip across the continent, during which no stops were made between the Massachusetts metropolis and California's.

SAN FRANCISCO EXAMINER—

—TUESDAY, MAY 18, 1915.

BEETHOVEN, BRAHMS AND BACH PLAYED

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Notable Concert From World's Greatest Masters

MAGNIFICENT WORK DONE

Dr. Karl Muck Leads His Players Through Beautiful and Enthralling Programme

BY REDFERN MASON.

"To-night there are four of them." Time has stolen away four days of the greatest festival of music San Francisco has ever had, or is likely to have, and the words of the lamented Ali Baba came into my head like a warning to make the best use of the eight days which remain.

Last night's concert was devoted to Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, the "Three B's," as Von Bulow called them. Now the three B's are classics, albeit romantic classics, and the popular idea of classical music is something which sounds difficult and is dreadfuly dull. So I must sadly confess that there were not so many people in Festival Hall last night to hear the Boston Symphony as there ought to have been. Still, it was a goodly crowd, probably about 2,500, and those who came were made happy.

FIRST BRAHMS SYMPHONY.

For we had the first Brahms Symphony, the one in C minor, which has been referred to as Beethoven's tenth, meaning thereby, I suppose, that it is the kind of work he would have written if he had been spared. But it is nothing of the sort; for, apart from a common indebtedness to the German volkslied and a sovereign gift of patience, they had not really a great deal in common. Beethoven would have approved of Brahms' dictum that a work of art must be perfect, whether it is beautiful or not. But there is a dignity and breadth in the Beethovenian moledy to which, save in a comparatively few inspired moments, Brahms did not rise. One of those great moments is in the C minor symphony. The chorale-like theme of the Finale is curiously suggestive of the Ninth Symphony, but not in a plagiaristic sense. We are happy unspeakably when the Bostonians played that music; happy, too, in the lovely Andante.

MIGHTIEST MAN OF MUSIC.

After Brahms came Bach, the mightiest man of music Germany ever begat—or any other country. He came of a race of musicians; the Bachs of old were town-pipers such as you will see in the etchings of Albert Durer, men for whom music was a trade, which they were apprenticed to and followed as conscientiously as if it were shoemaking or tailoring. And, when Bach came across a composition in a new fashion, he imitated it, just as a cobbler might copy a kind of shoe that was new to him.

The lovely suite in B minor, played by flute and strings, with Andre Maquarre as soloist, illustrates his method of going to work. He wrote numbers on the rhythms of old dances borrowed from France, from Poland and Spain; wrote an overture in the form sanctioned by Lully, and added a "Badinerie" which is a veritable tour de force of musical witticism. Do you want to know how the Boston strings played this music and how Mr. Maquarre broidered it with elegant, wistful and sportive melody? I can only assure you that it was beautiful exceedingly, literally an exhibition of flawless musicianship.

OF OLD ARCADIAN TYPE.

There was another Bach number and, to my mind, a greater; it was the "Shepherds' Music" from the "Christmas Oratorio." It is a sort of transcendental variety of the kind of music the Calabrian bagpipers still play at Christmas before the crib of the infant Jesus. I don't doubt that originally they danced as well; for the melody is of the old Arcadian type which Virgil must have listened to when he taught the Mantuan groves to sing the name of Amarillis. One theme suggests the angels; for it is a phrase which Bach always uses when his music has to do with the people of heaven; then the strings sing a sort of bucolic lullaby. It seems as if it were going on forever, and I always grieve that it doesn't.

Last of the trio came Beethoven, represented by one of the finest of his overtures, the immortal "Egmont," second only to the "Leonora No. 3." This is war music, with hoarse clangor of brass, themes that cleave the air like a falchion, and contrasting melodies that speak of love. The Bach was largely music of reverie; philosophy and the nature-note entered into the Brahms; but here was action. Egmont was a hero, and marvelously those strings and throbbing double-basses and trumpets proclaimed it.

Now we are hearing the authentic Beethoven, the Beethoven whom music-lovers have hailed as the greatest master of the orchestra. When Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony play him, he seems as great as his reputation.

To-night Wagner, and all San Francisco will be there.

From

AN FRANCISCO EXAMINER—SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1915.

BOSTONIANS CAST SPELL OVER FIRST-NIGHT AUDIENCE

Symphony Orchestra, With Dr. Karl Muck as Its Leader, Reveals Itself in All That Has Been Claimed for It.

BY REDFERN MASON.

There are seats for some 3,700 persons in Festival Hall, and they were all filled last night save a beggarly couple of hundred. That is San Francisco's act of faith in the Boston Symphony. True, the audience were not all San Franciscans. People had come from Denver, from Los Angeles, from a hundred places large and small in the Western States, and some had crossed the continent in order to combine the delights of the Exposition and the privilege of hearing the greatest orchestra in the world.

It has been said that people often imagine themselves in love, but when the genuine visitation comes upon them, there is no room for doubt. Falling in love with orchestras presents the same symptoms, and, when one hears the Bostonians, the sense of superiority, of abounding musical grace, of an art so perfect that it seems natural and instinctive, sweeps down on one, complete and overwhelming.

NEVER ROBBED OF CHARM.

I have heard the Boston Symphony many times, but theirs is a perfection which familiarity never robs of its charm. If any considerable part of the audience had wondered whether those stories about the growth of the organization, the slow gathering together of the best artists in every section from all parts of the world, were mere press agentry, that attitude of hesitancy gave place to the plenitude of ecstatic belief as soon as the instruments began to give out the glories of the "Eroica"

We in San Francisco have been told that Beethoven is old-fashioned, that his methods are schoolmasterly and uninspired. But when Dr. Muck drew forth the golden sonorities of the theme in which the supreme symphonic architect portrayed his conception of the ideal hero, the most confirmed modernist present must have felt that here was true musical inspiration

AS IF HYPNOTIZED

I never saw a more delighted or more attentive audience. They listened as if hypnotized. Could this be an orchestra? It seemed like a mighty organ of which every integer was a living soul, and the slight, nervously intense man silhouetted before them was the god who commanded its utterance. We have heard what purported to be Beethoven before in this western capital. But here was Beethoven authentic and august, an outpouring of tonal poetry which touched the sublime. Listen to those pianissimos; they are not merely dulcet; they are tremulous with power, Appolonian breathings, the whisperings of Pan and the sighings of the choir of nymphs. When the reeds gave out that lovely second theme the audience was tense with a pleasure that had something poignant in it. The famous Funeral March, a number so apt to drag if the director is not a man of poetic depth, moved along in a dirge-like luxury of woe. I never heard the flute give out notes of a more anguished beauty. The movement seemed almost prophetic, and one wondered for what warring potentate it might be singing the song of doom.

SOFT AS SPRING RAIN.

Then the horns gave out the chant of apotheosis. Never did this "brazen alchemy" sing with a more eloquent loveliness. The scherzo tripped with a lightness soft as the pattering of spring rain; the great finale left us breathless with joy.

"The voice of the people is the voice of God," runs the old saying We are prone to belittle the multitude and think that esthetic virtue is the privilege of the coterie. But in the presence of great art the people are rarely at fault. It may mistake tinsel for gold, but a masterpiece of the first order, played as the Boston Symphony played the "Eroica," appeals to the diviner part of all of us, and the man in the street, like his neighbor the connoisseur, is lifted out of himself.

GIVEN OVATION AT CLOSE.

It was an ovation with which the audience greeted Dr. Muck at the close of the symphony. They had heard a master and they knew him for what he was. Here was an artist who diffused that subtle essence which we call authority. When he waved the baton you had a sense of control, of mastery. The beat seemed to draw the tone. That his work was inspired in the improvisational sense of the word, Dr. Muck would be the first to deny. The wonderful effects, ranging from a delicate suspiration of wood, wind or strings to the thunder of brass, are all carefully prepared and rehearsed beforehand. But this master of men, armed with inward and compelling power, can, by magic of glance and gesture, renew the spell at will and beget anew a masterpiece.

VELVETY VOICE OF 'CELLOS.

It was a relief, after the deep passion of the "Eroica," to hear the artfully conceited variations which Johannes Brahms has written on the "St. Antony" theme of Josef Haydn. Here was orchestra virtuosity, but virtuosity which never went beyond the confines of beauty. Now we could marvel at the velvety voice of the 'cellos and be ravished by the cooing of the clarinet. In the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss we had the modernism of a master who knows his Bach and his Beethoven, a composer who can seem to defy the tradition of the masters, because he so thoroughly knows the code of aesthetic diplomacy. I never heard more splendid brass than the trombones in that initial theme, or more impassioned outpouring of lovelorn sentiment than the oboe gave out in the principal love episode.

Dr. Muck is no loose impressionist, no vague diffuser of honeyed atmosphere. Under his beat the instrumental discourse has the clarity of a Socratic argument; the themes are clean-cut as the facets of a cameo. The work is ever an organic whole, with a sense of logical continuity that would have delighted old Johann Sebastian. One felt that the director was leading his men through the well remembered pages of a tale which he knew as well as you and I know our way home. The complex became lucid; passages which, in the hands of a lesser man, would be vague and unconvincing, were understandable as an argument conducted by a master of forensic art.

REVEL IN SHEER BEAUTY.

The "Euryanthe" overture ended the concert, a romantic masterpiece in which the instruments revel in sheer beauty. The programme had been arranged in veritable sonata form, with its highest appeal first, its dainty interlude, its emotional middle movement, and its relatively carefree conclusion.

We had had our moods of exaltation and tender emotion; now we could yield ourselves to pure enjoyment. And I do not believe that an audience ever spent a more delightful evening than we San Franciscans spent last night. The Boston Symphony had realized our dearest hopes, and we found ourselves determining that we, too, in this western world, would have a symphony orchestra worthy of our highest ideals. A splendid discontent is being sown in California hearts; and I do not think we shall have to wait very long for it to bear fruit.

To-day's concert will take place in the afternoon. It will open with Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Haydn's "Surprise" symphony will be the second number; then will come that masterpiece of American music, the "Indian" suite of Macdowell, and the concluding number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 18 1915

2500 REVEL IN WONDERS OF SYMPHONY

Bach, Beethoven and Brahms made up the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Festival Hall last night. Dr. Karl Muck's magic baton proved equal to the formidable array of "Three B's" and brought forth from his players a beautiful and enthralling rendition of the romantic classics that charmed the audience gathered to hear America's greatest orchestra.

Perhaps it was the slightly threatening weather or perhaps the popular mind fought shy of the "dreadful B's," for not quite the large audience was present as on previous occasions, though a goodly crowd of over 2500 was present.

UNDERSTOOD BY ALL

But there was no need to fear that the program would be intricate or beyond understanding, for under the masterful sway of Dr. Muck the orchestra made Brahms popular, Bach sprightly and Beethoven noble.

The first Brahms symphony, the one in C minor, was played. It was neither an intricate Brahms nor a sensualized symphony. It was played serenely with a dignity and breadth and inspiration that left the [illegible] on the heights of happiness, as if, after a long walk through a shaded path, they had come upon the great composer in a new light.

Many who had before looked askance at Brahms symphonies became loyal partisans of the works. Dr. Muck's direction was a triumph of clarity, elegance and beauty.

TECHNIQUE IS FLAWLESS

Next came Bach, Germany's mighty music master. The suite in B minor, played by flute and strings, with Andre Maquarre as soloist, became for San Franciscans an elegant, wistful and sportive melody. The Bostonians made that Bach melody a flawless exhibition of music.

The last of the trio was Beethoven. This master was represented by the finest of his overtures, the immortal "Egmont." Here the audience felt the sway of militarism, for "Egmont" is war music, with its dull clangor of brass and themes that seem to smite the air asunder. Deep within the music was a thrilling melody of contrast that spoke of love that the strings and throbbing double basses and trumpets could not drown.

NEW INTERPRETATIONS

The faithful lovers of music who had braved the terrors of the "Three B's" left Festival Hall last night with new ideas on the music of the composers whose great triumphs were rendered by the Boston musicians. Bach, they learned, was music of reverie; Brahms was nature and philosophy; Beethoven was heroic.

Tonight's program will be Wagner, and with Wagner in Festival Hall all San Francisco will be there, or as many as can bulge within the walls of Festival Hall.

This is the program that will be offered:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser."
Act 1 (Paris version).
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 17 1915

SYMPHONY IS ENJOYED BY BIG AUDIENCES

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is being supported by San Franciscans in the way it deserves. For the opening night the audience numbered about 3600; Saturday afternoon, with a somewhat lighter program, it was 2800; while yesterday perhaps 3000 persons heard the first program of French composers. If it is true, as rumored, that the Exposition is paying $60,000 for the services of these magnificent musicians, with an added guarantee cf $15,000 for expenses, then these attendance figures show that the effort has not failed of appreciation. Indeed, the effort is made in the noblest and finest of causes. No musical experience could be better worth remembering, I firmly believe, than the listening to this orchestra.

Yesterday the program gave us heaven and its profound opposite, in immediate contrast. Heaven was represented by the Cesar Frank D minor symphony—the purest and most reverential of music, yet written in the idiom of an age to which the message is sadly unfamiliar. There is an interesting analogy between Franck and Francis Thompson, which those who have had a glimpse of both may trace out at their leisure. At any rate, they stand there to prove that the humble religious spirit is not inconsistent with modern complexity. Dr. Muck and his artists brought from this music the most beautiful reply of faith to skepticism.

DEMONIAC MUSIC.

Immediately afterward came Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier," a scherzo as unspiritual, as develishly intellectual, as could be imagined. It broke up all the vibrations of the preceding and started new and earthlier ones in their place. This seems to be a favorite device of Dr. Muck as program-builder. Friday night he gave us the mordant Brahms variations right after the "Eroica" symphony of hero-worshiping Beethoven. The Dukas number was played with matchless skill and dash.

Bizet's "Arlesienne" suite, a cool pastoral, followed, with an appeal as different again as could be imagined. The final number was Chabrier's "Espana," written by a Frenchman who remains French while talking Spanish, but who blazes with the warmth of both nations. The orchestra painted a very complex and beautiful picture, clever and well designed.

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM.

Tonight the program is an important one. It consists wholly of Brahms, Bach and Beethoven. There will be the first symphony of Brahms, the Bach suite in B minor for flute and strings, with Maquarre playing the solo flute; the Bach "Shepherd's Music" from the Christmas oratorio, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Tomorrow night the Wagner concert will be given. It is a notable program, and judging from past Wagnerian concerts here, the audience will be a notable audience.

176

From Examiner

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 16 1915

DR. KARL MUCK DINNER GUEST

Musicians' Club Members Hear Addresses at Meeting Welcoming Orchestra Leader.

Dr. Karl Muck was the guest of the Musicians' Club at a dinner given at the Clift Hotel last night. It was a congratulatory getting together of music lovers. Alexander T. Stewart, president of the club, felicitated the club on the coming of the Boston Symphony and of the great man who is its director.

Speeches were also made by John Haraden Pratt, Robert Toulmie, J. B. Levison and others. Levison spoke hopefully of the effect of the coming of the world's greatest orchestra to the Coast and expressed the belief that its effects would be far reaching.

Pratt, who was a student at the Leipsic Conservatory while Dr. Muck was there, recalled old student days and a photograph was passed round which Dr. Muck, then a poetic looking youth of twenty, gave to Metcalfe, one of the club members, in those days gone by.

Asked to welcome Dr. Muck on behalf of the German community in San Francisco, Dr. Max Magnus widened the scope of his welcome so as to include all good music-lovers, taking the ground that music is not a national trait, but a virture inherent in the whole human race. Max Bendix also welcomed the great leader.

The company would fain have had a few words from their guest; but, like Moltke, he is silent in a variety of tongues, reserving his eloquence for the language of the orchestra.

C. E. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony, responded on his behalf. George W. Stewart was another silent orator. He dislikes public speaking. Besides, bringing the Symphony to San Francisco spoke for him with sufficient eloquence.

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 18 1915

DR. MUCK MAKES BRAHMS POPULAR

Classical Programme Proves Clarity Itself Because Properly Played.

NO STING IN "THREE B'S"

Bach and Beethoven Given Sensitive Interpretation in Festival Hall.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

As was to have been expected, the audience last night in Festival Hall "fell off" slightly. Programme No. 4 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was deemed too formidable, probably because it bristled with "Three B's," which to many whose ears have been abused means "Beware" three times. So Bach, Beethoven and Brahms were presented to the smallest audience that has yet assembled to watch Dr. Karl Muck's marvelous baton evoke marvelous music. It should not have been so, for this director's Sunday night manipulation of the usually too-obscure Franck's symphonic beauties was sufficient evidence of his ability to make Brahms as popular as that introspective composer would care to be. As for Bach, this conductor made the old fugue master dance his sprightliest and quaintest or sing his most ethereal songs in the "Christmas" symphony, while Beethoven was represented in his turgid, noble and splendid "Egmont" overture, which needs no guide to its wonders, even when quite indifferently interpreted.

However, do not misunderstand me. The audience was not small. It was, in fact, large, but small in comparison with the preceding audiences and not so large as it should have been.

HERE WAS A NEW BRAHMS.

It seems that there are several ways in which to approach the inner meaning or beauties of Brahm's symphonic scores. One path leads you into labyrinthine mazes of polyphonic patterns, in the center of which sits the gray composer from Hamburg weaving mathematical spells about music, dallying with themes, inverting them, adding them, substracting them and multiplying them interminably. Another road leads to a sensual-

(over)

AN FRANCISCO EXAMINER—SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1915.

BOSTONIANS CAST SPELL OVER FIRST-NIGHT AUDIENCE

Symphony Orchestra, With Dr. Karl Muck as Its Leader, Reveals Itself in All That Has Been Claimed for It.

BY REDFERN MASON.

There are seats for some 3,700 persons in Festival Hall, and they were all filled last night save a beggarly couple of hundred. That is San Francisco's act of faith in the Boston Symphony. True, the audience were not all San Franciscans. People had come from Denver, from Los Angeles, from a hundred places large and small in the Western States, and some had crossed the continent in order to combine the delights of the Exposition and the privilege of hearing the greatest orchestra in the world.

It has been said that people often imagine themselves in love, but when the genuine visitation comes upon them, there is no room for doubt. Falling in love with orchestras presents the same symptoms, and, when one hears the Bostonians, the sense of superiority, of abounding musical grace, of an art so perfect that it seems natural and instinctive, sweeps down on one, complete and overwhelming.

NEVER ROBBED OF CHARM.

I have heard the Boston Symphony many times, but theirs is a perfection which familiarity never robs of its charm. If any considerable part of the audience had wondered whether those stories about the growth of the organization, the slow gathering together of the best artists in every section from all parts of the world, were mere press agentry, that attitude of hesitancy gave place to the plenitude of ecstatic belief as soon as the instruments began to give out the glories of the "Eroica."

We in San Francisco have been told that Beethoven is old-fashioned, that his methods are schoolmasterly and uninspired. But when Dr. Muck drew forth the golden sonorities of the theme in which the supreme symphonic architect portrayed his conception of the ideal hero, the most confirmed modernist present must have felt that here was true musical inspiration.

AS IF HYPNOTIZED

I never saw a more delighted or more attentive audience. They listened as if hypnotized. Could this be an orchestra? It seemed like a mighty organ of which every integer was a living soul, and the slight, nervously intense man silhouetted before them was the god who commanded its utterance. We have heard what purported to be Beethoven before in this western capital. But here was Beethoven authentic and august, an outpouring of tonal poetry which touched the sublime. Listen to those pianissimos; they are not merely dulcet; they are tremulous with power, Appolonian breathings, the whisperings of Pan and the sighings of the choir of nymphs. When the reeds gave out that lovely second theme the audience was tense with a pleasure that had something poignant in it. The famous Funeral March, a number so apt to drag if the director is not a man of poetic depth, moved along in a dirge-like luxury of woe. I never heard the flute give out notes of a more anguished beauty. The movement seemed almost prophetic, and one wondered for what warring potentate it might be singing the song of doom.

SOFT AS SPRING RAIN.

Then the horns gave out the chant of apotheosis. Never did this "brazen alchemy" sing with a more eloquent loveliness. The scherzo tripped with a lightness soft as the pattering of spring rain; the great finale left us breathless with joy.

"The voice of the people is the voice of God," runs the old saying. We are prone to belittle the multitude and think that esthetic virtue is the privilege of the coterie. But in the presence of great art the people are rarely at fault. It may mistake tinsel for gold, but a masterpiece of the first order, played as the Boston Symphony played the "Eroica," appeals to the diviner part of all of us, and the man in the street, like his neighbor the connoisseur, is lifted out of himself.

GIVEN OVATION AT CLOSE.

It was an ovation with which the audience greeted Dr. Muck at the close of the symphony. They had heard a master and they knew him for what he was. Here was an artist who diffused that subtle essence which we call authority. When he waved the baton you had a sense of control, of mastery. The beat seemed to draw the tone. That his work was inspired in the improvisational sense of the word, Dr. Muck would be the first to deny. The wonderful effects, ranging from a delicate suspiration of wood, wind or strings to the thunder of brass, are all carefully prepared and rehearsed beforehand. But this master of men, armed with inward and compelling power, can, by magic of glance and gesture, renew the spell at will and beget anew a masterpiece.

VELVETY VOICE OF 'CELLOS.

It was a relief, after the deep passion of the "Eroica," to hear the artfully conceited variations which Johannes Brahms has written on the "St. Antony" theme of Josef Haydn. Here was orchestra virtuosity, but virtuosity which never went beyond the confines of beauty. Now we could marvel at the velvety voice of the 'cellos and be ravished by the cooing of the clarinet. In the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss we had the modernism of a master who knows his Bach and his Beethoven, a composer who can seem to defy the tradition of the masters, because he so thoroughly knows the code of aesthetic diplomacy. I never heard more splendid brass than the trombones in that initial theme, or more impassioned outpouring of lovelorn sentiment than the oboe gave out in the principal love episode.

Dr. Muck is no loose impressionist, no vague diffuser of honeyed atmosphere. Under his beat the instrumental discourse has the clarity of a Socratic argument; the themes are clean-cut as the facets of a cameo. The work is ever an organic whole, with a sense of logical continuity that would have delighted old Johann Sebastian. One felt that the director was leading his men through the well remembered pages of a tale which he knew as well as you and I know our way home. The complex became lucid; passages which, in the hands of a lesser man, would be vague and unconvincing, were understandable as an argument conducted by a master of forensic art.

REVEL IN SHEER BEAUTY.

The "Euryanthe" overture ended the concert, a romantic masterpiece in which the instruments revel in sheer beauty. The programme had been arranged in veritable sonata form, with its highest appeal first, its dainty interlude, its emotional middle movement, and its relatively carefree conclusion.

We had had our moods of exaltation and tender emotion; now we could yield ourselves to pure enjoyment. And I do not believe that an audience ever spent a more delightful evening than we San Franciscans spent last night. The Boston Symphony had realized our dearest hopes, and we found ourselves determining that we, too, in this western world, would have a symphony orchestra worthy of our highest ideals. A splendid discontent is being sown in California hearts; and I do not think we shall have to wait very long for it to bear fruit.

To-day's concert will take place in the afternoon. It will open with Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Haydn's "Surprise" symphony will be the second number; then will come that masterpiece of American music, the "Indian" suite of Macdowell, and the concluding number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 8 1915

2500 REVEL IN WONDERS OF SYMPHONY

Bach, Beethoven and Brahms made up the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Festival Hall last night. Dr. Karl Muck's magic baton proved equal to the formidable array of "Three B's" and brought forth from his players a beautiful and enthralling rendition of the romantic classics that charmed the audience gathered to hear America's greatest orchestra.

Perhaps it was the slightly threatening weather or perhaps the popular mind fought shy of the "dreadful B's," for not quite the large audience was present as on previous occasions, though a goodly crowd of over 2500 was present.

UNDERSTOOD BY ALL

But there was no need to fear that the program would be intricate or beyond understanding, for under the masterful sway of Dr. Muck the orchestra made Brahms popular, Bach sprightly and Beethoven noble.

The first Brahms symphony, the one in C minor, was played. It was neither an intricate Brahms nor a sensualized symphony. It was played serenely with a dignity and breadth and inspiration that left the audience on the heights of happiness, as if, after a long walk through a shaded path, they had come upon the great composer in a new light.

Many who had before looked askance at Brahms symphonies became loyal partisans of the works. Dr. Muck's direction was a triumph of clarity, elegance and beauty.

TECHNIQUE IS FLAWLESS

Next came Bach, Germany's mighty music master. The suite in B minor, played by flute and strings, with Andre Maquarre as soloist, became for San Franciscans an elegant, wistful and sportive melody. The Bostonians made that Bach melody a flawless exhibition of music.

The last of the trio was Beethoven. This master was represented by the finest of his overtures, the immortal "Egmont." Here the audience felt the sway of militarism, for "Egmont" is war music, with its dull clangor of brass and themes that seem to smite the air asunder. Deep within the music was a thrilling melody of contrast that spoke of love that the strings and throbbing double basses and trumpets could not drown.

NEW INTERPRETATIONS

The faithful lovers of music who had braved the terrors of the "Three B's" left Festival Hall last night with new ideas on the music of the composers whose great triumphs were rendered by the Boston musicians. Bach, they learned, was music of reverie; Brahms was nature and philosophy; Beethoven was heroic.

Tonight's program will be Wagner, and with Wagner in Festival Hall all San Francisco will be there, or as many as can bulge within the walls of Festival Hall.

This is the program that will be offered:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser."
Act 1 (Paris version).
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

Penny Car Line in ress:

Date MAY

SYMPHONY IS ENJOYED BY BIG AUDIENCES

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is being supported by San Franciscans in the way it deserves. For the opening night the audience numbered about 3600; Saturday afternoon, with a somewhat lighter program, it was 2800; while yesterday perhaps 3000 persons heard the first program of French composers. If it is true, as rumored, that the Exposition is paying $60,000 for the services of these magnificent musicians, with an added guarantee of $15,000 for expenses, then these attendance figures show that the effort has not failed of appreciation. Indeed, the effort is made in the noblest and finest of causes. No musical experience could be better worth remembering, I firmly believe, than the listening to this orchestra.

Yesterday the program gave us heaven and its profound opposite, in immediate contrast. Heaven was represented by the Cesar Frank D minor symphony—the purest and most reverential of music, yet written in the idiom of an age to which the message is sadly unfamiliar. There is an interesting analogy between Franck and Francis Thompson, which those who have had a glimpse of both may trace out at their leisure. At any rate, they stand there to prove that the humble religious spirit is not inconsistent with modern complexity. Dr. Muck and his artists brought from this music the most beautiful reply of faith to skepticism.

DEMONIAC MUSIC.

Immediately afterward came Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier," a scherzo as unspiritual, as develishly intellectual, as could be imagined. It broke up all the vibrations of the preceding and started new and earthlier ones in their place. This seems to be a favorite device of Dr. Muck as program-builder. Friday night he gave us the mordant Brahms variations right after the "Eroica" symphony of hero-worshiping Beethoven. The Dukas number was played with matchless skill and dash.

Bizet's "Arlesienne" suite, a cool pastoral, followed, with an appeal as different again as could be imagined. The final number was Chabrier's "Espana," written by a Frenchman who remains French while talking Spanish, but who blazes with the warmth of both nations. The orchestra painted a very complex and beautiful picture, clever and well designed.

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM.

Tonight the program is an important one. It consists wholly of Brahms, Bach and Beethoven. There will be the first symphony of Brahms, the Bach suite in B minor for flute and strings, with Maquarre playing the solo flute; the Bach "Shepherd's Music" from the Christmas oratorio, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Tomorrow night the Wagner concert will be given. It is a notable program, and judging from past Wagnerian concerts here, the audience will be a notable audience.

From Examiner
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 6 1915

DR. KARL MUCK DINNER GUEST

Musicians' Club Members Hear Addresses at Meeting Welcoming Orchestra Leader.

Dr. Karl Muck was the guest of the Musicians' Club at a dinner given at the Clift Hotel last night. It was a congratulatory getting together of music lovers. Alexander T. Stewart, president of the club, felicitated the club on the coming of the Boston Symphony and of the great man who is its director.

Speeches were also made by John Haraden Pratt, Robert Toulmie, J. B. Levison and others. Levison spoke hopefully of the effect of the coming of the world's greatest orchestra to the Coast and expressed the belief that its effects would be far reaching.

Pratt, who was a student at the Leipsic Conservatory while Dr. Muck was there, recalled old student days and a photograph was passed round which Dr. Muck, then a poetic looking youth of twenty, gave to Metcalfe, one of the club members, in those days gone by.

Asked to welcome Dr. Muck on behalf of the German community in San Francisco, Dr. Max Magnus widened the scope of his welcome so as to include all good music-lovers, taking the ground that music is not a national trait, but a virture inherent in the whole human race. Max Bendix also welcomed the great leader.

The company would fain have had a few words from their guest; but, like Moltke, he is silent in a variety of tongues, reserving his eloquence for the language of the orchestra.

C. E. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony, responded on his behalf. George W. Stewart was another silent orator. He dislikes public speaking. Besides, bringing the Symphony to San Francisco spoke for him with sufficient eloquence.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 1 8 1915

DR. MUCK MAKES BRAHMS POPULAR

Classical Programme Proves Clarity Itself Because Properly Played.

NO STING IN "THREE B'S"

Bach and Beethoven Given Sensitive Interpretation in Festival Hall.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

As was to have been expected, the audience last night in Festival Hall "fell off" slightly. Programme No. 4 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was deemed too formidable, probably because it bristled with "Three B's," which to many whose ears have been abused means "Beware" three times. So Bach, Beethoven and Brahms were presented to the smallest audience that has yet assembled to watch Dr. Karl Muck's marvelous baton evoke marvelous music. It should not have been so, for this director's Sunday night manipulation of the usually too-obscure Franck's symphonic beauties was sufficient evidence of his ability to make Brahms as popular as that introspective composer would care to be. As for Bach, this conductor made the old fugue master dance his sprightliest and quaintest or sing his most ethereal songs in the "Christmas" symphony, while Beethoven was represented in his turgid, noble and splendid "Egmont" overture, which needs no guide to its wonders, even when quite indifferently interpreted.

However, do not misunderstand me. The audience was not small. It was, in fact, large, but small in comparison with the preceding audiences and not so large as it should have been.

HERE WAS A NEW BRAHMS.

It seems that there are several ways in which to approach the inner meaning or beauties of Brahm's symphonic scores. One path leads you into labyrinthine mazes of polyphonic patterns, in the center of which sits the gray composer from Hamburg weaving mathematical spells about music, dallying with themes, inverting them, adding them, substracting them and multiplying them interminably. Another road leads to a sensual-ized Brahms played with the vehement quality appropriate to Strauss in his "Domestica" and "Don Juan" tone poems. At the end of this highway is found Brahms dallying with a damsel. In some such spirit we have usually heard Brahms interpreted. There is still a middle highway that leads to the heart of this composer, and down that road we were taken last night by Dr. Muck, and we found a man, serenely walking the fields of God's eternal meadows. Here was a new Brahms—or, rather, here we met him for the first time.

(over)

CALLS SCHUBERT TO MIND.

I should like to know the number of times I heard this remark during and after the performance of the Brahms C minor symphony: "I never cared for Brahms before; he doesn't please me much as a rule—but this, this was lovely!"

Naturally the adagio movement might have been expected to charm even ears demanding the most obvious of tunes. Surely there can be nothing in music's literature more elegaically lovely than the melody intoned first by the French horn, then by the flute to a shimmering accompaniment of delicate violin harmonies. The passage following on the deep G strings of the violins, which sound forth a song of folk-lore simplicity, could not be over the heads of any; but what was significant was the effectiveness of the first movement and the solemnities of the second movement. Dr. Muck's direction of the entire work was a triumph in rendering into clearest terms the chaste elegance, the lofty passion, the calm beauty of this great man who so shut his ears to public clamor for compromise and mediocrity that the voice of God's nature is heard in his song. Many times last night I was instinctively reminded of another composer, remote indeed from Brahms in common report—I mean Schubert, whose fecundity of melody was no more abundant than Brahms, and who might have written a similar symphony had he lived as long and studied and pondered as deeply.

If you have looked askance at Brahms heretofore, give him a trial next Thursday night when Dr. Muck interprets his D major symphony, which has even more of the areas of sun-lighted, blue-arched meadows, mountain-locked in it than has the one we heard last night.

BACH'S SUITE IN B MINOR.

Bach's Suite in B minor did more than bring forth the father of modern music in the guise of a guide to ancient, sprightly or quaint or dignified dances. It revealed a flutist, Andre Maquarre, who reminded me of a boyhood story. I marveled once at the breath capacity of a glass blower whom I was admiring at his work. He assured me solemnly that he could blow the glass with his lips and inhale a reinforcement of breath at his nostrils simultaneously. I believed it. Later I learned it was a fable. Not till I saw Maquarre last night did I believe such a feat possible, but if Maquarre ever stops to breathe, he never breaks the longest of Bach's fugue melodies, which, as you know, amble by indefinitely and without pause. Only when the extended contour of the phrase required a semi-stop was it to be observed, and considerations of breath appeared to be as great a matter of indifference to him as they are to Caruso when he languishes over Italian sighs in song. In tone quality and musical intelligence Maquarre proved himself an artist.

Tonight's programme will be all Wagner, and there promises to be an audience that will bulge the circular walls of Festival Hall.

PROGRAMME FOR TONIGHT.

This is the programme that will be offered:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser."
Act 1 (Paris version).
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

◆

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 18 1915

Es 1884

GREAT BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN 'CLASSIC' VEIN

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

It's funny about that word "classical." It apparently has some overtone to it that drives people away. The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night played the fourth of thei, twelve priceless concerts in Festival Hall; and the audience was a sparse 2500 or so, simply because the program read "Brahms, Bach, Beethoven." People thought they were likely to get something heavy, dry, non-understandable, thick, stupid.

Now, one friend was present who had never heard a symphony orchestra before; and this friend was alert and interested and moved and thrilled from start to finish. I defy anyone to have been otherwise. Queer about that word "classical." People don't seem to know what it means. They avoid the greatest of literature—which means the most vitally interesting—and they shut themselves off from the greatest of music—meaning once more the most vitally enjoy-est of pictures [illegible] eye, simply because the word "classical" is stamped on their minds. folks who do that way are hu themselves, and it's a pity. "Cl cal" things are merely those w have delighted the majority of servers for a cycle of time. course, there's another and techn meaning of the word when "classic" is opposed to "romant but in this sense Beethoven is a mantic, and so often is Bach, even Brahms in certain phases. if you still cling to the idea t "classical" art is dry, just h the Boston Symphony play the "clas cal" composers, then go and re "Othello," which, I suppose, is "classical" play; then hang some go Da Vinci prints on your walls a get acquainted with them. Then com back, if you can, and tell me that "classical" things aren't interesting.

BRAHMS SYMPHONY.

First came the Brahms symphony. You don't hear that work interestingly played by mediocre orchestras, because it is a man's-sized task for every musician participating. Brahms was not "inspired," in the old Byronic sense, when he wrote it, unless it was an inspiration for him to borrow and use the Beethoven theme that is the finest melody in it; but Brahms working deliberately has plenty to keep the ears very busy in a worth-while cause.

There is no way to express the delight that came from watching the themes tossed about from one instrument to the other, passed about like a worthy remark from hand to hand, and gaining something with each transfer. At parties we used to start a story going, and each person would write a sentence or two and give a new twist to the plot. This was much the way of the Brahms symphony, the plot being handed from clarinet to flute to oboe, then over to the celli and the horns, then to the violins and back again, each instrument "wearing its rue with a difference."

The Bach suite brought us back into the old simple festivals, where high and low met together to dance—if they ever did. It was like the village merry-making in the "Winter's Tale." Andre Maquarre played the solo passages on the flute, and the effect was of the rarest daintiness and rural beauty.

"SHEPHERD'S MUSIC."

Bigger and more glorious Bach followed, still with the note of the soil, this time in the celebration of the oldtime Christmas, when men acted out the story of the shepherds watching their flocks by night and the star that burned bright over Bethlehem. The "Shepherd's Music," from the "Christmas Oratorio," was the name of it, and the impression of it was such as to make one wish that the word "anachronism" had never been invented to spoil these primitive religious ceremonies.

The program ended with Beethoven's fine overture to "Egmont"—once more so interesting that one wished the audience were trebled. As a matter of fact, the audience wasn't small; it would have more than filled any theater in this city; but the whole State should have been there.

Tonight is the Wagner program, and there are indications that the whole State will be there, or will try to be. It will be one of the great nights of this great but brief season.

◆

Examiner

From
Address San Francisco. Cal
Date MAY 16 1915

Established

3,000 HEAR BOSTONIANS AT THE SECOND RECITAL

Dr. Muck Again Proves Rare Artistry of Himself and His Orchestra.

BY REDFERN MASON

More than three thousand San Franciscans listened to the second concert of the Boston Symphony in Festival Hall yesterday afternoon. The word had gone forth that the organization was as great as its reputation and people were eager to hear it.

I met Josiah Zuro during the afternoon, and he told me that never had he heard the orchestra play a Beethoven Symphony as they played the "Eroica" on the night preceding. He added that the players themselves felt that they had done their best. So we may comfort ourselves with the reflection that we are hearing the world's greatest orchestra in its happiest vein.

Yesterday we had the "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn, and Dr. Muck brought out that famous chord in the Andante from which the work takes its name by taking the string passage which leads up to it in a veritable whisper.

OLD MUSIC DELIGHTFUL.

And how delightful that old music was. Call it old-fashioned, if you like; but assuredly not hackneyed.

We shall listen with delight to Haydn when many of our moderns are relegated to limbo.

How affectionately the reeds caressed those variations, how daintily the strings picked out that fanciful embroidery.

The noble house of Esterhazy, Haydn's patrons, never heard the "Surprise" Symphony played as we heard it played yesterday.

Neither, for that matter, did Beethoven ever hear the "Eroica" played as the Bostonians played it on Friday. He could not have done so, for not only was the standard of instrumental technique lower in his day, but trombones and French horns were limited in expression by structural conditions which have since been overcome.

TRUMPET TONE MAGNIFICENT.

I question whether even Liszt, although he is almost of our own day, ever heard such magnificence of trumpet tone as we heard yesterday in "Hungaria."

This was not the feminine sweetness of brass affected by some of our famous bandmasters, but brass that was masculine and militant. The music trembled with a fierce joy.

And did you not revel in the "Love Song" and "Dirge" of MacDowell's "Indian" suite? This is genuine American music—music which could have been composed nowhere but in the United States.

Julius Rehn Weber sat with me, and I could see he was wondering whether Dr. Muck would treat MacDowell and Mendelssohn as sympathetically as he did the great Viennese masters. Would he harden into academic coldness when he passed beyond the circle of his beloved classics?

ALL DOUBTS DISSIPATED.

That performance of the "Indian" suite removed all such forebodings. It was of a penetrating sympathy, and I think Edward MacDowell would have said that Dr. Muck understood the true inwardness of Redskin melody and rhythm as well as he did himself.

"Fine spirits understand one another," as the old saying has it.

The sense of security which, so to speak, broods over that orchestra is an aesthetic phenomenon.

The only director of my experience who ever diffused that spirit in equal measure with our Berlin mentor was Hans Richter. When the mighty Hans took the baton in hand you felt that nothing could go amiss.

CONVEYS CONFIDENCE.

Dr. Muck is more highly strung than Richter; but he conveys the same sense of tranquillity, of absolute confidence.

"He is never so calm as when his lightnings are flashing in the air," as Emerson said of Plato.

Never phlegmatic or running to the opposite extreme of emotional excess, Dr. Muck represents the combination of the best elements of the academic spirit with a temperament at once genial and exalted.

He plays on this great orchestral body of tone as if it were a veritable organ, every key a living fount of music.

The audience listened delighted; here was such god orchestral reason for enthusiasm as San Francisco had never had.

Believe me, the coming of the Boston Symphony opens a new chapter in our musical history.

ized Brahms played with the vehement quality appropriate to Strauss in his "Domestica" and "Don Juan" tone poems. At the end of this highway is found Brahms dallying with a damsel. In some such spirit we have usually heard Brahms interpreted. There is still a middle highway that leads to the heart of this composer, and down that road we were taken last night by Dr. Muck, and we found a man, serenely walking the fields of God's eternal meadows. Here was a new Brahms—or, rather, here we met him for the first time.

CALLS SCHUBERT TO MIND.

I should like to know the number of times I heard this remark during and after the performance of the Brahms C minor symphony: "I never cared for Brahms before; he doesn't please me much as a rule—but this, this was lovely!"

Naturally the adagio movement might have been expected to charm even ears demanding the most obvious of tunes. Surely there can be nothing in music's literature more elegaically lovely than the melody intoned first by the French horn, then by the flute to a shimmering accompaniment of delicate violin harmonies. The passage following on the deep G strings of the violins, which sound forth a song of folk-lore simplicity, could not be over the heads of any; but what was significant was the effectiveness of the first movement and the solemnities of the second movement. Dr. Muck's direction of the entire work was a triumph in rendering into clearest terms the chaste elegance, the lofty passion, the calm beauty of this great man who so shut his ears to public clamor for compromise and mediocrity that the voice of God's nature is heard in his song. Many times last night I was instinctively reminded of another composer, remote indeed from Brahms in common report—I mean Schubert, whose fecundity of melody was no more abundant than Brahms, and who might have written a similar symphony had he lived as long and studied and pondered as deeply.

If you have looked askance at Brahms heretofore, give him a trial next Thursday night when Dr. Muck interprets his D major symphony, which has even more of the areas of sun-lighted, blue-arched meadows, mountain-locked in it than has the one we heard last night.

BACH'S SUITE IN B MINOR.

Bach's Suite in B minor did more than bring forth the father of modern music in the guise of a guide to ancient, sprightly or quaint or dignified dances. It revealed a flutist, Andre Maquarre, who reminded me of a boyhood story. I marveled once at the breath capacity of a glass blower whom I was admiring at his work. He assured me solemnly that he could blow the glass with his lips and inhale a reinforcement of breath at his nostrils simultaneously. I believed it. Later I learned it was a fable. Not till I saw Maquarre last night did I believe such a feat possible, but if Maquarre ever stops to breathe, he never breaks the longest of Bach's fugue melodies, which, as you know, amble by indefinitely and without pause. Only when the extended contour of the phrase required a semistop was it to be observed, and considerations of breath appeared to be as great a matter of indifference to him as they are to Caruso when he languishes over Italian sighs in song. In tone quality and musical intelligence Maquarre proved himself an artist.

Tonight's programme will be all Wagner, and there promises to be an audience that will bulge the circular walls of Festival Hall.

PROGRAMME FOR TONIGHT.

This is the programme that will be offered:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser."
Act 1 (Paris version).
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude to "Parsifal."

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 1 8 1915

GREAT BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN 'CLASSIC' VEIN

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

It's funny about that word "classical." It apparently has some overtone to it that drives people away. The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night played the fourth of their twelve priceless concerts in Festival Hall; and the audience was a sparse 2500, or so, simply because the program read "Brahms, Bach, Beethoven." People thought they were likely to get something heavy, dry, nonunderstandable, thick, stupid.

Now, one friend was present who had never heard a symphony orchestra before; and this friend was alert and interested and moved and thrilled from start to finish. I defy anyone to have been otherwise. Queer about that word "classical." People don't seem to know what it means. They avoid the greatest of literature—which means the most vitally interesting—and they shut themselves off from the greatest of music—meaning once more the most vitally, enjoyable—and they look upon the greatest of pictures [illegible] eye, simply because the word "classical" is stamped on their minds. Why, folks who do that way are hurting themselves, and it's a pity. "Classical" things are merely those which have delighted the majority of observers for a cycle of time. Of course, there's another and technical meaning of the word whereby "classic" is opposed to "romantic"; but in this sense Beethoven is a romantic, and so often is Bach, and even Brahms in certain phases. And if you still cling to the idea that "classical" art is dry, just hear the Boston Symphony play the "classical" composers, then go and read "Othello," which, I suppose, is a "classical" play; then hang some good Da Vinci prints on your walls and get acquainted with them. Then come back, if you can, and tell me that "classical" things aren't interesting.

BRAHMS SYMPHONY.

First came the Brahms symphony. You don't hear that work interestingly played by mediocre orchestras, because it is a man's-sized task for every musician participating. Brahms was not "inspired," in the old Byronic sense, when he wrote it, unless it was an inspiration for him to borrow and use the Beethoven theme that is the finest melody in it; but Brahms working deliberately has plenty to keep the ears very busy in a worthwhile cause.

There is no way to express the delight that came from watching the themes tossed about from one instrument to the other, passed about like a worthy remark from hand to hand, and gaining something with each transfer. At parties we used to start a story going, and each person would write a sentence or two and give a new twist to the plot. This was much the way of the Brahms symphony, the plot being handed from clarinet to flute to oboe, then over to the celli and the horns, then to the violins and back again, each instrument "wearing its rue with a difference."

The Bach suite brought us back into the old simple festivals, where high and low met together to dance—if they ever did. It was like the village merry-making in the "Winter's Tale." Andre Maquarre played the solo passages on the flute, and the effect was of the rarest daintiness and rural beauty.

"SHEPHERD'S MUSIC."

Bigger and more glorious Bach followed, still with the note of the soil, this time in the celebration of the oldtime Christmas, when men acted out the story of the shepherds watching their flocks by night and the star that burned bright over Bethlehem. The "Shepherd's Music," from the "Christmas Oratorio," was the name of it, and the impression of it was such as to make one wish that the word "anachronism" had never been invented to spoil these primitive religious ceremonies.

The program ended with Beethoven's fine overture to "Egmont"—once more so interesting that one wished the audience were trebled. As a matter of fact, the audience wasn't small; it would have more than filled any theater in this city; but the whole State should have been there.

Tonight is the Wagner program, and there are indications that the whole State will be there, or will try to be. It will be one of the great nights of this great but brief season.

Examiner
San Francisco. Cal
MAY 1 6 1915

3,000 HEAR BOSTONIANS AT THE SECOND RECITAL

Dr. Muck Again Proves Rare Artistry of Himself and His Orchestra.

BY REDFERN MASON

More than three thousand San Franciscans listened to the second concert of the Boston Symphony in Festival Hall yesterday afternoon. The word had gone forth that the organization was as great as its reputation and people were eager to hear it.

I met Josiah Zuro during the afternoon, and he told me that never had he heard the orchestra play a Beethoven Symphony as they played the "Eroica" on the night preceding. He added that the players themselves felt that they had done their best. So we may comfort ourselves with the reflection that we are hearing the world's greatest orchestra in its happiest vein.

Yesterday we had the "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn, and Dr. Muck brought out that famous chord in the Andante from which the work takes its name by taking the string passage which leads up to it in a veritable whisper.

OLD MUSIC DELIGHTFUL.

And how delightful that old music was. Call it old-fashioned, if you like; but assuredly not hackneyed.

We shall listen with delight to Haydn when many of our moderns are relegated to limbo.

How affectionately the reeds caressed those variations, how daintily the strings picked out that fanciful embroidery.

The noble house of Esterhazy, Haydn's patrons, never heard the "Surprise" Symphony played as we heard it played yesterday.

Neither, for that matter, did Beethoven ever hear the "Eroica" played as the Bostonians played it on Friday. He could not have done so, for not only was the standard of instrumental technique lower in his day, but trombones and French horns were limited in expression by structural conditions which have since been overcome.

TRUMPET TONE MAGNIFICENT.

I question whether even Liszt, although he is almost of our own day, ever heard such magnificence of trumpet tone as we heard yesterday in "Hungaria."

This was not the feminine sweetness of brass affected by some of our famous bandmasters, but brass that was masculine and militant. The music trembled with a fierce joy.

And did you not revel in the "Love Song" and "Dirge" of MacDowell's "Indian" suite? This is genuine American music—music which could have been composed nowhere but in the United States.

Julius Rehn Weber sat with me, and I could see he was wondering whether Dr. Muck would treat MacDowell and Mendelssohn as sympathetically as he did the great Viennese masters. Would he harden into academic coldness when he passed beyond the circle of his beloved classics?

ALL DOUBTS DISSIPATED.

That performance of the "Indian" suite removed all such forebodings. It was of a penetrating sympathy, and I think Edward MacDowell would have said that Dr. Muck understood the true inwardness of Redskin melody and rhythm as well as he did himself.

"Fine spirits understand one another," as the old saying has it.

The sense of security which, so to speak, broods over that orchestra is an aesthetic phenomenon.

The only director of my experience who ever diffused that spirit in equal measure with our Berlin mentor was Hans Richter. When the mighty Hans took the baton in hand you felt that nothing could go amiss.

CONVEYS CONFIDENCE.

Dr. Muck is more highly strung than Richter; but he conveys the same sense of tranquillity, of absolute confidence.

"He is never so calm as when his lightnings are flashing in the air," as Emerson said of Plato.

Never phlegmatic or running to the opposite extreme of emotional excess. Dr. Muck represents the combination of the best elements of the academic spirit with a temperament at once genial and exalted.

He plays on this great orchestral body of tone as if it were a veritable organ, every key a living fount of music.

The audience listened delighted; here was such god orchestral reason for enthusiasm as San Francisco had never had.

Believe me, the coming of the Boston Symphony opens a new chapter in our musical history.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 1 8 1915

Established

San Francisco's Attitude Was Discreetly Missourian

Waited for Boston Symphony Orchestra to Show Us; But Now—Aha!

By HELEN DARE.

NOTHING could have been more interesting—especially to those of us who love to watch the oft-tempted (and sometimes betrayed) San Franciscan swim 'round the bait and cautiously nibble at it—than the way San Francisco acted at the initial concert, on Friday night, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was a splendid "house" assembled in Festival Hall—distinctly creditable to San Francisco—but watchful, expectant, non-committal.

It's attitude to the famous orchestra, and the still more famous conductor, was discreetly but firmly Missourian; as though it were murmuring to itself, politely and decorously:

"Oh! Yes! We've heard all about you, and we are perfectly willing to accept you on your merits; but—you've got to show us!"

It was noticeably taut, one might say—unless you can think of a better word—in the very way it sat in its chairs, and inclined the listening ear, tasted of the music critically before swallowing it; and in the way it applauded.

SAN FRANCISCO HERSELF AGAIN.

But that tautness relaxed before the evening was over—long before the evening was over; and San Francisco was her joyous, cordial, appreciative, vociferous self again, holding Dr. Karl Muck and his marvelous hundred in her arms, pressing them to her bosom ecstatically, so to speak.

San Francisco's been stung so often, even by authoritatively hall-marked prodigies; but this time——

Fulfillment exceeds promise.

Now that we are "in right" up to our ears; now that everybody is talking (and, what's more and better, is thinking) "Dr. Karl Muck" and "Boston Symphony"; now that in the glow of the full revelation of this incomparable treat that has been secured for us we are doing our duty to each other by urging each other under no circumstances and for no consideration to miss it, we can afford to confess our little cautiousness; we can tell this on ourselves:

We were resolved to judge for ourselves—independently, critically.

So set upon this were we that on that memorable first night I found that many shared the same experience, admitted the same sensations—which were these:

So alert were we to the occasion—to the test, shall I say?—that the marvel of the perfection of execution claimed our attention to the exclusion of the music it produced.

SURPRISE AND DELIGHT.

We actually were deprived of our natural pleasure in the thing done by our surprise at, and delight in, the way it was done; amazed that it could be so well done.

But we soon got used to that, adjusted ourselves with facility, accepted the good the gods sent, and settled down to the enjoyment of our good fortune.

And great good fortune it is to hear the best music at its best—as we've imagined (in unbridled moments) it might be; as the composer meant it to be.

For music—good music, rendered in such polished perfection as the Boston Symphony Orchestra renders it under the inspiring genius of Dr. Karl Muck—is not a luxury; it is a necessity.

It is as much a necessity of the starved, wearied, worn, suffering, striving spirit as are food and air and warmth and exercise and rest necessities of the body—and money expended to obtain it is as wisely and justly expended as for the creature comforts we acknowledge our need of.

Therefore we are saying to each other that we must not let our children of appreciative age miss it; we must not let any students of music be deprived of it—for there is more education in the heights reached, the standards set at one concert by the Boston Symphony under this gifted conductor than in countless lessons from mediocre teachers; yes, and admittedly good teachers.

FOOD FOR MUSIC HUNGRY.

We must not let any lover of music, who is grateful for whatever he can get, but cherishes ideals of unrealized beauty that he thinks can be attained to only in elysium, be denied the exquisite enjoyment of this

I think if I were a multi-millionare, or even just a plain little old one-million millionaire, I would turn Good Samaritan (for the Boston Symphony season only) and slip concert tockets to the music-hungry.

I know, if I could extend persuasion so far, I would stampede every father or mother (father AND mother, if necessary) of a musically sensitive child into spending the money for that child's summer wardrobe, or next winetr's overcoat, if necessary, having an abiding faith in Providence) for admissions to the symphony concerts—for the child.

Almost I got the Child's Welfare Society and the Mothers' Congress down on me by leaving out that last detail.

But really (between ourselves) doesn't it seem a pity that anyone who could get the enjoyment out of this rare treat that the opportunity now before us gives should miss it through any inability or indifference of his own or some one else's?

Wouldn't an empty seat staring you in the face at one of the few concerts left be a reproach to you, if you had the price of it in your purse and a music-loving friend to occupy it?

YOU WOULD BE SORRY.

And wouldn't you be sorry if you fooled around and put off going until i was too late?

However——

All this wasn't what I started out to say.

What I had on my mind was this, backed up by the letter of one with a like complaint to make:

Isn't there some way of inducing those persons who come to musical entertainments filled with conversation to conserve that conversation for the blank spaces between numbers, or to get it out of their system before or after the concert?

To say the least, it seems an imposition to have to listen, willy-nilly, to anyone's conversation when you paid for your seat because you wanted to hear the music.

No one's conversation, however enjoyable to the converser, seems worth the price under the circumstances.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
THURSDAY, MAY 27,

MUSIC NOTES

Leaving a profit in the treasury of the Panama-Pacific exposition guarantors, the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra take the train home from San Francisco today. They will arrive in Boston on Monday afternoon. The season of 13 concerts given in Festival hall closed last night with great acclaim, according to a telegram received at Symphony hall this morning from William H. Brennan, the business manager of the tour. Dr. Muck and the players, the message says, were received enthusiastically at the closing performances. "The concerts have been largely patronized," it adds, "and a considerable profit is assured the exposition."

BOSTON HERALD.

MAY 28, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES FAIR SEASON "GLORIOUSLY"

Concerts a Success Artistically and Financially.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night ended its series of 13 concerts at the Panama-Pacific international exposition in San Francisco. W. H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra, sent the following telegram to the home office:

"Season ended gloriously. Concerts have been largely patronized and a considerable profit is assured the exposition. Muck and orchestra had tremendous reception tonight. We leave for Boston 4:05 tomorrow afternoon."

It is a source of great gratification to Mr. Higginson, Mr. Ellis and Dr. Muck that the concerts given in San Francisco have not only been a great success artistically, but have proved to be profitable. The sum paid the orchestra for the concerts was very large and those who were responsible for the concerts looked forward to a considerable monetary loss, but felt that the advertisement of having the Boston Symphony Orchestra would more than offset this. The fact that these concerts have been a paying proposition means that their audiences would have more than filled Smyphony Hall at a scale of prices considerably larger than prevails in the East The orchestra is due in Boston next Monday afternoon at 3 o'clock.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 19 1915

Established: L

Wagner Crowd a Record; Orchestra's Work Isn't

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

People came out to Festival Hall last night. They came by the carload, and not only was every seat occupied, but people stood around the edges and crowded the space at the rear. I don't know how much cash that house represented, but it wasn't far from $7000, and it left about $2000 at the Exposition gates. It created the American record for receipts at a symphonic concert, I understand. Truly San Francisco likes its Wagner.

And just when everything was at its happiest from the audience standpoint, the "off night," that eternal bugbear of artistic humanity, descended upon Dr. Muck's matchless orchestra. Not that the concert wasn't great; if it were any other orchestra no fault could be found; but it happens that the Boston Symphony sets its own standard, clear above the ruck, and that it challenges criticism on an exceedingly high plane of its own. And I am sure that Dr. Muck and his musicians feel today that their art last night was under some sort of cloud; that a subtle something-or-other was lacking. What was the cause I do not know—perhaps a little fatigue, the thing that makes a man miss keys on his typewriter or forget to mail a letter. Fearing lest the fatigue was my own, I found corroboration from several others. Just a touch was missing; but to the Boston Symphony with its ideals of perfection a touch is all-important.

RIENZI OVERTURE.

Things started off bravely. The Rienzi overture, not really Wagnerish Wagner, was dutifully played, and the "Flying Dutchman" overture, that followed, was given magnificently, and lingers in the memory as the most convincing rendition of the evening. But in the midst of the Tannhauser bacchanale, after a wonderfully played overture, the "off night" descended. I could hardly believe my ears when an attack that should have been spirited came with a little raggedness; later the trombones sinned by a perceptible fraction of a beat; this is not the sort of thing which this orchestra has trained our ears to expect. The bacchanale thereafter called up a picture of bacchanalians who had also bacchanaled the night before.

The Lohengrin prelude, before the intermission, was played with the fullest poetry, and it would be wonderful, indeed, to hear this orchestra play it when the poetry would be felt and not merely remembered. The purity of tone in the strings was remarkable.

"TRISTAN" MUSIC.

The second half of the program was the deeper Wagner, he of "Tristan" and the "Ring"—is there any other composer from whose works a program can be built in strict chronological order? And while the playing was apparently faultless, it seemed cold except for a portion of the Tristan prelude; and the applause, except for the popular Meistersinger prelude, was not what should have been drawn from that expectant audience.

Well, there is nothing to be gained by carping, and the only point in calling attention at all to the absent "bouquet" is to impress it upon those who heard the orchestra last night for the first time, that the performance was not representative. Come again and you will hear the real thing—and it will be the real thing, too.

SIBELIUS TONIGHT.

Tonight the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," will open the program; the eighth symphony of Beethoven will follow, then will come Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," perhaps the best work of the dean of American orchestral composers, and in conclusion will be a suite of three sketches by Jan Sibelius, the Finn who is one of the outstanding modern composers. The Sibelius pieces are entitled "Karolia," "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia," and are distinctly feature offerings.

BOSTON GLOBE-
-FRIDAY, MAY 28,

ORCHESTRA STARTS HOME.

Boston's Great Symphony Organization Left San Francisco Yesterday —Due Here Monday Afternoon.

A telegram received at Symphony Hall from W. H. Brennan, business manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just completed a series of concerts at the Panama Exposition, stated that the orchestra was to have left San Francisco yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock, to arrive home Monday afternoon at 3.

Mr Brennan said it would be highly gratifying to Mr Higginson, Dr Muck and Mr Ellis that, while the guarantors of the exposition anticipated a monetary loss, one which they were willing to incur for advantage derived from so celebrated an attraction, the concerts not only had been artistically a success, but had drawn receipts sufficient to pay the heavy costs and at a scale of prices in advance of those which prevail here.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 13 1915
Established

San Francisco's Attitude Was Discreetly Missourian

Waited for Boston Symphony Orchestra to Show Us; But Now—Aha!

By HELEN DARE.

NOTHING could have been more interesting—especially to those of us who love to watch the oft-tempted (and sometimes betrayed) San Franciscan swim 'round the bait and cautiously nibble at it—than the way San Francisco acted at the initial concert, on Friday night, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was a splendid "house" assembled in Festival Hall—distinctly creditable to San Francisco—but watchful, expectant, non-committal.

It's attitude to the famous orchestra, and the still more famous conductor, was discreetly but firmly Missourian; as though it were murmuring to itself, politely and decorously:

"Oh! Yes! We've heard all about you, and we are perfectly willing to accept you on your merits; but—you've got to show us!"

It was noticeably taut, one might say—unless you can think of a better word—in the very way it sat in its chairs, and inclined the listening ear, tasted of the music critically before swallowing it; and in the way it applauded.

SAN FRANCISCO HERSELF AGAIN.

But that tautness relaxed before the evening was over—long before the evening was over; and San Francisco was her joyous, cordial, appreciative, vociferous self again, holding Dr. Karl Muck and his marvelous hundred in her arms, pressing them to her bosom ecstatically, so to speak.

San Francisco's been stung so often, even by authoritatively hall-marked prodigies; but this time——

Fulfillment exceeds promise.

Now that we are "in right" up to our ears; now that everybody is talking (and, what's more and better, is thinking) "Dr. Karl Muck" and "Boston Symphony"; now that in the glow of the full revelation of this incomparable treat that has been secured for us we are doing our duty to each other by urging each other under no circumstances and for no consideration to miss it, we can afford to confess our little cautiousness; we can tell this on ourselves:

We were resolved to judge for ourselves—independently, critically.

So set upon this were we that on that memorable first night I found that many shared the same experience, admitted the same sensations—which were these:

So alert were we to the occasion—to the test, shall I say?—that the marvel of the perfection of execution claimed our attention to the exclusion of the music it produced.

SURPRISE AND DELIGHT.

We actually were deprived of our natural pleasure in the thing done by our surprise at, and delight in, the way it was done; amazed that it could be so well done.

But we soon got used to that, adjusted ourselves with facility, accepted the good the gods sent, and settled down to the enjoyment of our good fortune.

And great good fortune it is to hear the best music at its best—as we've imagined (in unbridled moments) it might be; as the composer meant it to be.

For music—good music, rendered in such polished perfection as the Boston Symphony Orchestra renders it under the inspiring genius of Dr. Karl Muck—is not a luxury; it is a necessity.

It is as much a necessity of the starved, wearied, worn, suffering, striving spirit as are food and air and warmth and exercise and rest necessities of the body—and money expended to obtain it is as wisely and justly expended as for the creature comforts we acknowledge our need of.

Therefore we are saying to each other that we must not let our children of appreciative age miss it; we must not let any students of music be deprived of it—for there is more education in the heights reached, the standards set at one concert by the Boston Symphony under this gifted conductor than in countless lessons from mediocre teachers; yes, and admittedly good teachers.

FOOD FOR MUSIC HUNGRY.

We must not let any lover of music, who is grateful for whatever he can get, but cherishes ideals of unrealized beauty that he thinks can be attained to only in elysium, be denied the exquisite enjoyment of this

I think if I were a multi-millionare, or even just a plain little old one-million millionaire, I would turn Good Samaritan (for the Boston Symphony season only) and slip concert tockets to the music-hungry.

I know, if I could extend persuasion so far, I would stampede every father or mother (father AND mother, if necessary) of a musically sensitive child into spending the money for that child's summer wardrobe ,or next winetr s overcoat, if necessary, having an abiding faith in Providence) for admissions to the symphony concerts—for the child.

Almost I got the Child's Welfare Society and the Mothers' Congress down on me by leaving out that last detail.

But really (between ourselves) doesn't it seem a pity that anyone who could get the enjoyment out of this rare treat that the opportunity now before us gives should miss it through any inability or indifference of his own or some one else's?

Wouldn't an empty seat staring you in the face at one of the few concerts left be a reproach to you, if you had the price of it in your purse and a music-loving friend to occupy it?

YOU WOULD BE SORRY.

And wouldn't you be sorry if you fooled around and put off going until i was too late?

However——

All this wasn't what I started out to say.

What I had on my mind was this, backed up by the letter of one with a like complaint to make:

Isn't there some way of inducing those persons who come to musical entertainments filled with conversation to conserve that conversation for the blank spaces between numbers, or to get it out of their system before or after the concert?

To say the least, it seems an imposition to have to listen, willy-nilly, to anyone's conversation when you paid for your seat because you wanted to hear the music.

No one's conversation, however enjoyable to the converser, seems worth the price under the circumstances.

From

MONITOR, BOSTON,
THURSDAY, MAY 27,

MUSIC NOTES

Leaving a profit in the treasury of the Panama-Pacific exposition guarantors, the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra take the train home from San Francisco today. They will arrive in Boston on Monday afternoon. The season of 13 concerts given in Festival hall closed last night with great acclaim, according to a telegram received at Symphony hall this morning from William H. Brennan, the business manager of the tour. Dr. Muck and the players, the message says, were received enthusiastically at the closing performances. "The concerts have been largely patronized," it adds, "and a considerable profit is assured the exposition."

BOSTON HERALD.
MAY 28, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES FAIR SEASON "GLORIOUSLY"

Concerts a Success Artistically and Financially.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night ended its series of 13 concerts at the Panama-Pacific international exposition in San Francisco. W. H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra, sent the following telegram to the home office:

"Season ended gloriously. Concerts have been largely patronized and a considerable profit is assured the exposition. Muck and orchestra had tremendous reception tonight. We leave for Boston 4:05 tomorrow afternoon."

It is a source of great gratification to Mr. Higginson, Mr. Ellis and Dr. Muck that the concerts given in San Francisco have not only been a great success artistically, but have proved to be profitable. The sum paid the orchestra for the concerts was very large and those who were responsible for the concerts looked forward to a considerable monetary loss, but felt that the advertisement of having the Boston Symphony Orchestra would more than offset this. The fact that these concerts have been a paying proposition means that their audiences would have more than filled Smyphony Hall at a scale of prices considerably larger than prevails in the East The orchestra is due in Boston next Monday afternoon at 3 o'clock.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 19
Established: Lo

Wagner Crowd a Record; Orchestra's Work Isn't

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

People came out to Festival Hall last night. They came by the carload, and not only was every seat occupied, but people stood around the edges and crowded the space at the rear. I don't know how much cash that house represented, but it wasn't far from $7000, and it left about $2000 at the Exposition gates. It created the American record for receipts at a symphonic concert, I understand. Truly San Francisco likes its Wagner.

And just when everything was at its happiest from the audience standpoint, the "off night," that eternal bugbear of artistic humanity, descended upon Dr. Muck's matchless orchestra. Not that the concert wasn't great; if it were any other orchestra no fault could be found; but it happens that the Boston Symphony sets its own standard, clear above the ruck, and that it challenges criticism on an exceedingly high plane of its own. And I am sure that Dr. Muck and his musicians feel today that their art last night was under some sort of cloud; that a subtle something-or-other was lacking. What was the cause I do not know—perhaps a little fatigue, the thing that makes a man miss keys on his typewriter or forget to mail a letter. Fearing lest the fatigue was my own, I found corroboration from several others. Just a touch was missing; but to the Boston Symphony with its ideals of perfection a touch is all-important.

RIENZI OVERTURE.

Things started off bravely. The Rienzi overture, not really Wagnerish Wagner, was dutifully played, and the "Flying Dutchman" overture, that followed, was given magnificently, and lingers in the memory as the most convincing rendition of the evening. But in the midst of the Tannhauser bacchanale, after a wonderfully played overture, the "off night" descended. I could hardly believe my ears when an attack that should have been spirited came with a little raggedness; later the trombones sinned by a perceptible fraction of a beat; this is not the sort of thing which this orchestra has trained our ears to expect. The bacchanale thereafter called up a picture of bacchanalians who had also bacchanaled the night before.

The Lohengrin prelude, before the intermission, was played with the fullest poetry, and it would be wonderful, indeed, to hear this orchestra play it when the poetry would be felt and not merely remembered. The purity of tone in the strings was remarkable.

"TRISTAN" MUSIC.

The second half of the program was the deeper Wagner, he of "Tristan" and the "Ring"—is there any other composer from whose works a program can be built in strict chronological order? And while the playing was apparently faultless, it seemed cold except for a portion of the Tristan prelude; and the applause, except for the popular Meistersinger prelude, was not what should have been drawn from that expectant audience.

Well, there is nothing to be gained by carping, and the only point in calling attention at all to the absent "bouquet" is to impress it upon those who heard the orchestra last night for the first time, that the performance was not representative. Come again and you will hear the real thing—and it will be the real thing, too.

SIBELIUS TONIGHT.

Tonight the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," will open the program; the eighth symphony of Beethoven will follow, then will come Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," perhaps the best work of the dean of American orchestral composers, and in conclusion will be a suite of three sketches by Jan Sibelius, the Finn who is one of the outstanding modern composers. The Sibelius pieces are entitled "Karolia," "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia," and are distinctly feature offerings.

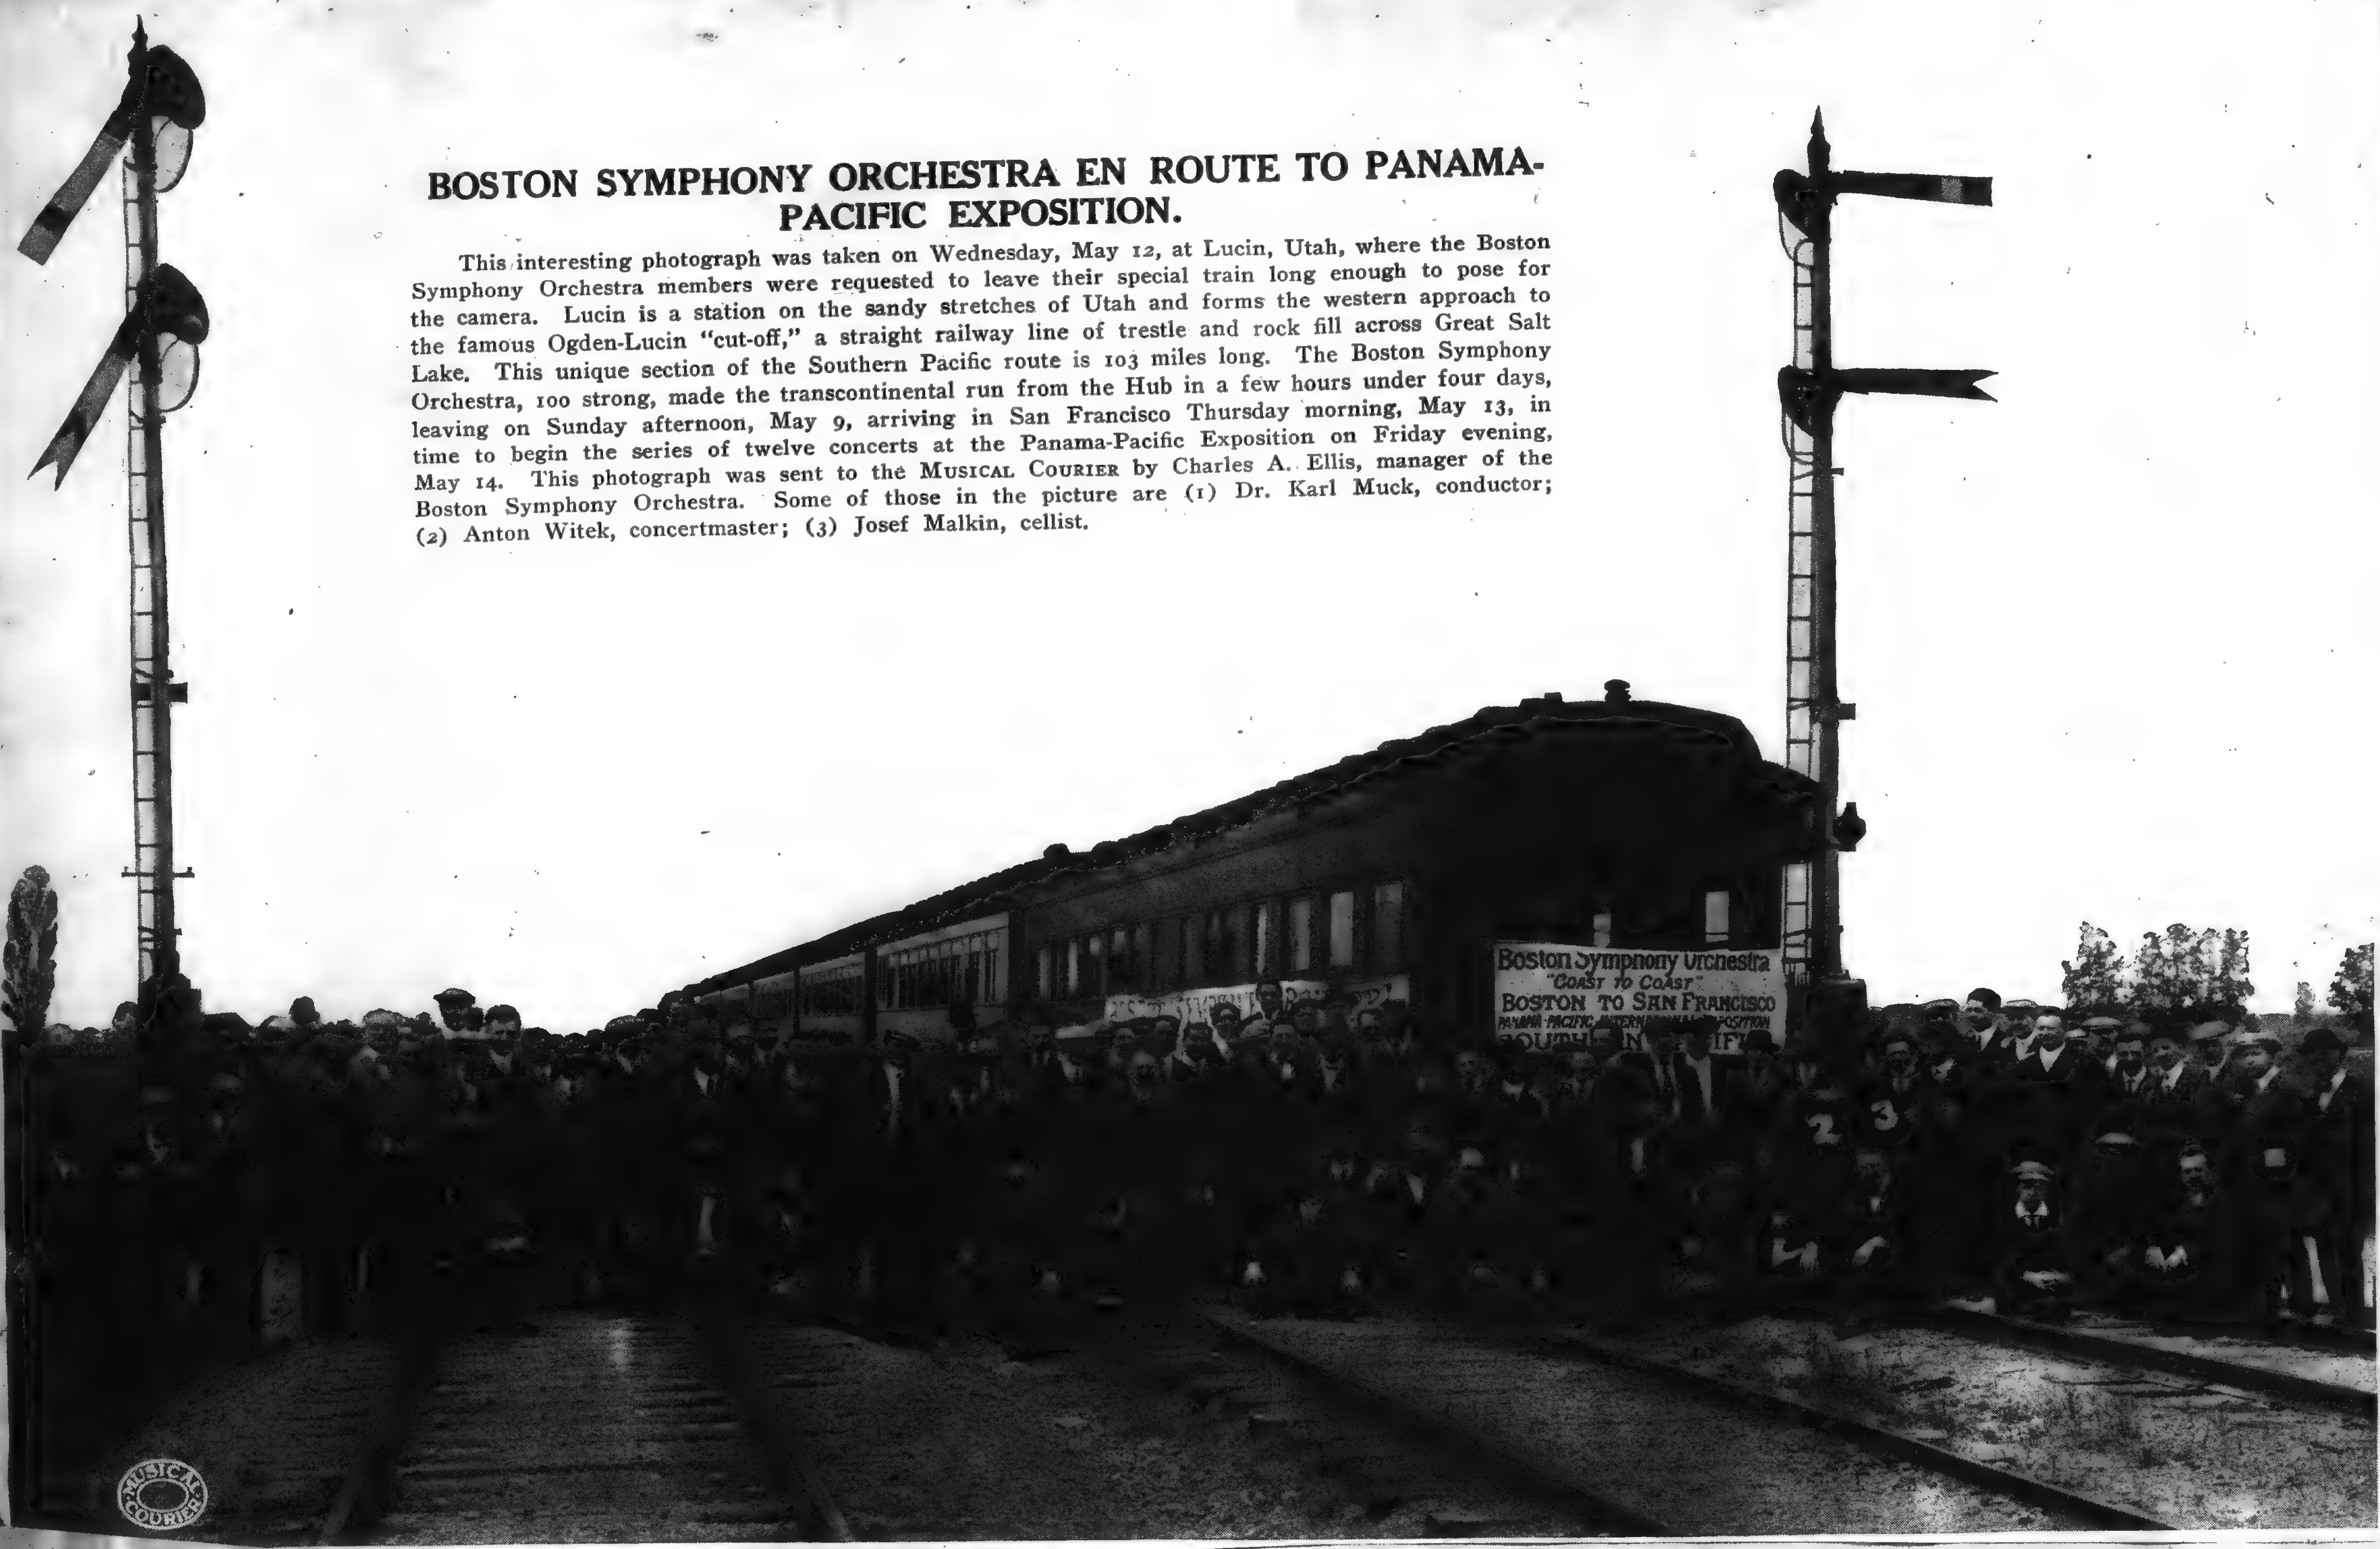
BOSTON GLOBE-
-FRIDAY, MAY 28,

ORCHESTRA STARTS HOME.

Boston's Great Symphony Organization Left San Francisco Yesterday —Due Here Monday Afternoon.

A telegram received at Symphony Hall from W. H. Brennan, business manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just completed a series of concerts at the Panama Exposition, stated that the orchestra was to have left San Francisco yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock, to arrive home Monday afternoon at 3.

Mr Brennan said it would be highly gratifying to Mr Higginson, Dr Muck and Mr Ellis that, while the guarantors of the exposition anticipated a monetary loss, one which they were willing to incur for advantage derived from so celebrated an attraction, the concerts not only had been artistically a success, but had drawn receipts sufficient to pay the heavy costs and at a scale of prices in advance of those which prevail here.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA EN ROUTE TO PANAMA-PACIFIC EXPOSITION.

This interesting photograph was taken on Wednesday, May 12, at Lucin, Utah, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra members were requested to leave their special train long enough to pose for the camera. Lucin is a station on the sandy stretches of Utah and forms the western approach to the famous Ogden-Lucin "cut-off," a straight railway line of trestle and rock fill across Great Salt Lake. This unique section of the Southern Pacific route is 103 miles long. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 100 strong, made the transcontinental run from the Hub in a few hours under four days, leaving on Sunday afternoon, May 9, arriving in San Francisco Thursday morning, May 13, in time to begin the series of twelve concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition on Friday evening, May 14. This photograph was sent to the MUSICAL COURIER by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some of those in the picture are (1) Dr. Karl Muck, conductor; (2) Anton Witek, concertmaster; (3) Josef Malkin, cellist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
"COAST TO COAST"
BOSTON TO SAN FRANCISCO
PANAMA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION
1
2
3
MUSICAL COURIER

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 20 1915

Established: Lond

ORCHESTRA AT HIGH MARK IN FINNISH MUSIC

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

Why doesn't Mr. Henry L. Higginson move to San Francisco and bring his Boston Symphony orchestra with him? Then we could hear Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela" played again and again, as beautifully as it was played last night.

Tuonela is the Finnish Hades, the program explained, and there is a river to cross before you get to the place of departed souls; and up and down the river, in the Finnish legend, there swims a sacred Swan. The hero Lemminkainen, in order to win his bride, pledges himself to shoot the Swan, using but a single arrow. He reaches the mystic river; but on the bank lies an old and sightless cowherd, Markahattu, who knows of his intention, and kills the hero by sending a serpent through his heart, "like a reed from out the billows."

The body of Lemminkainen drifts down the river to Hades, and is cut into pieces by a deity of the place; but it happens that the hero's mother knows magic, and she rakes the pieces of the body out of the cataract, joins them together and restores him to life.

Sibelius' music is as poetic as this wonderful story. The English horn sang the main theme. The Sibelius orchestration is highly individual, and theer are many weird and beautiful solo passages for the woodwinds, the French horn and finally the ~~solo violin~~. Dr. Muck's rendition was drenched with the truest of poetry. I wish this, and the other Sibelius pieces, the interpretation of the Finnish racial spirit entitled "Karelia," and the national expression entitled "Finlandia," could be repeated while the orchestra is here.

The symphony was Beethoven's eighth, a warm-hearted and genial work, played with a delightful freshness that told plainly of the players' love for this most human of works. The Chadwick symphonic sketches were slight, with the graceful tunefulness typical of American composers; the orchestration is clever, but the impression is something like that of the phrase in Gilbert's opera, where "The House of Lords did nothing much, and did it very well."

Tonight one of the greatest programs of the season will be given. Brahms' second symphony will be played, and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," which ranks probably as the greatest work of this unusual composed. Listzt's "Les Preludes" will be given, and the program will close with the prelude from Wagner's "Meistersinger."

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date MAY 23 1915

Est 34

Art and War.

(From the Boston Advertiser.)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra left for San Francisco in a blaze of glory. The final concert of a remarkable season was uncommonly brilliant. Due praise was awarded the conductor and the players by the critics. The audience was enthusiastic. A striking feature of the season has escaped notice.

The orchestra is composed of Germans, Austrians, French, Belgians, Dutch, Russians, Italians, Bohemians, English, Americans. Many of the players have relatives and friends in actual warfare. Some have had cause to mourn. Musicians are proverbially nervous and excitable, if not so irritable as the traditional poet. Yet during this trying season, under a conductor whose sympathies are known to every one as naturally frankly pro-German, there has been the utmost harmony in rehearsal and in private intercourse. If there was discussion, it was amicable. The men of the various nations and the conductor worked together in full artistic concord. As a result the season of 1914-15 will long be conspicuous in the annals of the orchestra. The exhibition of self-restraint, of tact, of forbearance, may well be a lesson to men in other and less nerve-rasping walks of life.

Nor should a feature of this last concert pass unnoticed. The atrocious sinking of the Lusitania was in the mind of every hearer on Saturday night. Every one knew that the conductor and the majority of the orchestra are Germans. The programme was made up of compositions by Germans, for Liszt, though a Hungarian by birth, is ranked among German composers. Yet the demonstrations of approval were unprecedented. Conductor and orchestra were applauded to the skies. For the audience realized that in art there should be no prejudice of nationality. Thus the behavior of the audience was as praiseworthy as the performance on the platform. It is not easy to think of a similar scene under the same conditions in any European city in these evil days.

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 19 1915

Est 884

nado.

Symphony Concert Attended by Smart Set

The Wagnerian program offered by the Boston Symphony, under Dr. Carl Muck, proved an irresistible lure to the beau monde and the largest and most fashionable audience that has yet met in Festival Hall attended last evening's concert. Box holders entertained parties after informal dinners at home or in the downtown hotels, and several smaller groups occupied seats in the body of the house.

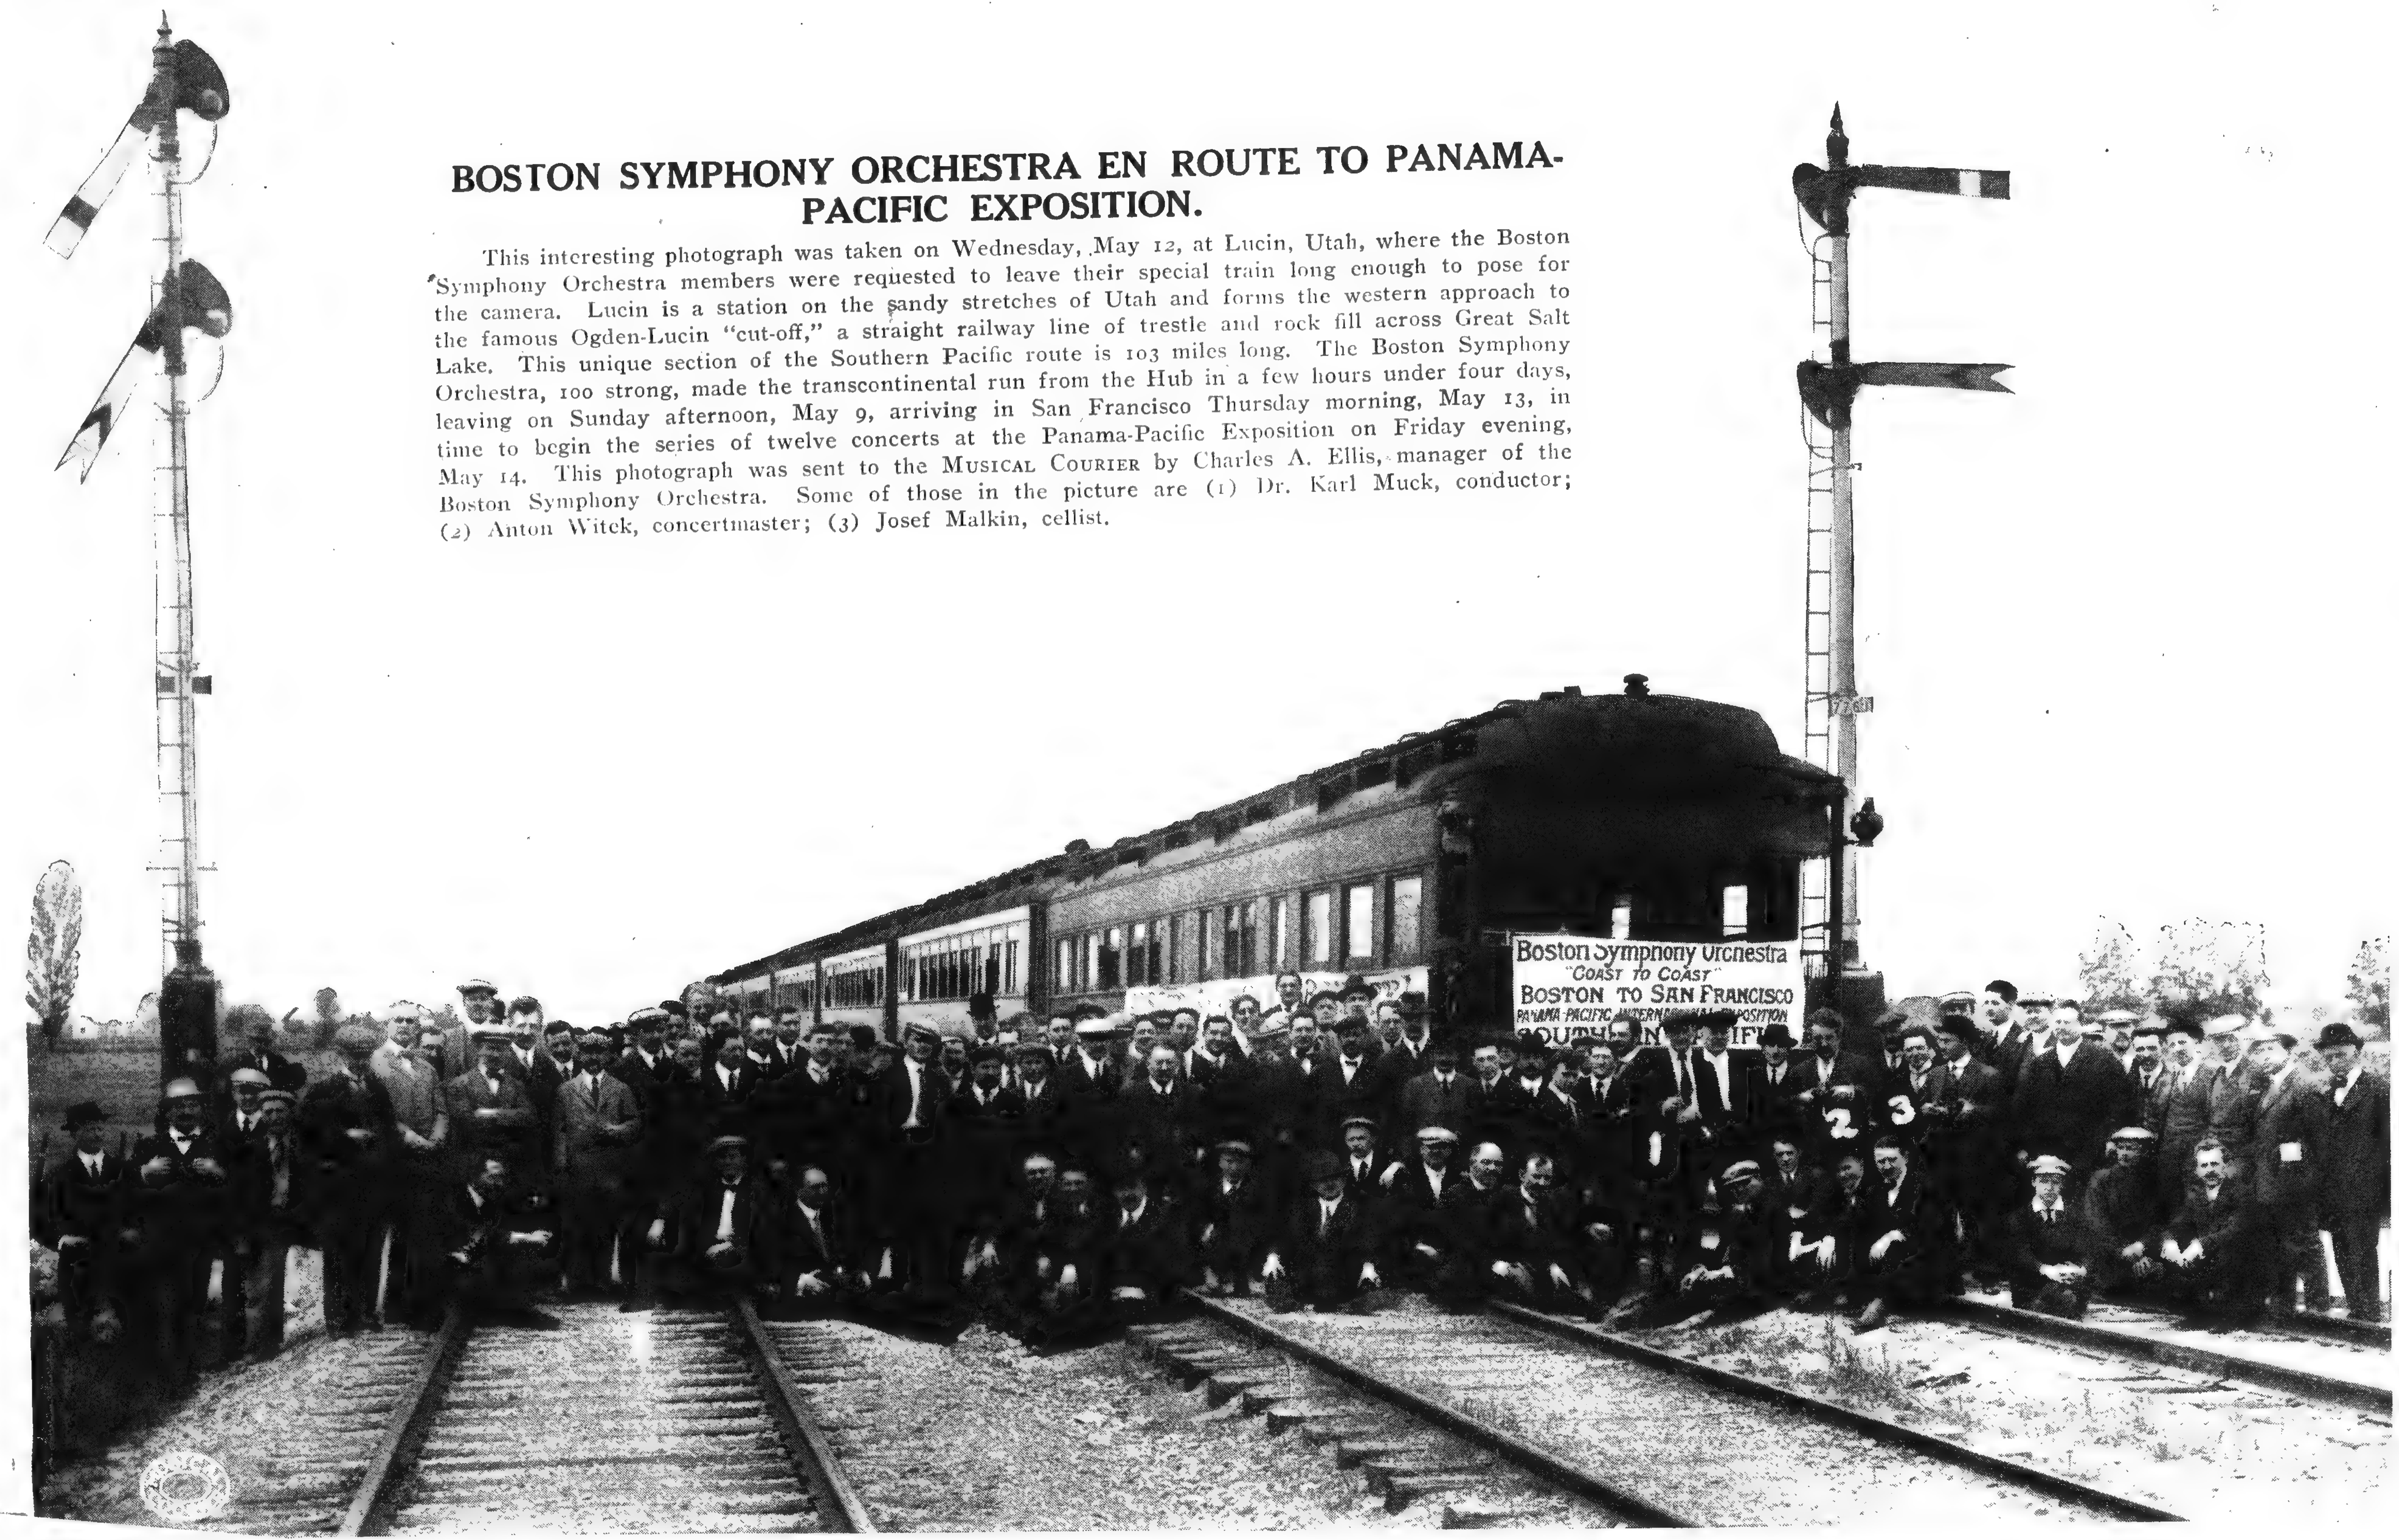
Among the music lovers who were noted in last night's audience were Dr. and Mrs. Grant Selfridge, Mr. and Mrs. John Drum, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Sharon, Mr. and Mrs. John B. Casserly, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Duplessis Beylard, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Meiere, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. William Bower Bourn, Mr. and Mrs. Mayo Newhall, Mr. and Mrs. Julian Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. William Bull Pringle, Mr. and Mrs. Elliott McAllister, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Mendell, Mr. and Mrs. Dixwell Hewitt, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Cheseborough, Mr. and Mrs. Mountford Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Stetson, Mr. and Mrs. George Pope, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Murphy, Mr. and Mrs. James Otis, Colonel and Mrs. Hamilton Stone Wallace, Dr. and Mrs. George Lyman, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Ransome, Mr. and Mrs. M. Hall McAllister, Mr. and Mrs. Atherton Macondray, Mr. and Mrs. George Newhall, Mr. and Mrs. John Johns, Mr. and Mrs. George Armsby, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Donohoe, Mr. and Mrs. Leavitt Baker, Miss Louise Janin, Miss Cora Otis, Miss Frederika Otis, Miss Sophie Beylard, Miss Ethel McAllister, Miss Hildreth Meiere, Miss Dorothea Coon, Miss Corona Williams, Miss Leonore Mejia, Miss Coralia Mejia, Miss Gladys Sullivan, Miss Barbara Parrott, Miss Emilie Parrott, Miss Ruth Zeile, Miss Gertrude Hopkins, Miss Johanna Volkmann, Miss Marion Rodgers, William Parrott, Edmund Lyman, Frederick Van Sicklen, Frederick Tillmann, William Fisher, John Hartigan, Joseph Donohoe Jr., Robert Eyre, Arthur H. Duke, William Goldsborough, Wilberforce Williams, Dr. E. K. Hopkins and Richard Tobin.

Visiting From South

[179]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA EN ROUTE TO PANAMA-PACIFIC EXPOSITION.

This interesting photograph was taken on Wednesday, May 12, at Lucin, Utah, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra members were requested to leave their special train long enough to pose for the camera. Lucin is a station on the sandy stretches of Utah and forms the western approach to the famous Ogden-Lucin "cut-off," a straight railway line of trestle and rock fill across Great Salt Lake. This unique section of the Southern Pacific route is 103 miles long. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 100 strong, made the transcontinental run from the Hub in a few hours under four days, leaving on Sunday afternoon, May 9, arriving in San Francisco Thursday morning, May 13, in time to begin the series of twelve concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exposition on Friday evening, May 14. This photograph was sent to the MUSICAL COURIER by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some of those in the picture are (1) Dr. Karl Muck, conductor; (2) Anton Witek, concertmaster; (3) Josef Malkin, cellist.



Boston Symphony Orchestra
"COAST TO COAST"
BOSTON TO SAN FRANCISCO
PANAMA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION
SOUTHERN PACIFIC
1
2
3

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 20 1915

Established: Lond

ORCHESTRA AT HIGH MARK IN FINNISH MUSIC

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

Why doesn't Mr. Henry L. Higginson move to San Francisco and bring his Boston Symphony orchestra with him? Then we could hear Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela" played again and again, as beautifully as it was played last night.

Tuonela is the Finnish Hades, the program explained, and there is a river to cross before you get to the place of departed souls; and up and down the river, in the Finnish legend, there swims a sacred Swan. The hero Lemminkainen, in order to win his bride, pledges himself to shoot the Swan, using but a single arrow. He reaches the mystic river; but on the bank lies an old and sightless cowherd, Markahattu, who knows of his intention, and kills the hero by sending a serpent through his heart, "like a reed from out the billows."

The body of Lemminkainen drifts down the river to Hades, and is cut into pieces by a deity of the place; but it happens that the hero's mother knows magic, and she rakes the pieces of the body out of the cataract, joins them together and restores him to life.

Sibelius' music is as poetic as this wonderful story. The English horn sang the main theme. The Sibelius orchestration is highly individual, and theer are many weird and beautiful solo passages for the woodwinds, the French horn and finally the solo violin. Dr. Muck's rendition was drenched with the truest of poetry. I wish this, and the other Sibelius pieces, the interpretation of the Finnish racial spirit entitled "Karelia," and the national expression entitled "Finlandia," could be repeated while the orchestra is here.

The symphony was Beethoven's eighth, a warm-hearted and genial work, played with a delightful freshness that told plainly of the players' love for this most human of works. The Chadwick symphonic sketches were slight, with the graceful tunefulness typical of American composers; the orchestration is clever, but the impression is something like that of the phrase in Gilbert's opera, where "The House of Lords did nothing much, and did it very well."

Tonight one of the greatest programs of the season will be given. Brahms' second symphony will be played, and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," which ranks probably as the greatest work of this unusual composed. Listzt's "Les Preludes" will be given, and the program will close with the prelude from Wagner's "Meistersinger."

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Esta 84

Art and War.

(From the Boston Advertiser.)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra left for San Francisco in a blaze of glory. The final concert of a remarkable season was uncommonly brilliant. Due praise was awarded the conductor and the players by the critics. The audience was enthusiastic. A striking feature of the season has escaped notice.

The orchestra is composed of Germans, Austrians, French, Belgians, Dutch, Russians, Italians, Bohemians, English, Americans. Many of the players have relatives and friends in actual warfare. Some have had cause to mourn. Musicians are proverbially nervous and excitable, if not so irritable as the traditional poet. Yet during this trying season, under a conductor whose sympathies are known to every one as naturally frankly pro-German, there has been the utmost harmony in rehearsal and in private intercourse. If there was discussion, it was amicable. The men of the various nations and the conductor worked together in full artistic concord. As a result the season of 1914-15 will long be conspicuous in the annals of the orchestra. The exhibition of self-restraint, of tact, of forbearance, may well be a lesson to men in other and less nerve-rasping walks of life.

Nor should a feature of this last concert pass unnoticed. The atrocious sinking of the Lusitania was in the mind of every hearer on Saturday night. Every one knew that the conductor and the majority of the orchestra are Germans. The programme was made up of compositions by Germans, for Liszt, though a Hungarian by birth, is ranked among German composers. Yet the demonstrations of approval were unprecedented. Conductor and orchestra were applauded to the skies. For the audience realized that in art there should be no prejudice of nationality. Thus the behavior of the audience was as praiseworthy as the performance on the platform. It is not easy to think of a similar scene under the same conditions in any European city in these evil days.

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date [illegible]AY 1[illegible] 1915

Est 884

nado.

Symphony Concert Attended by Smart Set

The Wagnerian program offered by the Boston Symphony, under Dr. Carl Muck, proved an irresistible lure to the beau monde and the largest and most fashionable audience that has yet met in Festival Hall attended last evening's concert. Box holders entertained parties after informal dinners at home or in the downtown hotels, and several smaller groups occupied seats in the body of the house.

Among the music lovers who were noted in last night's audience were Dr. and Mrs. Grant Selfridge, Mr. and Mrs. John Drum, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Sharon, Mr. and Mrs. John B. Casserly, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Duplessis Beylard, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Meiere, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. William Bower Bourn, Mr. and Mrs. Mayo Newhall, Mr. and Mrs. Julian Thorne, Mr. and Mrs. William Bull Pringle, Mr. and Mrs. Elliott McAllister, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Mendell, Mr. and Mrs. Dixwell Hewitt, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Chesebrough, Mr. and Mrs. Mountford Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Stetson, Mr. and Mrs. George Pope, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Murphy, Mr. and Mrs. James Otis, Colonel and Mrs. Hamilton Stone Wallace, Dr. and Mrs. George Lyman, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Ransome, Mr. and Mrs. M. Hall McAllister, Mr. and Mrs. Atherton Macondray, Mr. and Mrs. George Newhall, Mr. and Mrs. John Johns, Mr. and Mrs. George Armsby, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Donohoe, Mr. and Mrs. Leavitt Baker, Miss Louise Janin, Miss Cora Otis, Miss Frederika Otis, Miss Sophie Beylard, Miss Ethel McAllister, Miss Hildreth Meiere, Miss Dorothea Coon, Miss Corona Williams, Miss Leonore Mejia, Miss Coralia Mejia, Miss Gladys Sullivan, Miss Barbara Parrott, Miss Emilie Parrott, Miss Ruth Zeile, Miss Gertrude Hopkins, Miss Johanna Volkmann, Miss Marion Rodgers, William Parrott, Edmund Lyman, Frederick Van Sicklen, Frederick Tillmann, William Fisher, John Hartigan, Joseph Donohoe Jr., Robert Eyre, Arthur H. Duke, William Goldsborough, Wilberforce Williams, Dr. E. K. Hopkins and Richard Tobin.

Visiting From South

[179]

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date

Est 1884

WAGNER DRAWS RECORD CROWD TO SYMPHONY

Filling Festival Hall to overflowing, Wagnerian enthusiasts left no doubt last night that there is full appreciation here of the masterly performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The house was sold out for the first time since the series began. Favorable weather may have had something to do with this, but Wagner had more. It is asserted today that the audience and receipts were the largest known for a symphony orchestra concert in America.

It was the public's night to do homage to its popular composer, and the program was to its liking.

PILGRIMS' CHORUS MASTERFUL

Perhaps there was not the fullest enthusiasm over the "Rienzi" overture, but the music inspired by the "Wesendock," which came later, brought forth atonement from the auditors. Nor was there a complete thrill inspired by "The Flying Dutchman," the opening number, but when the "Pilgrim's Song" in the "Tannhauser" overture pealed forth all capitulated to the magic of the musicians. The "Bacchanale" version of the overture was given. It was written at a time when Paris would not tolerate opera without a ballet.

The strings brought out heavenly harmonies from the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the audience was thrilled to its highest pitch:

The second part of the concert opened with the "Tristan" Vorspiel, and then followed the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the Siegfried's "Funeral March" and finally the "Parsifal" prelude.

VERSATILITY IS SHOWN

The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" showed what could be accomplished by the various sections of the orchestra independently. The versatility of the orchestra was best exemplified in "Lohengrin" and the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."

German, American and Finnish compositions will make up the program for tonight. The overture "Karolia," by Sibelius, the Finlander, his "Swan of Tuonela," and the better known "Finlandia" are among the numbers to be rendered. "Symphonic Sketches" by George W. Chadwick, the American composer, will be played. The program will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" will be the opening number.

R. L. LEV[illegible]

Examiner
From
Address San Francisco Cal.
Date MAY 20 1915

Est 1884

ORCHESTRA'S ART FLAWLESS IN GIANT TASK

Despite Production of 12 Concerts Without Duplicating a Number, Muck Again Triumphs

UNWEARIED UNDER STRAIN

Beethoven's "Little Symphony" Is Played Exquisitely; Alegretto Scherzando a Cameo in Music

BY REDFERN MASON.

To travel twice from Eastern to Western ocean, to give twelve concerts and not duplicate a number, and to do all this within the space of three weeks; this is a veritable labor of Hercules, and I question whether a parallel achievement on the part of an organization of the first rank can be cited in the whole course of musical history.

No wonder, then, that Dr. Karl Muck looked tired last night. But it was only the outward man that showed evidence of weariness. The audience at Festival Hall could detect nothing in his direction of the Beethoven's Eighth Symphony or any of the other numbers to suggest that the man has been and still is undergoing a strain which would break down most musicians.

We were eager to hear the Eighth Symphony, the "little one" as Beethoven called it; for, though it is an outcome of the time when the composer had become hopelessly afflicted with deafness, it is gay and sprightly. Nay, it is the most "unbuttoned" work, to use Beethoven's own word, that he has left us.

WORK PLAYED EXQUISITELY.

And Dr. Muck and his men played it exquisitely. The opening movement was full of charm; the instruments conversed; the sense of well-being was over all. But it was the adorable Allegretto Scherzando that delighted me most, though the Tempo di Menuetto came near to it in sheer delightfulness and the Finale sparkled and was glad.

But that Allegretto Scherzando was a mosaic; nay, a cameo, chiseled by a master hand. In response to the conductor's sensitively authoritative beat, the reeds and horns gave out that metronomic tick in which Beethoven glanced musically at his friend Maelzel, who, by the way, invented the metronome. An insinuating movement of the baton drew from the violins an instrumental witticism, a sort of Attic embroidery; 'cellos and basses grunted their approval. Oboes and calrinets, fagotts and horns continued their metronomic chatter and the flutes added gay comment. The first violins interjected a mirthful sally; the basses retorted in kind and, in a moment, the whole string choir was engaged in a duel of repartee which the high Olympian deties and Loki, too, might rejoice in.

SORT OF EVOCATION.

Mark Twain says in his "Mississippi Pilot" that a pilot must know the river as well as the average landlubber knows the hall of his own house. Something of the same kind may be said of the conductor of an orchestra. Dr. Muck could not evoke the effects which he draws from his players if he did not know his Beethoven so well that his direction of the work is a sort of evocation. The Eighth Symphony does not exist in the symbols of the printed page; it abides in the vital appreciation of the work which dwells, like the plan of a house in the mind of an architect, in the brain of the master musician, who wields the baton.

There are people who say Dr. Muck is cold. But we loved the man when he directed the Eighth Symphony last night. His baton does not describe goemetrical figures, square-cut and rigid; it is a wand of power, a talisman; it outlines desings of greater potency than those which Faustus saw in his book of black magic; it pictures soul-states in contours which Raffaelle might envy. And, as the cryptic lines are drawn, there rise into the air at its bidding palaces of sound such as Browning dreamed of in "Abt Vogler."

HAS CREATIVE GIFT.

The first number on the programme was the overture to "Der Freischutz" and, as the music took form, one divined the sympathy, fine as that which exists between lovers, which unites director and orchestra. We have heard this work dozens of times, without doubt. Dr. Muck has the creative gift which makes it seem a new composition and, listening to its blending of elements of love and terror, as they were born into new being, we could divine the delight of Germans who heard that work at its first performance and divined that, at last, the Italian domination of opera was at an end, and the Teuton genius had begotten music-drama in its own image. We revelled in that lovely music for Agatha; we shuddered at the suggestion of the supernatural; the horns sang such woodland music as will set a standard here in San Francisco which we shall not be satisfied until we have made it our own.

George Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" gave pleasure; but they did not impress us as being of the same aesthetic significance as their companion works on the programme. Mr. Chadwick had a notable command of the art of orchestration; but his ideas are not always very remote from the commonplace. I could not but think that the "Jubilee" and "Noel" might better have been called orchestral ballads. But the Scherzo, with its picture of Robin Goodfellow, is on a higher plane. It is high-fanastic and picturesque. The "Vagrom Ballad" has, perhaps, the best title to be considered symphonic. I felt sorry that Dr. Muck had not given us something by Charles Martin Loeffler, say, for example, his "Pagan Poem."

COMPOSITION BY FINN.

Last came three compositions by the Finn, Sibelius, and they restored us to the aesthetic plane of the earlier part of the programme. Especially [illegible] the "Swan of T[illegible] told how emmenkainen goes to shoot the wan which floats on the black wat[illegible]s of the Finnish Tartarus. The English horn sings the swan song. Saint Saens would have given it to the 'cello. This work is truly poetic music, like a Northern version of the seventh book of the "Aeneid" told in terms of tone.

The symphonic poem, "Finnlandia," with which the concert ended, is a noble example of national music. I never heard grander harmonies for brass; they bespoke the spirit of an indomitable people, "the stern resolve not to submit or yield." As in the "Marseillaise," as in the folk songs of Erin, I knew, in listening to this music, that, though peoples may be crushed for a time, the race spirit is deathless.

The fifth concert was a glorious one, like its predecessors. It is idle to try to pick faults; the one right thing to do is to adopt a spirit of reverent and constructive appreciation.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 20 1915

Est 188

MUSIC ROAMS IN FREEDOM OVER TONE WORLD

From Boston to Finland the Audience Is Guided by Dr. Muck's Baton.

SIBELIUS WORKS ENJOYED

Suite by Chadwick Is Given Melodious Interpretation at Festival Hall.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

Other programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Festival Hall have been more classic, or more romantic, or more new to us than that which Dr. Karl Muck beckoned into being last night, but none has been as inclusively catholic or so extended in its scope as that which last night began with Von Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" and closed with Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

Some of the big audience, no doubt, found Sibelius to be as some in an 1820 audience found Von Weber—a little too turgid, complex or tonally too revolutionary; but it is certain that no taste went ungratified last night. There was something to please everybody. It was a Christmas tree programme with gifts for all.

MUSIC IS UNUSUAL.

The Sibelius music was undoubtedly the most interesting, because most unusual. It clearly could have come from no land but that which Havelock Ellis describes so vividly: "Where the summer is a perpetual warm, sunlit day, and the rest of the year a night of darkness and horror; a land which is the extreme northern limit of European civilization on the outskirts of which the primitive gods still dwell; and where elves and fairies and mermaids are still regarded as tame domestic animals."

The orchestra played the "Carelia" overture, "The Swan of Tuonela," and "Finlandia," which should be enough to give us a fair notion of the genius of this Finnish composer. The overture seemed less inspired, and less characteristic than the other two numbers, the most important of which was the legend of the swan which the northern youth must needs shoot with an arrow before ever he could win the hand of his cold inamorata.

MYSTIC AND MOURNFUL.

This swan belongs to no flock of Saint-Saens' graceful birds, nor to any swan that fluttered white before Wagnerian eyes. Sibelius' "Swan" is mystic, strange and mournful, and sad. It sweeps over a lake like that which washed Poe's "House of Usher," and it is not to be tamed. Though breathing the wild beauty of the north, a wierd touch of almost Oriental langour was achieved when the English horn plaintively sang a tremulous song.

Chadwick's suite of Symphonic Sketches, including "A Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad," was doubly interesting, first for itself and second for the fact that it was the first work by an American composer to be played by the Boston artists. The jubilee was a shout of triumph, alternating with a melody of Celtic genealogy—or at least of Celtic sweetness.

"NOEL" NICE ADJUSTMENT.

"Noel" was a nice adjustment of a tender song to an embracing instrumentation beginning with an English horn announcement of the tune and ending with the melody in orchestral thunders. The theme was rigidly built to stand the dynamic strain, though it seemed at first to be such a song as might be inspired on a winter night by music half sad, half sweet, at the hearthstone.

"Hobgoblin" was nice grotesquerie, and "A Vagrom Ballade" might have meant anything that concerned the woods and a gay companion. In the middle there must have been some sort of trouble, however, for the melody is made to limp along with half a tone cut from its major merriment. Its minor sadness causes the bassoon to say sepulchrally, "Ah me, ah me," after which spirits are perked up a bit and irresponsibility is heard gayly shouting through the manifold voices of the orchestra.

UNSURPASSED DELICACY.

Of Beethoven's eighth symphony as of Von Weber's "Der Freischutz," it must be said again that they were heard for the first time. No such delicacy has ever characterized the humor of the second movement of Beethoven's merriest symphony, and the spirit of rollicking humor was never lost save in such infrequent moments as that in the first movement, when the violins, reiterating the initial theme become impetuous with feeling. Dr. Muck, to me, is greatest when he plays Beethoven; which is to say, he is greatest when confronted with the greatest tasks.

Tonight's programme will be devoted to Brahms, Liszt, Richard Strauss and Wagner, and that spells a programme of inclusiveness not even excelled by that which is still ringing in grateful ears.

EVENING RECORD,

MAY 27, 1915

Triumph for Symphony in Frisco Close

Bostonians' Orchestra Artistic and Financial Success at the Exposition

(Special Dispatch.)

SAN FRANCISCO, May 27.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has closed its strikingly successful season at the exposition in a blaze of glory not only artistically, but financially. It left money in the pockets of the Exposition managers which they had far from expected.

The great triumph of the orchestra will naturally be most gratifying to Maj. Higginson and to the friends and admirers of the Boston institution. And about as remarkable as anything in the season here was the personal triumph of Director Muck.

The season ended gloriously, in the words of Business Manager Burnham. The concerts have drawn remarkably large audiences, and not only that, but they have endeared the Boston orchestra most warmly to Pacific Coast music lovers.

When the season of Boston Symphony concerts was arranged the management of the great Exposition hardly expected even to break even financially on the orchestra engagement. In fact the talk had been persistent that the venture would almost certainly result in a considerable financial loss to the fair. But far otherwise has been the actual result. According to Mgr. Burnham the Exposition management is assured of a considerable profit from the concert season.

The enthusiasm of those hereabouts for the orchestra was strikingly expressed in a tremendous ovation accorded to Director Muck and members of the orchestra as a feature of the close of the concert season. This was done at a reception which showered the Director and his musicians with evidences of the esteem of Californians for the orchestra and its work.

Members of the orchestra were scheduled to leave for Boston today at 4.05 p.m., and are due to arrive in the Hub at 3 p.m. Monday.

BOSTON HERALD.

MAY 25, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES BIG HIT AT EXPOSITION

William H. Walter, press representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from San Francisco yesterday and told of the success of the organization at the Panama exposition.

"Artistically the playing was a revelation to the people of the Golden Gate," he said. "Dr. Muck made no allowances for the fact that very little symphony music has been heard on the coast, and arranged such programs as he would give in Boston or New York. The public and the press were delighted, and were most enthusiastic in their praise.

"The concerts were given in Festival Hall, an ornate structure inside the fair grounds, which has a seating capacity of 4000. In the first five concerts the smallest audience was on Monday night, May 17, when the program consisted of Brahms, Bach and Beethoven numbers. There were about 2500 persons present. On the following Wednesday night Dr. Muck gave his first Wagner program, and the orchestra played to the largest audience in its history. Every seat was sold and more than 500 stood through the two hours of the concert. The prices were by no means cheap. In addition to the 50 cents admission to the grounds, the seats were $1, $1.50 and $2.50.

"At first the fair directors looked forward to considerable financial loss, and brought the orchestra to the exposition for the prestige that would come to the fair from its performances. Already there have been sufficient receipts to guarantee against any loss, and the chances are the series of concerts will show a profit.

"Dr. Muck won success artistically and personally. He and Mrs. Muck will not return with the orchestra. They are to spend some time in California and then may take a trip to Hawaii, or return by the way of the Grand Canyon or Yosemite valley. They expect to be back in Boston about the first of July.

"The orchestra closes its engagement tomorrow, and is to leave San Francisco on Thursday. Its special train is due in Boston Monday at 3 o'clock."

MONITOR, BOSTON,

MAY 24, 1915

THRONG HEARS BOSTON MEN IN SAN FRANCISCO

Symphony Orchestra's Wagner Program Attended by 4500, Says Member of Staff Returned From Panama Fair

Playing a program of Wagner's music the Boston Symphony orchestra enjoyed at its concert of May 19 at the Panama-Pacific exposition in San Francisco, the applause of the largest audience it ever called out in its history, according to William E. Walter of the orchestra's business staff, who has just returned home. "There were 4000 persons seated in Festival hall on that occasion," said Mr. Walter, talking to a representative of The Christian Science Monitor, "and there were 500 standing. They had to pay from $2.50 down to $1 for their places in the hall, besides 50 cents at the gate. This was the largest house of the five concerts at which I was present. The smallest was two days before, when the program consisted of works by Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, but even that audience would have more than filled Symphony hall."

Notwithstanding the comparatively light interest in the three composers of the initial "B," it happened that the most enthusiastic applause given to any selection in the time Mr. Walter was in San Francisco was the one familiar in the Christmas week concerts in Symphony hall, from the "Christmas" oratorio of Bach, known as the "Shepherds' Music." "There was every prospect when I left," said Mr. Walter, "that the committee would take in money enough to pay expenses, a thing they did not expect to do when they invited the orchestra to give a series of concerts. The acclaim of having the Boston Symphony men appear at the exposition, the members considered, would make up for a deficit. Now they are not likely to meet any loss; and if they are allowed to count in the gate receipts from those attending the performances, they will figure out a gain. The tickets have been going well the last few days. I hear from Mr. Ellis, the Symphony orchestra manager, that the concert tonight, which is to be of Russian music, has sold out the house."

In regard to the auditorium in which the orchestra plays, Mr. Walter explained that a balcony had been put into Festival hall, which both increased the seating capacity and counteracted an echo which originally existed. "At present," he commented, "I should say that the acoustic engineers had got the hall a little too dull, and that the orchestra does not sound with its full brilliancy. The civic auditorium, seating 12,000, in which the final concert was to have been held, will not, I am pretty sure, be found suitable. Dr. Muck tested it with players and declared it unsatisfactory. I do not think it will be put in readiness in time for use; so the closing performance on Wednesday, May 26, which will be of Wagner's music, will have to be held in Festival hall."

The orchestra, according to the itinerary, will leave San Francisco on Thursday of this week and will arrive in Boston a week from today at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Dr. Muck will not return with the players. He and Mrs. Muck are to stay in the West for a few weeks visiting places of scenic interest.

EVENING RECORD,

MONDAY, MAY 24,

Symphony Captures the West

Hub Orchestra is Toast of 'Frisco

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken San Francisco by storm. On one night alone the orchestra played to the largest audience in its history, and press and public has been enthusiastic in its praise of the organization.

Such is the message brought home to the Hub by William E. Walter, press representative of the orchestra, which has just been playing at the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco. Walter has just returned and pictures the orchestra as one of the triumphs of the exposition program.

The last concert will be given Wednesday, and the orchestra leaves Thursday on a special train. It is due to arrive in Boston Monday afternoon.

If the orchestra's playing was a triumph, the leadership of Dr. Muck was no less so. He has been hailed as a hero of the occasion. He and Mrs. Muck plan to spend some time in California.

Success Has Passed Highest Expectations

"The success of the orchestra in every respect surpasses the highest expectation," says Walter. "Artistically its playing has been a veritable revelation to the people of San Francisco. Dr. Muck made no allowances for the general lack of Symphony music on the Coast, but arranged a set of programmes such as he would give in Boston or New York. The papers in San Francisco have been most enthusiastic in their praise of the orchestra and the public has been delighted.

"Festival Hall, where the concerts are given, is an ornate structure inside of the Fair Grounds which originally had a seating capacity of 2500. Just before the arrival of the Orchestra a balcony holding 1500 people was put in so that the total seating capacity is now 4000.

"In the first five concerts the smallest audience was Monday night, May 17th, when the programme consisted of Brahms, Bach and Beethoven and that audience contained over 2500 people. The following Wednesday night, the 19th, Dr. Muck gave his first Wagner programme and the orchestra played to the largest audience in its history. Every seat in the house was sold and over 500 stood through the two hours of performance.

"The concerts are not cheap. The prices for seats are $1, $1.50 and $2.50, and in addition to this every person going to the concerts must pay the 50 cents entrance to the Grounds.

"The directors of the concerts looked forward to a considerable financial loss, but regarded the prestige that would come to the Fair from the presence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would more than balance it. The sales, so far, have guaranteed them against any actual financial loss and the chances are favorable that the concerts will show a considerable profit. All this, naturally, is more than gratifying to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, and to Dr. Muck.

"The hero of the occasion has been Dr. Muck, not only artistically but personally. His artistic success, as was certain, has been complete. Personally he has quite captured the affections of the San Franciscans. It has been impossible for him and Mrs. Muck to accept all the entertainments that have been planned for them and the papers out there openly say that if it is possible they intend to kidnap him and keep him there.

"Mr. and Mrs. Muck will not return with the orchestra. They purpose spending a considerable time in California, planning a week or more in the Yosemite Valley and after that they are undecided what they will do. They may go to the Grand Canyon, or more likely they may return by the way of the Northern Pacific, spending a week or more in the Yellowstone Park, and the middle of the last week they were considering seriously the possibility of going to Honolulu and spending a fortnight in the Hawaiian Islands. At any rate, they do not expect to return to Boston much before the first of July, and it may be later."

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 1915

Famous Composer Exposition Visitor

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS.

SAINT-SAENS SAYS INSPIRATION IS FOUND HERE

Dean of French Composers Brings Score to "Hail California."

By WALTER ANTHONY.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS, honored guest of the exposition and San Francisco, arrived from Paris, via New York yesterday morning as chipper and spry as though he had not counted nearly eighty years. He indignantly denied the implied impeachment that he was wearied with his journey across the continent, and to prove it said he was going tonight to the exposition to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he purposed to hear every time it played, and most certainly on Sunday afternoon, when a French programme will be presented, featuring his own C minor symphony, scored for orchestra and organ.

He reminded his interviewer that in 1906 when he made his first and only other visit to the United States, this work was played in Boston Symphony Hall at a concert given in his honor under Dr. Carl Muck's leadership. At that time Saint-Saens played the organ part. At tomorrow's concert in Festival Hall that portion of the symphony will be under the adept and sympathetic fingers of Wallace Sabin and Saint-Saens will be an interested auditor.

DEDICATED TO EXPOSITION.

He has brought with him the coveted composition which he wrote for and dedicated to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. It is titled, "Hail California," and is in free fantasia form, mingling the music of France with melodies of this country in a sonorous and artistic manner.

Saint-Saens, who is the best known of the French composers, will remain here for several weeks and will himself direct some of his compositions, which will be played by the Exposition Orchestra in June.

EXPECTS INSPIRATION.

"I believe," said he, "that my visit to San Francisco will fill me with a disposition to write something which may embody my impressions of this wonderful country and this wonderful people. I have nothing in hand just now, but I expect I shall compose as long as I live."

Camille Saint-Saens, though past 79 years of age, is vigorous and sturdy, with a keen sensitiveness to present day art and an abiding interest in the future of music in his own country.

He declined in most polite manner to discuss the works of any contemporaneous composers and avoided the subject of the war, mentioning it only in connection with a statement that Paris has resumed her concerts and he music generally, and finally that her music generally, and finally that reflect itself in future heroic music of big form and virile content.

Automobile Manager

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 21 1915

RICHARD SECOND IS ORCHESTRA KING AT CONCERT

At Least He Was So Declared When Symphonic Poem "Death" Was Played.

WAGNER IN SECOND PLACE

At Least He Was in Opinion of Big Audience Last Night.

By WALTER ANTHONY.

For taking an audience around, Dr. Karl Muck is the Cook of all conductors. There may be some bumps in transit, but they come between stops and not during them. We leaped from Brahms at his most gracile to Liszt in one of his stormiest moods, and after we had been led to the muse of Strauss we were turned back—or wouldn't you rather say ahead—to Richard Wagner, whose "Meistersinger" overture, after the stormy mortuary chamber scene of the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration," was so clear and simple that Dr. Muck did not deign, part of the time, to indicate the rhythm at all, but let his instrumentalists unravel the many strands of counterpoint undirected.

If it hadn't been for the Hungarian Liszt, last night's programme might well have been stamped "made in Germany," and modern Teuton music could scarcely have been better represented, if one is willing to agree that in Brahms one finds the spirit of Bach and the sinew of Beethoven.

SYMPHONY BEAUTIFUL.

The Hamburg composer was present in the serene spirit of his second symphony, in D major, in which many find Mendelssohn, but I do not, and others find Mozart, but it is a modern Mozart with more of dissonantal vigor than Wolfgang's delicately classic ears would welcome, I think. How beautifully was this peaceful, sometimes humorous and always clear symphony played! I think Dr. Muck brings the devotion of complete sympathy to Brahms as he does to Beethoven; he is like those intimate friends of long years' acquaintance, who see past the uttered word the inarticulate thought which moved you to speak. The lovely melody of English horn in the third movement, the brave controversial melodies of the final movement, the clearing up of doubtful matter in the second movement, usually muddy with uncertain meaning, were some of the pleasures brought from the luminous grays of this sun-kissed work.

I'm probably wrong, but it pleases me to think that Dr. Muck would have been better pleased if the outburst of enthusiasm that came after the Strauss fantasy had been devoted to the stiller voice of Strauss' better.

IS STRAUSS' NIGHT.

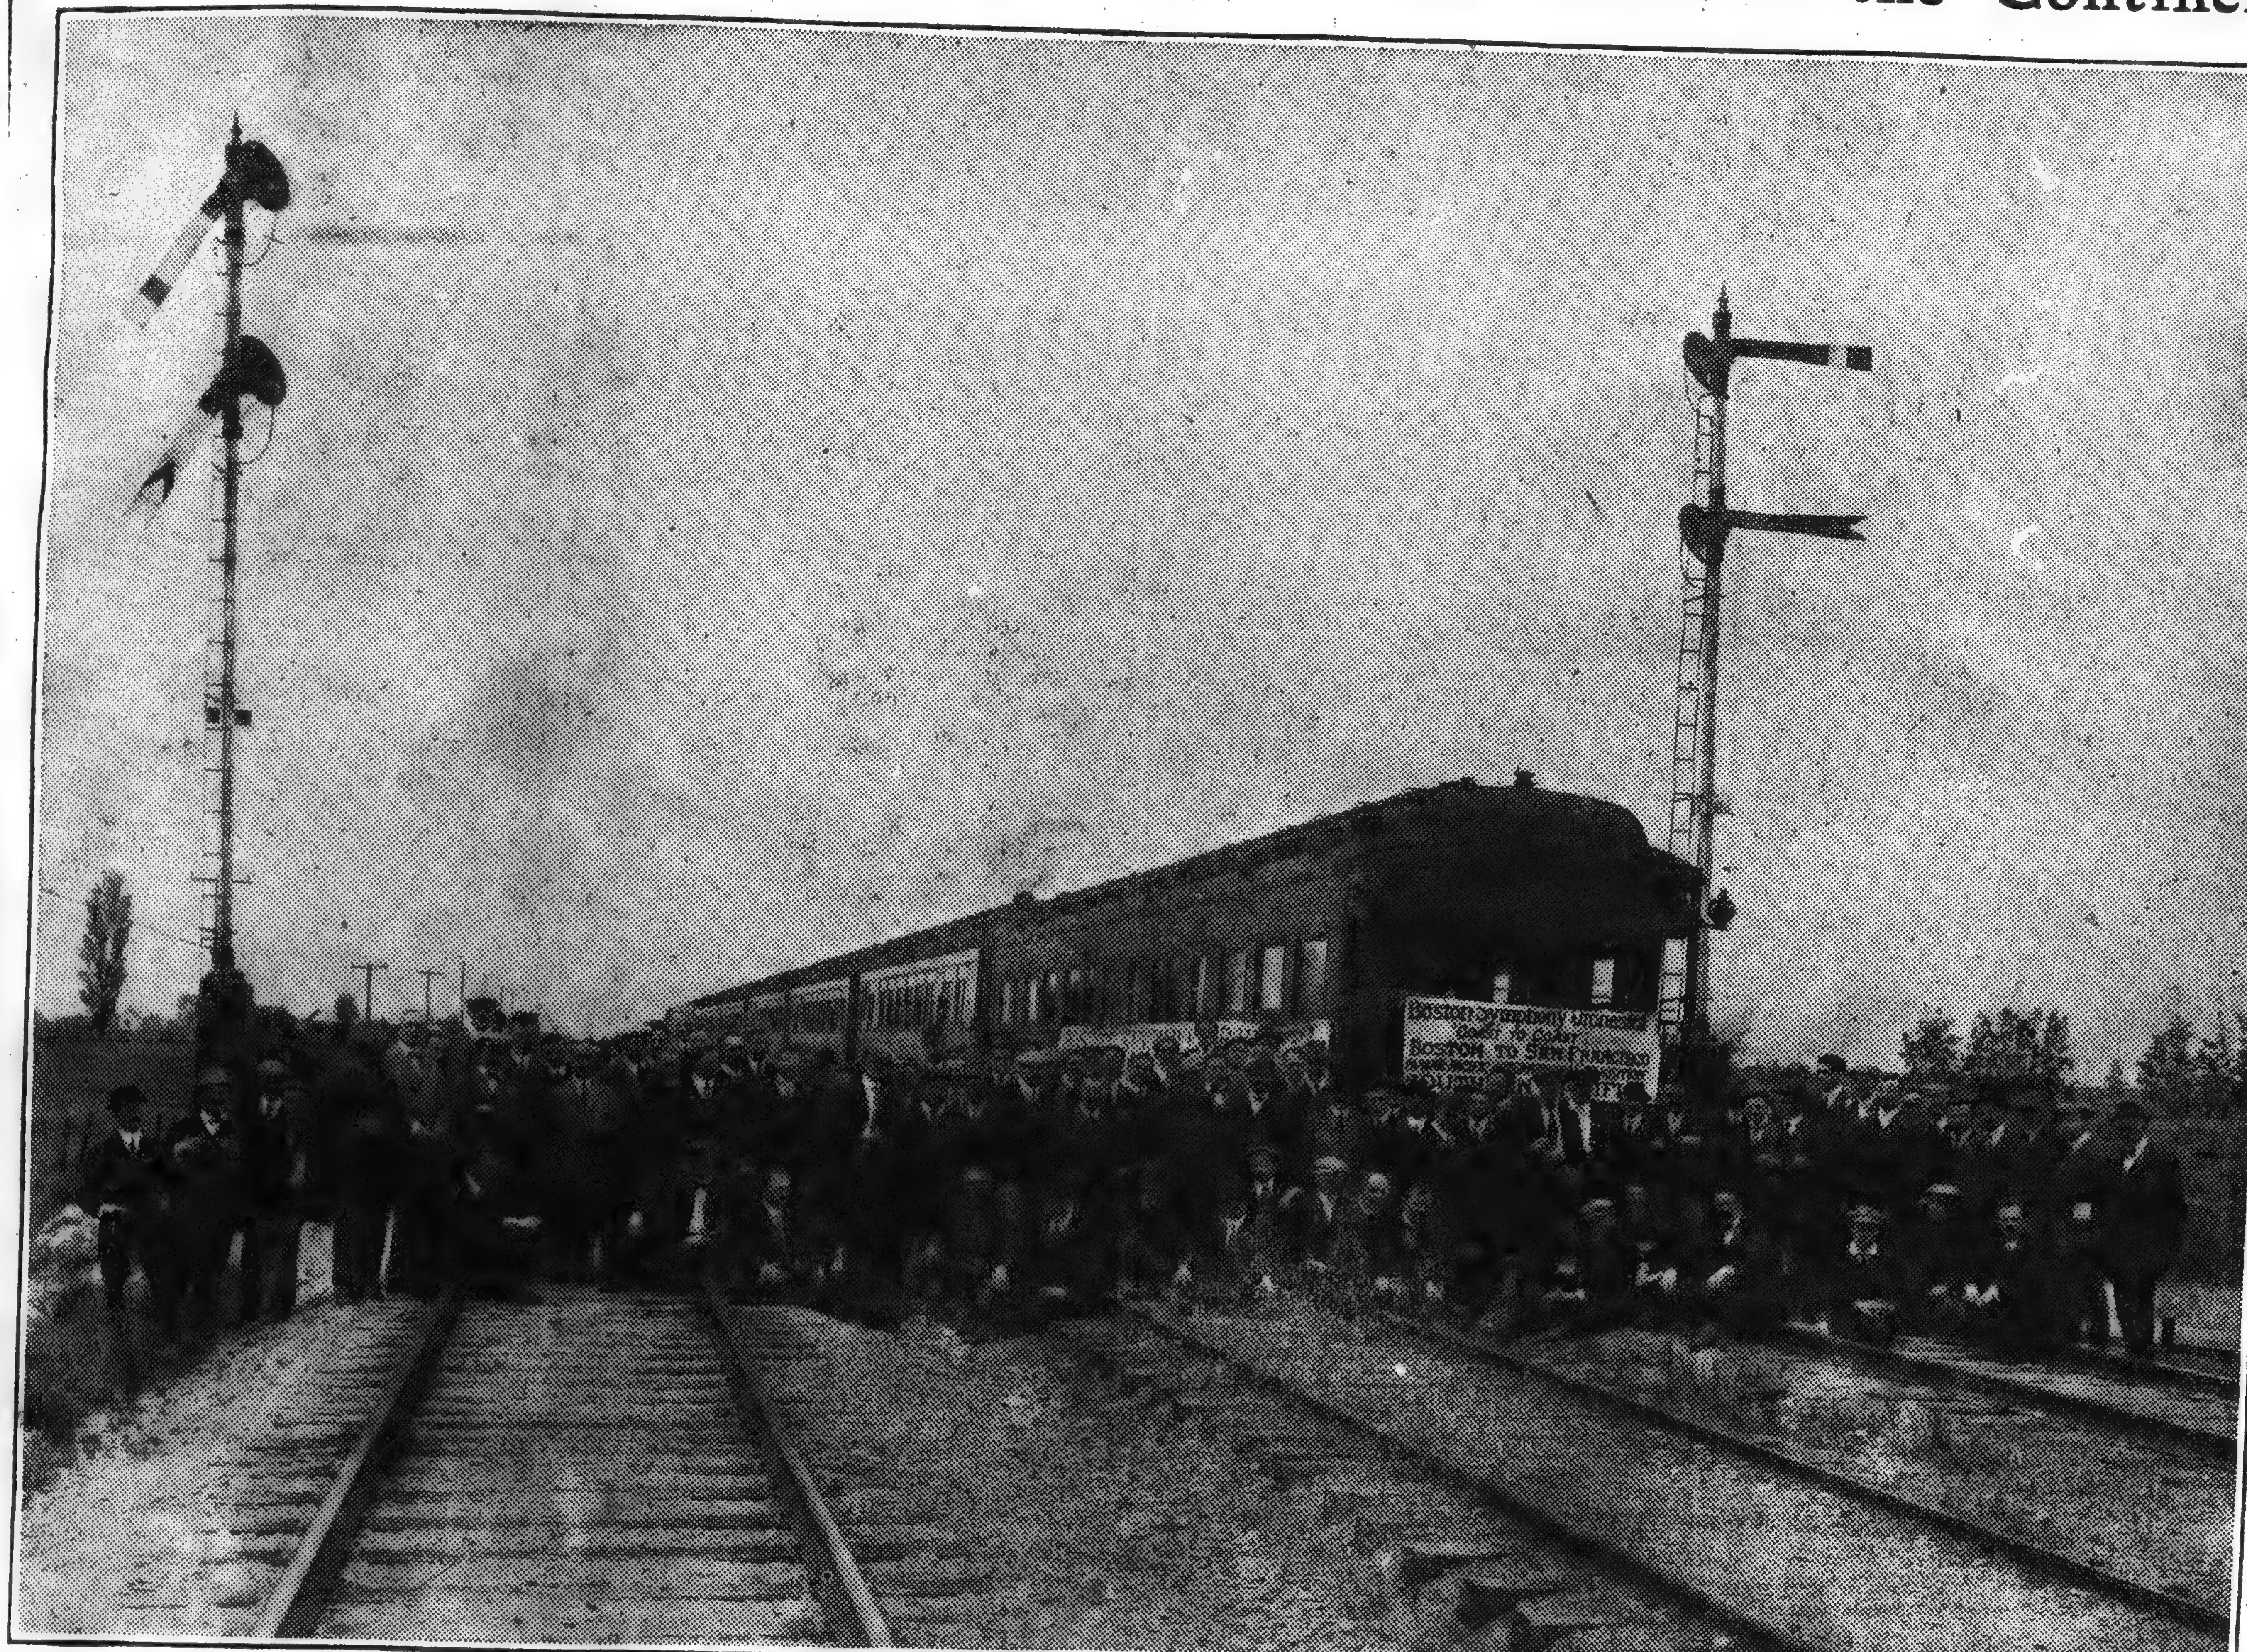
However, it was Strauss' night. His "Death and Transfiguration" was the work that commanded the most applause—an applause that was not stilled until Dr. Muck had called upon his instrumentalists to acknowledge it standing. And truly it was a wonderful agglomeration of thrilly music, interspersed with tender suggestions of melodies, and passages that led to climaxes such as the orchestra has not before been called upon to produce. The sonorous climaxes following discordant conjoining of distantly or rather utterly unrelated chords were the more effective for the very pains that were endured to reach them, and there are few more solemn, sinister, portentous silences in music than those punctuated by Strauss in this symphonic poem, when Death wins the victory which is announced with solemn gonglike knell.

BEAUTY OF LISZT.

The opulence of color in the Liszt "Symphonic Poem," No. 3, led the way measurably to Strauss' orgy of tone but Liszt, like Wagner, seemed ineffably beautiful and consonant whe separated by the mighty storm o Strauss' instrumentation.

Tonight will be given to Italia music, and Cherubini, Sgambati, Boss and Goldini will make a nice contras with last night's performance, givin a glimpse of that sunny land whic Strauss lamented could not be hi home, and where perhaps he migh have shaken off the gloom of northern mists.

The Boston Orchestra, Bound for the Fair, in a "Pause" in the Middle of the Continent



Stopping at Lucin, Utah, on the Southern Pacific

Dr. Muck is the figure under the sign in the unfamiliar garb of knickers and golf cap. Near him by the signal post is Witek, the concert-master. Those familiar with the band will easily recognize its other prominent members.

May 21st Transcript, Ma

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 1915

k, 1884

Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the guest of honor at a reception in the Massachusetts building at the exposition last night after the symphony concert. The affair was given by the Massachusetts Board of Managers. Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Power and Dr. and Mrs. Muck received.

Among those present were:

Mr. and Mrs. James M. Longyear of Brookline, Mass.; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, General Nelson A. Miles, Messrs. and Mesdames Horace Davis Pillsbury, John B. Casserly, William H. Crocker, John Rothschild, William B. Bourn, George A. Pope, W. H. Leahy, J. B. Levison, George E. Bates, C. T. C. Whitcomb, Clifford C. Martin, Charles W. Camm, C. Frederick Kohl, John C. Manning; Colonel and Mrs. L. H. Clement, the Misses Evelyn and Marie Withrow, Ethel Clement, Messrs. Max Bendix, H. T. Parker, musical critic of the Boston Transcript; C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and George W. Stewart.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 21 1915

, 1884

INDIANS WILL DANCE TODAY FOR SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

As a special compliment to Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Indians of the Miller Brothers' 101 Ranch will give a special performance of their tribal dances in Festival Hall at the exposition at 11 A. M. today. The Indians from Glacier Park, who are a part of the Great Northern exhibit at the exposition, have also been asked to take part. Dr. Muck has never seen an Indian dance, and while the programme will be for him especially, the public is invited.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 21 1915

Heard In the Drawingrooms

k, 1884

Reception Tonight

Following the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight a reception and supper will be given in compliment to Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck by the board of managers of the Massachusetts Building in the Exposition grounds. Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Power, resident hosts of the building, and John C. Daniels, in charge of the educational exhibit of that state, will receive the company, which will include Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. William Bowers Bourn, Mr. and Mrs. George Pope, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Kohl, Mr. and Mrs. William Leahy, Mr. and Mrs. John Rothschild, Mr. and Mrs. John B. Casserly, Mr. and Mrs. James N. Longyear, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Levison, Mr. and Mrs. George E. Bates, Mr. and Mrs. Clifford C. Martin, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Pillsbury, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Camm, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Manning, Colonel and Mrs. L. H. Clement, Mrs. H. A. Beach, Mrs. N. K. Withrow, Mrs. Shattuck, Miss Bertha Camm, Miss Ethel Clement, General Nelson Miles, W. H. Brennon, C. A. Ellis, George W. Stewart, Max Bendix and H. T. Parker.

Pianoforte Recital

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 21 1915

1884

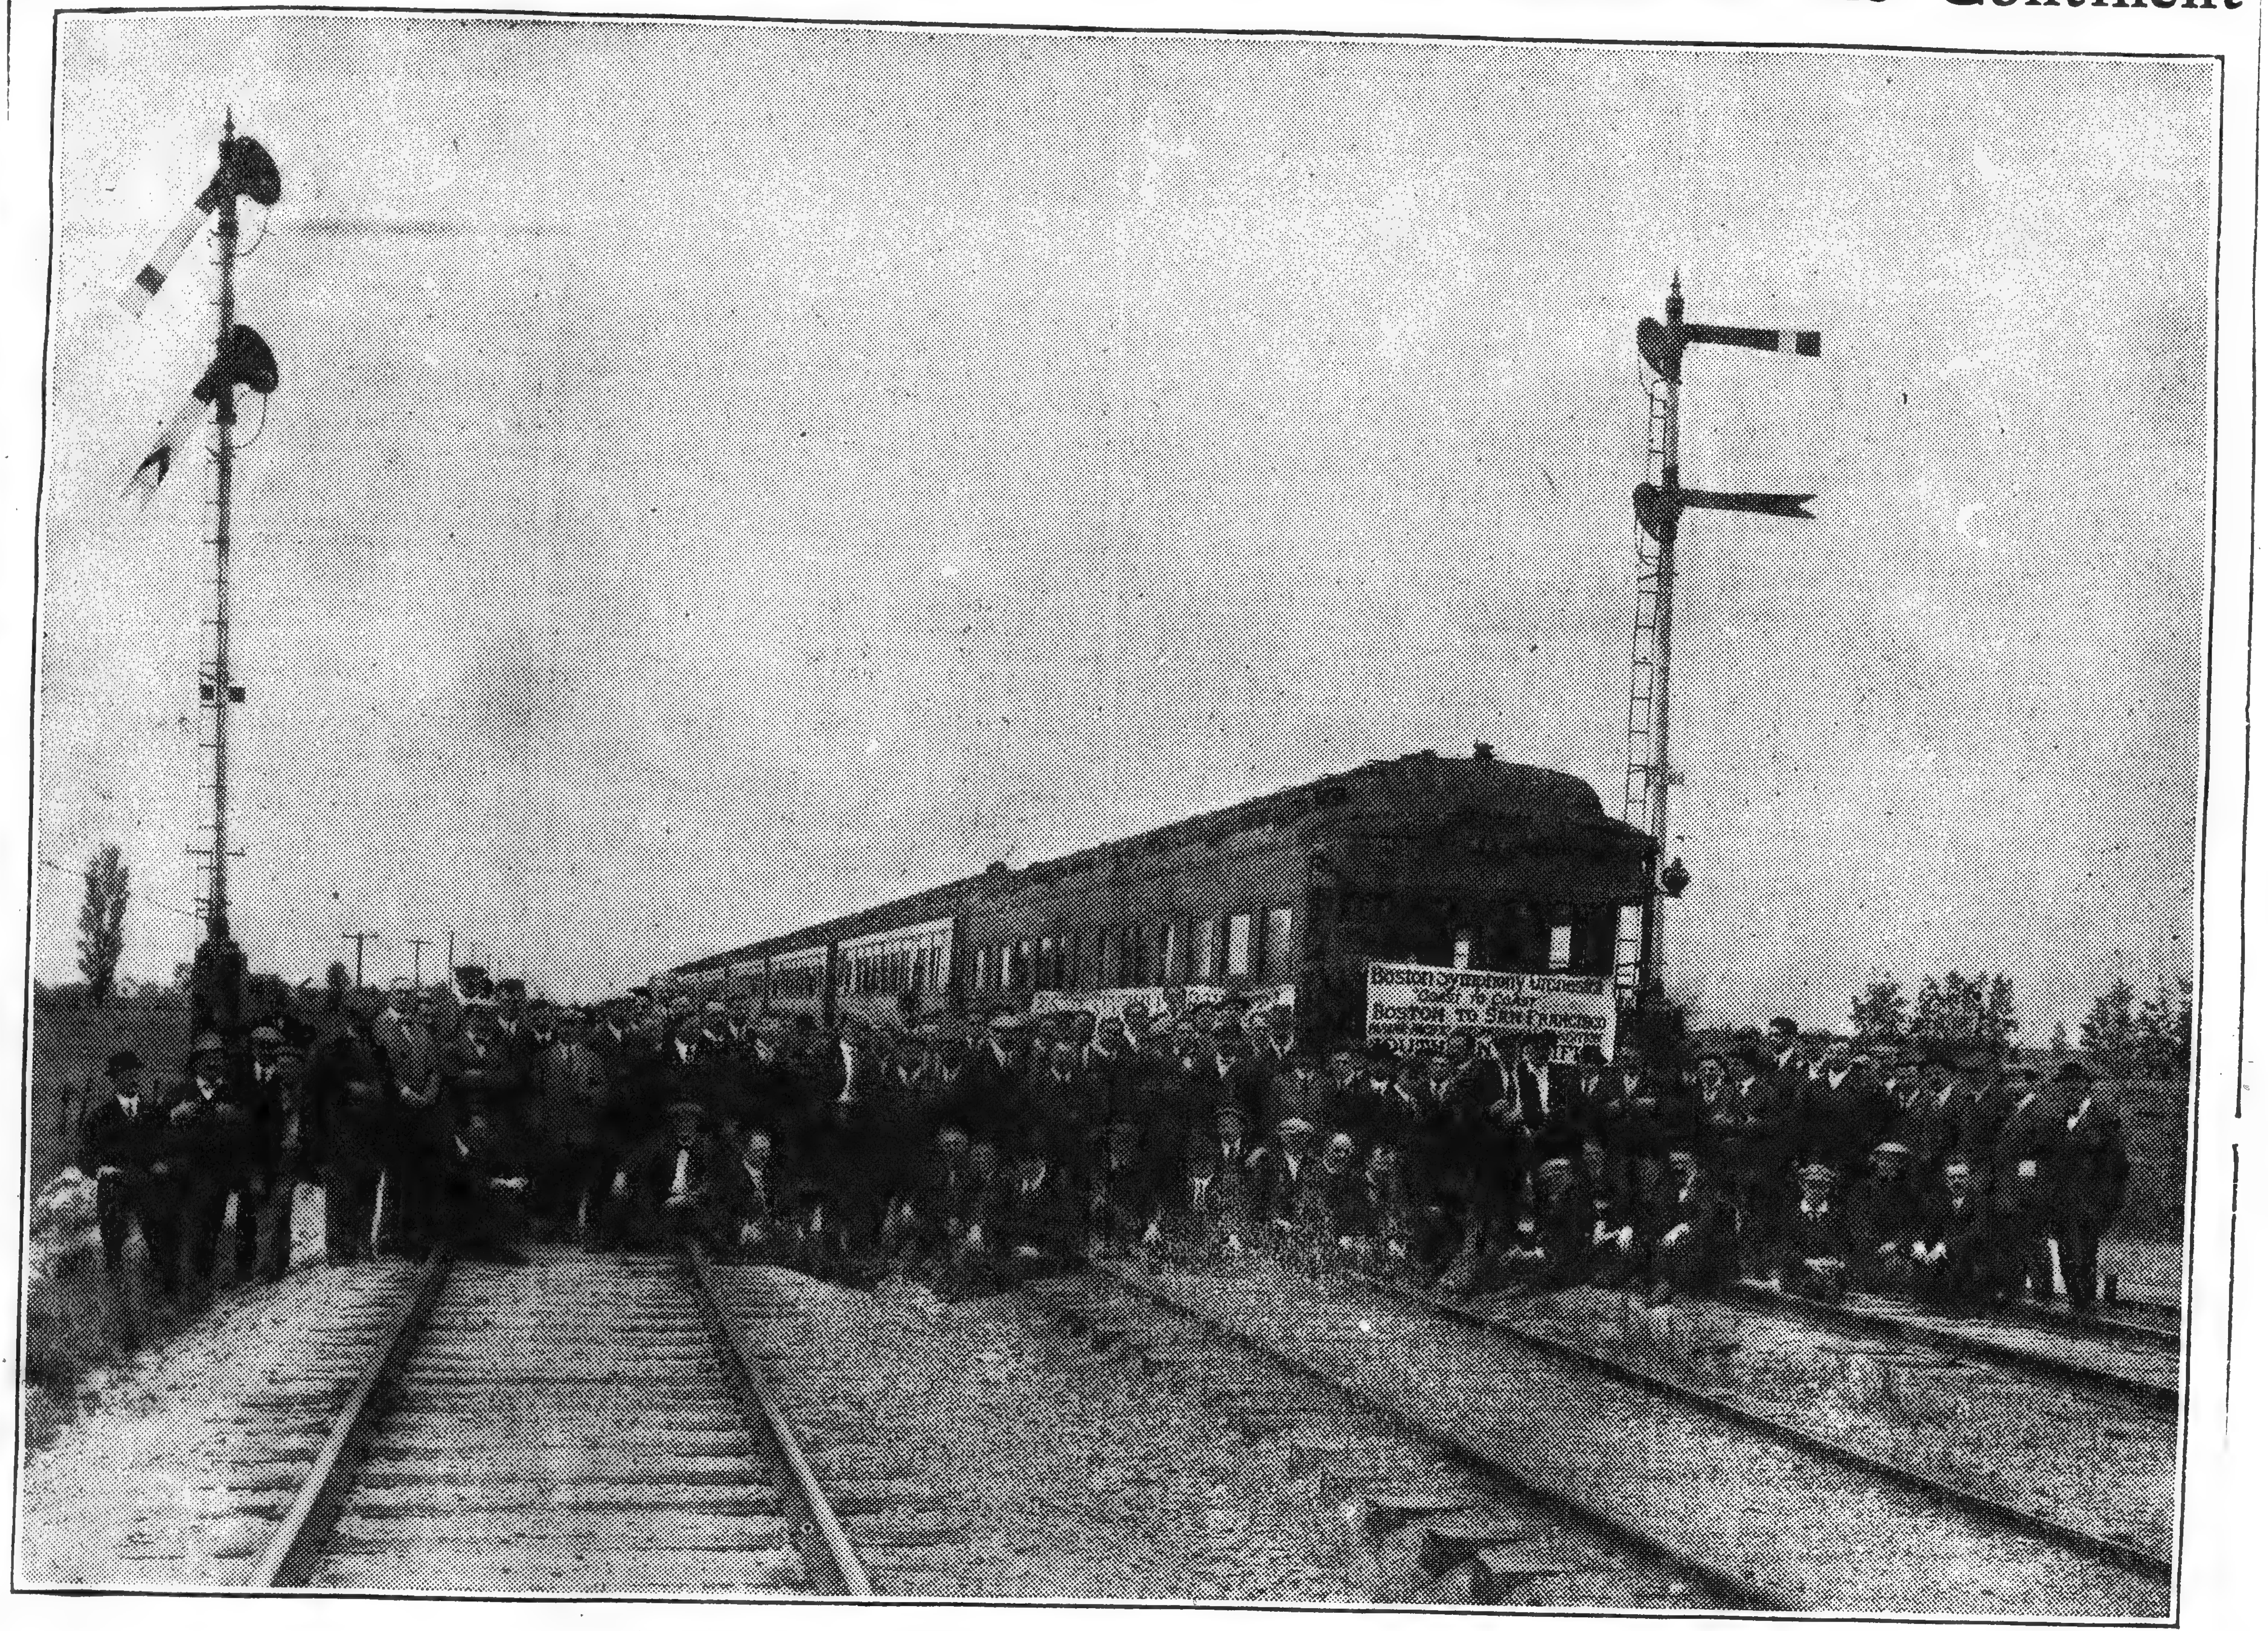
Indians Stage War Dance for Dr. Muck

Director Karl Muck and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as several hundred other visitors to the Exposition today, were treated to an event of barbaric interest at noon, when a number of braves and squaws from the 101 Ranch show staged a primitive singing and dancing entertainment on the steps of Festival Hall.

For half an hour the Indians made the grounds echo with their solemn dirges and warlike chants, until the great siren on Machinery Hall, which had grown hoarse in an effort to announce the noon hour, finally lapsed into quiet sleep.

Some of the Indian steps seemed strangely reminiscent of the Highland fling and the hornpipe, but this was explained by Director Muck and his associates as being due to the influence of the pale faces over the Sioux Indians.

The Boston Orchestra, Bound for the Fair, in a "Pause" in the Middle of the Continent



Stopping at Lucin, Utah, on the Southern Pacific

Dr. Muck is the figure under the sign in the unfamiliar garb of knickers and golf cap. Near him by the signal post is Witek, the concert-master. Those familiar with the band will easily recognize its other prominent members.

May 21st Transcript, Ma

---

s in the world

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 2 2 1915

k, 1884

* * * *

Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the guest of honor at a reception in the Massachusetts building at the exposition last night after the symphony concert. The affair was given by the Massachusetts Board of Managers. Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Power and Dr. and Mrs. Muck received.

Among those present were:

Mr. and Mrs. James M. Longyear of Brookline, Mass.; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, General Nelson A. Miles, Messrs. and Mesdames Horace Davis Pillsbury, John B. Casserly, William H. Crocker, John Rothschild, William B. Bourn, George A. Pope, W. H. Leahy, J. B. Levison, George E. Bates, C. T. C. Whitcomb, Clifford C. Martin, Charles W. Camm, C. Frederick Kohl, John C. Manning; Colonel and Mrs. L. H. Clement, the Misses Evelyn and Marie Withrow, Ethel Clement, Messrs. Max Bendix, H. T. Parker, musical critic of the Boston Transcript; C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and George W. Stewart.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 2 1 1915

Es , 1884

INDIANS WILL DANCE TODAY FOR SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

As a special compliment to Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Indians of the Miller Brothers' 101 Ranch will give a special performance of their tribal dances in Festival Hall at the exposition at 11 A. M. today. The Indians from Glacier Park, who are a part of the Great Northern exhibit at the exposition, have also been asked to take part. Dr. Muck has never seen an Indian dance, and while the programme will be for him especially, the public is invited.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 2 1 1915

E , 1884

Heard In the Drawingrooms

Reception Tonight

Following the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight a reception and supper will be given in compliment to Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck by the board of managers of the Massachusetts Building in the Exposition grounds. Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Power, resident hosts of the building, and John C. Daniels, in charge of the educational exhibit of that state, will receive the company, which will include Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. William Bowers Bourn, Mr. and Mrs. George Pope, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Kohl, Mr. and Mrs. William Leahy, Mr. and Mrs. John Rothschild, Mr. and Mrs. John B. Casserly, Mr. and Mrs. James N. Longyear, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Levison, Mr. and Mrs. George E. Bates, Mr. and Mrs. Clifford C. Martin, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Pillsbury, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Camm, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Manning, Colonel and Mrs. L. H. Clement, Mrs. H. A. Beach, Mrs. N. K. Withrow, Mrs. Shattuck, Miss Bertha Camm, Miss Ethel Clement, General Nelson Miles, W. H. Brennon, C. A. Ellis, George W. Stewart, Max Bendix and H. T. Parker.

Pianoforte Recital

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 2 1 1915

E 1884

Indians Stage War Dance for Dr. Muck

Director Karl Muck and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as several hundred other visitors to the Exposition today, were treated to an event of barbaric interest at noon, when a number of braves and squaws from the 101 Ranch show staged a primitive singing and dancing entertainment on the steps of Festival Hall.

For half an hour the Indians made the grounds echo with their solemn dirges and warlike chants, until the great siren on Machinery Hall, which had grown hoarse in an effort to announce the noon hour, finally lapsed into quiet sleep.

Some of the Indian steps seemed strangely reminiscent of the Highland fling and the hornpipe, but this was explained by Director Muck and his associates as being due to the influence of the pale faces over the Sioux Indians.

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 1915
Establishe

Noted Conductor May Succeed Henry Hadley

Number of Concerts by San Francisco Orchestra Next Season To Be Doubled; Hertz May Come Here.

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

HENRY HADLEY in all likelihood will not be the conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. Alfred Hertz, the very noted Wagnerian conductor of the eMtropolitan Opera; Max Fiedler, who preceded Dr. Muck in the Boston Symphony, and one or two others are being considered as possible successors.

This announcement, of treble interest at this time, when the Boston orchestra has aroused deep enthusiasm here, was made in verification of a rumor, by Richard M. Tobin, chairman of the music committee of the San Francisco Musical Association.

Another announcement of deep importance is the statement by Manager Frank Healey that next season the orchestra will give ten special concerts on Sunday afternoons at popular prices, in addition to the ten on the regular subscription series.

Five rehearsals will be held for each pair of concerts, instead of four per concert, as in past seasons.

TOWARD DEMOCRACY.

In other words, the orchestra, which has been too largely a society affair, is to come out of its shell and become a real institution. Artistic success is impossible with the old limited clientele. Those who remember the magnificent audience of 3,000 which filled the Exposition-Civic Auditorium one Sunday afternoon last Januar yto hear this orchestra play will realize what the ten extra concerts may signify.

And here is a third great announcement: Alfred Hertz has been asked to come out here and conduct a couple of Wagnerian concerts in August and has replied favorably. The concerts will probably be held, with a special orchestra of local artists.

It is at this time that Hertz will look over the field, and if all goes well, next season we shall have a conductor who ranks among the first few of the land.

HADLEY APPRECIATED.

Hadley's contract has expired. Many of the most influential members of the Musical Association are urging its renewal. But there is a strong sentiment against it on the part of men all of whom admire Hadley personally and appreciate what he has done, yet who also realize that greater artistic development will only be possible under a changed leadership.

Hadley as composer ranks among the first living Americans. As conductor he has certain shortcomings, mainly a lack of interest in all but the most modern music. His Beethoven has been dead for ninety years.

MONEY NEEDED.

Were it not for the financial consideration, it would seem, the announcement of Hadley's departure could be made now with certainty. But the money problem is difficult.

"People ask," said Tobin, "'Why can't we have an orchestra as good as the Boston Symphony?' The whole answer is, 'We can't get the money.'

"Henry L. Higginson has spent $900,000 on the Boston orchestra out of his own coffers. The San Francisco Musical Association puts up only $30,000 a year, and it is doubtful whether we can get any more.

"We have never really had a symphony orchestra at all, in the sense that Boston has. Their musicians play for nobody except Dr. Muck. Our poor fellows play in cafes and theaters and hotels. We could only afford to pay for their services for every other week. It actually happened last year that some of those men only got $13 from the orchestra every alternate week.

"When these things are told to the conductors they look serious. Few would face such trying conditions. I doubt whether many conductors, even of real eminence, could do any better under these limitations than Hadley. People should understand these things; they would be less ready to condemn."

INCREASED SKILL.

One added source of revenue next year will be the ten special concerts, and with an orchestra more work means better work.

It has always been matter for regret that the orchestra has been kept aloof from the general public. The Friday afternoon concerts in the Cort Theater have been mainly attended by a special, not a general, audience. True artistic success could not come without a more liberal policy, for art draws its life from life at large.

There is no question as to the ability of the musicians who will form the orchestra. They are San Francisco's best, and the best here is very good. Among the announcements is that Stanislas Bem, the fine 'cellist, will replace Arthur Hadley.

---

om CALL
ddress: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 21 1915
Es 1884

3000 THRILLED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck conducted an audience of over 3000 music lovers in Festival Hall last night through the beauties of Brahms, Liszt, Strauss and Richard Wagner, his instrumentalists, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, meanwhile, painting the glories of the world through which its auditors traveled.

From Brahms at his most gracile to Liszt at his stormiest, to Strauss in his revelry and Wagner in his joy, the music rendered by the symphonists bore the minds of all. The honeyed philosophies of Brahms unfolded only to be superseded in the hearts of the audience by the poetic revery of Liszt. Wagner and Strauss were beautifully clear and simple.

ORCHESTRA SALUTES APPLAUSE

Brahms was represented by the serene spirit of his second symphony, in D major. This semi-peaceful, semi-laughing symphony was a thing of beauty in the hands of Dr. Muck and his cohorts. With the devotion of complete sympathy to Brahms, Dr. Muck is able to treat his music as a friend of long years' acquaintance.

The Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" was the work that commanded the most applause. The applause was not stilled until Dr. Muck had called upon his men to acknowledge it standing. It was wonderfully thrilling music, interspersed with tender suggestions of melodies and passages that led to sonorous climaxes.

"MADE IN GERMANY" MUSIC

The Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," became an embodiment in music of the seerlike poetry of Lemartine. Hearing this music was an experience. If it had not been for the Hungarian composer, Liszt, the program could have been stamped "Made in Germany," for modern Teutonic music could scarcely have been better represented and certainly never better rendered.

Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" was the closing number of the program. It became a beautiful example of clarity and simplicity under the sway of Dr. Muck and concluded an evening of rare art and feeling and interpretation.

ITALIAN PROGRAM TONIGHT

Tonight will be given to Italian music, and Cherubini, Sgambati, Bossi and Goldini will make a nice contrast with last night's performance, giving a glimpse of that sunny land which Strauss lamented could not be his home, and where perhaps he might have shaken off the gloom of northern mists.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 1915
Est 1884

MUCK CRITICISES CIVIC AUDITORIUM

Says All Orchestras Would Sound Alike There Owing to Faulty Acoustics.

"Absolutely perfect acoustics," the ideal set for the Civic Center Auditorium, has not yet been attained, according to Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"All orchestras would sound alike in this room," declared Dr. Muck after listening to the exposition players in a test of the Auditorium yesterday. Those who waited for the decision of the Boston conductor interpreted it to mean that there is still sufficient reverberation from the dome to make it impossible to appreciate the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is greater than other symphony orchestras. So the plan to have the Bos symphony concert in the Civic Cent Auditorium at popular prices has be reluctantly abandoned.

But the ambition remains to hav the Auditorium made perfect in it acoustics. In fact it is more than a ambition. It is a determination.

"Not absolutely perfect now," William H. Crocker, chairman of the exposition building committee said yesterday, "but it is not too much to say that the Auditorium is 95 per cent perfect in its acoustics. That small remaining defect is sufficient, however, to make it impossible for the appreciation of the finest musical performances.

"But this defect is going to be remedied. The Johns-Manville Company, which recently took the contract to remedy the defect, gave a guarantee to make the Auditorium perfect. The representative of the company informed me the other day that the felt had been put in place on the ceiling and that the acoustics were now absolutely perfect.

Dr. Muck's criticism has, however, been called to his attention by H. D. H. Connick, and we understand that the company will live up to its guarantee. This can be done, I am told, by simply adding to the surface covered by the felt."

The contract with the Johns-Manville Company calls for a payment of $12,000 when the annoying resonance shall have been absolutely corrected.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 19
Est

SYMPHONY GIVES FINE ITALIAN PROGRAM

A feast of Italian music in the Festival Hall, rendered by Dr. Muck, the foremost German conductor, and his internationally composed orchestra from Boston, with Camille Saint-Saens, the foremost composer of France, the guest of honor, proved to a large audience last night the universal language of the symphonic muse.

The program included a symphony by Sgambati, a Cherubini overture, Bossi's intermezzo and a Sinigaglia overture.

Saint-Saens was an unannounced guest. From his loge box he appeared the most interested and enthusiastic auditor in the hall.

PEACE TONES RULE

The interpretation of the music of the Italian symphonists by Dr. and his orchestra had more of and quiet than has thus far heard from the masterful musi The instruments seemed to laugh gossip and breathe the tones o compositions as if they were human.

The first rendition was Sgamb Symphony, No. 1, in D major. It not the Italian music of fire and sion and vehemence. It was an teresting movement of tenderness if inspired by the hopeless song o rejected lover.

The Cherubini overture to the opera "Anacreon" was a beautiful work and admirably adapted to show the mervelous capacity of the strings of the Boston organization to meet any demand on their scope and elasticity.

WORK IS PERFECT

No body of violinists could have faced a more difficult task and accomplished their work better than did the Bostonians.

The Bossi intermezzo, which consisted of five archaic dance movements and a serenatina, were for the strings alone. The entire body of strings, in many octave movements, proved a superb unanimity as to pitch and again developed an impetuosity of spirit that was enlivening and refreshing.

Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" closed the program. It was a suggestion of wit and humor, that was the first touch thus far to reveal a little of the modernity of orchestration.

CONCERT THIS AFTERNOON

This afternoon's concert will include Mozart's Symphony in G minor, which, though not so well known as the "Jupiter," is really a more effective and important work, and its presentation should be the more enjoyable because its simplicities have usually stood in the way of its adequate interpretation.

Bach's double concerto, written for two violins and orchestra of strings, will be given, with A. Witek and S. Noak, first and second concert masters, respectively, as the soloists.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture will provide a nice contrast to the classics of Mozart and Bach, while Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" belongs on any program and makes its way in any company.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 1915
E 1884

'WAGNER NIGHT,' BOSTONIANS' FAREWELL

The visit to San Francisco of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been productive of such artistic benefit and delight to the music loving public of California, is drawing to a close, and the last concerts of the series will be given at Festival Hall today and tomorrow afternoons at 2:30 o'clock and on Monday and Tuesday evenings at 8:30.

A special farewell concert has been arranged for Wednesday evening at 8:30 o'clock, at Festival Hall, with a second program devoted entirely to the works of Richard Wagner. Dr. Muck is admittedly an authority on Wagner's music and he is the last of that group of the extraordinary conductors who drew their inspiration from Bayreuth when it was at the highest point of its artistic value. The program he has arranged is one of thrilling beauty and contains one number which he will play in concert for the first time, "The Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal." He has steadfastly refused to play any excerpts from "Parsifal" in concert, except the prelude, but he has decided that it is due to San Francisco to hear this exquisite bit, which depicts the meadows and fields flowering under the radiance of Good Friday morn.

The program begins with the great "A Faust Overture," which is very characteristic and shows many traces of the "Tristan" period in which it was revised. The second number will be the charming "Siegfried Idyl," played a few days ago. This will give a very stunning arrangement of parts of Siegfried and "Dusk of the Gods," and the wonderful pictorial music which accompanies Siegfried's venture through the magic fire to find the sleeping Brunhilde, from the last act of "Siegfried," the coming of dawn from the prologue of the "Dusk of the Gods," the parting of Siegfried and Brunhilde and finally Siegfried's Rhine journey, from the same work.

In the second part of the program will be heard "The Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and an admirably arranged selection from the last act of "Die Meistersinger," which includes "The Dance of the Apprentices," "The Entrance of the Guilds of the Ancient City of Nuremberg" and the homage to Hans Sachs. The final number will be the "Tannhauser" overture. Seats will be ready Monday morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 20 1915
tablist

BEETHOVEN ART CHARMS THRONG IN SYMPHONY

Wide range and scope marked the rogram of the Boston Symphony rchestra in Festival Hall last night. nwearied by the rapid succession of nduplicated concerts, Dr. Karl Muck voked exquisite renditions from his rchestra of a catholic range of comositions which began with Von Veber's overture to "Der Freischutz" nd closed with Sibelius' symphonic oem, "Finlandia."

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was cluded in the scope of the proram, the symphony that has been alled "the little one." Dr. Muck and is men play it exquisitely and with charm that seemed to spread over ll.

SHOWS COMPOSER'S GENIUS

The Sibelius music was undoubtedly e most interesting, because most unsual. The orchestra played the Carelia" overture, "The Swan of Tuoela" and "Finlandia"—enough to give fair notion of the genius of the Finish composer.

Chadwick's suite of symphonic ketches, including "A Jubilee," "Noel," Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad," vas interesting as being the first work of an American composer to be played here by the Boston orchestra.

The "Jubilee" was a song of trimph and Celtic sweetness. "Noel" was nice adjustment of tender song. 'Hobgoblin" was gotesquerie.

AT BEST IN BEETHOVEN

The first number on the program vas the overture to "Der Freischutz," nd as the music took form, one ivined the sympathy which unites irector and orchestra.

The Beethoven symphony was rendered in a spirit of rollicking humor hat lost none of the impetuous feel-

[183]

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 1915
Establishe

Noted Conductor May Succeed Henry Hadley

Number of Concerts by San Francisco Orchestra Next Season To Be Doubled; Hertz May Come Here.

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

HENRY HADLEY in all likelihood will not be the conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. Alfred Hertz, the very noted Wagnerian conductor of the eMtropolitan Opera; Max Fiedler, who preceded Dr. Muck in the Boston Symphony, and one or two others are being considered as possible successors.

This announcement, of treble interest at this time, when the Boston orchestra has aroused deep enthusiasm here, was made in verification of a rumor, by Richard M. Tobin, chairman of the music committee of the San Francisco Musical Association.

Another announcement of deep importance is the statement by Manager Frank Healey that next season the orchestra will give ten special concerts on Sunday afternoons at popular prices, in addition to the ten on the regular subscription series.

Five rehearsals will be held for each pair of concerts, instead of four per concert, as in past seasons.

TOWARD DEMOCRACY.

In other words, the orchestra, which has been too largely a society affair, is to come out of its shell and become a real institution. Artistic success is impossible with the old limited clientele. Those who remember the magnificent audience of 8,000 which filled the Exposition-Civic Auditorium one Sunday afternoon last Januar yto hear this orchestra play will realize what the ten extra concerts may signify.

And here is a third great announcement: Alfred Hertz has been asked to come out here and conduct a couple of Wagnerian concerts in August and has replied favorably. The concerts will probably be held, with a special orchestra of local artists.

It is at this time that Hertz will look over the field, and if all goes well, next season we shall have a conductor who ranks among the first few of the land.

HADLEY APPRECIATED.

Hadley's contract has expired. Many of the most influential members of the Musical Association are urging its renewal. But there is a strong sentiment against it on the part of men all of whom admire Hadley personally and appreciate what he has done, yet who also realize that greater artistic development will only be possible under a changed leadership.

Hadley as composer ranks among the first living Americans. As conductor he has certain shortcomings, mainly a lack of interest in all but the most modern music. His Beethoven has been dead for ninety years.

MONEY NEEDED.

Were it not for the financial consideration, it would seem, the announcement of Hadley's departure could be made now with certainty. But the money problem is difficult.

"People ask," said Tobin, "'Why can't we have an orchestra as good as the Boston Symphony?' The whole answer is, 'We can't get the money.'

"Henry L. Higginson has spent $900,000 on the Boston orchestra out of his own coffers. The San Francisco Musical Association puts up only $30,000 a year, and it is doubtful whether we can get any more.

"We have never really had a symphony orchestra at all, in the sense that Boston has. Their musicians play for nobody except Dr. Muck. Our poor fellows play in cafes and theaters and hotels. We could only afford to pay for their services for every other week. It actually happened last year that some of those men only got $13 from the orchestra every alternate week.

"When these things are told to the conductors they look serious. Few would face such trying conditions. I doubt whether many conductors, even of real eminence, could do any better under these limitations than Hadley. People should understand these things; they would be less ready to condemn."

INCREASED SKILL.

One added source of revenue next year will be the ten special concerts, and with an orchestra more work means better work.

It has always been matter for regret that the orchestra has been kept aloof from the general public. The Friday afternoon concerts in the Cort Theater have been mainly attended by a special, not a general, audience. True artistic success could not come without a more liberal policy, for art draws its life from life at large.

There is no question as to the ability of the musicians who will form the orchestra. They are San Francisco's best, and the best here is very good. Among the announcements is that Stanislas Bem, the fine 'cellist, will replace Arthur Hadley.

---

om CALL
ddress: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 21 1915
Es 1884

3000 THRILLED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck conducted an audience of over 3000 music lovers in Festival Hall last night through the beauties of Brahms, Liszt, Strauss and Richard Wagner, his instrumentalists, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, meanwhile, painting the glories of the world through which its auditors traveled.

From Brahms at his most gracile to Liszt at his stormiest, to Strauss in his revelry and Wagner in his joy, the music rendered by the symphonists bore the minds of all. The honeyed philosophies of Brahms unfolded only to be superseded in the hearts of the audience by the poetic revery of Liszt. Wagner and Strauss were beautifully clear and simple.

ORCHESTRA SALUTES APPLAUSE

Brahms was represented by the serene spirit of his second symphony, in D major. This semi-peaceful, semi-laughing symphony was a thing of beauty in the hands of Dr. Muck and his cohorts. With the devotion of complete sympathy to Brahms, Dr. Muck is able to treat his music as a friend of long years' acquaintance.

The Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" was the work that commanded the most applause. The applause was not stilled until Dr. Muck had called upon his men to acknowledge it standing. It was wonderfully thrilling music, interspersed with tender suggestions of melodies and passages that led to sonorous climaxes.

"MADE IN GERMANY" MUSIC

The Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," became an embodiment in music of the seerlike poetry of Lemartine. Hearing this music was an experience. If it had not been for the Hungarian composer, Liszt, the program could have been stamped "Made in Germany," for modern Teutonic music could scarcely have been better represented and certainly never better rendered.

Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" was the closing number of the program. It became a beautiful example of clarity and simplicity under the sway of Dr. Muck and concluded an evening of rare art and feeling and interpretation.

ITALIAN PROGRAM TONIGHT

Tonight will be given to Italian music, and Cherubini, Sgambati, Bossi and Goldini will make a nice contrast with last night's performance, giving a glimpse of that sunny land which Strauss lamented could not be his home, and where perhaps he might have shaken off the gloom of northern mists.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 1915
Est 1884

MUCK CRITICISES CIVIC AUDITORIUM

Says All Orchestras Would Sound Alike There Owing to Faulty Acoustics.

"Absolutely perfect acoustics," the ideal set for the Civic Center Auditorium, has not yet been attained, according to Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"All orchestras would sound alike in this room," declared Dr. Muck after listening to the exposition players in a test of the Auditorium yesterday. Those who waited for the decision of the Boston conductor interpreted it to mean that there is still sufficient reverberation from the dome to make it impossible to appreciate the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is greater than other symphony orchestras. So the plan to have the Bossymphony concert in the Civic Cent Auditorium at popular prices has be reluctantly abandoned.

But the ambition remains to hav the Auditorium made perfect in it acoustics. In fact it is more than a ambition. It is a determination.

"Not absolutely perfect now," William H. Crocker, chairman of the exposition building committee said yesterday, "but it is not too much to say that the Auditorium is 95 per cent perfect in its acoustics. That small remaining defect is sufficient, however, to make it impossible for the appreciation of the finest musical performances.

"But this defect is going to be remedied. The Johns-Manville Company, which recently took the contract to remedy the defect, gave a guarantee to make the Auditorium perfect. The representative of the company informed me the other day that the felt had been put in place on the ceiling and that the acoustics were now absolutely perfect.

Dr. Muck's criticism has, however, been called to his attention by H. D. H. Connick, and we understand that the company will live up to its guarantee. This can be done, I am told, by simply adding to the surface covered by the felt."

The contract with the Johns-Manville Company calls for a payment of $12,000 when the annoying resonance shall have been absolutely corrected

---

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 19
Est

SYMPHONY GIVES FINE ITALIAN PROGRAM

A feast of Italian music in the Festival Hall, rendered by Dr. Muck, the foremost German conductor, and his internationally composed orchestra from Boston, with Camille Saint-Saens, the foremost composer of France, the guest of honor, proved to a large audience last night the universal language of the symphonic muse.

The program included a symphony by Sgambati, a Cherubini overture, Bossi's intermezzo and a Sinigaglia overture.

Saint-Saens was an unannounced guest. From his loge box he appeared the most interested and enthusiastic auditor in the hall.

PEACE TONES RULE

The interpretation of the music of the Italian symphonists by Dr. M and his orchestra had more of and quiet than has thus far heard from the masterful musi The instruments seemed to laugh gossip and breathe the tones o compositions as if they were human.

The first rendition was Sgamb Symphony, No. 1, in D major. It not the Italian music of fire and sion and vehemence. It was an teresting movement of tenderness if inspired by the hopeless song o rejected lover.

The Cherubini overture to the opera "Anacreon" was a beautiful work and admirably adapted to show the mervelous capacity of the strings of the Boston organization to meet any demand on their scope and elasticity.

WORK IS PERFECT

No body of violinists could have faced a more difficult task and accomplished their work better than did the Bostonians.

The Bossi intermezzo, which consisted of five archaic dance movements and a serenatina, were for the strings alone. The entire body of strings, in many octave movements, proved a superb unanimity as to pitch and again developed an impetuosity of spirit that was enlivening and refreshing.

Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" closed the program. It was a suggestion of wit and humor, that was the first touch thus far to reveal a little of the modernity of orchestration.

CONCERT THIS AFTERNOON

This afternoon's concert will include Mozart's Symphony in G minor, which, though not so well known as the "Jupiter," is really a more effective and important work, and its presentation should be the more enjoyable because its simplicities have usually stood in the way of its adequate interpretation.

Bach's double concerto, written for two violins and orchestra of strings, will be given, with A. Witek and S. Noak, first and second concert masters, respectively, as the soloists.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture will provide a nice contrast to the classics of Mozart and Bach, while Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" belongs on any program and makes its way in any company.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 1915
E 1884

'WAGNER NIGHT,' BOSTONIANS' FAREWELL

The visit to San Francisco of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been productive of such artistic benefit and delight to the music loving public of California, is drawing to a close, and the last concerts of the series will be given at Festival Hall today and tomorrow afternoons at 2:30 o'clock and on Monday and Tuesday evenings at 8:30.

A special farewell concert has been arranged for Wednesday evening at 8:30 o'clock, at Festival Hall, with a second program devoted entirely to the works of Richard Wagner. Dr. Muck is admittedly an authority on Wagner's music and he is the last of that group of the extraordinary conductors who drew their inspiration from Bayreuth when it was at the highest point of its artistic value. The program he has arranged is one of thrilling beauty and contains one number which he will play in concert for the first time, "The Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal." He has steadfastly refused to play any excerpts from "Parsifal" in concert, except the prelude, but he has decided that it is due to San Francisco to hear this exquisite bit, which depicts the meadows and fields flowering under the radiance of Good Friday morn.

The program begins with the great "A Faust Overture," which is very characteristic and shows many traces of the "Tristan" period in which it was revised. The second number will be the charming "Siegfried Idyl," played a few days ago. This will give a very stunning arrangement of parts of Siegfried and "Dusk of the Gods," and the wonderful pictorial music which accompanies Siegfried's venture through the magic fire to find the sleeping Brunhilde, from the last act of "Siegfried," the coming of dawn from the prologue of the "Dusk of the Gods," the parting of Siegfried and Brunhilde and finally Siegfried's Rhine journey, from the same work.

In the second part of the program will be heard "The Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and an admirably arranged selection from the last act of "Die Meistersinger," which includes "The Dance of the Apprentices," "The Entrance of the Guilds of the Ancient City of Nuremberg" and the homage to Hans Sachs. The final number will be the "Tannhauser" overture. Seats will be ready Monday morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 20 1915
tablist

BEETHOVEN ART CHARMS THRONG IN SYMPHONY

Wide range and scope marked the rogram of the Boston Symphony rchestra in Festival Hall last night. nwearied by the rapid succession of nduplicated concerts, Dr. Karl Muck voked exquisite renditions from his rchestra of a catholic range of compositions which began with Vo Veber's overture to "Der Freischutz" nd closed with Sibelius' symphonic oem, "Finlandia."

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was icluded in the scope of the proram, the symphony that has been alled "the little one." Dr. Muck and is men play it exquisitely and with charm that seemed to spread over ll.

SHOWS COMPOSER'S GENIUS

The Sibelius music was undoubtedly e most interesting, because most unsual. The orchestra played the Carelia" overture, "The Swan of Tuoela" and "Finlandia"—enough to give fair notion of the genius of the Finish composer.

Chadwick's suite of symphonic ketches, including "A Jubilee," "Noel," Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad," as interesting as being the first ork of an American composer to be layed here by the Boston orchestra.

The "Jubilee" was a song of trimph and Celtic sweetness. "Noel" was nice adjustment of tender song. Hobgoblin" was gotesquerie.

AT BEST IN BEETHOVEN

The first number on the program vas the overture to "Der Freischutz," nd as the music took form, one ivined the sympathy which unites irector and orchestra.

The Beethoven symphony was renlered in a spirit of rollicking humor hat lost none of the impetuous feel-

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22 1915
Establishe

Noted Conductor May Succeed Henry Hadley

Number of Concerts by San Francisco Orchestra Next Season To Be Doubled; Hertz May Come Here.

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

HENRY HADLEY in all likelihood will not be the conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. Alfred Hertz, the very noted Wagnerian conductor of the eMtropolitan Opera; Max Fiedler, who preceded Dr. Muck in the Boston Symphony, and one or two others are being considered as possible successors.

This announcement, of treble interest at this time, when the Boston orchestra has aroused deep enthusiasm here, was made in verification of a rumor, by Richard M. Tobin, chairman of the music committee of the San Francisco Musical Association.

Another announcement of deep importance is the statement by Manager Frank Healey that next season the orchestra will give ten special concerts on Sunday afternoons at popular prices, in addition to the ten on the regular subscription series.

Five rehearsals will be held for each pair of concerts, instead of four per concert, as in past seasons.

TOWARD DEMOCRACY.

In other words, the orchestra, which has been too largely a society affair, is to come out of its shell and become a real institution. Artistic success is impossible with the old limited clientele. Those who remember the magnificent audience of 8,000 which filled the Exposition-Civic Auditorium one Sunday afternoon last Januar yto hear this orchestra play will realize what the ten extra concerts may signify.

And here is a third great announcement: Alfred Hertz has been asked to come out here and conduct a couple of Wagnerian concerts in August and has replied favorably. The concerts will probably be held, with a special orchestra of local artists.

It is at this time that Hertz will look over the field, and if all goes well, next season we shall have a conductor who ranks among the first few of the land.

HADLEY APPRECIATED.

Hadley's contract has expired. Many of the most influential members of the Musical Association are urging its renewal. But there is a strong sentiment against it on the part of men all of whom admire Hadley personally and appreciate what he has done, yet who also realize that greater artistic development will only be possible under a changed leadership.

Hadley as composer ranks among the first living Americans. As conductor he has certain shortcomings, mainly a lack of interest in all but the most modern music. His Beethoven has been dead for ninety years.

MONEY NEEDED.

Were it not for the financial consideration, it would seem, the announcement of Hadley's departure could be made now with certainty. But the money problem is difficult.

"People ask," said Tobin, "'Why can't we have an orchestra as good as the Boston Symphony?' The whole answer is, 'We can't get the money.'

"Henry L. Higginson has spent $900,000 on the Boston orchestra out of his own coffers. The San Francisco Musical Association puts up only $30,000 a year, and it is doubtful whether we can get any more.

"We have never really had a symphony orchestra at all, in the sense that Boston has. Their musicians play for nobody except Dr. Muck. Our poor fellows play in cafes and theaters and hotels. We could only afford to pay for their services for every other week. It actually happened last year that some of those men only got $13 from the orchestra every alternate week.

"When these things are told to the conductors they look serious. Few would face such trying conditions. I doubt whether many conductors, even of real eminence, could do any better under these limitations than Hadley. People should understand these things; they would be less ready to condemn."

INCREASED SKILL.

One added source of revenue next year will be the ten special concerts, and with an orchestra more work means better work.

It has always been matter for regret that the orchestra has been kept aloof from the general public. The Friday afternoon concerts in the Cort Theater have been mainly attended by a special, not a general, audience. True artistic success could not come without a more liberal policy, for art draws its life from life at large.

There is no question as to the ability of the musicians who will form the orchestra. They are San Francisco's best, and the best here is very good. Among the announcements is that Stanislas Bem, the fine 'cellist, will replace Arthur Hadley.

---

om CALL
ddress: San Francisco, Cal.
MAY 21 1915
Date
Es
1884

3000 THRILLED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck conducted an audience of over 3000 music lovers in Festival Hall last night through the beauties of Brahms, Liszt, Strauss and Richard Wagner, his instrumentalists, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, meanwhile, painting the glories of the world through which its auditors traveled.

From Brahms at his most gracile to Liszt at his stormiest, to Strauss in his revelry and Wagner in his joy, the music rendered by the symphonists bore the minds of all. The honeyed philosophies of Brahms unfolded only to be superseded in the hearts of the audience by the poetic revery of Liszt. Wagner and Strauss were beautifully clear and simple.

ORCHESTRA SALUTES APPLAUSE

Brahms was represented by the serene spirit of his second symphony, in D major. This semi-peaceful, semi-laughing symphony was a thing of beauty in the hands of Dr. Muck and his cohorts. With the devotion of complete sympathy to Brahms, Dr. Muck is able to treat his music as a friend of long years' acquaintance.

The Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" was the work that commanded the most applause. The applause was not stilled until Dr. Muck had called upon his men to acknowledge it standing. It was wonderfully thrilling music, interspersed with tender suggestions of melodies and passages that led to sonorous climaxes.

"MADE IN GERMANY" MUSIC

The Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," became an embodiment in music of the seerlike poetry of Lemartine. Hearing this music was an experience. If it had not been for the Hungarian composer, Liszt, the program could have been stamped "Made in Germany," for modern Teutonic music could scarcely have been better represented and certainly never better rendered.

Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" was the closing number of the program. It became a beautiful example of clarity and simplicity under the sway of Dr. Muck and concluded an evening of rare art and feeling and interpretation.

ITALIAN PROGRAM TONIGHT

Tonight will be given to Italian music, and Cherubini, Sgambati, Bossi and Goldini will make a nice contrast with last night's performance, giving a glimpse of that sunny land which Strauss lamented could not be his home, and where perhaps he might have shaken off the gloom of northern mists.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
MAY 22 1915
Date
Est
1884

MUCK CRITICISES CIVIC AUDITORIUM

Says All Orchestras Would Sound Alike There Owing to Faulty Acoustics.

"Absolutely perfect acoustics," the ideal set for the Civic Center Auditorium, has not yet been attained, according to Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"All orchestras would sound alike in this room," declared Dr. Muck after listening to the exposition players in a test of the Auditorium yesterday. Those who waited for the decision of the Boston conductor interpreted it to mean that there is still sufficient reverberation from the dome to make it impossible to appreciate the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is greater than other symphony orchestras. So the plan to have the Bos- symphony concert in the Civic Center Auditorium at popular prices has been reluctantly abandoned.

But the ambition remains to have the Auditorium made perfect in its acoustics. In fact it is more than an ambition. It is a determination.

"Not absolutely perfect now," William H. Crocker, chairman of the exposition building committee said yesterday, "but it is not too much to say that the Auditorium is 95 per cent perfect in its acoustics. That small remaining defect is sufficient, however, to make it impossible for the appreciation of the finest musical performances.

"But this defect is going to be remedied. The Johns-Manville Company, which recently took the contract to remedy the defect, gave a guarantee to make the Auditorium perfect. The representative of the company informed me the other day that the felt had been put in place on the ceiling and that the acoustics were now absolutely perfect.

Dr. Muck's criticism has, however, been called to his attention by H. D. H. Connick, and we understand that the company will live up to its guarantee. This can be done, I am told, by simply adding to the surface covered by the felt."

The contract with the Johns-Manville Company calls for a payment of $12,000 when the annoying resonance shall have been absolutely corrected

---

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
MAY 22 19
Date
Est

SYMPHONY GIVES FINE ITALIAN PROGRAM

A feast of Italian music in the Festival Hall, rendered by Dr. Muck, the foremost German conductor, and his internationally composed orchestra from Boston, with Camille Saint-Saens, the foremost composer of France, the guest of honor, proved to a large audience last night the universal language of the symphonic muse.

The program included a symphony by Sgambati, a Cherubini overture, Bossi's intermezzo and a Sinigaglia overture.

Saint-Saens was an unannounced guest. From his loge box he appeared the most interested and enthusiastic auditor in the hall.

PEACE TONES RULE

The interpretation of the music of the Italian symphonists by Dr. Muck and his orchestra had more of peace and quiet than has thus far been heard from the masterful musicians. The instruments seemed to laugh and gossip and breathe the tones of the compositions as if they were truly human.

The first rendition was Sgambati's Symphony, No. 1, in D major. It was not the Italian music of fire and passion and vehemence. It was an interesting movement of tenderness as if inspired by the hopeless song of a rejected lover.

The Cherubini overture to the opera "Anacreon" was a beautiful work and admirably adapted to show the mervelous capacity of the strings of the Boston organization to meet any demand on their scope and elasticity.

WORK IS PERFECT

No body of violinists could have faced a more difficult task and accomplished their work better than did the Bostonians.

The Bossi intermezzo, which consisted of five archaic dance movements and a serenatina, were for the strings alone. The entire body of strings, in many octave movements, proved a superb unanimity as to pitch and again developed an impetuosity of spirit that was enlivening and refreshing.

Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" closed the program. It was a suggestion of wit and humor, that was the first touch thus far to reveal a little of the modernity of orchestration.

CONCERT THIS AFTERNOON

This afternoon's concert will include Mozart's Symphony in G minor, which, though not so well known as the "Jupiter," is really a more effective and important work, and its presentation should be the more enjoyable because its simplicities have usually stood in the way of its adequate interpretation.

Bach's double concerto, written for two violins and orchestra of strings, will be given, with A. Witek and S. Noak, first and second concert masters, respectively, as the soloists.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture will provide a nice contrast to the classics of Mozart and Bach, while Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl'" belongs on any program and makes its way in any company.

---

m CALL
dress: San Francisco, Cal.
MAY 22 191
ate 1884

'WAGNER NIGHT,' BOSTONIANS' FAREWELL

The visit to San Francisco of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been productive of such artistic benefit and delight to the music loving public of California, is drawing to a close, and the last concerts of the series will be given at Festival Hall today and tomorrow afternoons at 2:30 o'clock and on Monday and Tuesday evenings at 8:30.

A special farewell concert has been arranged for Wednesday evening at 8:30 o'clock, at Festival Hall, with a second program devoted entirely to the works of Richard Wagner. Dr. Muck is admittedly an authority on Wagner's music and he is the last of that group of the extraordinary conductors who drew their inspiration from Bayreuth when it was at the highest point of its artistic value. The program he has arranged is one of thrilling beauty and contains one number which he will play in concert for the first time, "The Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal." He has steadfastly refused to play any excerpts from "Parsifal" in concert, except the prelude, but he has decided that it is due to San Francisco to hear this exquisite bit, which depicts the meadows and fields flowering under the radiance of Good Friday morn.

The program begins with the great "A Faust Overture," which is very characteristic and shows many traces of the "Tristan" period in which it was revised. The second number will be the charming "Siegfried Idyl," played a few days ago. This will give a very stunning arrangement of parts of Siegfried and "Dusk of the Gods," and the wonderful pictorial music which accompanies Siegfried's venture through the magic fire to find the sleeping Brunhilde, from the last act of "Siegfried," the coming of dawn from the prologue of the "Dusk of the Gods," the parting of Siegfried and Brunhilde and finally Siegfried's Rhine journey, from the same work.

In the second part of the program will be heard "The Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and an admirably arranged selection from the last act of "Die Meistersinger," which includes "The Dance of the Apprentices," "The Entrance of the Guilds of the Ancient City of Nuremberg" and the homage to Hans Sachs. The final number will be the "Tannhauser" overture. Seats will be ready Monday morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street.

-an.
M

ETHOVEN ART CHARMS THRONG IN SYMPHONY

Wide range and scope marked the rogram of the Boston Symphony rchestra in Festival Hall last night. nwearied by the rapid succession of nduplicated concerts, Dr. Karl Muck voked exquisite renditions from his rchestra of a catholic range of compositions which began with Vo Veber's overture to "Der Freischutz" nd closed with Sibelius' symphonic oem, "Finlandia."

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was icluded in the scope of the proram, the symphony that has been alled "the little one." Dr. Muck and is men play it exquisitely and with charm that seemed to spread over ll.

SHOWS COMPOSER'S GENIUS

The Sibelius music was undoubtedly e most interesting, because most unsual. The orchestra played the Carelia" overture, "The Swan of Tuoela" and "Finlandia"—enough to give fair notion of the genius of the Finish composer.

Chadwick's suite of symphonic ketches, including "A Jubilee," "Noel," Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad," vas interesting as being the first work of an American composer to be layed here by the Boston orchestra.

The "Jubilee" was a song of trimph and Celtic sweetness. "Noel" was nice adjustment of tender song. 'Hobgoblin" was gotesquerie.

AT BEST IN BEETHOVEN

The first number on the program vas the overture to "Der Freischutz," nd as the music took form, one ivined the sympathy which unites irector and orchestra.

The Beethoven symphony was renlered in a spirit of rollicking humor hat lost none of the impetuous feel-ng of the piece. Dr. Muck is at his est in Beethoven, which is to say hat he is at his best when confronted y his greatest task.

The fifth concert was a glorious ne, like its predecessors. It is idle o try to pick faults; the one right hing to do is to adopt a spirit of everent and constructive appreciaion.

Tonight we shall have works by rahms (Second Symphony), Liszt
"Les Preludes"), Richard Strauss
"Death and Transfiguration") and Vagner ("Meistersinger" Prelude).
ould program be more attractive?

From BULLETIN
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 22
Establishe

Boston Symphony to Give Farewell Wagner Concert

A special farewell concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been arranged for Wednesday evening, at 8:30, at Festival Hall, with a program devoted entirely to the works of Richard Wagner.

Dr. Muck is admittedly a final authority on Wagner's music. He is the last of that group of extraordinary conductors who drew their inspiration from Bayreuth when it was at the highest point of its artistic value.

The program he has arranged is one of thrilling beauty and contains one number which he will play in concert for the first time, "The Good Friday Spell" from Parsifal. He has hitherto steadfastly refused to play any excerpts from Parsifal in concert, except the Prelude, but he has decided to give this exquisite excerpt, which depicts the meadows and fields flowering under the radiance of a Good Friday morn.

The program begins with the great "Faust Overture," which is very characteristic and shows many traces of the "Tristan" period in which it was revised. The second number will be the charming "Siegfried Idyl," including the wonderful pictorial music which accompanies Siegfried's venture through the magic of fire to find the sleeping Brunhilde from the last act of "Siegfried"; the coming of dawn from the prologue of the "Dusk of the Gods," the parting of Siegfried and Brunhilde and finally Siegfried's Rhine journey, from the same work.

In the second part of the program will be heard "The Good Friday Spell," an admirably arranged selection from the last act of "Die Meistersinger," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Seats will be ready Monday morning at the Exposition box office, 343 Powell street. The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will leave at midnight, after the Wednesday concert, on their special train, returning direct to Boston. Their trip has made orchestral history.

FINAL CONCERTS.

Tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 the second French program will be given, and for the first time the great organ will be used. The principal work on the program will be Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor, the great French composer will hear the performance himself. When Saint-Saens was in America in the fall of 1906, a special concert for him was given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and among the works played was this symphony, under the leadership of Dr. Muck, Saint-Saens himself playing the organ part. Today Mr. Wallace Sabin will play the organ.

The symphony shows Saint-Saens at his best. He uses the organ and the orchestra with surpassing skill, and the work is one of Dr. Muck's favorites.

The second half of the program will comprise Debussy's fascinating Prelude to Mallarme's eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; the three orchestra pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"; "Dance of the Sylphs"; "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps" and the stirring "Racoczy March," while the final number will be the magnificent overture to Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline."

The program for Monday evening will be Russian and contains as its chief number the stupendous Symphony, "Pathetique," of Tschaikowsky. That Tschaikowsky wrote it with a forboding of the tragic death which was soon to come to him is nonsense, but nevertheless it remains one of the curious coincidences in the history of art.

The other works on this program are the flambuoyantly Slavic Overture by Glazounoff, the extraordinary symphonic sketch, "On the Steppes," by Borodin, and finally the clever Caprice on Spanish themes by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

TUESDAY'S PROGRAM.

Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is the outstanding feature of the Tuesday night program. He has taken for his inspiration Friedrich Nietsche's work of the same name, and carries Zarathustra through the various phases of experience outlined by the German philosopher. The opening of this work is most stupendous. In a theme built on three notes, Strauss would have the audience see the rising of the sun. This in many respects is the most astounding work of modern musical literature. It is probably being played west of the Mississippi for the first time, nor is it likely to be heard soon again, as it demands an orchestra of the largest size and highest skill.

Those who heard the three pieces by Sibelius the other evening will be glad to hear his first symphony in E minor.

This wonderful series will be brought to an end by the Third "Leonora" Overture of Beethoven.

ANDRE' MAQUARRE

BOSTON JOURNAL

MAY 29, 1915.

POPS WILL OPEN THURSDAY NIGHT

Concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday Will Be Private.

The Symphony Orchestra is due to return from San Francisco Monday afternoon. Tuesday morning Andre Maquarre, the first conductor of the Pops, will have a rehearsal for his first week and the season will open Tuesday evening. It should be noted, however, by the general pcblic that the house has been sold out in its entirety both Tuesday evening, June 1, and Wednesday evening, June 2, to private organizations, so, as a matter of fact, the opening night for the general public will be Thursday evening, June 3.

Owing to the San Francisco engagement of the Orchestra, the season of Pops will last only five weeks, the final concert coming on Saturday evening, July 3. Andre Maquarre will have charge of the concerts for the first two weeks. He will be followed for the next two weeks by Ernest Schmidt. For the final week Clement Lenom will be the conductor. "Request night" this year is set for Wednesday, June 30. Friday night, June 4, will bring the first Wagner program of the season and for Saturday night, Mr. Maquarre has arranged a characteristic program, such as appeals to the very large audiences that are always present at the end of the week.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

MAY 29, 1915

The Pops

The Symphony orchestra returns from San Francisco Monday afternoon. Tuesday morning Andre Maquarre, the first conductor of the Pops, will have a rehearsal for his first week, and the season will open Tuesday evening. It should be noted, however, by the general public that the house has been sold out in its entirety both Tuesday evening, June 1 and Wednesday evening, June 2—Tuesday evening to the Women's City Club, Wednesday evening to Boston University—so, as a matter of fact, the opening night for the general public will be Thursday evening, June 3.

Andre Maquarre, first flute of the orchestra, who has been a favorite Pop conductor now for several years, will have charge of the concerts for the first few weeks. He will be followed for the next two weeks by Ernst Schmidt, assistant conductor of the Symphony orchestra. For the final week, Clement Lemon will be the conductor. In his week will come one of the most popular nights of the season, "Request night," which, this year, is set for Wednesday evening, June 30.

There will be the usual number of special nights. Friday night, June 4, will bring the first Wagner program of the season, and for Saturday night Mr. Maquarre has arranged a characteristic program. The season closes Saturday evening, July 3.

TUESDAY, JUNE 1
Women's City Club Night.
March, "El Capitan"	Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"	Strauss
Selection, "Chin-Chin"	Caryll
Suite, "Peer Gynt"	Grieg
(a) "Morning Mood," (b) "Anitra's Dance," (c) "In the Hall of the Mountain King."
Violin solo, "Romance"	Svendsen
Mr. Hoffman
Selection, "La Boheme"	Puccini
Marche Hongroise	Berlioz
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Entr'acte, "I Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Chanteurs des bois"	Fahrbach
March, "For the Country"	Milloecker
WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2
Boston University Night
Cortege, "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture, "Mignon"	Thomas
Waltz, "Artist's Life"	Strauss
March, from "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2	Bizet
(a) "Pastorale," (b) "Menuet" (fluite, Mr. Brooke)), (c) "Farandole"
Intermezzo and Barcarole	Offenbach
Ali Baba Waltzes
Malcolmn Jenney, B. U. Law School, 1915
"Clarissima"
Brenton Patterson, B. U. C. L. A., 1911
Words by R. W. Taylor, B. U. C. L. A. 1911
Organ solos,
(a) "Benediction Nuptiale"	Dubois
(b) "Grand Chorus" in E flat	Guilmant
Mr. Marshall
"Largo"	Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; harp, Mr. Holy; Organ, Mr. Marshall
Waltz, "Roses of the South"	Strauss
"American Fantasy"	Herbert
Organ, Mr. Marshall
THURSDAY, JUNE 3
March, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
Overture, "Fra Diavolo"	Auber
Waltz, "Pomone"	Waldteufel
Selection, "The Little Cafe"	Caryll
Ballet music, "La Gioconda"	Ponchielli
Prelude to "The Deluge"	Saint-Saens
Solo violin, Mr. Hoffmann
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
"Pomp and Circumstance"	Elgar
Organ, Mr. Marshall
Overture, "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Selection, "A Petits Pas"	Sudessi
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
March, "Merry Soldiers"	Sabathil

DAILY ADVERTISER,

JUNE 1, 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK

ARRIVES IN CITY AFTER RECORD TRIP OVERLAND

All Members of Party Vote the Event a Big Success Artistically and Financially

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reached the Huntington ave. station yesterday afternoon after a record trip across the continent. The special train left San Francisco last Thursday afternoon at 4 p.m. and reached Boston 93 hours later. Railroad officials claim that the trip was a record for transcontinental travel to Boston. The members of the orchestra were all mighty glad to see Boston after the trip and their unusual absence.

"An artistic and financial success," was the statement of Mr. Ellis, the manager. The audiences were very large and appreciative at every one of the concerts. The Symphony gave 13 concerts in all to an official attendance of 46,000 paid admissions. The last concert on Wednesday evening was a special one, and over 4000 turned out for this farewell performance.

The concerts were all given in the Festival Hall on the fairgrounds. The Festival Hall seats 3800, or 1300 more than Symphony Hall, and was filled for every performance. Mr. Ellis says that the scale of prices was higher than those in Boston.

The concerts were attended by people from all parts of the Pacific Coast.

Several entertainments were planned for the players, but according to Mr. Ellis, the finest of all was the one given by the Commissioners of the Massachusetts State Building. The Commissioners also tendered a private reception to Dr. and Mrs. Muck, as did many of the musical clubs of San Francisco. Dr. Muck was more than pleased by the reception and the appreciation shown by the Pacific coast people to the Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck remained on the Pacific coast. They are planning on visiting the Yosemite and Yellowstone parks and many other points of interest before returning to Boston about Aug. 1. Mrs. Muck was the only woman of the party, as there was no soloist at any of the concerts. The entire party of 108 returned with the exception of Dr. and Mrs. Muck and Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master, who stopped off at Salt Lake City, where he is to be married to Miss Hartley of that city on June 5.

BOSTON HERALD

JUNE 1, 1915.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK FROM 6500-MILE TOUR

Gave 13 Concerts in Successive Nights at the Fair.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reached home yesterday from the Panama fair, after an absence of three weeks and a day, having traveled 6500 miles and given 13 concerts on 13 successive days to a total paid attendance of 46,000. It was the largest undertaking in the history of musical enterprise anywhere in the world, for the entire orchestra of over 100 went to San Francisco on a special train, without a stop, gave 13 different programs and returned on the same train, without stop.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck are in the Yosemite, whence they go to Los Angeles, San Diego, the Grand Canyon and the Yellowstone and Glacier Parks. Second Concert Master Sylvain Noack halted in Salt Lake City, where he is to be married Saturday. The orchestra came back in charge of Manager Charles A. Ellis and Business Manager W. H. Brennan.

Mr. Ellis spoke enthusiastically of the journey. "Too much credit," he said, "cannot be given to J. B. Levison, commissioner of music of the exposition, and George W. Stewart, the director of music, for their daring and imagination in planning the undertaking. I have never seen such rapt audiences, and the demonstration the last night, by 4000, was one of the greatest I have ever seen. Financially, the concerts, instead of showing a loss, as was expected, show a large profit. Prices ranged from $1 to $2.50, besides the 50 cents admission to the grounds. People came from Los Angeles, Phoenix, Denver, Portland, Seattle and Tacoma merely to hear the orchestra. The hospitality extended was unbounded. Dr. and Mrs. Muck could not accept all the invitations they received. Finally, I might add that the enterprise has done Boston no harm."

BOSTON GLOBE—

JUNE 1, 1915

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HOME

Exposition Trip Great Success and Actually Made Money—Dr Muck Sightseeing in West.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived home yesterday afternoon from the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

Of the 108 persons who left for San Francisco 106 returned. Dr and Mrs Karl Muck are going to do a little sightseeing in the West, and will not be in Boston until July. The other missing member is Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master, who injected a little romance into the trip by dropping off at Salt Lake City, where he is to be married next Saturday to a Miss Hartley, a resident of that city.

In 13 concerts on successive days, the last being Wednesday evening, there were 46,000 paid admissions.

At the final concert there were fully 4000 persons in the hall, though the seating capacity is only 3800. At the conclusion Dr Muck was given a tremendous ovation.

"This farewell to Dr Muck was one of the most extraordinary things I ever witnessed," said Charles A. Ellis, the business manager, who came through with the party. "I was told that nothing like it had ever before been seen on the Pacific Coast. The entire trip was an overwhelming success.

"One of the most remarkable things about it was that it was a financial success. We went to the Exposition on a guarantee. The backers were prepared to lose money, but the orchestra actually made money—a previously almost unheardof thing in music circles."

The orchestra took its special train at San Francisco at 4 o'clock last Thursday afternoon, coming by way of Salt Lake City, Omaha and Chicago.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
JUNE 1, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HOME

Played Before 46,000 Persons at Panama-Pacific Exposition.

The special train bringing back the Boston Symphony Orchestra party of 108 reached Boston just before 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon, after a 93-hour run from San Francisco, and "after a wonderfully successful trip," as Manager Charles A. Ellis said.

"It was without the slightest mishap—unless that Third Concert Master Sylvian Noack left us at Salt Lake City to be married. I don't know the details of the romance, but the lady's name is Miss Hartley."

The orchestra played to a total of 46,000 persons, exclusive of those receiving complimentary tickets, during the thirteen concerts given on consecutive days. Festival Hall, within the fair grounds, in which the concerts were held, has a seating capacity of 3800, and there were fully 4000 persons at several of the concerts. Boston Symphony Hall seats 2500.

"Our last concert was a remarkable testimonial to the orchestra," said Mr. Ellis. "At the end of the concert, every person remained and cheered, applauded or waved a handkerchief. And, in general, the audiences were remarkably appreciative. The management of the fair had expected to meet at least a small deficit from the trip of the orchestra there, for the guarantee was a generous one; but they have actually made a profit. The scale of prices was higher than in Boston—from $1 to $2.50—and, when it is recalled that this was paid in addition to the 50 cents admission to the fair grounds, it will be understood that the large attendance was a most gratifying surprise."

The orchestra was entertained at a special reception held in the Massachusetts Building, at which the Massachusetts commissioners to the fair were hosts. Another reception at the Massachusetts Building was given to the conductor, Dr. Muck, and Mrs. Muck, and they were entertained at various other special affairs. Dr. and Mrs. Muck remained in San Francisco and will return some time in July.

BOSTON POST,
JUNE 1, 1915

SYMPHONY BACK FROM THE COAST

Orchestra's Tour Big Financial and Artistic Success

The Boston Symphony Orchestra detrained yesterday afternoon at 3 o'clock at the South station from the same train which carried them to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition three weeks ago, where, under Dr. Muck's baton, 13 of the most successful concerts in the history of the orchestra were given before a total number of 46,000 people who paid for their seats. The orchestra returned in charge of Charles A. Ellis, manager, and W. H. Brennan, business manager.

THE MUCKS SIGHTSEEING

Dr. and Mrs. Muck parted from the orchestra at San Francisco, for a sightseeing tour in the West. They will return to Boston some time in July. At present they are in Yosemite. From the Yosemite they will go South to Los Angeles, San Diego, and the Grand Canyon. From there they will go North to the Yellowstone and Glacier Parks. One other member of the orchestra remains in the West, Mr. Sylvain Noack, who is to be married next Saturday in Salt-Lake City.

The trip taken by the orchestra was one of the biggest undertakings of its kind in the history of any musical enterprise. The entire Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players left Boston, proceeded without a stop to San Francisco, gave 13 concerts which presented 13 entirely different programmes, and then returned, without a stop, to their own city.

Memorable Enthusiasm

The audiences at each concert were larger than those which pack Boston's Symphony Hall to its capacity, the enthusiasm was memorable, the financial returns were such that in spite of the very large sum paid the Boston orchestra for its performances in San Francisco, a considerable profit, instead of the deficit which might reasonably have accured from such an expensive undertaking, goes to the guarantors.

"It was a great undertaking," said Mr. Ellis, "and has turned out most successfully from every point of view. Too much credit cannot be given to J. B. Levison, the commissioner of music of the exposition, and to George W. Stewart, the director of music, for their daring and imagination in planning to take the orchestra to San Francisco. And William H. Leahy, who had the direct management of the concerts, deserves highest praise for the manner in which he handled such a big undertaking.

Never Such Rapt Audiences

"It is more than gratifying for us here in Boston that the concerts were so successful. Artistically, the orchestra was a revelation to the audiences, and I may add that in all my experience I have never seen such attentive, actually rapt audiences. This feature impressed Dr. Muck also very strongly. I may add, too, that the orchestra has never played more magnificently.

"Last Wednesday night, when the last number of the last programme had been played, the audience, which numbered over 4000, did not make a move to leave their seats, but brought Dr. Muck out time and time again; then it finally began to cheer. It was one of the greatest demonstrations I have ever seen.

A Success Financially

"From the financial point of view," continued Mr. Ellis, "the success was remarkable. Naturally, a very large sum was paid the orchestra for the concerts, and the exposition expected to lose money on the undertaking. As a matter of fact, the concerts themselves more than paid, and when the 'gate money' is added they showed a large profit.

"Mr. Leahy informed me the day I left San Francisco that in round numbers 46,000 people paid to hear the 13 concerts.

"The prices ranged from $1 to $2.50 and everyone had in addition to this to pay 50 cents admission to the grounds. The concerts have been a great thing for the Pacific Coast. People came from as far as Los Angeles, Phoenix, Denver, Portland, Seattle and Tacoma merely to hear the orchestra, and all went away satisfied. It is only fair to remark that this has done Boston no harm.

Everybody Very Cordial

"Everybody was very cordial," said Mr. Ellis. "The members of the orchestra were entertained continually, and Dr. and Mrs. Muck were unable to find time for all the things planned for them. A very pleasant incident was a greeting from Mayor Ralph of San Francisco, and a telegram from Governor Walsh when we arrived there, and very pleasant was the hospitality shown us by Messrs. Powers and Daniels at the Massachusetts building.

"Altogether, the trip was worth while from every standpoint. We are glad we went, and I think everyone of us is glad to be home again."

TRANSCRIPT,
JUNE 1, 1915

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has returned from the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, where, under Dr. Muck's baton, thirteen of the most successful concerts in the history of the orchestra were given before a total number of 46,000 people who paid for their seats. Dr. and Mrs. Muck left the orchestra at San Francisco for a sight-seeing tour in the West. They will return to Boston some time in July. At present they are in Yosemite. From the Yosemite they will go south to Los Angeles, San Diego and the Grand Canyon, and from there to the Yellowstone and Glacier Parks. One other member of the orchestra remains in the West. Mr. Sylvain Noack, who is to be married next Saturday in Salt Lake City. The trip taken by the orchestra was a remarkable undertaking. The entire force of one hundred players left Boston, proceeded without a stop to San Francisco, gave thirteen concerts which presented thirteen entirely different programmes, and then returned, without a stop, to their own city. The audiences at each concert were larger than those which pack Boston's Symphony Hall to its capacity, the enthusiasm was memorable, and the financial returns were such that in spite of the large sum paid the Boston Orchestra for its performances in San Francisco, a considerable profit, instead of the deficit which might reasonably have accrued from such an expensive undertaking, goes to the guarantors.

EVENING RECORD,
JUNE 1, 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK

ARRIVES IN CITY AFTER RECORD TRIP OVERLAND

All Members of Party Vote the Event a Big Success Artistically and Financially

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reached the Huntington ave. station yesterday afternoon after a record trip across the continent. The special train left San Francisco last Thursday afternoon at 4 p.m. and reached Boston 93 hours later. Railroad officials claim that the trip was a record for transcontinental travel to Boston. The members of the orchestra were all mighty glad to see Boston after the trip and their unusual absence.

"An artistic and financial success," was the statement of Mr. Ellis, the manager. The audiences were very large and appreciative at every one of the concerts. The Symphony gave 13 concerts in all to an official attendance of 46,000 paid admissions. The last concert on Wednesday evening was a special one, and over 4000 turned out for this farewell performance.

The concerts were all given in the Festival Hall on the fairgrounds. The Festival Hall seats 3800, or 1300 more than Symphony Hall, and was filled for every performance. Mr. Ellis says that the scale of prices was higher than those in Boston.

The concerts were attended by people from all parts of the Pacific Coast.

Several entertainments were planned for the players, but according to Mr. Ellis, the finest of all was the one given by the Commissioners of the Massachusetts State Building. The Commissioners also tendered a private reception to Dr. and Mrs. Muck, as did many of the musical clubs of San Francisco. Dr. Muck was more than pleased by the reception and the appreciation shown by the Pacific coast people to the Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck remained on the Pacific coast. They are planning on visiting the Yosemite and Yellowstone parks and many other points of interest before returning to Boston about Aug. 1. Mrs. Muck was the only woman of the party, as there was no soloist at any of the concerts. The entire party of 108 returned with the exception of Dr. and Mrs. Muck and Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master, who stopped off at Salt Lake City, where he is to be married to Miss Hartley of that city on June 5.

TRANSCRIPT,
JUNE 1, 1915

A TOUR OF TRIUMPH

England never expected every man to do his duty half so confidently as Boston expects that the Symphony Orchestra, wherever it goes, will gain for itself new glory. The habit of success seems as firmly fastened upon it as the habit of painstaking work and artistic striving which make success possible. Yet when the players return from a trip that has spread wide their fame through all of the nation assembled in holiday concourse at the Panama fairs, surely the time is come for the word of praise extraordinary. Forty-six thousand persons attended the orchestra's thirteen concerts; forty-six thousand persons may thus be assumed to associate now in their minds the mere mention of Boston with the thought of what standards of excellence they discovered that Boston's orchestra keeps. How much more valuable is this kind of publicity, if we may use an unpleasant word for a very real asset, than the notoriety which the average boom-maker seeks. The one stands with dignity on great past endeavors whereof the present production is tangible evidence, the other floats on the promise of future accomplishments. A realized success in art and in proper financial return, the Symphony Orchestra's trip to the coast was truly a triumph. The players need no further procession in Boston.

Many of the members will enter at once into the season of Pop concerts, those musical entertainments which by their management unique in America have won for Boston another title to peculiar distinction, quite different from that which it bears for the fame of its Symphony concerts, but which still is unique in America. It is true that frequent attendance on the concerts of the regular season seems to take much of the pleasure away from frequent attendance at the Pops. One's ear becomes so trained to music flawlessly played that it will not accept with complacency playi less perfect. But the two seasons are designed for different publics and serve different publics. Malediction upon the head of the æsthete who cannot discover the value in these popular nightly festivals when Americans come together for the enjoyment of much good music quite as though they were Europeans, and praised be he who having an ear for musical subtleties can still, through the buzzing of much conversation, the noises of waiters, hear both the harmonies of the orchestra and the overtones of humanity.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
JUNE 1, 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK; POP SEASON OPEN

Seventy players of the Boston Symphony orchestra rehearsed in Symphony hall this morning for the opening of the pop concert season, with Andre Maquarre directing. It is the largest group that has ever been engaged for the summer season. The concerts open tonight with the members of the Women's City Club and their friends holding the house. The selections to be played are by Sousa, Suppe, Strauss, Caryll, Grieg, Svensden, Puccini, Berlioz, Wagner, Leoncavallo. Fahrbach and Milloecker.

Tomorrow evening students of Boston University and their friends will attend. Orchestral pieces by Gounod, Thomas, Strauss, Wagner, Bizet and Offenbach and organ selections by Dubois, Guilmant and Handel will be on the program. The concerts will go on without special visitors on the evenings of Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

Some of the players in the leading positions of the orchestra, including Messrs. Witek, Noack, Ferir, Longy and Sand, will begin their vacation at once, not resuming orchestral duties until the fall, when the tour of western cities opens.

The members of the orchestra arrived from San Francisco on Monday afternoon, confirming the reports sent on last week of the success of their concerts at the Panama-Pacific exposition.

"Our last concert was a remarkable testimonial to the orchestra," said Mr. Ellis, the manager. "At the end of the concert, every person remained and cheered, applauded or waved a handkerchief. And, in general, the audiences were remarkably appreciative. The management of the fair had expected to meet at least a small deficit from the trip of the orchestra there, for the guarantee was a generous one; but they have actually made a profit."

BOSTON GLOBE—
JUNE 2, 1915

"POPS" OPEN THIRTIETH YEAR

Women's City Club Entertains.

Orchestra Enlarged Over Former Years.

Mr Maquarre a Spirited Conductor.

The time was when all those disposed either to lend or to reflect glory at the opening night of the "Pops" found it their privilege to do so. That time is passed. The Women's City Club has monopolized this occasion, and last evening the newly elected treasurer, Mrs Goodwin, after thanking the members for their cooperation, said she believed the club would continue to open the "Pop" seasons.

The women of the club and men guests welcomed the orchestra, or 70 members of it, back from the brief but triumphant sojourn at the Exposition at San Francisco. Mr Maquarre, the first flutist of the usual season, conducted in his enthusiastic manner a program well suited to the tastes of an audience pleased with music, light and serious.

The strings are more numerous than in any recent season, and to the obvious and recognizable improvement in the quality and breadth of tone. The program was an attractive one, blending lighter pieces with the more serious overtures and selections, including the "Peer Gynt" suite without the movement of the mother's death, and Svendsen's "Romance," played with good

BOSTON JOURNAL—
JUNE 1, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HOME

Played Before 46,000 Persons at Panama-Pacific Exposition.

The special train bringing back the Boston Symphony Orchestra party of 108 reached Boston just before 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon, after a 93-hour run from San Francisco, and "after a wonderfully successful trip," as Manager Charles A. Ellis said.

"It was without the slightest mishap—unless that Third Concert Master Sylvian Noack left us at Salt Lake City to be married. I don't know the details of the romance, but the lady's name is Miss Hartley."

The orchestra played to a total of 46,000 persons, exclusive of those receiving complimentary tickets, during the thirteen concerts given on consecutive days. Festival Hall, within the fair grounds, in which the concerts were held, has a seating capacity of 3800, and there were fully 4000 persons at several of the concerts. Boston Symphony Hall seats 2500.

"Our last concert was a remarkable testimonial to the orchestra," said Mr. Ellis. "At the end of the concert, every person remained and cheered, applauded or waved a handkerchief. And, in general, the audiences were remarkably appreciative. The management of the fair had expected to meet at least a small deficit from the trip of the orchestra there, for the guarantee was a generous one; but they have actually made a profit. The scale of prices was higher than in Boston—from $1 to $2.50—and, when it is recalled that this was paid in addition to the 50 cents admission to the fair grounds, it will be understood that the large attendance was a most gratifying surprise."

The orchestra was entertained at a special reception held in the Massachusetts Building, at which the Massachusetts commissioners to the fair were hosts. Another reception at the Massachusetts Building was given to the conductor, Dr. Muck, and Mrs. Muck, and they were entertained at various other special affairs. Dr. and Mrs. Muck remained in San Francisco and will return some time in July.

BOSTON POST,
JUNE 1, 1915

SYMPHONY BACK FROM THE COAST

Orchestra's Tour Big Financial and Artistic Success

The Boston Symphony Orchestra detrained yesterday afternoon at 3 o'clock at the South station from the same train which carried them to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition three weeks ago, where, under Dr. Muck's baton, 13 of the most successful concerts in the history of the orchestra were given before a total number of 46,000 people who paid for their seats. The orchestra returned in charge of Charles A. Ellis, manager, and W. H. Brennan, business manager.

THE MUCKS SIGHTSEEING

Dr. and Mrs. Muck parted from the orchestra at San Francisco, for a sightseeing tour in the West. They will return to Boston some time in July. At present they are in Yosemite. From the Yosemite they will go South to Los Angeles, San Diego, and the Grand Canyon. From there they will go North to the Yellowstone and Glacier Parks. One other member of the orchestra remains in the West, Mr. Sylvain Noack, who is to be married next Saturday in Salt-Lake City.

The trip taken by the orchestra was one of the biggest undertakings of its kind in the history of any musical enterprise. The entire Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players left Boston, proceeded without a stop to San Francisco, gave 13 concerts which presented 13 entirely different programmes, and then returned, without a stop, to their own city.

Memorable Enthusiasm

The audiences at each concert were larger than those which pack Boston's Symphony Hall to its capacity, the enthusiasm was memorable, the financial returns were such that in spite of the very large sum paid the Boston orchestra for its performances in San Francisco, a considerable profit, instead of the deficit which might reasonably have accured from such an expensive undertaking, goes to the guarantors.

"It was a great undertaking," said Mr. Ellis, "and has turned out most successfully from every point of view. Too much credit cannot be given to J. B. Levison, the commissioner of music of the exposition, and to George W. Stewart, the director of music, for their daring and imagination in planning to take the orchestra to San Francisco. And William H. Leahy, who had the direct management of the concerts, deserves highest praise for the manner in which he handled such a big undertaking.

Never Such Rapt Audiences

"It is more than gratifying for us here in Boston that the concerts were so successful. Artistically, the orchestra was a revelation to the audiences, and I may add that in all my experience I have never seen such attentive, actually rapt audiences. This feature impressed Dr. Muck also very strongly. I may add, too, that the orchestra has never played more magnificently.

"Last Wednesday night, when the last number of the last programme had been played, the audience, which numbered over 4000, did not make a move to leave their seats, but brought Dr. Muck out time and time again; then it finally began to cheer. It was one of the greatest demonstrations I have ever seen.

A Success Financially

"From the financial point of view," continued Mr. Ellis, "the success was remarkable. Naturally, a very large sum was paid the orchestra for the concerts, and the exposition expected to lose money on the undertaking. As a matter of fact, the concerts themselves more than paid, and when the 'gate money' is added they showed a large profit.

"Mr. Leahy informed me the day I left San Francisco that in round numbers 46,000 people paid to hear the 13 concerts.

"The prices ranged from $1 to $2.50 and everyone had in addition to this to pay 50 cents admission to the grounds. The concerts have been a great thing for the Pacific Coast. People came from as far as Los Angeles, Phoenix, Denver, Portland, Seattle and Tacoma merely to hear the orchestra, and all went away satisfied. It is only fair to remark that this has done Boston no harm.

Everybody Very Cordial

"Everybody was very cordial," said Mr. Ellis. "The members of the orchestra were entertained continually, and Dr. and Mrs. Muck were unable to find time for all the things planned for them. A very pleasant incident was a greeting from Mayor Ralph of San Francisco, and a telegram from Governor Walsh when we arrived there, and very pleasant was the hospitality shown us by Messrs. Powers and Daniels at the Massachusetts building.

"Altogether, the trip was worth while from every standpoint. We are glad we went, and I think everyone of us is glad to be home again."

TRANSCRIPT,
JUNE 1, 1915

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has returned from the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, where, under Dr. Muck's baton, thirteen of the most successful concerts in the history of the orchestra were given before a total number of 46,000 people who paid for their seats. Dr. and Mrs. Muck left the orchestra at San Francisco for a sight-seeing tour in the West. They will return to Boston some time in July. At present they are in Yosemite. From the Yosemite they will go south to Los Angeles, San Diego and the Grand Canyon, and from there to the Yellowstone and Glacier Parks. One other member of the orchestra remains in the West. Mr. Sylvain Noack, who is to be married next Saturday in Salt Lake City. The trip taken by the orchestra was a remarkable undertaking. The entire force of one hundred players left Boston, proceeded without a stop to San Francisco, gave thirteen concerts which presented thirteen entirely different programmes, and then returned, without a stop, to their own city. The audiences at each concert were larger than those which pack Boston's Symphony Hall to its capacity, the enthusiasm was memorable, and the financial returns were such that in spite of the large sum paid the Boston Orchestra for its performances in San Francisco, a considerable profit, instead of the deficit which might reasonably have accrued from such an expensive undertaking, goes to the guarantors.

EVENING RECORD,
JUNE 1, 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK

ARRIVES IN CITY AFTER RECORD TRIP OVERLAND

All Members of Party Vote the Event a Big Success Artistically and Financially

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reached the Huntington ave. station yesterday afternoon after a record trip across the continent. The special train left San Francisco last Thursday afternoon at 4 p.m. and reached Boston 93 hours later. Railroad officials claim that the trip was a record for transcontinental travel to Boston. The members of the orchestra were all mighty glad to see Boston after the trip and their unusual absence.

"An artistic and financial success," was the statement of Mr. Ellis, the manager. The audiences were very large and appreciative at every one of the concerts. The Symphony gave 13 concerts in all to an official attendance of 46,000 paid admissions. The last concert on Wednesday evening was a special one, and over 4000 turned out for this farewell performance.

The concerts were all given in the Festival Hall on the fairgrounds. The Festival Hall seats 3800, or 1300 more than Symphony Hall, and was filled for every performance. Mr. Ellis says that the scale of prices was higher than those in Boston.

The concerts were attended by people from all parts of the Pacific Coast.

Several entertainments were planned for the players, but according to Mr. Ellis, the finest of all was the one given by the Commissioners of the Massachusetts State Building. The Commissioners also tendered a private reception to Dr. and Mrs. Muck, as did many of the musical clubs of San Francisco. Dr. Muck was more than pleased by the reception and the appreciation shown by the Pacific coast people to the Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck remained on the Pacific coast. They are planning on visiting the Yosemite and Yellowstone parks and many other points of interest before returning to Boston about Aug. 1. Mrs. Muck was the only woman of the party, as there was no soloist at any of the concerts. The entire party of 108 returned with the exception of Dr. and Mrs. Muck and Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master, who stopped off at Salt Lake City, where he is to be married to Miss Hartley of that city on June 5.

TRANSCRIPT,
JUNE 1, 1915

A TOUR OF TRIUMPH

England never expected every man to do his duty half so confidently as Boston expects that the Symphony Orchestra, wherever it goes, will gain for itself new glory. The habit of success seems as firmly fastened upon it as the habit of painstaking work and artistic striving which make success possible. Yet when the players return from a trip that has spread wide their fame through all of the nation assembled in holiday concourse at the Panama fairs, surely the time is come for the word of praise extraordinary. Forty-six thousand persons attended the orchestra's thirteen concerts; forty-six thousand persons may thus be assumed to associate now in their minds the mere mention of Boston with the thought of what standards of excellence they discovered that Boston's orchestra keeps. How much more valuable is this kind of publicity, if we may use an unpleasant word for a very real asset, than the notoriety which the average boom-maker seeks. The one stands with dignity on great past endeavors whereof the present production is tangible evidence, the other floats on the promise of future accomplishments. A realized success in art and in proper financial return, the Symphony Orchestra's trip to the coast was truly a triumph. The players need no further procession in Boston.

Many of the members will enter at once into the season of Pop concerts, those musical entertainments which by their management unique in America have won for Boston another title to peculiar distinction, quite different from that which it bears for the fame of its Symphony concerts, but which still is unique in America. It is true that frequent attendance on the concerts of the regular season seems to take much of the pleasure away from frequent attendance at the Pops. One's ear becomes so trained to music flawlessly played that it will not accept with complacency playing less perfect. But the two seasons are designed for different publics and serve different publics. Malediction upon the head of the æsthete who cannot discover the value in these popular nightly festivals when Americans come together for the enjoyment of much good music quite as though they were Europeans, and praised be he who having an ear for musical subtleties can still, through the buzzing of much conversation, the noises of waiters, hear both the harmonies of the orchestra and the overtones of humanity.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
JUNE 1, 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK; POP SEASON OPEN

Seventy players of the Boston Symphony orchestra rehearsed in Symphony hall this morning for the opening of the pop concert season, with Andre Maquarre directing. It is the largest group that has ever been engaged for the summer season. The concerts open tonight with the members of the Women's City Club and their friends holding the house. The selections to be played are by Sousa, Suppe, Strauss, Caryll, Grieg, Svensden, Puccini, Berlioz, Wagner, Leoncavallo. Fahrbach and Milloecker.

Tomorrow evening students of Boston University and their friends will attend. Orchestral pieces by Gounod, Thomas, Strauss, Wagner, Bizet and Offenbach and organ selections by Dubois, Guilmant and Handel will be on the program. The concerts will go on without special visitors on the evenings of Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

Some of the players in the leading positions of the orchestra, including Messrs. Witek, Noack, Ferir, Longy and Sand, will begin their vacation at once, not resuming orchestral duties until the fall, when the tour of western cities opens.

The members of the orchestra arrived from San Francisco on Monday afternoon, confirming the reports sent on last week of the success of their concerts at the Panama-Pacific exposition.

"Our last concert was a remarkable testimonial to the orchestra," said Mr. Ellis, the manager. "At the end of the concert, every person remained and cheered, applauded or waved a handkerchief. And, in general, the audiences were remarkably appreciative. The management of the fair had expected to meet at least a small deficit from the trip of the orchestra there, for the guarantee was a generous one; but they have actually made a profit."

BOSTON GLOBE—
JUNE 2, 1915

"POPS" OPEN THIRTIETH YEAR

Women's City Club Entertains.

Orchestra Enlarged Over Former Years.

Mr Maquarre a Spirited Conductor.

The time was when all those disposed either to lend or to reflect glory at the opening night of the "Pops" found it their privilege to do so. That time is passed. The Women's City Club has monopolized this occasion, and last evening the newly elected treasurer, Mrs Goodwin, after thanking the members for their cooperation, said she believed the club would continue to open the "Pop" seasons.

The women of the club and men guests welcomed the orchestra, or 70 members of it, back from the brief but triumphant sojourn at the Exposition at San Francisco. Mr Maquarre, the first flutist of the usual season, conducted in his enthusiastic manner a program well suited to the tastes of an audience pleased with music, light and serious.

The strings are more numerous than in any recent season, and to the obvious and recognizable improvement in the quality and breadth of tone. The program was an attractive one, blending lighter pieces with the more serious overtures and selections, including the "Peer Gynt" suite without the movement of the mother's death and Svendsen's "Romance," played with good tonal quality and se[illegible] without exaggeration by Jacques Hoffmann, who is concertmaster. Encores were generously given, "The Blue Danube" being one of them. The tables on the floor were practically all taken and for the greater part the seats in the galleries filled.

During the second intermission Mrs James Storrow, Dr Blanche Dennig and Mrs Goodwin, escorted by Maj Higginson, appeared on the platform. Mr Higginson introduced Mrs Dennig, who said that a moving picture man would be at the front entrance of the clubhouse this afternoon to take pictures of the club women as they enter and leave the building; the pictures to be represented in 26 States, as of important local interest. Mrs Storrow reported on the committee's suggestion of a beach site near Annisquam for the Summer camp. Mrs Goodwin looked forward to a women's club night at all successive openings.

Mrs F. E. A. Goodwin, to whom credit is due for the success of the affair, was recipient of many congratulations. Among those who entertained guests at the tables were Mrs James J. Storrow, Mrs Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Mrs John J. Enneking, Mrs Mary Schenck Woolman, Mrs May Alden Ward, Miss Josephine Bruorton, Mrs C. A. Codman, Mrs Ada F. Endres, Mrs W. H. Foster, Mrs F. E. A. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Murray, Mrs Myra B. Lord, Miss Flora MacDonald, Miss Hortense Lewis, Miss Alice H. Grady and other prominent members.

Special nights to occur this season will be Wagner Night, Friday, June 4; Amherst Night, Monday, June 7; Tech Night, Tuesday, June 8, and Boston College Night, Thursday, June 10.

This evening wil be Boston University night. The program will be as follows:

Cortege, Queen of Sheba................Gounod
Overture, Mignon......................Thomas
Waltz, Artist's Life....................Strauss
March, from Tannhauser..................Wagner
Suite, L'Arlesienne, No 2.................Bizet
(a) Pastorale (b) Menuet (Flute, Mr Brooke)
(c) Farandole
Intermezzo and Barcarole............Offenbach
Ali Baba Waltzes,
Malcolm Jenney, B U Law School, 1915
Clarissima. Brenton Patterson, B U C L A, 1911
Words by R. W. Taylor, B U C L A, 1911
Organ Solos,
(a) Benediction Nuptiale............Dubois
(b) Grand Chorus in E flat.......Guilmant
Mr Marshall
Largo ....Handel
Violin, Mr Hoffman Harp, Mr Holy
Organ, Mr Marshall
Waltz, Roses of the South..............Strauss
American Fantasy......................Herbert
Organ, Mr Marshall

BOSTON JOURNAL—

JUNE 2, 1915.

POPS OPEN WITH WOMEN PRESIDING

Women's City Club and Its Guests Monopolize Festivities.

"W. C. C." were the letters in golden lights that glowed over the stage of Symphony Hall last night to mark Women's City Club night at the Pops.

This is the 30th season of the Pops, and last night was the first opening in the history of these springtime soirees to be monopolized by any private organization. Thus the W. C. C. showed its enterprise and its appreciation of the pleasures of the Pops. Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, who is credited with promoting the successful affair, was roundly congratulated.

Among those who entertained guests at the tables were Mrs. James J. Storrow, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Mrs. John J. Enneking, Mrs. Mary Schenck Woolman, Mrs. May Alden Ward, Miss Josephine Bruorton, Mrs. C. A. Codman, Mrs. Ada F. Endres, Mrs. W. H. Foster, Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Murray, Mrs. Myra B. Lord, Miss Flora MacDonald, Miss Hortense Lewis and Miss Alice H. Grady.

Of course, the big brother of the W. C. C., the Boston City Club, was much in evidence with compliments for the ladies and applause for Conductor Andre Maquarre and his band of Symphony players.

The hall was comfortably filled, and weather, audience and orchestra combined to make it an ideal evening for a club musicale.

Tonight will be Boston University night at the Pops. Prof. Marshall will play several organ selections, and B. U. music will have a place on the program. Among the 'varsity pieces will be the "Ali Baba Waltzes," written by Malcolm Jenney, '15, of the Law School, and selections from "Clarissima," with music by Brenton Patterson, '11, and words by R. W. Taylor, '11.

Friday will bring the first Wagner night. Amherst will celebrate next Monday night, "Tech" next Tuesday night, Boston College on Thursday, June 10, and Roxbury Latin the following night.

BOSTON HERALD,

JUNE 2, 1915.

WOMEN'S CITY CLUB AT POPS

More Than 2000 Persons at Initial Concert of the Season.

Pops are here again. The initial concert of the season last evening drew more than 2000 persons to Symphony Hall, where attractively gowned women and men in evening clothes listened to the strains of a Strauss waltz or a rhapsody from "Peer Gynt." It was Women's City Club night and the orchestra, conducted by A. Maquarre, was given an enthusiastic reception.

The bright hues of the women's gowns made a brilliant spectacle and the applause, which was frequent and prolonged, testified to the popularity of the Pops, which have become one of Boston's favorite institutions.

At the tables were many members of the club who entertained parties of friends. Flowers decorated the tables and added to the festive appearance. The balconies also were crowded.

Conductor Maquarre was applauded with much fervor when he picked up his baton and gave the signal for the first number on the program, which was Sousa's march, "El Capitan," and the hum of voices ceased as the first strains of the music filled the hall. The applause was at all times enthusiastic and there were several encores.

Mrs. James J. Storrow, president of the Women's City Club, and Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, its treasurer, appeared on the platform during intermission, which brought forth more applause from all parts of the hall.

Among those who entertained guests at tables were Mrs. Storrow, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Mrs. John J. Enneking, Mrs. Mary S. Woolman, Mrs. May Alden Ward, Miss Josephine Bruorton, Mrs. C. A. Codman, Mrs. Ada F. Endres, Mrs. W. H. Foster, Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Murray, Mrs. Myra B. Lord, Miss Flora MacDonald, Miss Hortense Lewis and Miss Alice H. Grady. Former Mayor and Mrs. John F. Fitzgerald were also among the first nighters.

The program was: Overture, "Light Cavalry," Suppe; waltz, "Vienna Blood," Strauss; selection from "Chin Chin," Caryll; suite from Grieg's "Peer Gynt," "Morning Mood," "Anitra's Dance," "In the Hall of the Mountain King"; violin solo, "Romance" (Mr. Hoffman) Svendsen; selection from "La Boheme," Puccini; "Marche Hongroise," Berlioz; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; entr'acte "I Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; waltz, "Chanteurs des bois," Fahrbach; march, "For the Country," Milloecker.

Boston University will celebrate this evening at the Pops in Symphony Hall. The program is as follows:

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba"........Gounod
Overture, "Mignon"...............Thomas
Waltz, "Artist's Life"...........Strauss
March, from "Tannhaeuser"........Wagner
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2 (a) Pastorale, (b) Menuet (flute, Mr. Brooke),
(c) Farandole........................Bizet
"Ali Baba" waltzes—
Intermezzo and Bacarole........Offenbach
Malcolm Jenney, B. U. law school, 1915.
"Clarissima"..........................
Words by R. W. Taylor, B. U. C. L. A., 1911
Brenton Patterson, B. U. C. L. A., 1911.
Organ solos—
(a) "Benediction Nuptiale"........Dubois
(b) Grand Chorus in E-flat......Guilmant
Mr. Marshall.
Largo..............................Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Waltz, "Roses of the South"........Strauss
American Fantasy..................Herbert
Organ, Mr. Marshall.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

JUNE 2, 1915

CROWDED HOUSE WELCOMES "POPS"

M. ANDRE MAQUARRE EXCELLENT LEADER

Women's City Club Night to Be Followed by Boston University Today

By Louis C. Elson

Better a half-loaf than no bread. Our Pops have been cut down this season from about ten weeks to five. Of course every Bostonian is proud of the success achieved by our Orchestra in San Francisco, but the light dessert to the musical banquet of the year is craved none-the-less.

The immediate outcome of the shortened season is likely to be seen in very crowded houses. Last night was a special one, as the house was taken by the Women's City Club. We are glad to see such a female influence in this field, for we can recollect a time when there were some people in Boston who banned the Pops (and banned the band also) from the odor of sanctity.

After all the liquid measures and the measured liquids go well enough together. It is not so far from Meyerbeer to Lager Beer, or from "Tannhauser" to Anhauser. But, enjoyable as these concerts are, in their informality, their high standard of execution, and their well-contrasted programmes, there is nothing for the critic to say about them that would not be a ten-times-told tale. M. Andre Maquarre conducted last night, and he is an excellent leader. That a man should be a first-class flute-player, a good composer and a well-equipped conductor, is quite enough of versatility for one person.

After a couple of weeks Mr. Ernst Schmidt will have his innings. Those who remember the excellent Schumann reading which this assistant conductor of our Symphony Orchestra gave to Boston will await his more extensive work with pleasant anticipation; and the last week will bring back M. Clement Lenom, who has won his spurs in many fields of music.

The programme last night was as follows:—

March, "El Capitan"........................Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry".................Suppe
Waltz, "Vienna Blood"....................Strauss
Selection, "Chin-Chin"....................Caryll
Suite, "Peer Gynt".........................Grieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) Anitra's Dance.
(c) In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Violin Solo, Romance...................Svendsen
Mr. Hoffmann.
Selection, "La Boheme"..................Puccini
Marche Hongroise........................Berlioz
Overture, "Rienzi"........................Wagner
Entr'acte, "I Pagliacci"...........Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Chanteurs des bois"...........Fahrbach
March, "For the Country"............Milloecker

Most of these numbers are familiar to our concert-goers, but it is not the kind of familiarity that breeds contempt.

Almost every number won its applause, many were encored, and Mr. Jaques Hoffmann's violin solo held the audience in rapt attention.

"Chin-Chin," by the way, was not a tone poem of a Congressional debate, but a pleasant piece of pseudo-Oriental music.

Tonight is another special night, and the Boston University takes the house, which is to be as crowded as yesterday.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 30 1915

PROMINENT MEN ARE FLEECED

Self-Styled Representative of "Fatherland" Arrested at the Fairmont.

FIGHTS WITH DETECTIVE

Dr. Karl Muck Plans to Have Man Captured After Giving Up $300.

What the police assert was a wholesale swindling of rich German-Americans ended last night in the arrest at the Fairmont Hotel of Henry M. Meyers, alias Frank M. Granlan, living at the Berg Hotel, 221 Mason street, at the instance of Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck charged that he had been fleeced of $300 by Meyers, who claimed to be representing the "Fatherland," a German newspaper published by the New York German Press and devoted to the Teuton cause.

Meyer sought to escape from Detective Fred Kracke when he was taken into custody, but after a fierce fight with the officer failed in his attempt.

Dr. Muck said he gave Meyers $100 on May 21st to aid the "Fatherland" on credentials submitted by him stating that the paper needed funds with which to "refute English lies" printed in the United States. Later, he said, Meyers obtained $200 additional.

PROMINENT VICTIMS.

Among Meyers' alleged victims were the following prominent San Franciscans and others:

Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, $300.
William Bauer, broker, $100.
E. L. Heuter, $300.
Charles Schultz, $50.
California Brick Company, $50.
Dr. Max Magnus.
Robert Cappell, agent North German Steamship Company.
Dr. M. K. Krotoszyner.
C. E. Grunsky, civil engineer, $300.
Fred Hagemann, $100.
Max Schmidt, $75.
N. Ohlandt, banker, $150.
F. J. Ruhstaller, Sacramento, Ruhstaller Brewing Company.
L. C. Brandt, Sacramento, Buffalo Brewing Company.
G. L. Bovereaux, manager Haas Grocery Company.
Jacob Blumlein, manager Sussman-Wormser, 140 Spear street.
Dr. Hugo Leiber.
H. H. Lochbaum & Co.

SUSPICIONS AROUSED.

Dr. Muck's suspicions were aroused by the hurried cashing of his two checks at the hotel. Being intimately acquainted with Professor Hugo Munsterberg of Harvard and George S. Viereck, editor of the Fatherland, he telegraphed to see if Meyers was authorized to collect subscriptions. Replies came back that he was not. Dr. Muck then went to see James Steward, local representative of the publication, and the matter was placed before Lieutenant Layne at police headquarters.

Dr. Muck was instructed to notify the department if Meyers approached him again. Last night the man visited Dr. Muck at the Fairmont with the proposal that for $175 he would have the orchestra director's picture published in the Fatherland. Muck detained him until Detective Fred Kracke arrived.

Kracke stood in the hotel writing-room listening to the conversation and then asked Meyers to go with him to headquarters. Meyers went peacefully, although protesting, until the pair turned the corner at Mason street to go down California street.

PUTS UP FIGHT.

Then he swung on Kracke's jaw and attempted to escape. Kracke clinched with his man and the two went down, fighting and rolling. They rolled down the sidewalk the entire length of the block to Powell street. Here Special Officer Loedge of the Fairmont, attracted by the noise and crowd, came to Kracke's assistance.

Meyers was then taken to the City Prison and is being held in detinue, pending the filing of charges against him.

A search of his clothing at the prison disclosed the names of a score of men from whom he had received money on his representations.

A list of men who, the police believe, Meyers intended as prospective victims, contained the following names:

Otto Von Gildern, Dr. Charles Hoffman, J. D. Stuse, 3079 Sixteenth street; John Hermann, Hermann Safe Company, 720 Folsom street; Max Kuhl, attorney and former Police Commissionr, Hobart building; Henry Eickhoff, attorney and member State Prison Board, Mills building; E. C. and E. L. Hueter.

Four promissory notes, three for $175 and one for $200, made payable to Dr. Muck were found in Meyers' clothing. They were accompanied by what the police believe is a forged telegram, directing Meyers to cash the notes in the event he ran short of expense money.

In the face of telegraphic denials from Professor Hugo Munsterberg of Harvard University and George S. Viereck, editor of The Fatherland, that he is an impostor, Meyers stoutly maintained his innocence.

James Stewart of 525 Market street, San Francisco representative of The Fatherland, told the police Meyers was not a representative of the publication.

In searching Meyers' rooms at the Berg Hotel the police found a return ticket to Chicago, which showed that the man had left there March 25th. In addition, a number of pawn tickets made out to F. M. Gresham in Los Angeles, a safe deposit box key and two opium pipes were found.

The police will attempt to locate the deposit box, hoping to recover much of the money Meyers has obtained through his operations.

Meyers had $150 on his person when arrested. He has been staying at the hotel for a month.

ROUMANTA AND

From Examiner

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 31 1915

E 1884

SUSPECT IN MUCK CASE IDENTIFIED

Is Frederick M. Greisheimer, Divorced From Lillian Lorraine, Star of Ziegfeld's "Follies"

Son of Millionaire, Has Had Varied Career; Had Wife in This City, Shubert Show Girl

Refuses to Discuss Charge That He Swindled Prominent Germans in San Francisco

FRANK M. GRESHAM, as he called himself when arrested Saturday and charged with obtaining money under false pretenses from Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and many other prominent Germans in San Francisco, was identified at the city prison last night as Frederick M. Greisheimer, divorced husband of Lillian Lorraine, stage beauty and star of Ziegfeld's "Follies."

Miss Lorraine had Greisheimer indicted in 1913 on the charge that he had taken a $5,000 diamond from her finger while she was asleep and had sent her a pawn ticket for it after he had raised $2,500 on the gem. They were married in 1912 after a courtship that began in Atlantic City, where Greisheimer had taught Miss Lorraine how to swim.

LOOKED LIKE AN ADONIS

"Freddie looked such a perfect Adonis in a bathing suit," Miss Lorraine said after their marriage, "that I just couldn't resist him."

A year later Miss Lorraine sued her husband for divorce, saying that she had been grossly deceived in Greisheimer and that she had determined to return tc a life of single blessedness and devote all her time to her stage carrer. Art and matrimony, she said she had discovered, were not compatible.

Before their divorce Greisheimer had a fistic encounter with Flo Ziegfeld, now the husband of Billie Burke, declaring that the manager of the Follies was paying altogether too much attention to Miss Lorraine, who had been elevated from a lowly position in the chorus to the place of a Broadway musical comedy star.

Greisheimer is the son of a millionaire clothing manufactur of Chicago and is known from New York to San Francisco. He has been in turn a real estate promoter, a moving picture manager and a solicitor for publishing houses in New York.

HAD WIFE IN THIS CITY.

Gresheimer had a wife living in San Francisco when he married the beautiful Miss Lorrains in 1912. This woman was Mrs. Gertrude McCauley Greisheimer, who before her marriage to the Adonis of the bathing suit had been one of the Shubert show girls. She was living at the Venice Apartments, Post and Taylor streets, when she learned of the marriage of Miss Lorraine and Greisheimer, and said then that she had never been informed that she and Greisheimer had been divorced. Greisheimer had started proceedings in Chicago after she had left him and had come to live in San Francisco, but she had never accepted service of the papers in the proceedings.

Because of the doubt raised over the validity of Greisheimer's divorce from Gertrude McCauley, Miss Lorraine and the Chicago man went through a second marriage ceremony.

"I don't know whether I am a single woman or the wife of Lillian Lorraine's husband," Miss McCauley had said when she heard of the Greisheimer-Lorraine nuptials.

Eventually the tangle was straightened out, but Miss Lorraine soon tired of her Adonis merman and also sought relief in the divorce courts.

SUSPECT IS SILENT.

Greisheimer yesterday refused to make any statement to the police concerning the charges lodged against him by Dr. Muck further than to say he intended to consult an attorney before committing himself in any way. He also said he wanted to get in communication with former State Senator Gus Hartman and another man connected with the Cliff House.

In the list of subscriptions found on Greisheimer after being booked for obtaining money under false pretenses was the name of Dr. Hugo Lieber. Dr. Lieber is president of the German Exposition Commission and has been stopping at the Hotel St. Francis. He has completed the German exhibits at the Fair and has arranged to leave for New York this week to look after radium interests he has with a number of other capitalists.

Greisheimer succeeded in getting subscriptions from Dr Muck after representing himself as a solicitor for "The Fatherland," a New York publication supporting the Teuton cause in the European war. He was arrested after calling on Dr. Muck at the Fairmont Hotel.

From Examiner

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 25 1915

Estal

STRAUSS HAS INNING WITH BOSTONIANS

Next to Final Concert Given at Festival Hall by Dr. Muck and His Peerless Orchestra

ORGAN HAS BAD SPELL

Delay Caused by This and Disturbance Raised by People Who Straggled In Too Late

BY REDFERN MASON.

Last night we heard the Boston Symphony give its twelfth concert. I am glad it was not the last; for it proved to be the one occasion of the whole season on which the god of dullness made his presence felt. There was a little contretemps with the organ, a pipe of which went on singing with joyful persistency, careless whether Richard Strauss or Zarathustra or Dr. Muck looked askance or not. Then the number of people who straggled up the aisle of Festival Hall, between the movements of the Sibelius, was large, and the esteemed director looked at them with an air which suggested that he would like to start an auto da fe, with them for victims.

The programme opened with the Sibelius Symphony, No. 1, in E minor, a work which has this quality in common with the "New World" Symphony of Antonin Dvorak, that it seems strongly to reflect the mood of the folk. But Sibelius is more of a scholar than Dvorak was, and though he does not entirely avoid the pitfalls of idyllicism, he weaves his somewhat folk-songish themes into a more symphonic web than the Bohemian composer could do. The movement which left the liveliest impression on the audience was assuredly the Scherzo, which is of a Berserker fierceness and may be taken to have a national significance. If so, let the Russians look to it, if the Finns ever get a chance to assert themselves.

DELAYS STRAUSS WORK.

So far the concert had gone well enough musically, in spite of the late-comers. But the organ episode delayed the beginning of the Richard Strauss tone-poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," for quite a time, and though a pleasant-worded interlocutor explained and apologized when Doctor Muck reappeared, Jovian thunder clouds were about his head. I don't know whether the orchestra was infected by like gloom, but the Strauss did not go nearly as well as did "Tod und Verklarung" the other night.

If I had not heard the work before and studied its symbolic meaning in the text of Nietzsche, I am inclined to think that I should have joined the ranks of those who shake their heads in doubt over the score. "How can you express philosophy in music" people ask. The plain answer is that Strauss does not attempt any direct expression of philosophic ideas. His score is rather a portrayal of the moods of the philosopher as individual, with here and there a bit of nature-music, as in the wonderful picture of the dawn with which the work opens, or suggests a state of mind, as in the cryptic ending of the composition in two keys, a conclusion which may be interpreted as a glance at "the doubtful doom of human kind," or the uncertainty of all knowledge whatsoever.

IS MAGNIFICENT SYMBOL.

What the music does portray with marvellous intensity and variety is the experiences through which the thinker must pass in the unfolding of his ego. There is no mistaking the religious cast of that part of the score which succeeds the dawn, and the Gregorian "Credo" is a manifest symbol. Passion, too, is recognizable and, as De Quincey reminds us in "Levana," joy and sorrow are the great ministers by which the capacities of the spirit are developed. There is Nietzschean irony in the use of the fugue to indicate science, and, after this academic mockery, we listen with a sense of relief to the gurgling laughter of the reeds in the dance.

But last night the number of dark places in the score seemed larger than usual. We got the idea of a mighty cause at stake, the warring of princedoms and powers; but here and there the Homer of the baton seemed to nod. One can say this of Dr. Muck with the more freedom because he is a great man. Even Shakespeare has his moments of banality, and there are cantos of the Divine Commedia over which the veriest Dante enthusiast yawns.

CLEAR, LUMINOUS STORY.

So it was right gladly that we turned to the "Leonora No. 3," and I think the members of the orchestra were glad as well Here is no mystery; but a story clear and luminous. How beautiful sounded the notes of Florestan's song; how joyously the wood-wind sang the second theme "woven out of sobs and pitying sighs"; how jubilant rang the trumpet calls and the song of thanksgiving. I thank the high gods that the concert ended with the splendid optimism of Beethoven and not with the soul-searing doubt of Strauss.

Let us rejoice, therefore, that we are to hear yet another concert. Tonight will be devoted to Wagner, and here is the programme:

"A Faust Overture."
"A Siegfried Idyl."
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods," arranged by Hans Richter.
The Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal."
Selectons from Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."
Overture to Tannhauser.

From Examiner

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 23 1915

Es 1884

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Power and John C. Daniels, representing the board of managers of the Massachusetts building, entertained some of their friends at a supper party Friday night, following the symphony concert, in honor of Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony organization. Mr. Muck is highly connected with literary and musical circles in Boston, being a great favorite in those circles where aesthetic entertainment has its highest value.

Among those at the supper party at the Massachusetts building were:

Mr. and Mrs. George Pope, Mr. and Mrs. C. Frederick Kohl, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Pillsbury, the Misses Withrow, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. William Bowers Bourn, Mr. and Mrs. John B. Casserly, Mr. and Mrs. John Rothschild, Mrs. H. A. Beach, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Leahy, General Nelson Miles, Mr. and Mrs. Clifford Martin, Mr. and Mrs. James Longyear, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Levison, Mr. and Mrs. George E. Bates, Mrs. Shattuck, Colonel and Mrs. L. E. Clement, Miss Ethel Clement, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Camm, Miss Bertha Camm, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Manning, C. A. Ellis, Max Bendix, George W. Sweet, H. T. Parker and W. H. Brennan.

* * *

From CHRONICLE

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 25 1915

Est 1884

MUSIC OF RUSSIA CALLS OUT THRONG

Boston Players in Versatile Interpretation of Four Big Composers.

By ANNA CORA WINCHELL.

The devotees of Russian music are numerous and enthusiastic, to judge from the number that went to hear the Boston players last night. Every seat in Festival Hall was taken and hundreds were contented to stand. The event was as great in its importance as any of this symphonic season, and the make-up of the programme could not have been more acceptable. With two of the numbers this community has become fairly well acquainted—the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" and Glazounow's "Overture Solennelle," but there were "voices" innumerable in each work, which came to recognition last night for the first time.

Whatever the impulse that dominated Tschaikowsky in his creation of the "Pathetic" is almost immaterial. Biographers differ in their opinions concerning it, but its rendition under the baton of Dr. Muck will leave it ringing in the ears as a mighty epic never to be forgotten. The fluency and descriptive power of the instruments were put to full test, and their dynamic strength was no more impressive than their pianissimos; in fact through the entire season, no one item has seemed so potent as this orchestra's pianissimos drawn to the fineness of a needle's point. Dissonances ceased to be dissonances in their greater capacity of carrying a message and announcing what the composer had in mind.

The "Solennelle" was given with an extreme grace that brought out beauty and dignity in a tone. Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," called a "sketch," was deeply pictorial, and contained a wonderful amout of mysticism and color for a work of such brevity. It proved entrancing and delightful not only in harmonies, but in construction, which allowed for enunciation from a variety of instruments, notable among which was the English horn, whose plaintive yet hopeful little melody suggested what Larbi might have done with his flute in the Garden of Allah.

Rimsky - Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" gave so much real scenic effect with its dances and festa spirit that an operatic stage was easily before one's vision. The commingling of the Latin music with that of the Russian formed a fanciful composition that was attractive both in originality and vivacious beauty.

Tonight's programme will include Sibelius, Strauss and Beethoven.

BOSTON HERALD.

JUNE 8, 1915.

AMHERST NIGHT AT THE POPS

Ten-Year-Old Son of Old Song Leader Merrill Carries Off Honors.

The annual "Amherst Night" was held last evening at the Pops concert in Symphony Hall, and the college found a future chorister in Frederick Merrill, the 10-year-old son of W. F. Merrill, Amherst '99, of 197 Longwood avenue, Brookline. The youngster, who is bound for Amherst in the class of 1927, jumped to the platform and led the audience in the singing of "Lord Jeffrey Amherst." Though his father, an old song leader, had wrought the house up to a high pitch of enthusiasm, young Frederick brought forth twice the volume, and when, at the end of the song, he ran down the centre aisle, he received the congratulations of former Gov. Foss, who was seated at a table.

Last night, as always, Amherst kept up her reputation for singing. The hall was decorated with Amherst banners, and over the organ was suspended a large electric sign, bearing the word "Amherst" in purple and white lights.

During the second intermission, a crowd of the "boys" gave vent to some real "college barber-shop chords." Throughout the program Amherst songs, hymns and waltzes were given as encores.

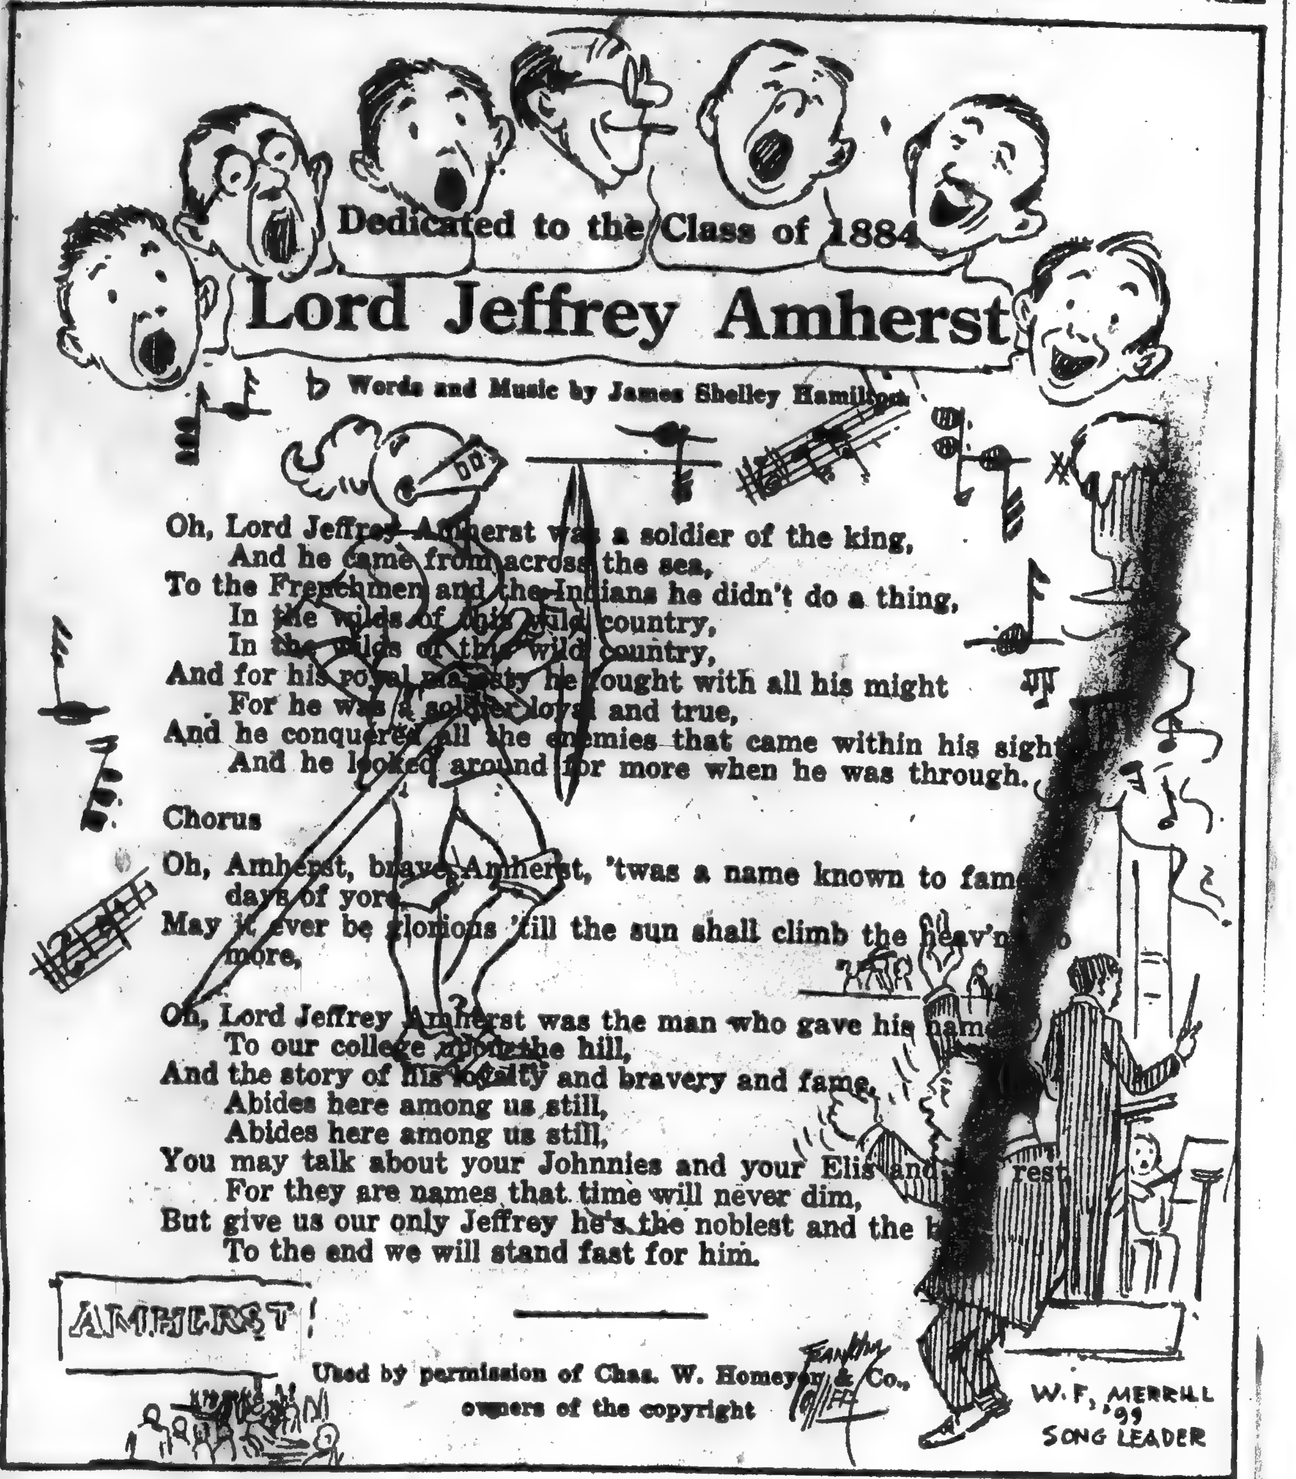
From the first to the last note the audience retained its jolity, and joined in the songs without needing any invitation. During a lapse, someone imported a toy ballon, and aerial polo ensued in the rear of the hall. Men and women in evening clothes joined in pelting the yellow globe with their fists, and it continued on its zigzag course through the air.

Perhaps the favorite selections of the evening were "Lord Jeffrey Amherst" and Handel's "Largo," withMr. Hoffman at the violin, Mr. Holy at the harp and Mr. Marshall at the organ.

The annual "Tech Night' will be held at Symphony Hall this evening. Since the Institute has engaged the entire house, the public will be unable to procure seats.

BOSTON JOURNAL— JUNE 8, 1915

SONG SHEET SKETCHES AT THE POPS



AMHERST!
W. F. MERRILL '99 SONG LEADER

Dedicated to the Class of 1884

Lord Jeffrey Amherst

Words and Music by James Shelley Hamilton

Oh, Lord Jeffrey Amherst was a soldier of the king,
And he came from across the sea,
To the Frenchmen and the Indians he didn't do a thing,
In the wilds of this wild country,
In the wilds of this wild country,
And for his royal majesty he fought with all his might
For he was a soldier loyal and true,
And he conquered all the enemies that came within his sight
And he looked around for more when he was through.

Chorus

Oh, Amherst, brave Amherst, 'twas a name known to fam[illegible] days of yore,
May it ever be glorious 'till the sun shall climb the heav'n[illegible] more,

Oh, Lord Jeffrey Amherst was the man who gave his name
To our college upon the hill,
And the story of his loyalty and bravery and fame,
Abides here among us still,
Abides here among us still,
You may talk about your Johnnies and your Elis and [illegible] rest
For they are names that time will never dim,
But give us our only Jeffrey he's the noblest and the [illegible]
To the end we will stand fast for him.

Used by permission of Chas. W. Homeyer & Co., owners of the copyright

The song, "Lord Jeffrey Amherst," dedicated to the class of 1884, and one of the most stirring of all college melodies, created intense enthusiasm at Symphony Hall last evening. The artist gives his impressions of "Amherst Night" on margin of the program.

BOSTON POST, JUNE 8, 1915

AMHERST HAS "POP" NIGHT

Amherst College held forth last night at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall. Amherst boys and their girls were present in abundance, and the hall was freely decorated with the college colors. As befitted the occasion the orchestra, under Mr. Maquarre's baton, as well as the singers in the hall, was called upon to celebrate the greatness of Amherst. It was an appropriate occasion for such a celebration, for in addition to hiring practically the entire auditorium, floor and balconies, the men sustained the reputation of Amherst as a musical college. They write songs, as well as sing them there, and the songs are of unusually good quality.

BOSTON HERALD, JUNE 9, 1915.

$1,000,000 GIVEN TECH WITHIN WEEK

Charles Hayden, Charles A. Stone and Edwin H. Webster Among Donors.

Announcement of gifts amounting to $1,000,000 was made at the Tech Pop concert in Symphony Hall last night by President Maclaurin. During an intermission in the musical program President Horn of the Alumni Association mounted the platform and introduced President Maclaurin, who made known the gifts and the names of the donors. All of them have been received during the last week.

Three gifts totalling $350,000 are for dormitories on the new site in Cambridge, D. Coleman du Pont '84 of Wilmington, Del., gave $100,000. The other gifts of $100,000 and $150,000 are given anonymously.

Charles Hayden '90 of Boston, D. Coleman du Pont and S. Pierre du Pont '90 of Wilmington, Del., are joint donors of $225,000 for the mining laboratories.

Charles A. Stone '88 and Edwin H. Webster '88 of Stone & Webster, have given the construction of the presidential mansion on Ames street as their gift.

President Horn also announced that the Alumni Association will put $500,000

BOSTON HERALD, JUNE 9, 1915.

POP CONCERT MARKS END OF TECH SENIOR WEEK

Pageant Given Depicting History of Institute.

The Tech Pop concert marked the closing of the week's celebration by the seniors. There were few classes that were not represented and the classes of 1902, 1908 and 1890 were there in force. The first two classes marched in before the opening of the music, but the class of 1915 was ushered in by the class of 1890 to the strains of "El Capitan." The seniors, 300 strong, marched up the centre aisle and took seats in the front of the orchestra.

In the intermission the class presented a pageant entitled "The Presidential Range," by H. E. Kebbon '12 and R. E. Rogers, depicting the life of the institute since the days when it started in the Mercantile building on Summer street in 1865 with 15 students, to the present day, when it is fast approaching the time when it must move to its new buildings across the Charles to accommodate its more than 1600 students. The cast for the playlet was:

President Richards, first president of Tech	G. Whitwell
P. Richards, oldest living alumnus	By himself
President Runkle, second president	W. S. Thomas
President Walker, third president	J. Tobey
President Crafts, fourth president	E. J. Castleman
President Pritchett, fifth president	C. L. Hall
President Noyes, sixth president	O. R. Freeman
President Maclaurin, seventh president	C. W. Howlett
Miss Co-ed	Miss M. E. Plummer, M. I. T., '15
Tech Cadet	L. Best
Boisterous Student	G. Hilton
Baby Alumni Association	W. Rennie
Ike Litchfield	Himself
Mr. Smith, mysterious masked person	G. Sabin
Fair Harvard	J. C. Caldwell
Mr. Tech Man	I. MacDaniells
Mr. Horn, president Alumni Association	Himself
President Graduating Class	M. B. Dalton

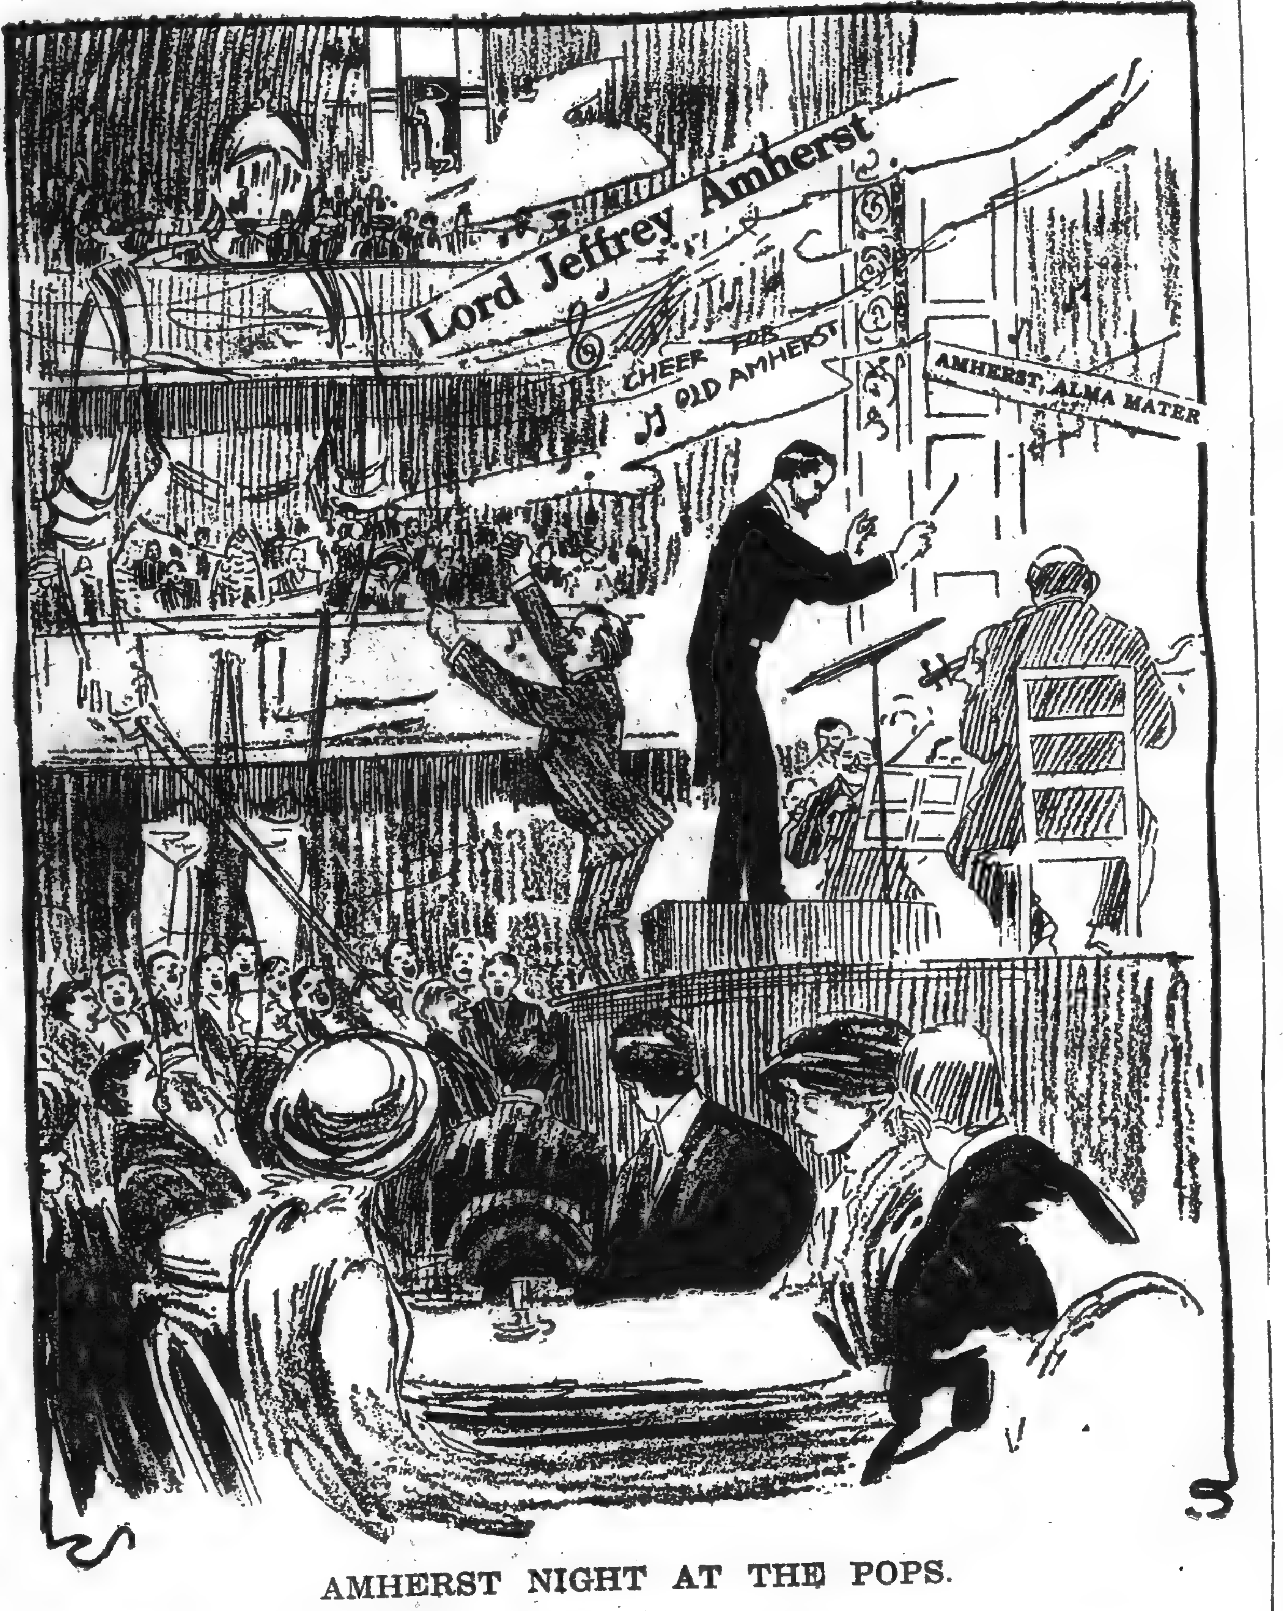
In chronological order each President descended from his perch and enacted the important event of his respective tenure of office. These included the admission of women in President Runkle's term, the institution of drill in President Walker's, the suggestion of the Tech-Harvard combination by President Pritchett in 1903 and the simultaneous Tech riot, and finally the completed Tech union, the mysterious gift of $2,000,000 by an anonymous donor and the moving across the Charles since the advent of President Maclaurin.

Following the historical sketch a speech of presentation and welcome was given the graduating class by the president of the Alumni Association, who entrusted the class banner to President Dalton of the seniors.

BOSTON GLOBE— JUNE 8, 1915

AMHERST IN MERRY MOOD.

Grads, Old and Young, Enjoy Their "Night" at The Pops and Join in Singing College Songs.



AMHERST NIGHT AT THE POPS.

Amherst night, the first of the college nights at the Pops, brought to Symphony Hall last evening a great throng of college champions, old and young, some "stagging" it, but most of them densely surrounded by gay ramparts of femininity. All the floor had been reserved for them, and they filled it full, while the balconies, dripping with Amherst banners, held also a bright-colored, enthusiastic assemblage.

To a large degree the college gave the tone to the musical program. Two of the orchestral numbers were the work of E. N. Blake, '97, namely, the popular "Campus Dreams" waltz and "For the Glory of Old Amherst." But the voice of the college was heard best in its songs.

The first intermission was followed by "Amherst, Alma Mater," by J. S. Hamilton, '6, and led, as were all the songs, by W. F. Merrill, '99, who gives to his conducting all the athletic enermy of an undergraduate cheer-leader and by comparison makes Billy Sunday at his hight of strenuosity seem like a bandage-bound mummy.

Then after the "Peer Gynt" suite—itself so well received that the third part was repeated—came "Lord Geoffrey Amherst," also by Hamilton, best of Amherst songs and perhaps best of all the songs of all the colleges. Everybody rose for this and everybody who knew or could pick up the tune, sang it with a will.

The two stanzas followed by the repeated chorus rang through the big hall and then the applause was so insistent that the first stanza was given again. Still the applause continued and the second stanza was repeated.

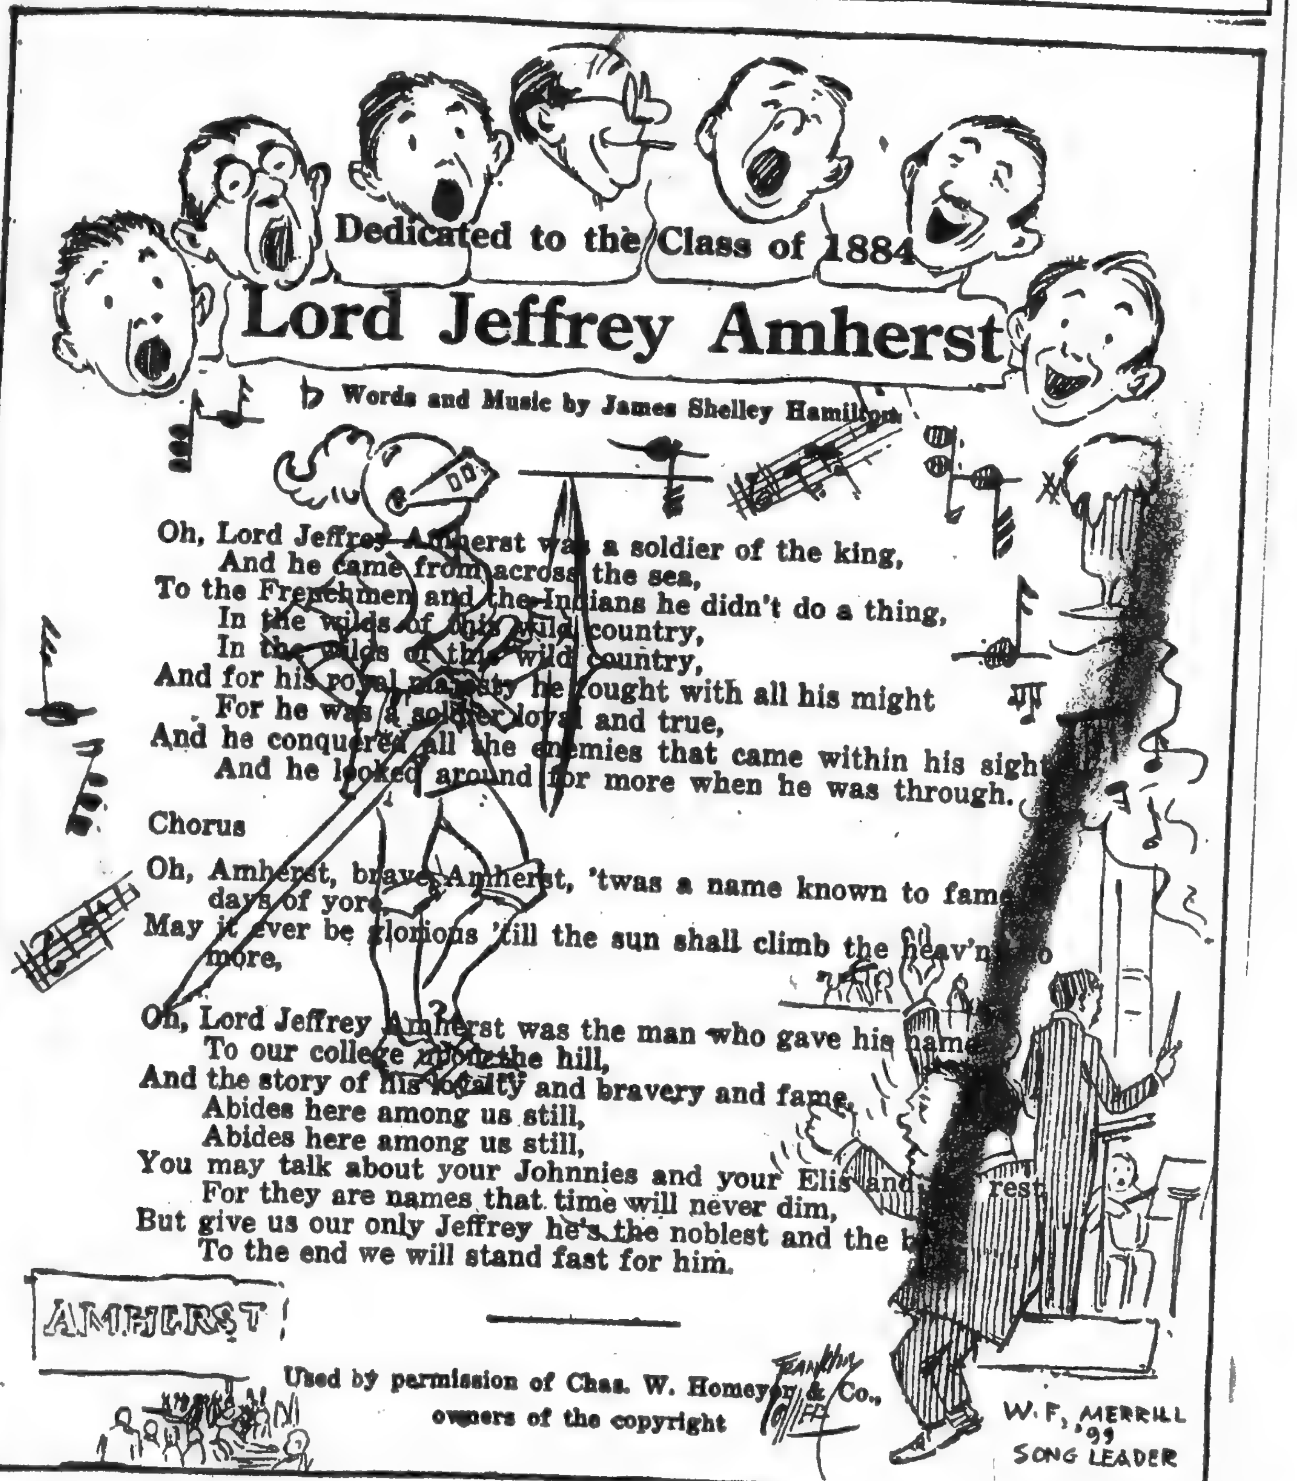
Nor did Mr Merrill have to bear alone the burden of conducting this prince of songs, for W. F. Jr came to his rescue, much at ease in his gray knickerbockers, and tried to give as good an imitation of father's style as limited muscularity and a bit hazy sense of time permitted. He is prospectively Amherst '27 and some day he is going to be song-leader all by himself.

Other college numbers on the program were "Paige's Horse" and "To the Fairest College," both by D. C. Bartlett, the singing of which was accompanied by C. E. Lamson, '99, at the organ. But a leaflet of Amherst songs had been distributed, and it was very easy to fill up any intermission with one of the old favorites that all Amherst men know.

The orchestral program was especially good. Especially to be noted was Handel's "Largo," with Mr Hoffman violin, Mr Holy harp and Mr Marshall organ.

BOSTON JOURNAL— JUNE 8, 1915

SONG SHEET SKETCHES AT THE POPS



AMHERST!
W. F. MERRILL '99 SONG LEADER

Dedicated to the Class of 1884

Lord Jeffrey Amherst

Words and Music by James Shelley Hamilton

Oh, Lord Jeffrey Amherst was a soldier of the king,
And he came from across the sea,
To the Frenchmen and the Indians he didn't do a thing,
In the wilds of this wild country,
In the wilds of this wild country,
And for his royal majesty he fought with all his might
For he was a soldier loyal and true,
And he conquered all the enemies that came within his sight
And he looked around for more when he was through.

Chorus

Oh, Amherst, brave Amherst, 'twas a name known to fam[illegible] days of yore,
May it ever be glorious 'till the sun shall climb the heav'n [illegible] more,

Oh, Lord Jeffrey Amherst was the man who gave his name
To our college upon the hill,
And the story of his loyalty and bravery and fame,
Abides here among us still,
Abides here among us still,
You may talk about your Johnnies and your Elis and [illegible] rest,
For they are names that time will never dim,
But give us our only Jeffrey he's the noblest and the b[illegible]
To the end we will stand fast for him.

Used by permission of Chas. W. Homeyer & Co., owners of the copyright

The song, "Lord Jeffrey Amherst," dedicated to the class of 1884, and one of the most stirring of all college melodies, created intense enthusiasm at Symphony Hall last evening. The artist gives his impressions of "Amherst Night" on margin of the program.

BOSTON POST,
JUNE 8, 1915

AMHERST HAS "POP" NIGHT

Amherst College held forth last night at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall. Amherst boys and their girls were present in abundance, and the hall was freely decorated with the college colors. As befitted the occasion the orchestra, under Mr. Maquarre's baton, as well as the singers in the hall, was called upon to celebrate the greatness of Amherst. It was an appropriate occasion for such a celebration, for in addition to hiring practically the entire auditorium, floor and balconies, the men sustained the reputation of Amherst as a musical college. They write songs, as well as sing them there, and the songs are of unusually good quality.

BOSTON HERALD,
JUNE 9, 1915.

$1,000,000 GIVEN TECH WITHIN WEEK

Charles Hayden, Charles A. Stone and Edwin H. Webster Among Donors.

Announcement of gifts amounting to $1,000,000 was made at the Tech Pop concert in Symphony Hall last night by President Maclaurin. During an intermission in the musical program President Horn of the Alumni Association mounted the platform and introduced President Maclaurin, who made known the gifts and the names of the donors. All of them have been received during the last week.

Three gifts totalling $350,000 are for dormitories on the new site in Cambridge, D. Coleman du Pont '84 of Wilmington, Del., gave $100,000. The other gifts of $100,000 and $150,000 are given anonymously.

Charles Hayden '90 of Boston, D. Coleman du Pont and S. Pierre du Pont '90 of Wilmington, Del., are joint donors of $225,000 for the mining laboratories.

Charles A. Stone '88 and Edwin H. Webster '88 of Stone & Webster, have given the construction of the presidential mansion on Ames street as their gift.

President Horn also announced that Alumni Association will put $500,000

BOSTON HERALD,
JUNE 9, 1915.

POP CONCERT MARKS END OF TECH SENIOR WEEK

Pageant Given Depicting History of Institute.

The Tech Pop concert marked the closing of the week's celebration by the seniors. There were few classes that were not represented and the classes of 1902, 1908 and 1890 were there in force. The first two classes marched in before the opening of the music, but the class of 1915 was ushered in by the class of 1890 to the strains of "El Capitan." The seniors, 300 strong, marched up the centre aisle and took seats in the front of the orchestra.

In the intermission the class presented a pageant entitled "The Presidential Range," by H. E. Kebbon '12 and R. E. Rogers, depicting the life of the institute since the days when it started in the Mercantile building on Summer street in 1865 with 15 students, to the present day, when it is fast approaching the time when it must move to its new buildings across the Charles to accommodate its more than 1600 students. The cast for the playlet was:

President Richards, first president of Tech, G. Whitwell
P. Richards, oldest living alumnus..By himself
President Runkle, second president........ W. S. Thomas
President Walker, third president.....J. Tobey
President Crafts, fourth president........ E. J. Castleman
President Pritchett, fifth president..C. L. Hall
President Noyes, sixth president..O. R. Freeman
President Maclaurin, seventh president.... C. W. Howlett
Miss Co-ed...Miss M. E. Plummer, M. I. T., '15
Tech Cadet............................L. Best
Boisterous Student...................G. Hilton
Baby Alumni Association............W. Rennie
Ike Litchfield..........................Himself
Mr. Smith, mysterious masked person..G. Sabin
Fair Harvard....................J. C. Caldwell
Mr. Tech Man..................I. MacDaniells
Mr. Horn, president Alumni Association.. Himself
President Graduating Class.......M. B. Dalton

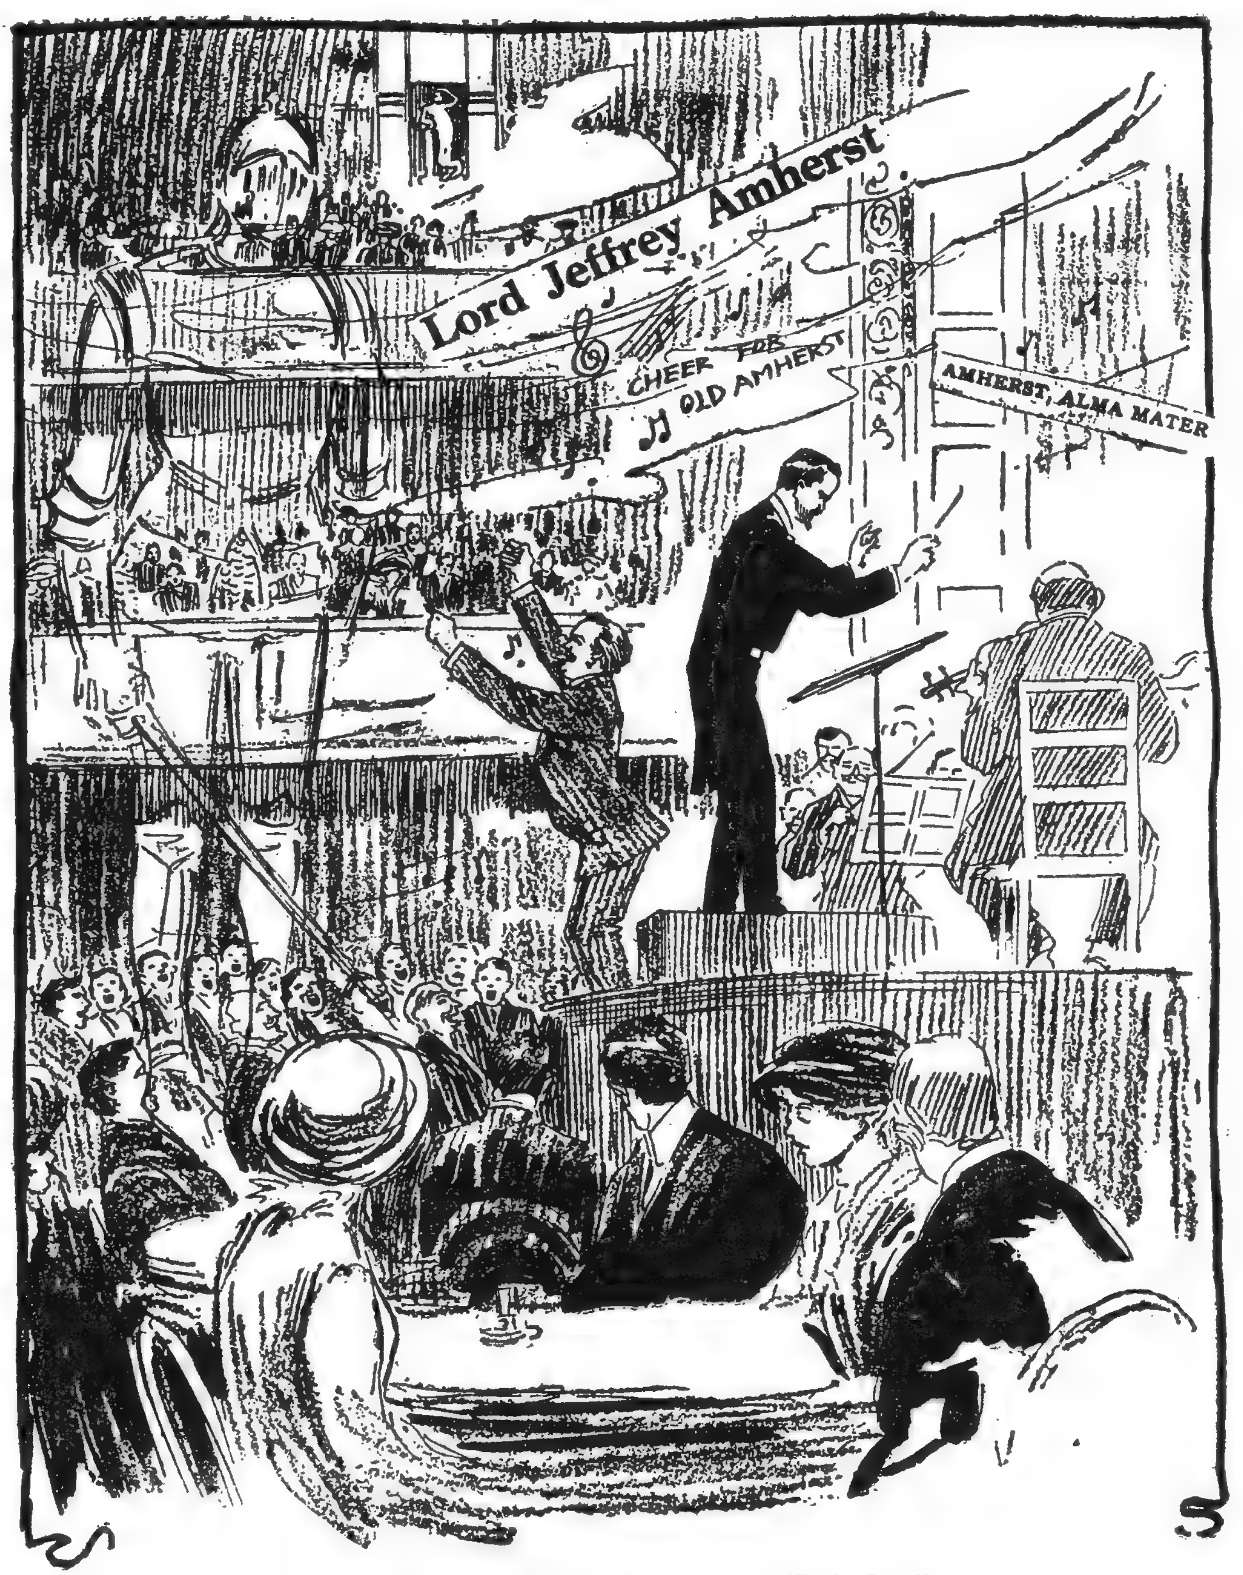
In chronological order each President descended from his perch and enacted the important event of his respective tenure of office. These included the admission of women in President Runkle's term, the institution of drill in President Walker's, the suggestion of the Tech-Harvard combination by President Pritchett in 1903 and the simultaneous Tech riot, and finally the completed Tech union, the mysterious gift of $2,000,000 by an anonymous donor and the moving across the Charles since the advent of President Maclaurin.

Following the historical sketch a speech of presentation and welcome was given the graduating class by the president of the Alumni Association, who entrusted the class banner to President Dalton of the seniors.

BOSTON GLOBE— JUNE 8, 1915

AMHERST IN MERRY MOOD.

Grads, Old and Young, Enjoy Their "Night" at The Pops and Join in Singing College Songs.



AMHERST NIGHT AT THE POPS.

Amherst night, the first of the college nights at the Pops, brought to Symphony Hall last evening a great throng of college champions, old and young, some "stagging" it, but most of them densely surrounded by gay ramparts of femininity. All the floor had been reserved for them, and they filled it full, while the balconies, dripping with Amherst banners, held also a bright-colored, enthusiastic assemblage.

To a large degree the college gave the tone to the musical program. Two of the orchestral numbers were the work of E. N. Blake, '97, namely, the popular "Campus Dreams" waltz and "For the Glory of Old Amherst." But the voice of the college was heard best in its songs.

The first intermission was followed by "Amherst, Alma Mater," by J. S. Hamilton, '6, and led, as were all the songs, by W. F. Merrill, '99, who gives to his conducting all the athletic enermy of an undergraduate cheer-leader and by comparison makes Billy Sunday at his hight of strenuosity seem like a bandage-bound mummy.

Then after the "Peer Gynt" suite—itself so well received that the third part was repeated—came "Lord Geoffrey Amherst," also by Hamilton, best of Amherst songs and perhaps best of all the songs of all the colleges. Everybody rose for this and everybody who knew or could pick up the tune, sang it with a will.

The two stanzas followed by the repeated chorus rang through the big hall and then the applause was so insistent that the first stanza was given again. Still the applause continued and the second stanza was repeated.

Nor did Mr Merrill have to bear alone the burden of conducting this prince of songs, for W. F. Jr came to his rescue, much at ease in his gray knickerbockers, and tried to give as good an imitation of father's style as limited muscularity and a bit hazy sense of time permitted. He is prospectively Amherst '27 and some day he is going to be song-leader all by himself.

Other college numbers on the program were "Paige's Horse" and "To the Fairest College," both by D. C. Bartlett, the singing of which was accompanied by C. E. Lamson, '99, at the organ. But a leaflet of Amherst songs had been distributed, and it was very easy to fill up any intermission with one of the old favorites that all Amherst men know.

The orchestral program was especially good. Especially to be noted was Handel's "Largo," with Mr Hoffman violin, Mr Holy harp and Mr Marshall organ.

[168]

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 30 1915
Establishe

Ours the Gain From the "Bos

By HELEN DAR

IT'S been a great season—our San Francisco season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; great for the orchestra, great for the distinguished conductor of the orchestra and great for San Francisco. Felicitations are mutual—and becoming.

San Francisco did herself proud—was splendidly equal to the occasion and not only sustained her reputation but added to it as a city of music lovers and connoisseurs.

When her hand was called she wasn't caught four-flushing—and none there be who can put tongue in cheek and droop a mocking eyelid at our pretentiousness, to point it out as pretense.

We made good with the Boston Symphony, and—the obligation being mutual—the Boston Symphony certainly made good with us.

The orchestra justified its existence and the claims made for it far beyond our most exacting expectations—even to the degree of effervescence of our uncorked enthusiasm.

UNQUALIFIED TRIUMPH.

As for Dr. Karl Muck—it was an unqualified triumph carried to a magnificent crescendo climax that must have been (at least so we would wish it who contributed to it by our joy in his genius) extremely gratifying.

But, after all—after the last lovely note died away in the rapt silence of the more than four thousand listeners in Festival Hall; after the last salvo of applause dwindled away in a lingering patter; after the marvelous hundred for the last time rose en masse to be thanked and (metaphorically) patted on the back; after Dr. Muck made his last precise, impersonal courtly bow in acknowledgment of praise that he somehow seemed to always pass on to the music instead of take to himself; after the great event was over and done with, and the last shekel thrust upon the plethoric box office was scooped in—the afterglow of a glory that has passed our way remains with us.

Ours is the gain.

It is we who heard this music that benefit by the "Boston Symphony" season.

While San Francisco can congratulate herself on not having fallen down in what was, in a way, an artistic crisis; while a great sigh of relief goes up from the box office that the venture was a success; yet it is we who ate of the feast, as it were, that are the richer by our opportunity.

ACQUIRED A TREASURE.

We have acquired a treasure for ourselves, laid it up in memory "where neither moth nor rust do corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal."

We have that which—now that we have it—we would not part with at any price; and which no one, and no "run of hard luck" can take away from us. Which is why drinking of the joys of life, claiming our share of the beautiful, is more satisfying, and in the end more profitable than cluttering up ourselves with possessions that porch-climbers covet or lawsuits deprive us of.

The Boston Symphony season was not merely a season of pleasure, an opportunity for indulgence, however refined. It was an education—even to the cognoscenti; an artistic and intellectual revelation even to the musically expert.

It has left with us a standard.

We know how beautiful, how perfect music can be—and we know (even the lay admirers of Dr. Muck) how difficult must be the attainment to such beauty, such perfection, such faultless lucidity, as was discovered to us by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MAY CHANGE US.

It seems to me we shall, hereafter, always be more appreciative of all sincerely striving artists, even in their imperfection, because of the possibilities that Dr. Muck has shown us.

When they nearly approach his heights, or, having the vision, strive toward it, we shall be kinder, more tolerant, more appreciative—as we love the sun's ray for having known the full effulgence of the sun.

The remarkable thing is that Dr. Muck has not caught us and dazzled us by any glamour; by no special tricks of his art or personality.

In fact he has been as economical of his personality as he is o
tures in conducting—and could be more illustrative o
than the way he handles
ting-needle of a baton, ne
accident moving it, or th fingers, or his swi, fine b brief sweep of arm o
head a hundredth pa more than the experienc practices the same ec lightning flashes accurately at his just to hit, never of nothing—not the instant clash

INTRODUCE

With this rigo
his personality—
concealed it from us to music, to c
that made us won
met with them b
we know their sm
joys and heartac
hopes, how the sia, the twinklin

THE MUSICAL LEADER

MUSIC IN THE EXPOSITION CITY

San Francisco, May 27, 1915.

Today one of the shining achievements of the Panama-Pacific Exposition goes down in history. At a cost of $65,000, one of the world's greatest orchestras was brought across the country. It was a tremendous gamble on the musical taste of a community that had never before been put under so severe a test. There is always the band of true music lovers, greater or smaller, according to the size of the community, always the group of cognoscenti who are present on every meritorious occasion, but unhappily these do not usually number enough to pay the bills. To this time, with great and justified pride, San Franciscans point out the fact that the box office for the Boston Symphony engagement shows a substantial sum to the good. Every music lover in the West will rejoice at the good news. And it is more than good news—it is significant news. Why should not San Francisco have a yearly spring festival of international work? Together with its many other attractions and advantages, it would become the mecca for the whole Western country. I can see in this place an immense stimulus to the musical life of the whole United States—a friendly and mutually helpful rivalry between the East and West. And suppose that eventually, fed and stimulated by the greatest, our own symphony orchestra becomes the legitimate rival of the peerless Eastern organization? Not at all improbable, with the material at hand, the ideals and the willingness. The future looms big with promise. God grant us a continuance of our national health, and a furtherance of the arts of peace.

Much of the story of the Boston Symphony's visit has been told in two previous letters. The only program devoted to a special composer was that of the fifth concert, a Wagner program. The significance of a house filled to overflowing and wildly enthusiastic, was duly observed, with the result that an extra gala Wagner farewell program was announced to end the engagement. The orchestra was never more magnificent than in the handling of the superb epic eloquence of the Titan of Bayreuth.

Next in popularity with the all-important public, came the Russian evening on Monday. The entire house was sold out days in advance, and many were the disappointed seekers after Muscovite thrills and elemental excitements. The program consisted of the marvelous "Pathetique" Symphony of Tschaikowsky, a work deserving of a more ennobling title; the Overture Solonelle of Glazounow, which as a composition leaves one rather unimpressed by its solemnity and uninspired by its message; the highly illuminating descriptive sketch of Borodine, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," compelling in the charm and strength of its tone pictures; and lastly the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" of Rimsky-Korsakow, colorful and interesting. The occasion of the playing of the Saint-Saens concerto last Sunday was made more interesting by the presence of the composer himself. The audience's demonstration, when it discovered the distinguished visitor, must have warmed his heart. No doubt his feelings were torn to hear his work conducted by a German director, unable as he seems to be to separate his artistic friendships from his political affiliations. A pity, is it not, that Art does not always succeed in transcending the mundane struggle and bias?

A digression this, which in no way detracts from the main theme, the success extraordinary which attended every concert of the Boston Symphony, and which will long preserve its memory in the minds of all who were privileged to attend.

The Pacific Musical Society gave a luncheon in honor of Dr. Karl Muck last Thursday, the affair taking place at the beach. A spirit of informality prevailed, and the occasion gave rise to several impromptu and clever remarks by the various members, which Dr. Muck received with appreciation. Among the speakers were Mme. Emilia Tojetti, Mrs. Toby Schussler, Mrs. David Hirschler, Mrs. William Ritter, Miss May Sinsheimer and Elias M. Hecht.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 24 1915

AN INSPIRING EXPOSITION.

Great Musicians and Artists Confess Having Found Unique Stimulus.

OF THE paying of compliments to the San Francisco exposition, there is apparently no end. And it is not merely that each newcomer offers up his tribute of profound admiration; those who have been and gone continue lavishing their praises in interviews, conversations and contributions to their home town papers. It is the proof of an enthusiasm far deeper than any aroused by previous festivals.

No other exposition has been the source of such literary and artistic inspiration and, in support of this, there is abundant evidence. Following a long series of reprinted tributes, The Chronicle recently reproduced a half-page encomium by Royal Cortissoz, the distinguished art critic, and written for the New York Tribune.

It may have seemed to our readers that Cortissoz then exhausted his adjectives of eulogy, but he was only beginning. He returns to the pleasant duty, and in a contribution taking up nearly a whole page, indulges in even more lavish superlatives.

Still fascinated, to use his own expression, he comes closer and closer to the details, only to find that the more minutely the exposition is examined, the more are the reasons for an admiration bordering upon worship. Space can be found for only one quotation, but it is a summary of all the excellences observed:

> But in closing I must once more enforce the supreme virtue of the fair, its amazing artistic unity. We have never seen anything like it in construction of the sort. Just for the perfect balance of its extraordinary architectural beauty it is worth coming three thousand miles to see.

After reading such whole-souled adulation, the East can only ask one question when considering a visit, and that is: Have I got the price?

But the exposition has given rise to inspiration in more than the devotees to architectural beauty. Camille Saint-Saens, the greatest of living composers, says that the spectacle has inspired him beyond the dreams born of those pictures which prompted him to compose the fantasia, 'Hail California."

The players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been stimulated by both the spectacle of the exposition and their reception at the hands of San Francisco audiences to work which has been described as the summit of their art.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 3 0 1915
Establish

Ours the Gain From the "Bos

By HELEN DAR

It's been a great season—our San Francisco season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; great for the orchestra, great for the distinguished conductor of the orchestra and great for San Francisco. Felicitations are mutual—and becoming.

San Francisco did herself proud—was splendidly equal to the occasion and not only sustained her reputation but added to it as a city of music lovers and connoisseurs.

When her hand was called she wasn't caught four-flushing — and none there be who can put tongue in cheek and droop a mocking eyelid at our pretentiousness, to point it out as pretense.

We made good with the Boston Symphony, and—the obligation being mutual—the Boston Symphony certainly made good with us.

The orchestra justified its existence and the claims made for it far beyond our most exacting expectations—even to the degree of effervescence of our uncorked enthusiasm.

UNQUALIFIED TRIUMPH.

As for Dr. Karl Muck—it was an unqualified triumph carried to a magnificent crescendo climax that must have been (at least so we would wish it who contributed to it by our joy in his genius) extremely gratifying.

But, after all—after the last lovely note died away in the rapt silence of the more than four thousand listeners in Festival Hall; after the last salvo of applause dwindled away in a lingering patter; after the marvelous hundred for the last time rose en masse to be thanked and (metaphorically) patted on the back; after Dr. Muck made his last precise, impersonal courtly bow in acknowledgment of praise that he somehow seemed to always pass on to the music instead of take to himself; after the great event was over and done with, and the last shekel thrust upon the plethoric box office was scooped in—the afterglow of a glory that has passed our way remains with us.

Ours is the gain.

It is we who heard this music that benefit by the "Boston Symphony" season.

While San Francisco can congratulate herself on not having fallen down in what was, in a way, an artistic crisis; while a great sigh of relief goes up from the box office that the venture was a success; yet it is we who ate of the feast, as it were, that are the richer by our opportunity.

ACQUIRED A TREASURE.

We have acquired a treasure for ourselves, laid it up in memory, "where neither moth nor rust do corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal."

We have that which—now that we have it—we would not part with at any price; and which no one, and no "run of hard luck" can take away from us. Which is why drinking of the joys of life, claiming our share of the beautiful, is more satisfying, and in the end more profitable than cluttering up ourselves with possessions that porch-climbers covet or lawsuits deprive us of.

The Boston Symphony season was not merely a season of pleasure, an opportunity for indulgence, however refined. It was an education—even to the cognoscenti; an artistic and intellectual revelation even to the musically expert.

It has left with us a standard.

We know how beautiful, how perfect music can be—and we know (even the lay admirers of Dr. Muck) how difficult must be the attainment to such beauty, such perfection, such faultless lucidity, as was discovered to us by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MAY CHANGE US.

It seems to me we shall, hereafter, always be more appreciative of all sincerely striving artists, even in their imperfection, because of the possibilities that Dr. Muck has shown us.

When they nearly approach his heights, or, having the vision, strive toward it, we shall be kinder, more tolerant, more appreciative—as we love the sun's ray for having known the full effulgence of the sun.

The remarkable thing is that Dr. Muck has not caught us and dazzled us by any glamour; by no special tricks of his art or personality.

In fact he has been as economical of his personality as he is tures in conducting could be more illustrative
than the way he handles
ting-needle of a baton, ne
accident moving it, or th fingers, or his swift, fine brief sweep of arm or head a hundredth part
more than the exigency practices the same e
lightning flashes of accurately at his obj just to hit, never t of nothing—not e
the instant clash

INTRODUCE

With this rigo
his personality—
concealed it from us to music, to c
that made us won
met with them b
we know their sm
joys and heartac
hopes, how the
sia, the twinklin

THE MUSICAL LEADER

MUSIC IN THE EXPOSITION CITY

San Francisco, May 27, 1915.

Today one of the shining achievements of the Panama-Pacific Exposition goes down in history. At a cost of $65,000, one of the world's greatest orchestras was brought across the country. It was a tremendous gamble on the musical taste of a community that had never before been put under so severe a test. There is always the band of true music lovers, greater or smaller, according to the size of the community, always the group of cognoscenti who are present on every meritorious occasion, but unhappily these do not usually number enough to pay the bills. To his time, with great and justified pride, San Franciscans point out the fact that the box office for the Boston Symphony engagement shows a substantial sum to the good. Every music lover in the West will rejoice at the good news. And it is more than good news—it is significant news. Why should not San Francisco have a yearly spring festival of international work? Together with its many other attractions and advantages, it would become the mecca for the whole Western country. I can see in this place an immense stimulus to the musical life of the whole United States—a friendly and mutually helpful rivalry between the East and West. And suppose that eventually, fed and stimulated by the greatest, our own symphony orchestra becomes the legitimate rival of the peerless Eastern organization? Not at all improbable, with the material at hand, the ideals and the willingness. The future looms big with promise. God grant us a continuance of our national health, and a furtherance of the arts of peace.

Much of the story of the Boston Symphony's visit has been told in two previous letters. The only program devoted to a special composer was that of the fifth concert, a Wagner program. The significance of a house filled to overflowing and wildly enthusiastic, was duly observed, with the result that an extra gala Wagner farewell program was announced to end the engagement. The orchestra was never more magnificent than in the handling of the superb epic eloquence of the Titan of Bayreuth.

Next in popularity with the all-important public, came the Russian evening on Monday. The entire house was sold out days in advance, and many were the disappointed seekers after Muscovite thrills and elemental excitements. The program consisted of the marvelous "Pathetique" Symphony of Tschaikowsky, a work deserving of a more ennobling title; the Overture Solonelle of Glazounow, which as a composition leaves one rather unimpressed by its solemnity and uninspired by its message; the highly illuminating descriptive sketch of Borodine, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," compelling in the charm and strength of its tone pictures; and lastly the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" of Rimsky-Korsakow, colorful and interesting. The occasion of the playing of the Saint-Saens concerto last Sunday was made more interesting by the presence of the composer himself. The audience's demonstration, when it discovered the distinguished visitor, must have warmed his heart. No doubt his feelings were torn to hear his work conducted by a German director, unable as he seems to be to separate his artistic friendships from his political affiliations. A pity, is it not, that Art does not always succeed in transcending the mundane struggle and bias?

A digression this, which in no way detracts from the main theme, the success extraordinary which attended every concert of the Boston Symphony, and which will long preserve its memory in the minds of all who were privileged to attend.

The Pacific Musical Society gave a luncheon in honor of Dr. Karl Muck last Thursday, the affair taking place at the beach. A spirit of informality prevailed, and the occasion gave rise to several impromptu and clever remarks by the various members, which Dr. Muck received with appreciation. Among the speakers were Mme. Emilia Tojetti, Mrs. Toby Schussler, Mrs. David Hirschler, Mrs. William Ritter, Miss May Sinsheimer and Elias M. Hecht.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 2 4 1915

AN INSPIRING EXPOSITION.

Great Musicians and Artists Confess Having Found Unique Stimulus.

OF THE paying of compliments to the San Francisco exposition, there is apparently no end. And it is not merely that each newcomer offers up his tribute of profound admiration; those who have been and gone continue lavishing their praises in interviews, conversations and contributions to their home town papers. It is the proof of an enthusiasm far deeper than any aroused by previous festivals.

No other exposition has been the source of such literary and artistic inspiration and, in support of this, there is abundant evidence. Following a long series of reprinted tributes, The Chronicle recently reproduced a half-page encomium by Royal Cortissoz, the distinguished art critic, and written for the New York Tribune.

It may have seemed to our readers that Cortissoz then exhausted his adjectives of eulogy, but he was only beginning. He returns to the pleasant duty, and in a contribution taking up nearly a whole page, indulges in even more lavish superlatives.

Still fascinated, to use his own expression, he comes closer and closer to the details, only to find that the more minutely the exposition is examined, the more are the reasons for an admiration bordering upon worship. Space can be found for only one quotation, but it is a summary of all the excellences observed:

> But in closing I must once more enforce the supreme virtue of the fair, its amazing artistic unity. We have never seen anything like it in construction of the sort. Just for the perfect balance of its extraordinary architectural beauty it is worth coming three thousand miles to see.

After reading such whole-souled adulation, the East can only ask one question when considering a visit, and that is: Have I got the price?

But the exposition has given rise to inspiration in more than the devotees to architectural beauty. Camille Saint-Saens, the greatest of living composers, says that the spectacle has inspired him beyond the dreams born of those pictures which prompted him to compose the fantasia, 'Hail California."

The players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been stimulated by both the spectacle of the exposition and their reception at the hands of San Francisco audiences to work which has been described as the summit of their art.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 3 0 1919
Establishe

◆ Ours the Gain From the "Bos

By HELEN DAR

IT'S been a great season—our San Francisco season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; great for the orchestra, great for the distinguished conductor of the orchestra and great for San Francisco. Felicitations are mutual—and becoming.

San Francisco did herself proud—was splendidly equal to the occasion and not only sustained her reputation but added to it as a city of music lovers and connoisseurs.

When her hand was called she wasn't caught four-flushing—and none there be who can put tongue in cheek and droop a mocking eyelid at our pretentiousness, to point it out as pretense.

We made good with the Boston Symphony, and—the obligation being mutual—the Boston Symphony certainly made good with us.

The orchestra justified its existence and the claims made for it far beyond our most exacting expectations—even to the degree of effervescence of our uncorked enthusiasm.

UNQUALIFIED TRIUMPH.

As for Dr. Karl Muck—it was an unqualified triumph carried to a magnificent crescendo climax that must have been (at least so we would wish it who contributed to it by our joy in his genius) extremely gratifying.

But, after all—after the last lovely note died away in the rapt silence of the more than four thousand listeners in Festival Hall; after the last salvo of applause dwindled away in a lingering patter; after the marvelous hundred for the last time rose en masse to be thanked and (metaphorically) patted on the back; after Dr. Muck made his last precise, impersonal courtly bow in acknowledgment of praise that he somehow seemed to always pass on to the music instead of take to himself; after the great event was over and done with, and the last shekel thrust upon the plethoric box office was scooped in—the afterglow of a glory that has passed our way remains with us.

Ours is the gain.

It is we who heard this music that benefit by the "Boston Symphony" season.

While San Francisco can congratulate herself on not having fallen down in what was, in a way, an artistic crisis; while a great sigh of relief goes up from the box office that the venture was a success; yet it is we who ate of the feast, as it were, that are the richer by our opportunity.

ACQUIRED A TREASURE.

We have acquired a treasure for ourselves, laid it up in memory, "where neither moth nor rust do corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal."

We have that which—now that we have it—we would not part with at any price; and which no one, and no "run of hard luck" can take away from us. Which is why drinking of the joys of life, claiming our share of the beautiful, is more satisfying, and in the end more profitable than cluttering up ourselves with possessions that porch-climbers covet or lawsuits deprive us of.

The Boston Symphony season was not merely a season of pleasure, an opportunity for indulgence, however refined. It was an education—even to the cognoscenti; an artistic and intellectual revelation even to the musically expert.

It has left with us a standard.

We know how beautiful, how perfect music can be—and we know (even the lay admirers of Dr. Muck) how difficult must be the attainment to such beauty, such perfection, such faultless lucidity, as was discovered to us by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MAY CHANGE US.

It seems to me we shall, hereafter, always be more appreciative of all sincerely striving artists, even in their imperfection, because of the possibilities that Dr. Muck has shown us. When they nearly approach his heights, or, having the vision, strive toward it, we shall be kinder, more tolerant, more appreciative—as we love the sun's ray for having known the full effulgence of the sun.

The remarkable thing is that Dr. Muck has not caught us and dazzled us by any glamour; by no special tricks of his art or personality.

In fact he has been as economical of his personality as he is tures in conducting—and could be more illustrative
than the way he handles
ting-needle of a baton, ne
accident moving it, or th fingers, or his swift, fine h
brief sweep of arm or head a hundredth part
more than the exigency practices the same ec
lightning flashes of accurately at his obj just to hit, never to of nothing—not ev
the instant clash

INTRODUC

With this rigo
his personality—
concealed it from us to music, to co
that made us won
met with them b
we know their sm
joys and heartac
hopes, how the
sia, the twinklin

THE MUSICAL LEADER

MUSIC IN THE EXPOSITION CITY

San Francisco, May 27, 1915.

Today one of the shining achievements of the Panama-Pacific Exposition goes down in history. At a cost of $65,000, one of the world's greatest orchestras was brought across the country. It was a tremendous gamble on the musical taste of a community that had never before been put under so severe a test. There is always the band of true music lovers, greater or smaller, according to the size of the community, always the group of cognoscenti who are present on every meritorious occasion, but unhappily these do not usually number enough to pay the bills. To his time, with great and justified pride, San Franciscans point out the fact that the box office for the Boston Symphony engagement shows a substantial sum to the good. Every music lover in the West will rejoice at the good news. And it is more than good news—it is significant news. Why should not San Francisco have a yearly spring festival of international work? Together with its many other attractions and advantages, it would become the mecca for the whole Western country. I can see in this place an immense stimulus to the musical life of the whole United States—a friendly and mutually helpful rivalry between the East and West. And suppose that eventually, fed and stimulated by the greatest, our own symphony orchestra becomes the legitimate rival of the peerless Eastern organization? Not at all improbable, with the material at hand, the ideals and the willingness. The future looms big with promise. God grant us a continuance of our national health, and a furtherance of the arts of peace.

Much of the story of the Boston Symphony's visit has been told in two previous letters. The only program devoted to a special composer was that of the fifth concert, a Wagner program. The significance of a house filled to overflowing and wildly enthusiastic, was duly observed, with the result that an extra gala Wagner farewell program was announced to end the engagement. The orchestra was never more magnificent than in the handling of the superb epic eloquence of the Titan of Bayreuth.

Next in popularity with the all-important public, came the Russian evening on Monday. The entire house was sold out days in advance, and many were the disappointed seekers after Muscovite thrills and elemental excitements. The program consisted of the marvelous "Pathetique" Symphony of Tschaikowsky, a work deserving of a more ennobling title; the Overture Solonelle of Glazounow, which as a composition leaves one rather unimpressed by its solemnity and uninspired by its message; the highly illuminating descriptive sketch of Borodine, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," compelling in the charm and strength of its tone pictures; and lastly the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" of Rimsky-Korsakow, colorful and interesting. The occasion of the playing of the Saint-Saens concerto last Sunday was made more interesting by the presence of the composer himself. The audience's demonstration, when it discovered the distinguished visitor, must have warmed his heart. No doubt his feelings were torn to hear his work conducted by a German director, unable as he seems to be to separate his artistic friendships from his political affiliations. A pity, is it not, that Art does not always succeed in transcending the mundane struggle and bias?

A digression this, which in no way detracts from the main theme, the success extraordinary which attended every concert of the Boston Symphony, and which will long preserve its memory in the minds of all who were privileged to attend.

The Pacific Musical Society gave a luncheon in honor of Dr. Karl Muck last Thursday, the affair taking place at the beach. A spirit of informality prevailed, and the occasion gave rise to several impromptu and clever remarks by the various members, which Dr. Muck received with appreciation. Among the speakers were Mme. Emilia Tojetti, Mrs. Toby Schussler, Mrs. David Hirschler, Mrs. William Ritter, Miss May Sinsheimer and Elias M. Hecht.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 2 4 1915

AN INSPIRING EXPOSITION.

Great Musicians and Artists Confess Having Found Unique Stimulus.

OF THE paying of compliments to the San Francisco exposition, there is apparently no end. And it is not merely that each newcomer offers up his tribute of profound admiration; those who have been and gone continue lavishing their praises in interviews, conversations and contributions to their home town papers. It is the proof of an enthusiasm far deeper than any aroused by previous festivals.

No other exposition has been the source of such literary and artistic inspiration and, in support of this, there is abundant evidence. Following a long series of reprinted tributes, The Chronicle recently reproduced a half-page encomium by Royal Cortissoz, the distinguished art critic, and written for the New York Tribune.

It may have seemed to our readers that Cortissoz then exhausted his adjectives of eulogy, but he was only beginning. He returns to the pleasant duty, and in a contribution taking up nearly a whole page, indulges in even more lavish superlatives.

Still fascinated, to use his own expression, he comes closer and closer to the details, only to find that the more minutely the exposition is examined, the more are the reasons for an admiration bordering upon worship. Space can be found for only one quotation, but it is a summary of all the excellences observed:

> But in closing I must once more enforce the supreme virtue of the fair, its amazing artistic unity. We have never seen anything like it in construction of the sort. Just for the perfect balance of its extraordinary architectural beauty it is worth coming three thousand miles to see.

After reading such whole-souled adulation, the East can only ask one question when considering a visit, and that is: Have I got the price?

But the exposition has given rise to inspiration in more than the devotees to architectural beauty. Camille Saint-Saens, the greatest of living composers, says that the spectacle has inspired him beyond the dreams born of those pictures which prompted him to compose the fantasia, 'Hail California."

The players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been stimulated by both the spectacle of the exposition and their reception at the hands of San Francisco audiences to work which has been described as the summit of their art.

◆

ng People," "Sports | James C. M. Bayliss, E. O'Grady, A. Heaney, L. L. Heath, G. J. Axen, A. Lindemann, M. | go whenever they choose. It is one | Catlin. Special music.

ton Symphony" Season

E

f his gesnothing f economy that knitever by any ose electric ands, or the crisp nod of of an inch requires. He onomy with the his eyes—aiming ect and shooting pierce; wasteful en the signal for f cymbals.

TO MUSIC.

us suppression of hich by no means us—he introduced mposers, in a way der if we had ever fore, so that now les and tears, their es, their voices and wild steppes of Russ feet of Spain, the coming of spring im Vaterland, the dimming of the Teuton gods moved them.

With a rare and beautiful loyalty to the composers, the masters who wove their visions into song, he put them forward—stepping to one side as he drew the curtain.

It was never Dr. Muck presenting Dr. Muck against a background of Brahms or Bach or Beethoven, Wagner and the rest. It was always Dr. Muck presenting Brahms or Bach or Beethoven, Wagner and the rest, each in his own person, speaking with his own voice.

He gave us Bach, and Brahms and Beethoven, Wagner and Goldmark, Cherubini, Rimsky-Korsakoff—the whole host—as they are, as they would be given, and not as Dr. Muck plus Bach, Brahms, Beethoven et al.

He let them speak for themselves direct—and no doubt makes his own choice among them.

So, for once in a way, those who care for music and wanted it in its purity had their wish.

Just as Chief Justice Miller of the United States Supreme Court, who was impatient of muddling mediocrity, said that he never really knew what was in the Lord's Prayer until he heard Edwin Booth read it, so many of those who went to the concerts never really heard Bach, Brahms, Beethoven et al., until they heard it under Dr. Muck's knitting-needle baton.

THE BEST AT ITS BEST.

It is something to have heard the best at its best.

But our gain from the Boston Symphony does not end with that.

To know the best cures us of a taste for the worst.

There was, of course, the purely intellectual stimulus—the invigorating close attention demanded; for you cannot with Dr. Muck's programmes listen merely with the ear and trim a hat or plan a menu in the back of your head. It is with him as Napoleon found it was with Cherubini's music (you see we benefit even by the programme notes of Philip Hale) impossible to carry on "dreaming of affairs of state" as a side line.

And besides this there was—what still remains with us—the inspiration that high achievement always awakens; the encouraging conviction that goals can be reached by striving; that effort is worth while.

While Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra afforded great pleasure to many thousands, gave us a rare artistic treat, there was something not so easily defined and not to be measured that we received—the something intangible that we call psychological.

For some there was in this the awakening of old hopes, for some the creating of new hopes, the girding of fainting resolves, the brightening of dimmed visions—for in the thing well done there is always the inspiration to doing.

Both music and life took on a finer, clearer meaning under the magic of Dr. Muck's slender, flashing baton, so that those who affably came as patrons remained as devotees—even those who never touched his hand to make sure that he was real and not the Spirit of Music in an extremely well-fitting dress suit; an impelling, dynamic spirit, at times Plutonian, at times seraphic.

On the whole, we can congratulate ourselves that we got the best out of the Boston Symphony season.

But the faith has proved justified, and there were the profits of two nights, Tuesday and Wednesday, to reward it. I suppose last night's house was about $7000 and the night before perhaps $5,000. There is the entrance to the Exposition to figure upon; of that total of 46,000, at least 30,000 must have been cash admissions, exclusive of season-tickets; which meant that $15,000 was left at the gates. Take $75,000 in the "house" and $15,000 at the gates, and it adds up to $90,000—which is the cash value placed by San Francisco on thirteen days of Boston Symphony.

GREAT EXPERIENCE.

Of last night's program little need be said. It eclipsed the former Wagner concert. It was one of the most wonderful of this wonderful series. It is to Dr. Muck that we owe the wonderful educational gain of the season; he arranged the programs, and gave us Bach, Haydn, Mozart, at their best; Beethoven at his highest, Brahms as we never knew Brahms before, Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz and Strauss at their most eloquent; Sibelius and Macdowell and Saint-Saens and Chabrier and Franck, and the Russians and Italians and other French composers—why, the series was a journey all around the musical globe.

So, no matter who brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra here—and this interesting question is still in dispute—the thanks of many thousands of people are massed together and held in escrow for the right party.

As announced in The Bulletin, we are to have a fine orchestra of our own next season, under improved conditions, and in all probability a very noted conductor. We shall know how to listen to our orchestra now, and how to praise it helpfully. Some day—who knows?—Boston may pay $90,000 to hear the San Francisco Symphony!

From Examiner

Address San Francisco Cal.

Date MAY 25 1915

Established 1884

BOSTONIANS GIVE RUSSIAN PROGRAMME

Music of the Czar's Land Is Interpreted Beautifully by Dr. Muck and His Players

TALE OF NOMADIC PEOPLE

Borodine's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" Is a Marvel of Beauty and Comprehension

BY REDFERN MASON.

Russian music seen through the prism of a Teutonic personality. That is what we heard last night, and our friends of the Boston Symphony were greeted by a gathering of over 4,000 people. Only two nights of this golden season remain to us, and those who wish to hear such orchestral playing as San Francisco has never heard before must seize the chance before it slips away from them.

When I say that we heard Russian music as mirrored in a Teutonic brain, I do not imply any diminution of artistic grace, but simply seek to define the more clearly the significance of what we heard. Dr. Muck is a German in the large sense of the term, a sense which carries with it the idea of broad, yet ingoing understanding of the music of non-Germanic peoples.

WAS PROFOUNDLY MOVING.

That reading of the "Pathetic" was beautiful throughout, and, in moments, as for example, the passionate climax of the first allegro, and the conclusion of the Adagio-Lamentoso, profoundly moving. But, in order to play the valse in five-four time as the Russians play it, I think Dr. Muck would have had to drink vodka in his youth and whirl a maiden through the measures, now langourous, now frenzied, of the Cossacks dance. It had German domesticity where it should have had Muscovite madness and melancholy. It was beautiful, but of a beauty which savored too much of Teutonic decorum.

The Glazounoff "Overture Solonelle," which followed, is a finely knit and brilliant score of a marked festal character. Here there is no perplexing Weltschmerz, but jubilant tone-painting, a sort of Russian analogue to certain pages which Weber has left us.

MUCH MORE RUSSIAN.

Much more characteristically Russian was Borodine's famous sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," with its well-defined programme of a caravan on the march through the wilds, its snatches of exotic song and powerful suggestions of the illimitable waste. Borodine was a master who left us all too little; but this composition is a masterpiece. Though the French writers, with Felicien David and Saint Saens at their head, have been the pioneers in the use of Oriental pigments, the Russians have outdone them in subtle realism. This work is as documentary in its way as is Burton's "Pilgrimage to Al Madinah," or the canvasses of Gerome.

Dr. Muck seemed to emancipate himself from his Teutonic leading strings and to contemplate the Asiatic wilderness and the nomadic dwellers therein with a soul artistically free. When I heard the masterly reading of the Borodine I was tempted to regret that the director had not done violence to his sense of form in the drawing up of the programme and given us the Glazounoff first, then the Borodine, taking the "Pathetic" at a time when he had been swept out of himself, so to speak, and freed from academic bonds by the magic of the works he s directing. Then, I fancy, we might have had a performance of the Tschaikowsky as truly Muscovite as was the "Steppenskizze."

RACIAL PRISM MORE COMPLEX.

Last of the works performed was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." Here the racial prism is more complex even than in the other works. Here we have the music written by a Russian on themes borrowed from Spanish dances with a German for director. Add the fact that the listeners were American, and the intricacy of the psychological problem which the performance of this art presents may be realized.

Some people say there is no such thing as national music. But who could hear those Hispanic rhythms and not recognize that they have only one possible place of origin? Here I felt the Teuton in Dr. Muck not at all. I have heard Sarasate play those dances and Gogorza sing songs tinged with the same color, and Dr. Muck's reading of the Caprice seems to form a natural and inevitable coda to those memories. How the Bostonians played them you may imagine. It was as beautiful a performance as any they have given us in the long and varied tale of their doings.

WILL BE OF PAST.

The pity of it that, a few days from now, all these splendid things will be one with the irreclaimable past. But we in San Francisco have had our draught of the world's best music making, and it will never be the same with us as it was before

To-night Sibelius the Finn, Strauss and Beethoven the Teutons, will provide the programme. The Sibelius will the First Symphony, in E minor; the Strauss, "Also sprach Zarathustra"; the Beethoven, the immortal "Leonora No. 3," the greatest overture ever written. On Wednesday we shall have an evening with Wagner, and the rest, alas! as far as the Boston Symphony is concerned, will, for us, be silence.

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 26 1915

Establishe

STRAUSS MUSIC BEAUTIFIED BY BOSTONIANS

By GRENA J. BENNETT

For fully half an hour it looked as if only half a concert would be given last evening at Festival Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sibelius' symphony No. 1 had just been presented and the musicians were tuning up for one of Strauss' most notable tone poems when the mammoth organ protested by ciphering on one of its high pitched pipes. Of course, it might not have been due to Strauss at all; it probably was only faulty mechanism. But, whatever the cause, it took a good half hour to adjust it, and the large audience good naturedly accepted the excuses and apologies offered by one of the musicians, who explained briefly the cause of the delay.

[190]

The program consisted of three [illegible] a symphony [illegible] tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Strauss, and the "Leonore," No. 3 overture by Beethoven.

"DESPOT OF DIN"

Interest centered in the Strauss number, an excellent example of modern composition by the "Despot of Din," as Strauss has aptly been called. The work is program music i strictest sense, though no on Strauss himself could "get unde skin" of it without the assistan the printed thematic program g ously distributed among the au by the management of the socie

Consistent with precedent St has augmented his orchestra for he considers a proper presentati the story of the superman which inated in the mind of the mad zsche.

To be sure there are momen delightful melodiousness, severa them in fact. And again Strauss in this work occasionally foregon taste for discord and dissonance given his hearers infinitesimal sages of glorious harmonization. was in these latter that the inc parable work of the orchestra was most thankfully heard. Not even a Dr. Muck, however, could have read some of the clanging noisy, ear-splitting phrases with pleasing effect.

The audience owed a debt of gratitude to the conductor and to the musicians for their masterly effort in a work containing such stupendous difficulties, and so few really grateful opportunities.

BEETHOVEN SOOTHES

And the audience owed a double debt of gratitude to Dr. Muck for his considerateness in giving the lovely, suave Beethoven overture immediately after the Strauss work.

There is no indication of Beethoven's dissatisfaction in his work and changeableness in his ideas in "Leonore" No. 3. Not only is this a charming example of the master's most tender and expressive musical thoughts, but it offers unlimited opportunities in interpretation. As it was heard last night, the overture was intensely dramatic, a wonderful mosaic of tonal blending, with episodes well contrasted and eloquently revealed.

The symphony given last night is the most gracious of Sibelius' four, offering only a hint of its composer's present tendencies toward ultra-modernism. Though the product of a Finnish writer, it contains much thematic material as warm and sensuous as the characteristic melodies of the Neopolitans. The second movement was particularly gracious, and the work of the musicians, especially that of the strings, was deserving of the highest praise.

With tonight's all Wagner special program the season of the Boston orchestra will terminate.

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 27

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

The greatest artistic event of the Exposition is over; last night, after thrilling an audience of 4200 people, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stepped nonchalantly aboard its special train and flitted eastward. Hereafter folks will say, "Before the Boston Symphony," and "Since the Boston Symphony."

The total attendance at the thirteen concerts was 46,037. This tells the tale in itself. When in America before have people gone to symphony concerts in the aggregate of 46,000 in thirteen nights?

Dr. Muck and his men are used to large audiences. In Boston they always "sell out." But Festival Hall is far larger than this orchestra's usual home; and if you will divide out the figure of 46,037 you will find that the average attendance for the dozen-and-one concerts was actually 3541.

CASH ELOQUENT.

It's a poor way to figure the artistic importance of an event; but even the cash returns are eloquent. W. H. Leahy announced that on Monday night the box office receipts equaled the huge guarantee of $60,000, and the expense guarantee, $5,000 additional, which had been necessary to get the Boston Symphony out here.

From Examiner

Address Cal.

Date MAY 30 1915

Established:

Music

BY REDFERN MASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY is come and gone. The result is that our ideal of what orchestral music ought to be has been greatly raised. Never again will the work which passed muster last season satisfy. A deep discontent has been sown in our hearts. Either the membership of the San Francisco Musical Association will have to be increased or the present members will have to give more. Given the necessary funds, we can multiply rehearsals and engage better men, if better men are needed. But first and foremost the question of a leader will have to be considered. A man may be a composer of rare creative gifts and yet lack the magnetism and authority which are necessary to weld instrumentalists into a satisfactory orchestral organism. That, it seems to me, is the difficulty under which we have been laboring. True, nobody can make an ideal orchestra out of men who have to eke out their subsistence by playing in cafes. But we also want a man who does not believe that Beethoven is old-fashioned. When Dr. Muck directs the "Eroica" it sounds modern; his Mozart G Minor is not only of yesterday, but of to-day also. We do not want a pedant; but we want a director of broad sympathies, not so modernistic as to despise "Papa" Haydn, not so rootedly old-fashioned as to be out of touch with the movements championed by Strauss, Debussy, Schonberg and the rest. And such men are to be found, men like Pohlig of Philadelphia, Kroeger of Cincinnati, Hertz of New York, Oberhoffer of Minneapolis. The wisest economy is to

---

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

South Main street.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has returned from its trip to the Panama-Pacific Exposition, after an absence of three weeks and a day, during which it travelled over 6500 miles, gave 13 concerts on 13 consecutive days to a total paid attendance of 46,000.

Established 1884

Commenting on the fact, the Boston Herald says: "It was the largest undertaking in the history of musical enterprise anywhere in the world, for the entire orchestra of over 100 went to San Francisco on a special train, without a stop, gave 13 different programmes and returned on the same train without stop."

Financially, the concerts, instead of showing a loss, as was expected, show a large profit. People came from Los Angeles, Phoenix, Denver, Portland, Seattle and Tacoma merely to hear the orchestra. The hospitality extended was unbounded.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck who could not accept all the invitations, they received, are in the Yosemite, whence they go to Los Angeles, San Diego, the Grand Canyon and the Yellowstone and Glacier Parks.

The orchestra came back in charge o Manager C. A. Ellis and business manag W. H. Brennan, second concert ma Sylvain Noack stopped in Salt Lake C where his marriage took place yester

The orchestra's five-week seaso "Pop" concerts opened the past under the first conductor Andre Mag but the opening night for the publi

...ng People," "Sports | James C. M. Bayliss, E. O'Grady, A. Heaney, L. L. Heath, G. J. Axen, A. Lindemann, M. | go whenever they choose. It is one | Catlin. Special music.

...ton Symphony" Season

E

...f his gesnothing ...f economy that knit...ver by any ...ose electric ...ands, or the ...crisp nod of ...of an inch ...requires. He ...onomy with the ...his eyes—aiming ...ect and shooting ...pierce; wasteful ...en the signal for ...f cymbals.

...TO MUSIC.

...us suppression of ...hich by no means ...us—he introduced ...mposers, in a way ...der if we had ever ...fore, so that now ...es and tears, their ...s, their voices and ...wild steppes of Rus...g feet of Spain, the coming of spring im Vaterland, the dimming of the Teuton gods moved them.

With a rare and beautiful loyalty to the composers, the masters who wove their visions into song, he put them forward—stepping to one side as he drew the curtain.

It was never Dr. Muck presenting Dr. Muck against a background of Brahms or Bach or Beethoven, Wagner and the rest. It was always Dr. Muck presenting Brahms or Bach or Beethoven, Wagner and the rest, each in his own person, speaking with his own voice.

He gave us Bach, and Brahms and Beethoven, Wagner and Goldmark, Cherubini, Rimsky-Korsakoff—the whole host—as they are, as they would be given, and not as Dr. Muck plus Bach, Brahms, Beethoven et al.

He let them speak for themselves direct—and no doubt makes his own choice among them.

So, for once in a way, those who care for music and wanted it in its purity had their wish.

Just as Chief Justice Miller of the United States Supreme Court, who was impatient of muddling mediocrity, said that he never really knew what was in the Lord's Prayer until he heard Edwin Booth read it, so many of those who went to the concerts never really heard Bach, Brahms, Beethoven et al., until they heard it under Dr. Muck's knitting-needle baton.

THE BEST AT ITS BEST.

It is something to have heard the best at its best.

But our gain from the Boston Symphony does not end with that.

To know the best cures us of a taste for the worst.

There was, of course, the purely intellectual stimulus—the invigorating close attention demanded; for you cannot with Dr. Muck's programmes listen merely with the ear and trim a hat or plan a menu in the back of your head. It is with him as Napoleon found it was with Cherubini's music (you see we benefit even by the programme notes of Philip Hale) impossible to carry on "dreaming of affairs of state" as a side line.

And besides this there was—what still remains with us—the inspiration that high achievement always awakens; the encouraging conviction that goals can be reached by striving; that effort is worth while.

While Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra afforded great pleasure to many thousands, gave us a rare artistic treat, there was something not so easily defined and not to be measured that we received—the something intangible that we call psychological.

For some there was in this the awakening of old hopes, for some the creating of new hopes, the girding of fainting resolves, the brightening of dimmed visions—for in the thing well done there is always the inspiration to doing.

Both music and life took on a finer, clearer meaning under the magic of Dr. Muck's slender, flashing baton, so that those who affably came as patrons remained as devotees—even those who never touched his hand to make sure that he was real and not the Spirit of Music in an extremely well-fitting dress suit; an impelling, dynamic spirit, at times Plutonian, at times seraphic.

On the whole, we can congratulate ourselves that we got the best out of the Boston Symphony season.

But the faith has proved justified, and there were the profits of two nights, Tuesday and Wednesday, to reward it. I suppose last night's house was about $7000 and the night before perhaps $5,000. There is the entrance to the Exposition to figure upon; of that total of 46,000, at least 30,000 must have been cash admissions, exclusive of season-tickets; which meant that $15,000 was left at the gates. Take $75,000 in the "house" and $15,000 at the gates, and it adds up to $90,000—which is the cash value placed by San Francisco on thirteen days of Boston Symphony.

GREAT EXPERIENCE.

Of last night's program little need be said. It eclipsed the former Wagner concert. It was one of the most wonderful of this wonderful series. It is to Dr. Muck that we owe the wonderful educational gain of the season; he arranged the programs, and gave us Bach, Haydn, Mozart, at their best; Beethoven at his highest, Brahms as we never knew Brahms before, Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz and Strauss at their most eloquent; Sibelius and Macdowell and Saint-Saens and Chabrier and Franck, and the Russians and Italians and other French composers—why, the series was a journey all around the musical globe.

e So, no matter who brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra here—and this interesting question is still in dispute—the thanks of many thousands of people are massed together and held in escrow for the right party.

As announced in The Bulletin, we are to have a fine orchestra of our own next season, under improved conditions, and in all probability a very noted conductor. We shall know how to listen to our orchestra now, and how to praise it helpfully. Some day—who knows?—Boston may pay $90,000 to hear the San Francisco Symphony!

From Examiner

Address San Francisoc. Cal.

Date MAY 25 1915

Established 1884

"BOSTONIANS" GIVE RUSSIAN PROGRAMME

Music of the Czar's Land Is Interpreted Beautifully by Dr. Muck and His Players

TALE OF NOMADIC PEOPLE

Borodine's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" Is a Marvel of Beauty and Comprehension

BY REDFERN MASON.

Russian music seen through the prism of a Teutonic personality. That is what we heard last night, and our friends of the Boston Symphony were greeted by a gathering of over 4,000 people. Only two nights of this golden season remain to us, and those who wish to hear such orchestral playing as San Francisco has never heard before must seize the chance before it slips away from them.

When I say that we heard Russian music as mirrored in a Teutonic brain, I do not imply any diminution of artistic grace, but simply seek to define the more clearly the significance of what we heard. Dr. Muck is a German in the large sense of the term, a sense which carries with it the idea of broad, yet ingoing understanding of the music of non-Germanic peoples.

WAS PROFOUNDLY MOVING.

That reading of the "Pathetic" was beautiful throughout, and, in moments, as for example, the passionate climax of the first allegro, and the conclusion of the Adagio-Lamentoso, profoundly moving. But, in order to play the valse in five-four time as the Russians play it, I think Dr. Muck would have had to drink vodka in his youth and whirl a maiden through the measures, now langourous, now frenzied, of the Cossacks dance. It had German domesticity where it should have had Muscovite madness and melancholy. It was beautiful, but of a beauty which savored too much of Teutonic decorum.

The Glazounoff "Overture Solonelle," which followed, is a finely knit and brilliant score of a marked festal character. Here there is no perplexing Weltschmerz, but jubilant tone-painting, a sort of Russian analogue to certain pages which Weber has left us.

MUCH MORE RUSSIAN.

Much more characteristically Russian was Borodine's famous sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," with its well-defined programme of a caravan on the march through the wilds, its snatches of exotic song and powerful suggestions of the illimitable waste. Borodine was a master who left us all too little; but this composition is a masterpiece. Though the French writers, with Felicien David and Saint Saens at their head, have been the pioneers in the use of Oriental pigments, the Russians have outdone them in subtle realism. This work is as documentary in its way as is Burton's "Pilgrimage to Al Madinah," or the canvasses of Gerome.

Dr. Muck seemed to emancipate himself from his Teutonic leading strings and to contemplate the Asiatic wilderness and the nomadic dwellers therein with a soul artistically free. When I heard the masterly reading of the Borodine I was tempted to regret that the director had not done violence to his sense of form in the drawing up of the programme and given us the Glazounoff first, then the Borodine, taking the "Pathetic" at a time when he had been swept out of himself, so to speak, and freed from academic bonds by the magic of the works he was directing. Then, I fancy, we might have had a performance of the Tschaikowsky as truly Muscovite as was the "Steppenskizze."

RACIAL PRISM MORE COMPLEX.

Last of the works performed was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." Here the racial prism is more complex even than in the other works. Here we have the music written by a Russian on themes borrowed from Spanish dances with a German for director. Add the fact that the listeners were American, and the intricacy of the psychological problem which the performance of this art presents may be realized.

Some people say there is no such thing as national music. But who could hear those Hispanic rhythms and not recognize that they have only one possible place of origin? Here I felt the Teuton in Dr. Muck not at all. I have heard Sarasate play those dances and Gogorza sing songs tinged with the same color, and Dr. Muck's reading of the Caprice seems to form a natural and inevitable coda to those memories. How the Bostonians played them you may imagine. It was as beautiful a performance as any they have given us in the long and varied tale of their doings.

WILL BE OF PAST.

The pity of it that, a few days from now, all these splendid things will be one with the irreclaimable past. But we in San Francisco have had our draught of the world's best music making, and it will never be the same with us as it was before

To-night Sibelius the Finn, Strauss and Beethoven the Teutons, will provide the programme. The Sibelius will the First Symphony, in E minor; the Strauss, "Also sprach Zarathustra"; the Beethoven, the immortal "Leonora No. 3," the greatest overture ever written. On Wednesday we shall have an evening with Wagner, and the rest, alas! as far as the Boston Symphony is concerned, will, for us, be silence.

From CALL

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 26 1915

Established

STRAUSS MUSIC BEAUTIFIED BY BOSTONIANS

By GRENA J. BENNETT

For fully half an hour it looked as if only half a concert would be given last evening at Festival Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sibelius' symphony No. 1 had just been presented and the musicians were tuning up for one of Strauss' most notable tone poems when the mammoth organ protested by ciphering on one of its high pitched pipes. Of course, it might not have been due to Strauss at all; it probably was only faulty mechanism. But, whatever the cause, it took a good half hour to adjust it, and the large audience good naturedly accepted the excuses and apologies offered by one of the musicians, who explained briefly the cause of the delay.

The program consisted of three numbers—a symphony by Sibelius, the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Strauss, and the "Leonore," No. 3 overture by Beethoven.

"DESPOT OF DIN"

Interest centered in the Strauss number, an excellent example of modern composition by the "Despot of Din," as Strauss has aptly been called. The work is program music in the strictest sense, though no one but Strauss himself could "get under the skin" of it without the assistance of the printed thematic program generously distributed among the auditors by the management of the society.

Consistent with precedent Strauss has augmented his orchestra for what he considers a proper presentation of the story of the superman which originated in the mind of the mad Nietzsche.

To be sure there are moments of delightful melodiousness, several of them in fact. And again Strauss has in this work occasionally foregone his taste for discord and dissonance and given his hearers infinitesimal passages of glorious harmonization. It was in these latter that the incomparable work of the orchestra was most thankfully heard. Not even a Dr. Muck, however, could have read some of the clanging noisy, ear-splitting phrases with pleasing effect.

The audience owed a debt of gratitude to the conductor and to the musicians for their masterly effort in a work containing such stupendous difficulties, and so few really grateful opportunities.

BEETHOVEN SOOTHES

And the audience owed a double debt of gratitude to Dr. Muck for his considerateness in giving the lovely, suave Beethoven overture immediately after the Strauss work.

There is no indication of Beethoven's dissatisfaction in his work and changeableness in his ideas in "Leonore" No. 3. Not only is this a charming example of the master's most tender and expressive musical thoughts, but it offers unlimited opportunities in interpretation. As it was heard last night, the overture was intensely dramatic, a wonderful mosaic of tonal blending, with episodes well contrasted and eloquently revealed.

The symphony given last night is the most gracious of Sibelius' four, offering only a hint of its composer's present tendencies toward ultra-modernism. Though the product of a Finnish writer, it contains much thematic material as warm and sensuous as the characteristic melodies of the Neopolitans. The second movement was particularly gracious, and the work of the musicians, especially that of the strings, was deserving of the highest praise.

With tonight's all Wagner special program the season of the Boston orchestra will terminate.

GIRL CATCHES THIEF

[190]

From BULLETIN

Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 27

By ERNEST J. HOPKINS.

The greatest artistic event of the Exposition is over; last night, after thrilling an audience of 4200 people, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stepped nonchalantly aboard its special train and flitted eastward. Hereafter folks will say, "Before the Boston Symphony," and "Since the Boston Symphony."

The total attendance at the thirteen concerts was 46,037. This tells the tale in itself. When in America before have people gone to symphony concerts in the aggregate of 46,000 in thirteen nights?

Dr. Muck and his men are used to large audiences. In Boston they always "sell out." But Festival Hall is far larger than this orchestra's usual home; and if you will divide out the figure of 46,037 you will find that the average attendance for the dozen-and-one concerts was actually 3541.

CASH ELOQUENT.

It's a poor way to figure the artistic importance of an event; but even the cash returns are eloquent. W. H. Leahy announced that on Monday night the box office receipts equaled the huge guarantee of $60,000, and the expense guarantee, $5,000 additional, which had been necessary to get the Boston Symphony out here.

Examiner

Cal.

MAY 30 1915

Music

BY REDFERN MASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY is come and gone. The result is that our ideal of what orchestral music ought to be has been greatly raised. Never again will the work which passed muster last season satisfy. A deep discontent has been sown in our hearts. Either the membership of the San Francisco Musical Association will have to be increased or the present members will have to give more. Given the necessary funds, we can multiply rehearsals and engage better men, if better men are needed. But first and foremost the question of a leader will have to be considered. A man may be a composer of rare creative gifts and yet lack the magnetism and authority which are necessary to weld instrumentalists into a satisfactory orchestral organism. That, it seems to me, is the difficulty under which we have been laboring. True, nobody can make an ideal orchestra out of men who have to eke out their subsistence by playing in cafes. But we also want a man who does not believe that Beethoven is old-fashioned. When Dr. Muck directs the "Eroica" it sounds modern; his Mozart G Minor is not only of yesterday, but of to-day also. We do not want a pedant; but we want a director of broad sympathies, not so modernistic as to despise "Papa" Haydn, not so rootedly old-fashioned as to be out of touch with the movements championed by Strauss, Debussy, Schonberg and the rest. And such men are to be found, men like Pohlig of Philadelphia, Kroeger of Cincinnati, Hertz of New York, Oberhoffer of Minneapolis. The wisest economy is to engage the best man we can get.

Providence, R. I.

1884

...on South Main street.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has returned from its trip to the Panama-Pacific Exposition, after an absence of three weeks and a day, during which it travelled over 6500 miles, gave 13 concerts on 13 consecutive days to a total paid attendance of 46,000.

Commenting on the fact, the Boston Herald says: "It was the largest undertaking in the history of musical enterprise anywhere in the world, for the entire orchestra of over 100 went to San Francisco on a special train, without a stop, gave 13 different programmes and returned on the same train without stop."

Financially, the concerts, instead of showing a loss, as was expected, show a large profit. People came from Los Angeles, Phoenix, Denver, Portland, Seattle and Tacoma merely to hear the orchestra. The hospitality extended was unbounded.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck who could not accept all the invitations, they received, are in the Yosemite, whence they go to Los Angeles, San Diego, the Grand Canyon and the Yellowstone and Glacier Parks.

The orchestra came back in charge of Manager C. A. Ellis and business manag... W. H. Brennan, second concert mas... Sylvain Noack stopped in Salt Lake C... where his marriage took place yester...

The orchestra's five-week seaso... "Pop" concerts opened the past... under the first conductor Andre Mag... but the opening night for the publi...

BOSTON GLOBE— JUNE 9, 1915

GIFTS OF $655,000 TO TECH MADE PUBLIC

Announced by Pres Maclaurin to the Alumni at Concert.

Two '88 Men Also Promise to Erect Building As a Residence for President.

Gifts to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology totaling $655,000 were announced last evening by Pres Maclaurin at the Tech Pop concert in Symphony Hall. This announcement was the sensation of the evening, and was vociferously applauded by the great gathering of Tech men and their friends, who were met for the concluding exercises of senior week.

Gifts of $250,000 and $100,000, respectively, were announced from two men who emulate the original "Mr Smith" in their anonymity. These sums are to be used as a fund for the erection of dormitories at the new Tech.

Then followed the announcement that $305,000 had been given the institute to build the mining building—$75,000 each by Col Charles Hayden, '90, of Boston, and Pierre S. Du Pont, '90, of Wilmington, Del, and $155,000 by Gen T. Coleman Du Pont, '83, also of Delaware.

Finally Pres Maclaurin anounced that Charles A. Stone, '88, and Edwin S. Webster, '88, had presented a residence for the president, to be erected on the Cambridge site.

The class of 1915 entered the hall escorted by the class of 1890, their predecessors by 25 years, acting as the sponsors for this year's class. When they were seated a special little pageant play which led up to the initiation of the class of 1915 into the alumni association was enacted. There was presented on the stage the "Presidential Range" in which the presidents of Tech from Rogers to Maclaurin were portrayed.

The following was the cast: Pres Rogers, G. E. Whitwell; Pres Runkle, W. S. Thomas; Pres Walker, J. A. Tobey; Pres Crafts, E. J. Casselman; Pres Pritchet, C. L. Hall; Pres Noyes, O. F. Freeman; Pres Maclaurin, C. W. Howlett; Little Bobby Richards, Prof R. H. Richards; Miss Co-ed, Miss Mary Plummer; Tech Cadet, L. E. Best; Boisterous Student, G. B. Hilton; Baby Alumni Association, R. M. Rennie; Association of Today, I. W. Litchfield; Mysterious Mr Smith, Person Unknown; Fair Harvard, E. S. Coldwell.

The hall was decorated with class banners and Tech colors, and streamers and confetti were thrown from the balcony by the guests of the alumni. There was special music for the occasion interspersed with Tech songs in which all joined.

RECORD NUMBER OF DEGREES

Miss Plummer Only Woman Among 326 Graduates—Massachusetts With 102 Leads States.

Dr Richard C. Maclaurin, president of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, presented degrees yesterday afternoon in Huntington Hall to 326 students, including two doctors of philosophy, one doctor of engineering, 30 masters of science and 293 bachelors of science. This is the record total number of graduates and the number of masters particularly high.

There are 24 graduates from foreign countries, 41 from the West, 60 from New York and the South, and the rest are from New England, Massachusetts leading with 162. Thirty-four States are represented and the foreign contingent includes 12 Chinese, one Hindu, one Syrian, and one each from Russia, Turkey, Brazil, Paraguay, Hawaii and the Philippines. Canada furnishes four.

Of the Massachusetts men taking degrees 44 are from Boston.

The platform was occupied by the faculty. Each student was applauded as he went forward to receive his diploma and the applause was particularly loud for Miss Mary E. Plummer of Newton, the only woman in the class. Miss Plummer took the regular course in chemistry and had for a thesis "The Adaptability of Calcium Acid Lactate as a Baking Powder Material."

Thesis were read by Alfred Clark, Herman E. Morse, Robert A. Schmucker, Philip L. Small, Robert W. Mitchell, Leo B. Miller, AB; Edward Wallker, AB; Peter Masucci, Robert E. Haylett, BS; Evers Burtner and Richard O. Bailey.

CLASS OF '90 DINES.

Present Scarfpin to Secretary as Mark of Appreciation for 25 Years' Work—Three Other Banquets.

Four classes of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology before going to the Pop concert last night dined at the Boston City Club—'90, '95, '98 and '05.

The class of '90, the 25-year class, had 22 members at dinner and G. D. Mansfield, '74, was a guest. G. L. Gilmore, the secretary, presided. Mr Gilmore received a scarfpin as a gift from his classmates in token of their appreciation of his 25 years' work as secretary of the class.

Among those at the dinner were D. de Lancey of Waterbury, Conn; H. W. Spaulding, J. O. DeWolf, H. B. Burley, A. F. Brown, C. W. Sherman, H. M. Goodwin, J. L. Bachellor, W. Z. Ripley, A. Loring, F. W. Atwood, G. E. Borden, W. H. Root, W. Ellis, E. T. Simpson, L. C. Wason, K. C. Richmond, J. F. Baker, F. M. White, C. J. Morse.

The class of '96 had 16 at dinner. W. H. Winkley, the secretary, presided in the absence of the president, E. H. Clapp.

The class of '98 dinner was attended by 14, Arthur Blanchard presiding.

The class of '05, which had spent the day at the Point Shirley Yacht Club, had 40 to dinner.

M. I T. CLASS REUNIONS

Informal Dinners Enjoyed at Various Boston Hotels.

Ten members of the M. I. T. class of '94 dined informally last evening at the Copley Square Hotel. Prof Samuel Prescot presided. There were no speeches.

Plans were made at a dinner of the class of '01 at the Copley Square Hotel, attended by 17, for the quindecennial next year. Ex-Pres Player spoke.

Officers elected were: M. J. Monohan of Watertown, president; Frederick C. Boyd of Lynn, vice president; William Pepperell of Holyoke, chairman of the executive committee.

Sixteen graduates in the class of '07 dined informally at the Hotel Westminster.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

JUNE 9,

$500,000 GIVEN TO TECHNOLOGY BY GRADUATES

Announcement Is Made by President Maclaurin at Pop Concert.

It was Tech night at the Pops last evening, and announcements were made of gifts of nearly half a million dollars to the institution.

Everything was given over to the Tech students. Their music was the music sung and played; their cheers were the only cheers heard in the building and their colors—the famous gray and crimson—were the only colors used in the attractive scheme of decoration.

The real sensation of the night was when President Maclaurin made the announcement of the gifts to the Institute amounting to about half a million dollars. Two anonymous benefactors tendered to the institute gifts of $150,000 and $100,000 respectively. The sums are to be used as a starter for the dormitories, and are the entering wedge toward a happy solution of a question which has been constantly discussed at any meeting of Tech students the world over. In addition there is a gift of $100,000 from T. C. Dupont of Wilmington, Del.

Then it was announced that the funds with which to construct the mining building, some $225,000, had been offered by Charles Hayden, '90, of Boston; T. Coleman DuPont, '83, and S. Pierre DuPont of Wilmington, Del., past and present presidents of the DuPont DeNemours Powder Company. It was T. Coleman DuPont, who a few years ago by his gift of half a million, made the purchase of the new Tech site in Cambridge possible. Charles A. Stone, '88, and Edwin S. Webster, '88, although both members of the same business firm, made a gift individually and not as a firm of a residence for the president.

These gifts have practically solved the dormitory question which for years has been the greatest source of worry among the authorities of the institute.

The buildings can now be built as a component part of the original scheme and will be completed when Tech sessions open in September.

JUNE 9, 1915

DAILY ADVERTISER,

$655,000 IN GIFTS TO M. I. T.

"Tech" Night at Pops Made Memorable by Announcements of Pres. Maclaurin

NEW HOME FOR THE PRESIDENT DONATED

Enthusiastic Scenes in Symphony Hall Make Fitting Climax to Graduation Exercises

The main feature of the M. I. T. Pop night last evening was contributed by Pres. Maclaurin when he announced gifts to the Institute amounting to $655,000 and a new residence for the president. The announcement was made from the conductor's platform shortly after the initiation of the graduating class into the alumni association.

No longer can the mysterious Mr. Smith enjoy the praise of Tech men alone, for he was joined by two other anonymous donors who gave gifts of $100,000 and $250,000 respectively. Col. Charles Hayden '90 of Boston made a gift of $75,000 and Pierre S. du Pont '90, present president of the du Pont de Nemours Powder Co., contributed gift of $75,000 and Pierre S. duPont '90, present president of the duPont mours Powder Co., tendered a gift of $155,000.

The last gift to be announced was declared by Pres. Maclaurin to be the most appreciated of all by himself, for it was a tribute by the alumni to Mrs. Maclaurin for the constant interest which she has taken in the so-for them. The gift of the residence of the president comes from two Boston men of the class of 1888, Charles A. Stone and Edwin S. Webster, who made the gift as individuals and not as a firm. Messrs. Stone and Webster plan to erect the president's home on the corner of the M. I. T. grounds east of Ames st., and the dormitories.

The anonymous gifts as well as a part of the gift of Coleman duPont will be used to start the construction of new dormitories and thus opens a solution of the problem of what was to be done with the students on removal to the new site in Cambridge. The other building provided for in these new gifts is the mining building. Such a structure formed a part of the original plans, but on account of financial stringencies it had been decided to improve the basement of the Rogers Building for the mining courses.

The announcement of the gifts aroused the greatest enthusiasm of the evening, but things had been moving along very rapidly even before financial matters appeared on the scene. It was alumni night, including the most recent and largest accession which has ever been made to the alumni, the initiation of the senior class. The first student and a member of the oldest class, Prof. R. H. Richards, was there. So was Miss Mary Elsa Plummer, in a black hat and a green dress, the only girl graduate of this year's class.

For decorations the platform held a picture of the old Rogers Building and a scene sketch of the New Technology. There were Tech banners and class numerals. There were the indescribable and variagated senior "goose hats," the "tall lids" of '05 and bright hued streamers to greet the class of 1890, the sponsors of the seniors to the allumni association.

The royal attraction of the evening was a special pageant play which led up to the initiation of the class of 1915 into M. I. T. Alumni Association. There was disclosed the "Presidential Range," the presidents, however, were those of M. I. T., and each of them in turn told a tale or some moral illustrating the history of Tech from 1865 to 1915. The presidents were portrayed by members of the senior class, opening with G. B. Whitewell as Pres. Rogers, quoting from Rogers' diary, "Opened school this morning, 15 students entered. May this prove a memorable day," and closing with a $500,000 gift of the alumni to Pres. Maclaurin, who was impersonated by C. W. Howlett in Highland kilts. There was also enacted the refusal of Tech to be absorbed by Harvard, and the ultimate union of "Fair Harvard" and "Mr. Tech." It might also be added that the Symphony Orchestra was present and rendered a programme at intermissions.

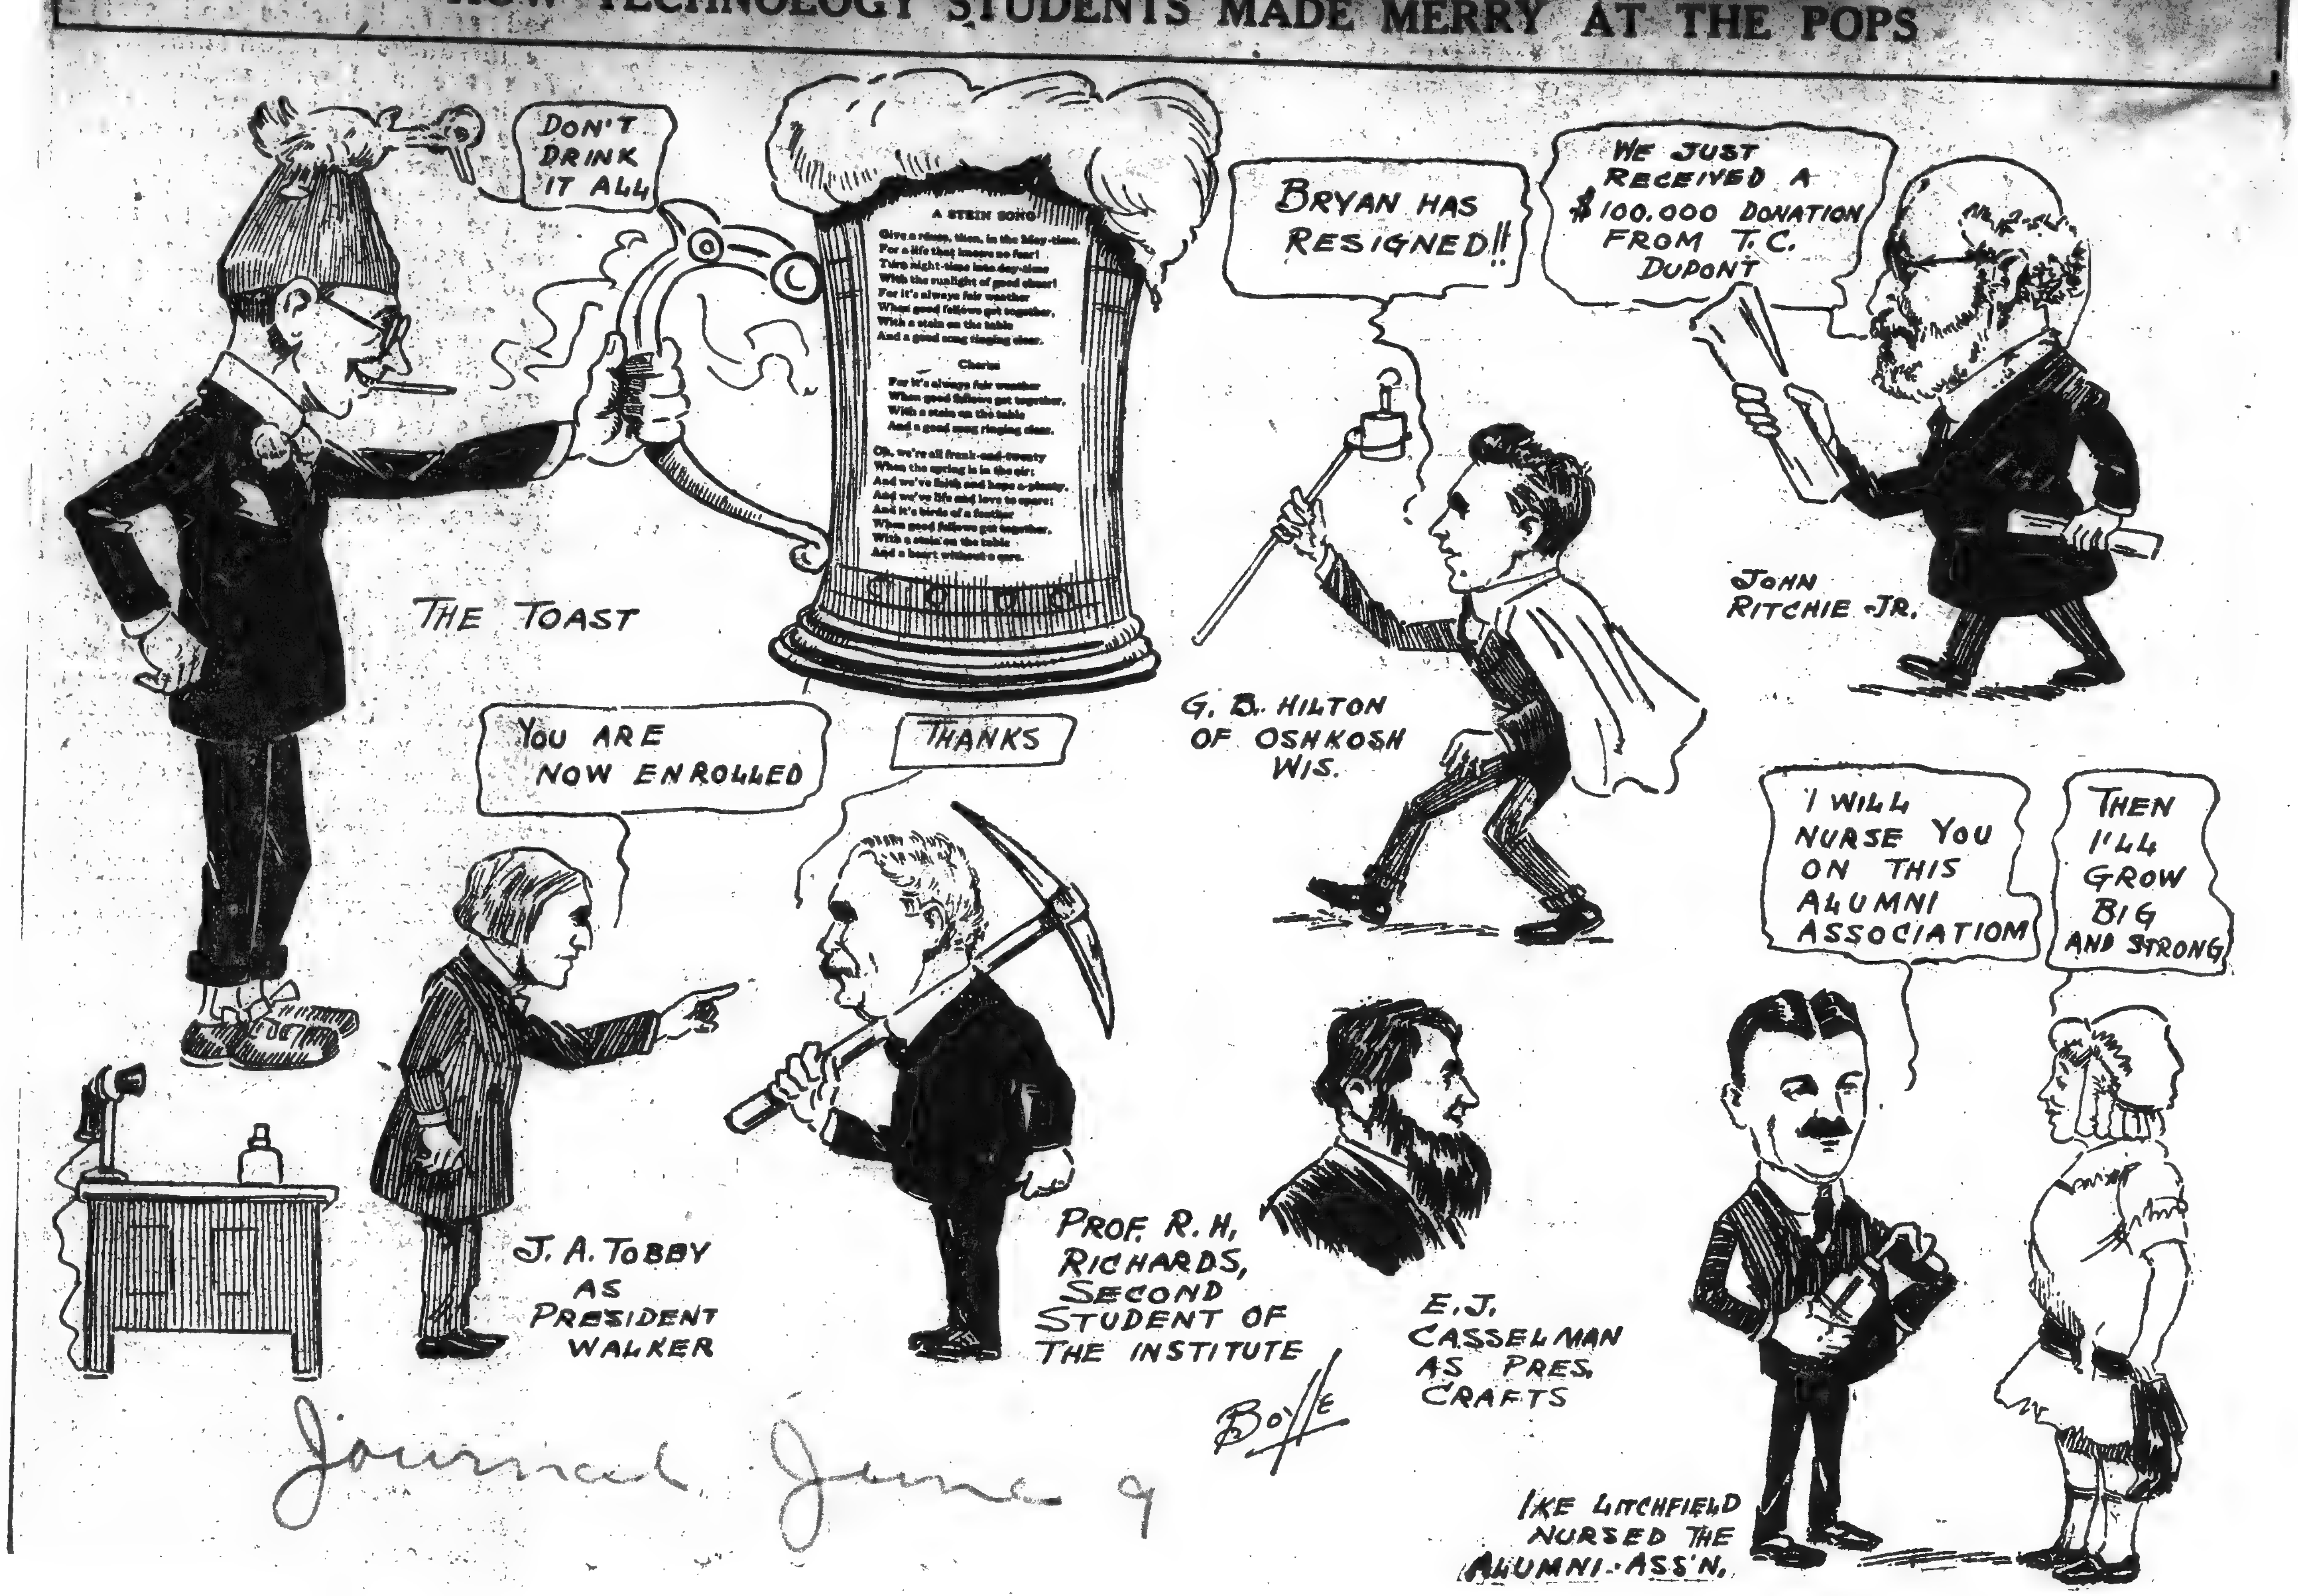
Graduations exercises were held in Huntington Hall in the afternoon. The diplomas were distributed by Pres. Maclaurin.

Of the young men receiving degrees, two are doctors of philosophy; one of doctor of engineering; 30 of master of science, and 293 of bachelor of science. In every particular this is the highest record yet, the figures for 1914, itself a record year, being 24 masters and 286 bachelors.

Of the graduates 24 are from foreign countries, 41 from the West, 60 from New York and the South, and the rest from New England, with Massachusetts in the lead with 162. Thirty-four States are represented and the foreign contingent includes 12 Chinese, one Hindu and a Syrian, and one each from Russia, Turkey, Brazil, and Paraguay. Canada furnishes four of the students and Hawaii and the Philippines one each. Of the Massachusetts men taking degrees 44 are from Boston.

One woman, Mary Elsa Plummer of Newton, graduated with the class, having taken the regular courses in chemistry. Her thesis was on "The Adaptability of Calcium Acid Lactate as a Baking Powder Material."

HOW TECHNOLOGY STUDENTS MADE MERRY AT THE POPS



DON'T DRINK IT ALL
A STEIN SONG
Give a rouse, then, in the May-time,
For a life that knows no fear!
Turn night-time into day-time
With the sunlight of good cheer!
For it's always fair weather
When good fellows get together,
With a stein on the table
And a good song ringing clear.
Chorus
For it's always fair weather
When good fellows get together,
With a stein on the table
And a good song ringing clear.
Oh, we're all frank-and-twenty
When the spring is in the air;
And we've faith and hope a-plenty,
And we've life and love to spare;
And it's birds of a feather
When good fellows get together,
With a stein on the table
And a heart without a care.
THE TOAST
BRYAN HAS RESIGNED!!
WE JUST RECEIVED A $100.000 DONATION FROM T.C. DUPONT
G. B. HILTON OF OSHKOSH WIS.
JOHN RITCHIE JR.
YOU ARE NOW ENROLLED
THANKS
J. A. TOBBY AS PRESIDENT WALKER
PROF. R. H. RICHARDS, SECOND STUDENT OF THE INSTITUTE
E.J. CASSELMAN AS PRES. CRAFTS
I WILL NURSE YOU ON THIS ALUMNI ASSOCIATIOM
THEN I'LL GROW BIG AND STRONG IKE LITCHFIELD NURSED THE ALUMNI-ASS'N.
Boyle

Journal June 9

SAN FRANCISCO EXAMINER—

—SUNDAY, MAY 30, 1915.

KARL MUCK DISCLOSES WAR FRAUD

Boston Symphony Leader Lays Trap Which Captures Bogus Collector for German Cause

Many Prominent San Franciscans on List of Contributors; Dr. Muck Himself Gives Up $300

F. M. Gresham Alias H. H. Meyers Is Caught by Detective Kracke After Hard Fight in Street

Frank M. Gresham, alias H. H. Meyers, representing himself as a soliciting agent for "The Fatherland," a German publication of New York, was arrested last night after he had wrestled and rolled with Detective Fred Kracke for a block down the hill along California street from the Fairmont Hotel to Powell street.

He is charged with obtaining money from Germans in San Francisco under false pretenses.

Meyers had just left the Fairmont after engaging in a lengthy conversation in the lobby with Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he was tackled by Detective Kracke.

MANY NAMES SECURED.

After he was booked at police headquarters a list was found on him containing the names of many prominent persons in San Francisco who had agreed to subscribe to the Teuton cause.

Amounts were affixed after some of the names, and blank spaces were left after others.

These were among the entries in the list:

Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra	$300
E. L. Hueter	300
C. E. Grunsky, civil engineer	300
Fred Hagemann	300
Robert Cappell, agent North German Lloyd Steamship Co.	**---
Dr. Max Magnus	**---
Dr. M. Krotoszynerl	**---
George B. Brockman	150
N. Ihlandt, banker	150
Max Schmidt	75
California Brick Co	50
Chris Schulz	50
C. J. Bovereaux	**---
William Bauer	**---
Dr. Hugo Liber	**---
Buffalo Brewing Company	**---
H. W. Lockbaum & Company	**---
T. J. Rehstote, Sacramento	**---

A day or two ago Dr. Muck came to the conclusion that Meyers was not all he represented himself to be, and he got in communication with the police.

$50 ADDITIONAL SOUGHT.

Last night Meyers called, by appointment, at the Fairmont to have another talk with Dr. Muck. Detective Kracke was seated unobserved in a chair a short distance from Dr. Muck while he talked with Meyers. The solicitor mentioned to Dr. Muck that for an extra $50, in addition to the $300 already subscribed, the doctor might have an especially prominent portrait of himself published in "The Fatherland."

Meyers turned around after making this statement and noticed that Detective Kracke was listening to the conversation. He then decided to leave the hotel. Detective Kracke followed after him, and engaged Meyers in conversation at the corner of Mason and California streets. Then they clinched in a struggle, which was not ended until they had rolled down the steep hill and Special Policeman Lodge of the Fairmont went to Kracke's assistance.

MEYERS SECURES $300.

Dr. Muck told the police that upon the strength of the representations made to him by Meyers he had given the solicitor $100. He had given him another $200 last Friday, when Meyers showed him a telegram from the people purporting to be connected with "The Fatherland" in New York, thanking him for his generosity.

Dr. Muck then came to the conclusion that Meyers was an imposter, and he got into communication with James Stuart, 525 Market street, San Francisco, agent of "The Fatherland." The agent confirmed his impression about the character of Meyers, and Dr. Muck had a conference with the police and arranged for the arrest of the man.

Meyers represented to Dr. Muck that he has been living at the Palace Hotel since his arrival here. The police learned that he has been actually living at the Berg Hotel in Mason street, and searched his room after his arrest. They said he worked in conjunction with another man since coming to San Francisco, and that all the credentials, telegrams and other papers he has exhibited in collecting subscriptions are spurious.

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date MAY 27 1915

Estal 384

BOSTON MUSICIANS IN FINAL CONCERT

Dr. Muck Presents Wagner's Music to Large Audience.

By ANNA CORA WINCHELL.

San Francisco paid splendid tribute to Dr. Muck and his Boston musicians last night, their final appearance in Festival Hall beckoning a "capacity house." Two special reasons might be given for this, aside from the fact that the Boston Symphony is a drawing card at any time.

Many grasped it last night as the last opportunity to hear an organization which is world famous and second to none, and the programme was Wagnerian. The hold of this composer on all classes of hearts and minds is something that defies analysis, for a Wagner house seldom fails to be filled and the attendance is of the kind best described as cosmopolitan.

WAGNER LOGICAL OFFERING.

In the extension of the symphonic season Wagner was the logical offering, and even though his works were generously presented but a week ago they took nothing from the enthusiasm of last night. The selections were especially attractive to the students of Wagner, while his admirers on any ground found much to engage their ears and ponder over, and in giving the "Good Friday Spell" Dr. Muck made a concession as he has previously refused to play other than the "Prelude" to "Parsifal."

From the rendition of the latter, one gained some of the most potent passages of the music drama and experienced the spiritual depth of the storp emphasized by Wagner's inspired pen. This music was presented immediately following the intermission, opportuntely and effectively, the listeners by that time having mellowed to the mood of religious receptivenes through the influence of the preceding numbers, which, opening with "A Faust Overture," included "A Siegfried Idyl," besides selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods."

The overture revealed, through exquisite manipulations of the orchestra, all the purpose Wagner had in mind when he wrote to portray a "soul aweary of life, yet forced to engage anew in life's endeavors." In the "Idyl" were distinctly traces of the joy felt by the master of Weimar in his possession of a son, while the last number of this first group again contained much of the solemn motif.

"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" has a share of comedy which was made apt and contagious by those skilled strings and their several aids. It seemed, however, that "Tannhauser" brought not only the keenest satisfaction of the night, but that it found more actual response in the players themselves. In some respects it was far more interesting as a musical revelation than any other number on the programme.

NEW INTERPRETATION.

Everyone knows "Tannhauser" through its quality of tunefulness; few know it as it is written. Nine out of ten conductors give it color and speed, especially the latter. In the customary interpretation it would be easy to believe that "Tannhauser" was a march towards some gay and even frivolous event. On the other hand, being a march of pilgrims, Dr. Muck plays it so and gives many wonderful insights into the real beauty and dignity of the theme which has for its basis the religious heart.

The restricted tempo was solemn but glorious in its perfection of interpretation, and surely it will spoil many in the future for the gala type of reading.

The thirteen concerts have also proved that San Francisco once more declares for the best things. The cooperation of music-lovers has been complete and the result emphasizes that only the best is acceptable.

PATIENT ATTEMPTS SUICIDE.

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date.......... MAY

DR. MUCK GIV AN OVATION AS CONCERTS END

By GRENA J. BENNETT

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is over. The twelve promised events were insufficient to supply the appetite of local music lovers and the unpopularity of number thirteen vanished when an extra concert was given last night.

The success of the season was remarkable. Nearly 48,000 persons visited Festival Hall, making capacity audiences at each of the concerts.

Last night's attendance was a representative one. The all-Wagner program proved a lure that few admirers of the creator of musical realism could resist. Musicians and conductor were in perfect accord and the audience's reception of their efforts must have been uncommonly gratifying.

OVATION FOR DR. MUCK

When the last note of the closing number had become wisps of echoes the audience burst into an applause that grew in volume until it became a mighty round of cheers. Dr. Muck, usually so self-controlled and restrained, appeared to be really affected by such a show of appreciation; he shook hands with the concert master; received a lovely laurel wreath from which hung the Exposition colors; and after repeated bows retired from the stage.

History was made by the visit just ended; because of a mutual love of good music a firm link has undoubtedly been established between the metropolis of the Pacific Coast and the metropolis of New England.

DESERVED ALL ITS PRAISE

And surely the treatment accorded the Boston orchestra's efforts was deserved. In the interpretations heard last night, for instance, one noticed, among the laudable qualities, a sincerity of purpose and a devotion to high ideals. There was no attempt at individual exploitation, nor was there an effort to shatter familiar ideals.

If Dr. Muck entertained personal and peculiar views of how Wagner should be read he refrained from presenting them except in modified form.

It might be that there was a slight variant in the matter of accentuation in the excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung"; the sensitive listener may also have heard unusually poetic tone gradations and color contrasts in the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," or, one familiar with the compositions of Wagner's early period perhaps noticed exceptional deliberation of tempo in the overture to "Tannhauser."

EVERY MEMBER ARTISTIC

But none could conscientiously consider these in any but a favorable light, for each selection was given with true artistic spirit; with an understanding of underlying mysticism (when that quality was appropriate); with fine dramatic vigor, and with a well developed taste for light and shade.

And again the experiment of an entire program by one composer, an experiment which has frequently proved monotonous, was one of varied delights. As it was presented the list was composed of "A Faust Overture," "A Siegfried Idyl," selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods" (arranged by Richter), extract from "Parsifal," selections from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Tannhauser," each a singularly significant composition and each interpreted with comforting beauty and under-

---

From CHRONICLE
Address: San Francisco, Cal.
Date JUN 1 1915
Established: ..., 1884

Dr. Karl Muck Likes Our Manners and Musical Taste

And Has Highest Praise for Artistic Aspect of the Exposition

By HELEN DARE.

IT NOW develops—in the cordial exchange of amenities between San Francisco and the Boston Symphony Orchestra—that that famous organization, and particularly its unrivaled conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, were as well pleased with San Francisco as a musical center, San Franciscans as an audience and the exposition as an artistic achievement as was San Francisco with Dr. Muck and his marvelous hundred.

Perhaps it would be better—out of consideration for those who are fussy about mathematical accuracy—to say ALMOST as well pleased; for, making due allowance for the relative difference, it is quite clear that the preponderance of delight was with the greater number, and therefore San Francisco's was the greater pleasure, of course.

However——

Dr. Muck—whose habit tends rather toward repression than effervescence, and who thinks, Mm-m! I should say about eleven times before he speaks once; and then sometimes, doesn't speak, but gives you a tingling once-over with those flashing eyes—registered some flattering impressions of us and our doings while he was here; and, before leaving for the Yosemite, spoke enthusiastic words of praise, both of San Franciscans as an audience to play to, and of the exposition as a work of art.

AUDIENCES REMARKABLE.

He seems to have observed us pretty closely, even though circumstances and the nature of his occupation kept his back turned to us most of the time; for he said of his immense audiences in Festival Hall that in number and in attentiveness they were remarkable.

Remarkable from this point of view, he explained:

That here we are—population and visitors—in the throes of restless sight-seeing which the diverting (not to say distracting) variety of interests and diversity of attractions naturally occasion; and that, yet, those great audiences assembled, in increasing numbers, in Festival Hall for the thirteen closely-crowded-together concerts and listened with rapt attention to programmes which, even under usual and reposeful conditions, make an exacting demand on listeners.

Of course, Dr. Muck was denied that really wonderful sight of the "packed house," with that vast leveled expanse of heads (as even of surface as though a lawn roller had been over them) meeting the rising tiers of the galleries that were pressed full to the walls, and fringed in turn by the S. R. O's, who formed, as it were, the inclosing hedge. He couldn't see the tensity of attention, nor, perhaps, hear the sibillant Sh!-Shushing of the faintest rustle of a programme, creaking of a step or breath too stertorously drawn.

APPRECIATION MANIFESTED.

But he managed to "get it" just the same; and getting it he was not nearly as impatient as the audience itself of such slight but annoying contretemps as the seating—say, between movements of a symphony—of the rustling, chattering late-comers.

The very impatience of the audience at such interruption couldn't help being for him an added proof of interest in the music.

And so, in making his farewells, he paid his respects to our musical taste and our good manners.

He said that only in a community where there was real love of music and a cultivated taste for it could such audiences—in size and intelligent appreciation—be assembled; and that only a people who love and appreciate and know music could have listened with such beautiful manners.

This compliment, from such a source, surely ought to permanently and securely establish San Francisco's reputation as a musical center—and make us feel pleased with ourselves.

However, it but supports and confirms the expressed opinions of other competent authorities who have come our way; for it still remains (as a bonne bouche) in the memories of the loyal who look to a San Francisco that shall be an art center, that Theodore Thomas said there was no dearth of the musically-talented here, and that it was one of the easiest places in the world to gather a chorus on short notice.

In spite of the arduousness of the symphony season, Dr. Muck found time and opportunity to "do" the exposition: exteriorally at least.

FELT ARTISTIC APPEAL.

So completely the artist himself, he felt poignantly the artistic appeal it makes as a whole, by night and by day, and he said of it:

"In architecture and arrangement, in its extraordinarily beautiful and natural setting between hills and bay and sky, in decoration and garniture, in color and lighting it is admirable; and I never have seen anything of the kind in Europe or this country to equal it in beauty. The lighting effects, particularly, are marvelous; marking the birth of a new art.

"Now that I have seen it I feel that it would have been an irreparable loss to have missed it."

It's rather nice to be appreciated by one who won such unstinted meed of our appreciation, isn't it?

From CALL
Address: San Francisco, Cal.

Date MAY 2 7 1915

k, 1884

DR. MUCK GIVEN AN OVATION AS CONCERTS END

By GRENA J. BENNETT

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is over. The twelve promised events were insufficient to supply the appetite of local music lovers and the unpopularity of number thirteen vanished when an extra concert was given last night.

The success of the season was remarkable. Nearly 48,000 persons visited Festival Hall, making capacity audiences at each of the concerts.

Last night's attendance was a representative one. The all-Wagner program proved a lure that few admirers of the creator of musical realism could resist. Musicians and conductor were in perfect accord and the audience's reception of their efforts must have been uncommonly gratifying.

OVATION FOR DR. MUCK

When the last note of the closing number had become wisps of echoes the audience burst into an applause that grew in volume until it became a mighty round of cheers. Dr. Muck, usually so self-controlled and restrained, appeared to be really affected by such a show of appreciation; he shook hands with the concert master; received a lovely laurel wreath from which hung the Exposition colors; and after repeated bows retired from the stage.

History was made by the visit just ended; because of a mutual love of good music a firm link has undoubtedly been established between the metropolis of the Pacific Coast and the metropolis of New England.

DESERVED ALL ITS PRAISE

And surely the treatment accorded the Boston orchestra's efforts was deserved. In the interpretations heard last night, for instance, one noticed, among the laudable qualities, a sincerity of purpose and a devotion to high ideals. There was no attempt at individual exploitation, nor was there an effort to shatter familiar ideals.

If Dr. Muck entertained personal and peculiar views of how Wagner should be read he refrained from presenting them except in modified form.

It might be that there was a slight variant in the matter of accentuation in the excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung"; the sensitive listener may also have heard unusually poetic tone gradations and color contrasts in the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," or, one familiar with the compositions of Wagner's early period perhaps noticed exceptional deliberation of tempo in the overture to "Tannhauser."

EVERY MEMBER ARTISTIC

But none could conscientiously consider these in any but a favorable light, for each selection was given with true artistic spirit; with an understanding of underlying mysticism (when that quality was appropriate); with fine dramatic vigor, and with a well developed taste for light and shade.

And again the experiment of an entire program by one composer, an experiment which has frequently proved monotonous, was one of varied delights. As it was presented the list was composed of "A Faust Overture," "A Siegfried Idyl," selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods" (arranged by Richter), extract from "Parsifal," selections from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Tannhauser," each a singularly significant composition and each interpreted with comforting beauty and under-

---

ICLE
Francisco, Cal.

JUN 1 1915

r. Karl Muck Likes Our Manners and Musical Taste

And Has Highest Praise for Artistic Aspect of the Exposition

By HELEN DARE.

IT NOW develops—in the cordial exchange of amenities between San Francisco and the Boston Symphony Orchestra—that that famous organization, and particularly its unrivaled conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, were as well pleased with San Francisco as a musical center, San Franciscans as an audience and the exposition as an artistic achievement as was San Francisco with Dr. Muck and his marvelous hundred.

Perhaps it would be better—out of consideration for those who are fussy about mathematical accuracy—to say ALMOST as well pleased; for, making due allowance for the relative difference, it is quite clear that the preponderance of delight was with the greater number, and therefore San Francisco's was the greater pleasure, of course.

However——

Dr. Muck—whose habit tends rather toward repression than effervescence, and who thinks, Mm-m! I should say about eleven times before he speaks once; and then sometimes, doesn't speak, but gives you a tingling once-over with those flashing eyes—registered some flattering impressions of us and our doings while he was here: and, before leaving for the Yosemite, spoke enthusiastic words of praise, both of San Franciscans as an audience to play to, and of the exposition as a work of art.

AUDIENCES REMARKABLE.

He seems to have observed us pretty closely, even though circumstances and the nature of his occupation kept his back turned to us most of the time; for he said of his immense audiences in Festival Hall that in number and in attentiveness they were remarkable.

Remarkable from this point of view, he explained:

That here we are—population and visitors—in the throes of restless sight-seeing which the diverting (not to say distracting) variety of interests and diversity of attractions naturally occasion; and that, yet, those great audiences assembled, in increasing numbers, in Festival Hall for the thirteen closely-crowded-together concerts and listened with rapt attention to programmes which, even under usual and reposeful conditions, make an exacting demand on listeners.

Of course, Dr. Muck was denied that really wonderful sight of the "packed house," with that vast leveled expanse of heads (as even of surface as though a lawn roller had been over them) meeting the rising tiers of the galleries that were pressed full to the walls, and fringed in turn by the S. R. O's, who formed, as it were, the inclosing hedge. He couldn't see the tensity of attention, nor, perhaps, hear the sibilant Sh!-Shushing of the faintest rustle of a programme, creaking of a step or breath too stertorously drawn.

APPRECIATION MANIFESTED.

But he managed to "get it" just the same; and getting it he was not nearly as impatient as the audience itself of such slight but annoying contretemps as the seating—say, between movements of a symphony—of the rustling, chattering late-comers.

The very impatience of the audience at such interruption couldn't help being for him an added proof of interest in the music.

And so, in making his farewells, he paid his respects to our musical taste and our good manners.

He said that only in a community where there was real love of music and a cultivated taste for it could such audiences—in size and intelligent appreciation—be assembled; and that only a people who love and appreciate and know music could have listened with such beautiful manners.

This compliment, from such a source, surely ought to permanently and securely establish San Francisco's reputation as a musical center—and make us feel pleased with ourselves.

However, it but supports and confirms the expressed opinions of other competent authorities who have come our way; for it still remains (as a bonne bouche) in the memories of the loyal who look to a San Francisco that shall be an art center, that Theodore Thomas said there was no dearth of the musically-talented here, and that it was one of the easiest places in the world to gather a chorus on short notice.

In spite of the arduousness of the symphony season, Dr. Muck found time and opportunity to "do" the exposition: exteriorally at least.

FELT ARTISTIC APPEAL.

So completely the artist himself, he felt poignantly the artistic appeal it makes as a whole, by night and by day, and he said of it:

"In architecture and arrangement, in its extraordinarily beautiful and natural setting between hills and bay and sky, in decoration and garniture, in color and lighting it is admirable; and I never have seen anything of the kind in Europe or this country to equal it in beauty. The lighting effects, particularly, are marvelous; marking the birth of a new art.

"Now that I have seen it I feel that it would have been an irreparable loss to have missed it."

It's rather nice to be appreciated by one who won such unstinted meed of our appreciation, isn't it?

KEEP PROMISE.

[193]

DETROIT SATURDAY NIGHT

June 19

MUSIC and the DRAMA

EDITED BY
N. J. and
A. B. Corey

"Who Done It"

THE sensational topic of the month has been the trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to San Francisco for thirteen concerts during as many days, and the enormous success attending the enterprise. One of the San Francisco papers says that history was made which will cause the people to say for years—"Before the Boston Symphony," and "Since the Boston Symphony." With a total attendance at the thirteen concerts of 46,037, the receipts were $90,000, a figure which astonished citizens, as it was confidently expected by business men that several thousand dollars of the $60,000 guarantee fund would have to be used. C. A. Ellis, the manager, has published a large collection of the San Francisco newspaper comments which affords much interesting, as well as some amusing, reading. The success of the season was so great that universal comment centered in determining who was responsible for the orchestra coming to the coast city. An amusing treatment of the subject from the San Francisco Bulletin is well worth reading, as it is in reality such an admirable epitome of human nature in all successful ventures:

"Who brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to San Francisco?

"Everybody is asking, in order to find out whom to thank. There is a feeling that somebody deserves thanks. And a whole list of modest candidates are standing forward and saying, 'I done it;' and nominations are still open.

"In a speech the other day, Director of Music George W. Stewart is reported as saying: 'In bringing the Boston Symphony here, I believe my record speaks for itself.'

"'Doc' W. H. Leahy, the San Francisco impresario who is handling the local details of the engagement, declared: 'I put up the money—$60,000 guarantee and $5,000 for expenses.' So, of course, 'Doc' brought the orchestra here.

"A morning newspaper states unqualifiedly that Exposition Director J. B. Levison is the man to thank.

"A certain business man avers we must thank the Fleishhackers, bankers, who are said to have stood behind the $60,000 guarantee.

"Thornwell Mullally, chairman of special events, the other evening kicked his way through a closed dor in order to break into the concert, and replied to protests by indicating that he was the man responsible for the orchestra's presence.

"C. A. Ellis, of Boston, manager of the orchestra, believes he has some claims, since he made the proposal originally to Stewart.

"Then something might even be said for the humble music-lovers who are paying to hear the concerts at the rate of some 3,000 admissions per night.

"Let's thank every one we meet and be on the safe side."

DETROIT SATURDAY NIGHT votes for Ellis, the manager.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 34

BSO Pops

1915 - 1916

C. A. Ellis
C. A. Ellis

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Season 1915–1916

HILL, SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS AND BLANK BOOK
MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET,
[illegible]
BOSTON.
Job No. 911
Duplicate this book by sending the above number.

SUNDAY HERALD

AUGUST 29, 1915.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The administrative offices at Symphony Hall are already at work preparing for the 35th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will open in Boston Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, and Saturday evening, Oct. 16.

The auction sales of seats come at the end of September, the dates being Monday, Sept. 27; Tuesday, Sept. 28; Thursday, Sept 30, and Friday, Oct. 1. The rehearsal seats will be held on Monday and Tuesday, and concert seats Thursday and Friday, as the custom has always been in past years.

A year ago, on account of the war, the orchestra was compelled to abandon a trip through the middle west. This year, conditions are such that the trip will be made in the first week of October, although there have been some changes in the cities to be visited. The scheme of the trip calls for concerts in Toledo, Ohio; Milwaukee; Peoria, Ill.; Omaha; St. Joseph, Mo.; St. Louis and Chicago. The first concert will be given Monday evening, Oct. 4, and the last concert in Chicago, Sunday afternoon, Oct. 10.

The orchestra has been called together for its first rehearsal, Monday evening, Sept. 27, and will work through that entire week preparing for its western trip, and incidentally, for the first Boston program.

Dr. Muck is not yet prepared to make definite announcements as to his plans fo the season. One thing, however, is certain. The great success of last year were the performances of Liszt's Faust Symphony. This year he purposes giving Liszt's Dante Symphony with a woman's chorus.

As already announced, among those who will appear as soloists with the orchestra are Madame Melba, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler. Other soloists of distinction will be announced in due time.

Boston American

AUGUST 29,

MUSIC NOTES

At the request of Otto Kahn and Mr. Gatti-Casazza of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, Charles A. Ellis of this city has consented to undertake a season of opera at the Boston Opera House to be given by the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York next Winter.

The season will be for three weeks, and under the contract, the Metropolitan Opera Company is bound to bring to Boston its entire personnel of artists, conductors, artists and its entire stage equipment for the operas to be performed. What these operas are will naturally be decided later on, as matters have not yet progressed that far.

The fact that Mr. Ellis has assumed the responsibility of this season of grand opera in Boston will be welcome news to the large opera-loving public of this city. Mr. Ellis, in his years as manager of the Symphony Orchestra, and as manager of great artists, has demonstrated how thoroughly he may be depended upon to keep faith with the public, and make good his promises.

The personnel of the company will be headed by Miss Farrar and Caruso, while Toscanini will be the conductor.

SUNDAY GLOBE

AUGUST 29,

Outline of Plans For Symphony Season.

The 35th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open in Boston Friday afternoon, Oct 15, and Saturday evening, Oct 16. The auction sales of seats will be held Monday, Sept 27; Tuesday, Sept 28; Thursday, Sept 30, and Friday, Oct 1. The rehearsal seats will be sold Monday and Tuesday, and concert seats Thursday and Friday, as the custom has been in past years.

No such doubt about the continuance of the orchestra assails its friends and patrons in Boston as it did a year ago. Then nearly one-third of the members, including Dr Muck, were in Europe, and the sudden outbreak of the war made it a serious question whether they would be able to return and the orchestra continue its work. This year no members of the orchestra left the country.

A year ago, on account of the war, the orchestra was compelled to abandon a trip through the Middle West which had been mapped out for it. This year, conditions are such that the trip will be made in the first week of October, although there have been some changes in the cities to be visited. The scheme of the trip calls for concerts in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St Joseph, St Louis and Chicago. The first concert will be given Monday evening, Oct 4, and the last concert in Chicago, Sunday afternoon, Oct 10.

The orchestra has been called together for its first rehearsal, Monday evening, Sept 27, and will work through that entire week preparing for its Western trip, and incidentally, for the first Boston program.

Dr Muck is not yet prepared to make definite announcements as to his plans for the season. One thing, however, is certain. On account of the great success last year of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," this year he purposes giving Liszt's "Dante Symphony," with a woman's chorus.

Among those who will appear as soloists with the orchestra are Mme Melba, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mr Paderewski and Mr Kreisler.

SUNDAY POST,

AUGUST 29,

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The administrative offices at Symphony Hall are already full of work, preparing for the 35th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open in Boston Friday afternoon, Oct. 15 and Saturday evening, Oct. 16.

The auction sales of seats come at the end of September, the dates being Monday, Sept. 27; Tuesday, Sept. 28; Thursday, Sept. 30, and Friday, Oct. 1. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday and concert seats Thursday and Friday, as the custom has always been in past years.

No such doubt about the continuance of the orchestra assails its friends and patrons in Boston as it did a year ago. Then nearly one-third of the members of the orchestra, including Dr. Muck, were in Europe, and a sudden outbreak of the war made it a serious question whether they would be able to return and the orchestra continue its work. This year no members of the orchestra left the country.

Dr. Muck did not return from San Francisco with the orchestra last May, but spent his time, up to Aug. 1, exploring the West. With Mrs. Muck he visited Southern California, the Grand Canyon, Yellowstone and Glacier Parks and returned to Boston three weeks ago. He is now on the north shore, where he will be until the end of next month.

A year ago, on account of the war, the orchestra was compelled to abandon a very interesting trip through the Middle West which had been mapped out for it. This year conditions are such that the trip will be made in the first week of October, although there have been some changes in the cities to be visited. The scheme of the trip calls for concerts in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis and Chicago. The first concert will be given Monday evening, Oct. 4, and the last concert in Chicago, Sunday afternoon, Oct. 10.

The orchestra has been called together for its first rehearsal Monday evening, Sept. 27, and will work through that entire week, preparing for its Western trip and, incidentally, for the first Boston programme.

Dr. Muck is not yet prepared to make definite announcements as to his plans for the season. On thing, however, is certain. The great success of last year was the performances of Liszt's Faust Symphony. This year he purposes giving Liszt's Dante Symphony with a woman's chorus.

As already announced, among those who will appear as soloists with the orchestra are Madame Melba, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler. Other soloists of distinction will be announced in due time.

TRANSCRIPT,

AUGUST 28,

The Symphony Season

Preparations are afoot at Symphony Hall for the thirty-fifth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, and Saturday evening, Oct. 16. The auction sales of seats will be held on Monday, Sept. 27; Tuesday, Sept. 28; Thursday, Sept. 30, and Friday, Oct. 1. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and concert seats Thursday and Friday, as in past years.

Dr. Muck did not return from San Francisco with the orchestra last May, but spent his time, up to the first of August, exploring the West. With Mrs. Muck he visited Southern California, the Grand Canyon, Yellowstone and Glacier Parks, and returned to Boston three weeks ago. He is now on the North Shore, where he will be until the end of next month. A year ago, on account of the war, the orchestra was compelled to abandon a trip through the Middle West. This year the trip will be made the first week of October, although there have been some changes in the cities to be visited. The itineray calls for concerts in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis and Chicago.

Dr. Muck has not yet completed his plans for the season, but it is certain that he will give Liszt's Dante Symphony with a woman's chorus. Among those who will appear as soloists are Madame Melba, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 15,

NEWS OF MUSIC

INNOVATIONS IN THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

"Public Rehearsals" Renamed at Last, and No More Auctions of Tickets After the Current Season—The Wisdom of the Change—Plans for the Worcester Festival—Considering Mr. Toscanini's Return—Autumn Opera

THOSE that closely scanned the announcement of the Symphony Concerts for the impending season, printed in the newspapers of last Saturday, remarked a sensible change in the wording. For thirty years it had been the absurd custom to designate the concerts of Friday afternoons as "public rehearsals." Now, at last, they stood in the advertisements for what they really are and have long been—"afternoon concerts." [illegible] seats for the follow[illegible]

It is doubtful whether they ever were "rehearsals" in exact application of the word; and certainly they have not been such in any appreciable sense since the first years of Mr. Gericke's first term with the orchestra in the distant eighties. For the whole present generation of the Symphony Concerts—conductor, band, "assisting artists" and audiences—the concert of Friday afternoon has been no less a concert than that of the following Saturday evening and as worthy of their mutual pains. In fact, the public, though for reasons not always related to musical achievement and pleasure, has preferred the afternoon to the evening series. To call the concerts of Friday "public rehearsals" was mere tradition in silly variance with actual fact. Years since the new conditions invited the new name.

All this was relatively trifling—if any matter is trifling that has to do with so minutely organized an undertaking as the Symphony Concerts—but now on the heels of one happy break with outworn custom comes another of more moment. By announcement made this morning, the seats for the Symphony Concerts will be sold at auction for the last times when they are so distributed a fortnight hence. Beginning with the concerts of 1916-1917, the holders of places may retain them from season to season by a mere renewal of their subscriptions in the spring or the autumn. These subscriptions will be made at fixed prices—presumably to be announced next spring—and seats not so retained will be similarly sold at the box-office. That is to say, seats bought at the approaching auctions may be held indefinitely by the occupants under an easy annual routine, while in the future newcomers to the concerts will seek the box-office and not the auditorium, made for four summer days an auction-room. The management of the orchestra so sells the seats for the concerts in New York and in the other cities to which the band pays regular visits. Every orchestra in the United States and in Europe, too, so arranges the distribution of places.

If there were ever conditions in Boston to justify the ancient procedure, they have long since passed. Perhaps, years ago, the auctions stimulated interest in the concerts, reassembled the smaller and mutually acquainted public of the eighties and the early nineties and increased the revenues of the orchestra. Gradually, however, Symphony Hall on three or four days of each September became a kind of ticket-brokers' exchange where these agents filled the orders placed with them and made their own purchases. Now and then, a duel between two of them for seats that their respective clients especially desired enlivened dull routine and provided a paragraph for the newspapers. Once and again, "outsiders" bid for seats that they wished—timid amateurs hovering on the outskirts of the professional ranks. The public of the concerts murmured over the cost and other incidental conditions of this annual procedure and the unfortunate under it bewailed the occasional loss of places they had long occupied and cherished. The management, in turn, found it more and more burdensome and these many years nobody but the ticket-brokers has had a good word for the auctions. Only custom, inertia and the time and pains necessary to the arrangement of a schedule of fixed prices have maintained them. At last the end is at hand and the seats for the Symphony Concerts will be sold like the seats for any similar series the world over. But, how the public of Symphony Hall will buzz with comment when those same fixed prices are announced next spring! Meanwhile, in the midst of these breaks with outworn routine, the modest hope once more rekindles that the Symphony Concerts in the evening may sooner or later begin at the normal hour of 8.15 and not at the eight of the ways of a Boston long since vanished.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 15,

SYMPHONY PLANS TO ABANDON SEAT SALE BY AUCTION

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will not sell tickets for its concerts and public rehearsals at auction after this season, according to an announcement made yesterday by C. A. Ellis, manager of the organization. Beginning next fall, it is planned to sell seats at fixed prices, by subscription. Persons desiring to retain the same seats from year to year may do so by informing the management at the end of each season.

The adoption of the new plan means that the auction this year may determine the holding of a seat for years to come. The purchaser of a seat at the auctions that begin Sept. 27 will have an option on the same sitting for the following season, and may renew it indefinitely. Under this plan seats may become almost a family possession, as at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. The fixed rate subscription has been adopted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concerts in New York, Washington, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Providence and Baltimore.

Manager Ellis describes the new plan as an attempt to "get rid of cumbersome and inconvenient methods that suit nobody." He described the auctions as the outgrowth of peculiar conditions that existed in Boston 30 years ago, but says they have served their purpose and are now outworn. "They have lost the distinction that they had in the early days," he asserts. "The vast majority of the patrons used to attend the auctions personally and bid on their seats. The sales were amusing, and had a social value. All that is changed. Patrons commission brokers to bid on their seats and the sales are almost in the hands of a dozen or less agents."

Under the new plan the importance of agents will decrease. Patrons will be permitted to take up their options on their seats before a given date, send their check, and that will end the transaction. Seat holders will no longer have the just complaint that they are paying $20 more or less than someone sitting next to them, in a seat as well situated in every way.

EVENING RECORD,

SEPTEMBER 15,

Last Auction Of Tickets at the Symphony

Fixed Price Method of Selling Seats to Be Started Next Year

Boston patrons of the Symphony Orchestra will be agreeably surprised to learn that the old system of selling of tickets by auction is to be done away with and that for next year, the season of 1916-17, a radical change in the method of disposing of season tickets for the public rehearsals and the concerts will be adopted. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, announced yesterday that he had practically decided to substitute for that method a subscription at fixed prices varying according to location, both for the Friday afternoon rehearsals and the Saturday evening concerts.

This plan would carry with it the privilege to subscribers of retaining the same seats from year to year and, naturally, will mean that purchasers of tickets at this year's auction sales which begin Sept. 27, will have an option for 1916-1917 on the seats then secured.

"We have been trying for several years," said Mr. Ellis yesterday, "to work out a plan by which we could get rid of the cumbersome and inconvenient auction sales which suit nobody, and we think we should be able to put the new method into force a year from this fall. The auction sales are an outgrowth of peculiar conditions that existed in Boston 30 years ago. They served their purpose, but now they are outworn and troublesome to everybody and altogether unsatisfactory. No other orchestra in the country sells its season tickets by auction, and we do not do so in any other city but Boston.

"Under the new plan, if we put it through, as we probably shall," said Mr. Ellis, "patrons have only to announce their intention of renewing their subscription before a given date, send their check, and that is all there is to it. Patrons will no longer have the just complaint that they are paying $20 to $50 more for their seats than their neighbors, which is now not at all uncommon. They will not be uneasy, wondering whether they will be able to retain the seats they like.

"Moreover, in the early days the auction sales had a distinction which they have lost. The vast majority of patrons used to attend the auctions personally and bid on their seats. The sales were not only amusing, but had a certain social value. Now that is all changed. The average man of business and the average woman interested in the Orchestra has not the time necessary to come to Symphony Hall and wait, sometimes for hours, for the seats they desire to be put up for sale. The result is that the majority of the patrons commission brokers to bid in their seats, and the sales are almost in the hands of a dozen or less agents."

BOSTON AMERICAN

SEPTEMBER 15,

SYMPHONY WILL ABANDON AUCTIONS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will not sell tickets for its concerts and public rehearsals at auction after this season, according to an announcement by C. A. Ellis, manager of the organization.

Beginning next Fall, it is planned to sell seats at fixed prices by subscription. Persons desiring to retain the same seats from year to year may do so by informing the management at the end of each season.

The adoption of the new plan means that the auction this year may determine the holding of a seat for years to come.

BOSTON GLOBE-

SEPTEMBER 15.

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALES PASSING

This Year Last of the Cumbersome Plan.

Seats Will Hereafter Be Sold at a Fixed Schedule of Prices.

It will come as a surprise to the Boston patrons of the Symphony Orchestra that the management is contemplating for next year, the season of 1916-1917, a radical change in the method of disposing of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, announced yesterday that he had practically decided to abandon after this year the selling of tickets by auction, and to substitue a subscription at fixed prices varying according to the location, both for the Friday afternoon rehearsals and the Saturday evening concerts.

This plan would permit subscribers to retain the same tickets from year to year and, naturally, will mean that purchasers of tickets at this year's auction sales which begin Sept 27, will have on option for 1916-1917 on the seats then secured.

"We have been trying for several years," said Mr Ellis, "to work out a plan to get rid of the cumbersome and inconvenient auction sales which suit nobody. The auction sales are an outgrowth of peculiar conditions that existed in Boston 30 years ago. No other orchestra in the country sells its season tickets by auction, and we do not do so in any other city but Boston.

"Our subscriptions in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Providence are at a fixed price. Subscribers retain their seats from season to season as long as they wish, merely by filling in a card of renewal. In New York, for example, where we give two series of five concerts, every seat in Carnegie Hall is sold for both series and not more than 100 seats out of 2600 in each series change hands from season to season. The Metropolitan Opera House handles its huge subscription in the same fashion and seats there become almost a family possession, patrons renewing their subscription for the same seats year after year.

"Here, on the contrary, with auction sales our patrons never know from year to year whether they can get their favorite seats or how much they will have to pay for them. The explanation of some of the abnormally high prices brought about by auctions for a pair of seats is usually that one person wants the seats occupied by another the season previous and bids them up, the other defending them.

"Under the new plan, if we put it through, as we probably shall, patrons will no longer have the just complaint that they are paying $20 to $50 more for their seats than their neighbors, which is now not at all uncommon.

"Moreover, in the early days the auction sales had a distinction which they have lost. The vast majority of patrons used to attend the auctions personally and bid on their seats. The sales were not only amusing, but had a certain social value. Now that is all changed. The result is that the majority of the patrons have commission brokers to bid in their seats and the sales are almost in the hands of a dozen or less agents.

"In working out a plan for a fixed price subscription, we have decided that the fairest way will be to allow the holders of seats for the coming season of 1915-1916, bought at the auction sales at the end of this month, the privilege of taking these seats for the following year. In other words, purchasers of seats for the coming season will have an option on them for as many years as they wish to attend the symphony concers.

"The details of the plan have not yet been fully worked out to our satisfaction. Unexpected obstructions may prevent our putting the plan through, but it is fairly certain that we shall have no more auction sales after this year.

"To secure the benefit of this plan, names and addresses of purchasers of seats will be recorded at the time of the auction sales in Symphony Hall."

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1915.

SYMPHONY WILL DROP AUCTIONS

After This Year Seats Will Be Sold at Fixed Prices by Subscription.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will not sell tickets for its concerts and public rehearsals at auction after this season, according to an announcement made yesterday by C. A. Ellis, manager of the organization. Beginning next fall, it is planned to sell seats at fixed prices, by subscription. Persons desiring to retain the same seats from year to year may do so by informing the management at the end of each season.

The adoption of the new plan means that the auction this year may determine the holding of a seat for years to come. The purchaser of a seat at the auctions that begin Sept. 27 will have an option on the same sitting for the following season, and may renew it indefinitely. Under this plan seats may become almost a family possession, as at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. The fixed rate subscription has been adopted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concerts in New York, Washington, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Providence and Baltimore.

Manager Ellis describes the new plan as an attempt to "get rid of cumbersome and inconvenient methods that suit nobody." He described the auctions as the outgrowth of peculiar conditions that existed in Boston 30 years ago, but says they have served their purpose and are now outworn. "They have lost the distinction that they had in the early days," he asserts. "The vast majority of the patrons used to attend the auctions personally and bid on their seats. The sales were amusing, and had a social value. All that is changed. Patrons commission brokers to bid on their seats and the sales are almost in the hands of a dozen or less agents."

Under the new plan the importance of agents will decrease. Patrons will be permitted to take up their options on their seats before a given date, send their check, and that will end the transaction. Seat holders will no longer have the just complaint that they are paying $20 more or less than someone sitting next to them, in a seat as well situated in every way.

SEPTEMBER 15,

ADVERTISER,

OLD SYSTEM OF AUCTIONING SYMPHONY TICKETS TO END

Method of Subscriptions at Fixed Prices to Be Provided for Patrons Which Promises to Give More Satisfaction to Patrons of Entertainments

Boston patrons of the Symphony Orchestra will be agreeably surprised to learn that the old system of selling of tickets by auction is to be done away with and that for next year, the season of 1916-1917, a radical change in the method of disposing of season tickets for the public rehearsals and the concerts will be adopted. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, announced yesterday that he had practically decided to substitute for that method a subscription at fixed prices varying according to location, both for the Friday afternoon rehearsals and the Saturday evening concerts.

This plan would carry with it the privilege to subscribers of retaining the same seats from year to year and, naturally, will mean that purchasers of tickets at this year's auction sales which begin Sept. 27, will have an option for 1916-1917 on the seats then secured.

"We have been trying for several years," said Mr. Ellis yesterday, "to work out a plan by which we could get rid of the cumbersome and inconvenient auction sales which suit nobody, and we think we should be able to put the new method into force a year from this fall. The auction sales are an outgrowth of peculiar conditions that existed in Boston 30 years ago. They served their purpose, but now they are outworn and troublesome to everybody and altogether unsatisfactory. No other orchestra in the country sells its season tickets by auction, and we do not do so in any other city but Boston.

"Our subscriptions in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Providence are at a fixed price. Subscribers retain their seats from season to season as long as they wish, merely by filling in a card and notifying us of their intention to renew for a coming year. In New York, for example, where we give two series of five concerts, each and every seat in Carnegie Hall is sold for both series and not more than 100 seats out of 2600 in each series change hands from season to season. The Metropolitan Opera House handles its huge subscription in the same fashion and seats there become almost a family possession, the same patrons renewing their subscription for the same seats year after year. Here, on the contrary, with auction tions for a pair of seats is usually that one person wants the seats occupied by another the season previous and bids them up, the other defending them.

"Under the new plan, if we put it through, as we probably shall," said Mr. Ellis, "patrons have only to announce their intention of renewing their subscription before a given date, send their check, and that is all there is to it. Patrons will no longer have the just complaint that they are paying $20 to $50 more for their seats than their neighbors, which is now not at all uncommon. They will not be uneasy, wondering whether they will be able to retain the seats they like.

"Moreover, in the early days the auction sales had a distinction which they have lost. The vast majority of patrons used to attend the auctions personally and bid on their seats. The sales were not only amusing, but had a certain social value. Now that is all changed. The average man of business and the average woman interested in the Orchestra has not the time necessary to come to Symphony Hall and wait, sometimes for hours, for the seats they desire to be put up for sale. The result is that the majority of the patrons commission brokers to bid in their seats, and the sales are almost in the hands of a dozen or less agents.

"In working out a plan for a fixed price subscription," said Mr. Ellis, "we have tried to devise the most satisfactory way in which to allot the seats. We have decided that the fairest way will be to allow the holders of seats for the coming season of 1915-16, bought at the auction sales at the end of this month, the privilege of taking these seats for the following year. In other words, purchasers of seats for the coming season will have an option on them for as many years as they wish to attend the Symphony concerts."

BOSTON JOURNAL-

SEPTEMBER 15,

SYMPHONY SALES WILL BE CHANGED

Subscription Planned in Place of Auction After This Year.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday that he had practically decided to abandon, after this year, the selling of tickets by auction, and to substitute for that method a subscription at fixed prices varying according to location, both for the Friday afternoon rehearsals and the Saturday evening concerts.

This plan would carry with it the privilege to subscribers of retaining the same seats from year to year and, naturally, will mean that purchasers of tickets at this year's auction sales, which begin Sept. 27, will have an option for 1916-1917 on the seats then secured.

"We have been trying for several years," said Mr. Ellis yesterday, "to work out a plan by which we could get rid of the cumbersome and inconvenient auction sales which suit nobody, and we think we should be able to put the new method into force a year from this fall. No other orchestra in the country sells its season tickets by auction, and we do not do so in any other city but Boston."

"Our subscriptions in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Providence are at a fixed price. Subscribers retain their seats from season to season as long as they wish, merely by filling in a card and notifying us of their intention to renew for a coming year. Here, on the contrary, our patrons never know from year to year whether they can get their favorite seats or how much they will have to pay for them.

"Under the new plan, if we put it through, as we probably shall," said Mr. Ellis, "patrons will have only to announce their intention of renewing their subscription before a given date, send their check, and that is all there is to it. Patrons will no longer have the just complaint that they are paying $20 to $50 more for their seats than their neighbors, which is now not at all uncommon. They will not be uneasy, wondering whether they will be able to retain the seats they like.

"We have decided that the fairest way will be to allow the holders of seats for the coming season of 1915-1916, bought at the auction sales at the end of this month, the privilege of taking these seats for the following year. In other words, purchasers of seats for the coming season will have an option on them for as many years as they wish to attend the Symphony concerts. To secure the benefit of this plan of names and addresses of purchasers of seats will be recorded at the time of the auction sale in Symphony Hall.

BOSTON POST,

SEPTEMBER 15,

TO ABANDON AUCTION AT SYMPHONY

Subscriptions at Fixed Prices After This Year

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday announced that he had practically decided to abandon after this year the selling of tickets by auction, and to substitute for that method a subscription at fixed prices varying according to location, both for the Friday afternoon rehearsals and the Saturday evening concerts.

This plan will carry with it the privilege to subscribers of retaining the same seats from year to year and, naturally, will mean that purchasers of tickets at this year's auction sales, which begin on Sept. 17, will have an option for 1916-1917 on the seats then secured.

AUCTION TOO CUMBERSOME

Though unexpected obstructions may prevent putting the plan through to execution, it is said to be fairly certain that there will be no more auction sales after this year.

"We have been trying for several years," said Mr. Ellis yesterday, "to work out a plan by which we could get rid of the cumbersome and inconvenient auction sales which suit nobody, and we think we should be able to put the new method into force a year from this fall. The auction sales are an out-growth of peculiar conditions that existed in Boston 30 years ago. They served their purpose but now they are outworn and troublesome to everybody and altogether unsatisfactory. No other orchestra in the country sells its season tickets by auction, and we do not do so in any other city but Boston.

Fixed Price Elsewhere

"Our subscriptions in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Providence are at a fixed price. Subscribers retain their seats from season to season as long as they wish merely by filling in a card and notifying us of their intention to renew for a coming year. In New York, for example, where we give two series of five concerts each, and every seat in Carnegie Hall is sold for both series, and not more than 100 seats out of 2600 in each series change hands from season to season.

"The Metropolitan Opera House handles its huge subscription in the same fashion and seats there become almost a family possession, the same patrons renewing their subscription for the same seats year after year. Here, on the contrary, with auction sales our patrons never know from year to year whether they can get their favorite seats or how much they will have to pay for them. The explanation of some of the abnormally high prices brought about by auctions for a pair of seats is usually that one person wants the seats occupied by another the season [illegible] the other

[3]

"Under the new plan, if we put it through, as we probably shall," said Mr. Ellis, "patrons have only to announce their intention of renewing their subscription before a given date, send their check, and that is all there is to it. Patrons will no longer have the just complaint that they are paying $20 to $50 more for their seats than their neighbors, which is now not at all uncommon. They will not be uneasy, wondering whether they will be able to retain the seats they like.

"The details of the plan have not yet been fully worked out to our satisfaction. Unexpected obstructions may prevent our putting the plan through, but it is fairly certain that we shall have no more auction sales after this year.

"To secure the benefit of this plan names and addresses of purchasers of seats will be recorded at the time of the auction sales in Symphony Hall."

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 18,

MANY ARTISTS FOR SYMPHONY

LEADING PIANISTS AND VIOLINISTS IN NUMBER

Melba, Farrar, Ruth Deyo With the Singers; Kreisler, Witek, Entering the Big

Soloists or no soloists at the Symphony is a question that has long been a subject of popular debate wherever real Bostonians gather. Many musical loving persons say—and believe—that there is no place for a soloist at a Symphony concert.

Others frankly say that although this holds theoretically, there should be a little leeway for popular taste. They argue that the soloist gives huge pleasure to the average auditor and should be a concert fixture.

All agree on one point—if there are any soloists at all they should be superlatively fine. Such soloists are announced for the Symphony Orchestra this winter. Occasionally in the past there have appeared on the stage of Symphony Hall artists that were not of "Symphony rank." That cannot be this year, for the soloists are all the leaders in their respective branches of musical art.

Take the women who will appear for instance. First there is the peerless Melba. Singers come, and singers go, but Nellie Melba sings like a nightingale year in, year out, and the crowds throng to hear her.

A younger but almost equally popular singer—here at least—is Miss Farrar, who is doing more concert than opera work this winter. Another interesting woman, although not so widely known as Melba and Farrar, is Miss Ruth Deyo, whose coming pleases the lovers of fine pianism.

An idol of the general public, who will play with the orchestra, is Fritz Kreisler, hero of battlefield and concert stage.

A supreme artist, a man of great personal charm, withal a man of most refreshingly modest demeanor, Mr. Kreisler undoubtedly has today the largest following of any violinist. The other two violinists will be two artists from the orchestra, Anton Witek, the concert-master, and Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master. The 'cellists will be Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the principal 'cellists of the orchestra.

The list of pianists is headed by the name of Paderewski. This greatest of artists has been in America since early spring, but not for the purpose of playing, for all his time and energy has been devoted to the work he is undertaking to further the cause of the Polish Victims' Relief Funds. However, he will begin a limited concert tour in November, and it goes without saying that he is to appear with the orchestra here. The other pianists are Moriz Rosenthal, that most brilliant Austrian who has not been heard here for nine years; Harold Bauer, who, like Kreisler, has become almost an annual visitor with the Symphony Orchestra; and Ernest Schelling, composer as well as pianist.

The first rehearsal will be Oct. 15, and the first concert on the following evening. Thence on, with the exception of six weeks when the orchestra is away on tour, the concerts will be given weekly until Saturday evening, May 6. The Fridays and Saturdays the orchestra is away are Nov. 5 and 6; Dec. 3 and 4; Jan. 7 and 8; Jan. 28 and 29; Feb. 18 and 19, and March 17 and 18. The orchestra will give a total of 120 concerts, seven of which will be made early in October when beginning Oct. 4, concerts will be given on consecutive days in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis, and Chicago.

In the last week of January, the annual western trip which includes such cities as Buffalo, Cleveland, and Detroit will be given. Eight concerts will be given in Cambridge, and the usual series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Providence, Hartford, and Worcester. The other concerts will

---

MONITOR, BOSTON.

SEPTEMBER 18,

MUSIC NOTES

Seats bought this year for the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra can be held hereafter from year to year as long as the owners wish, according to the policy recently announced by the manager. For this reason the auction of tickets, which opens in Symphony hall on the morning of Sept. 27 will be of unusual importance to buyers. Persons who so choose can secure locations permanently, subject only to annual renewal of the subscription. The new plan is expected to give the same satisfaction to the patrons of the orchestra in Boston as it gives to those in New York, where it has had a test regarded as adequate.

At the auction of Monday, Sept. 27, the $18 seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. On the following day the $10 seats for the same series will be offered. On the morning of Friday, Sept. 30, the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts will be sold. The remaining seats for the Saturday nights will be offered on Oct. 1.

The Friday afternoon performances, which are to go on under the traditional designation of public rehearsals, will open on the afternoon of Oct. 15. The Saturday night performances, called the concerts, begin Oct. 16. From that time until May 6, 1916, with the exception of the weeks when the orchestra is on its monthly tour, the performances will be given every Friday and Saturday. The dates when the skips occur are the following: Nov. 5 and 6; Dec. 3 and 4; Jan. 7 and 8; Jan. 28 and 29; Feb. 18 and 19, and March 17 and 18.

The orchestra will give a total of 120 concerts, seven of which will be early in October. Beginning Oct. 4, concerts will be given on consecutive days in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis, and Chicago. In the last week of January, the annual western trip which includes such cities as Buffalo, Cleveland, and Detroit, will be given.

Eight concerts will be given in Cambridge, and the usual series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Providence, Hartford and Worcester. Other concerts will be given in the smaller cities of New England.

At half of the concerts soloists will appear. Two of these are soprano singers: Mme Melba and Miss Farrar. Five are pianists: Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Bauer, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Schelling and Miss Deyo. Three are violinists: Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack. Two are violoncellists: Mr. Warnke and Mr. Malkin.

The only program information added in this week's announcements from the office of the orchestra is that Ernest Schelling, the pianist, is to present at his appearance as soloist a new work for piano and orchestra, called "Symphonic Variations."

AUCTIONS TO BE DISCONTINUED AT SYMPHONY HALL

After This Fall Tickets for Concerts of Orchestra to Be Sold at Flat Subscription Rate

Sept 15th

Subscription tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be sold at auction for the last time this fall, according to an announcement of C. A. Ellis, the manager. Tickets will be sold at a flat rate under the projected plan, and purchasers of seats this year will be permitted to retain their locations indefinitely from year to year.

Making a statement on the subject, Mr. Ellis declares that the present method of sale has served its purpose and is not a genuine auction any longer, for purchasers do not attend the sale in person, as in former years, but buy through ticket agents. "No other orchestra in the country," the manager continues, "sells its season tickets by auction, and we do not do so in any other city but Boston. Our subscriptions in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and Providence are at a fixed price. Subscribers retain their seats from season to season as long as they wish, merely by filling in a card and notifying us of their intention to renew for a coming year. In New York, for example, we give two series of five concerts each and every seat in Carnegie hall is sold for both series and not more than 100 seats out of 2600 in each series change hands from season to season.

"In working out a plan for a fixed price subscription, we have tried to devise the most satisfactory way in which to allot the seats. We have decided that the fairest way will be to allow the holders of seats for the coming season of 1915-1916, bought at the auction sales at the end of this month, the privilege year. In other words, purchasers of seats for the coming season will have an option on them for as many years as they wish to attend the symphony concerts."

4

The auctions this year open Sept. 27.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 18,

DR. MUCK'S NEW YEAR

HE SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT HAND AGAIN

hanges from Former Ways—The Conductor's Mistaken Reticence About Programmes — Personnel and "Assisting Artists"—Schedules for the Season—Old Standards and New Effort

NEW practices abound in the arrangements and the announcements for the Symphony Concerts of the new season. For the last imes, the tickets are to be sold by auction ind hereafter the frequenters of the conerts may hold their places from year to rear by the annual payment of a subscription. For the first time, the so-called "public rehearsals" of Fridays are to be lesignated as the "afternoon concerts" that they have been in fact for thirty years. Both changes speak persuasively for themselves. On the other hand, hardly ever before have the announcements of the concerts been so barren of what the public most wishes to know. The usual list of "assisting artists" has been handed to the newspapers; the usual schedule of dates and journeys has been compiled and published; but not a word as yet has come from Symphony Hall about the music that Dr. Muck and the orchestra are to play.

Next week, the programmes for the first two pairs of concerts are to dribble down upon the expectant and there, presumably, preliminary announcement will end. Not so long ago, it was the custom of the management to issue a comprehensive prospectus that scheduled routine, made known the "assisting artists" and disclosed the conductor's larger plans and novel pieces for the new season. The public expected it; read it eagerly and was usually content. It still misses it and still inquires for it. Now it must piece together a series of announcements made more or less obscurely from week to week and not one of them as it happens hints at the programmes for the new year.

Lacking Information

No one can reasonably expect that Dr. Muck to lay twenty-four programmes on the table at the end of each summer, as some conductors do, and so pledge himself to fulfill them. To do so would be only to hamper the freedom of choice and arrangement that is his just right and that contributes to the pleasure of his audiences. On the other hand, he has undoubtedly fixed upon one and another piece for performance in the course of the season and a loyal and interested public may rightfully expect to know what they are. Not for nothing, surely, has he spent many mornings of late in the library of the orchestra and in the Brown Collection of music at the Public Library. Such preliminary announcement would by no means bind him to literal fidelity to it. Circumstances alter the best-laid plans and there is reason even in the things of music. The audiences of the concerts would merely enjoy the pleasures of anticipation in that which most stimulates them—the music they are to hear under Dr. Muck's hand. Managements, as a rule, are not chary of announcements interesting to the public that they wish to attract. It is a superfluous reticence on the part of a conductor to withhold them.

Public and Programmes

True, it is easy to rejoin that we in Boston know by this time the usual scope of Dr. Muck's programmes as we know his standards and achievement in performance. It is a safe inference that he will hold the balance as even as he has of old between the elder and established classics, the semi-classics of more recent years, the music of the matured composers of our time and the interesting experiments and accomplishments of the youngest generation. These many years his hand has not slipped in such a division of his programmes. It has been as discreet and fair in its regard for almost every school and style. Dr. Muck chooses his pieces by their intrinsic deserts and interest and not by the nationality or any other chance attribute of the composers who have signed them. One or another of his hearers and even little companies of them may regret in one season that he has overlooked music that they would gladly hear. Usually a succeeding season brings it. In the years that Dr. Muck has spent in Boston, he has ripened his programmes in wisdom of choice and catholicity of arrangement. Of late, even, he has made new departures of his own as when, more than once last year, he revived eighteenth-century pieces in which one or another of the virtuosi of the orchestra played solo parts. But this very confidence in his programmes makes the public of the concerts keener for preliminary hint of them.

Unabated Standards

As Dr. Muck spares not in pains with his programmes, so he relaxes not a whit his standards of performance. He has not been content to raise the orchestra to its present high pitch of accomplishment and to maintain it there. He would carry it steadily forward toward the ideal achievement that haunts and beckons him like a vision, only to recede anew each time that he nears it. For him, it is not enough that the orchestra which Boston hears almost as a matter of course for seven months of each year, [illegible] any other in the present world technical perfection, beauty and euphony of tone and range and vitality of style and expression. He would heighten these qualities until they shall be as the finest ear and the alertest intuition have imagined them. With each year, he would make the orchestra a more sensitive instrument to the music that it plays and to him who leads it. Each year he would become more sensitive himself in his playing upon it through and for this music. He knows but one way to this end—ceaseless pains, with his own acute mind, discriminating ear, designing hand and divining imagination to order them.

Long since, Dr. Muck began to penetrate his men with his ideal. Consciously or unconsciously, they have absorbed it until a progress that began in admiration and respect now goes forward in a more intimate and subtle sympathy. The longer that conductor and band work together, the more closely and responsively are they bound together as a single instrument. For this season, moreover, there is hardly a change in the individual voices. A new and promising young flutist of French training succeeds Mr. Chevrot and there has been a redistribution of the brass choir which promises a bettered tone. For the moment, seemingly, Dr. Muck is content with his forces.

"Assisting Artists"

In the music and the performance, in the conductor and the orchestra beats the full life of the Symphony Concerts and the "assisting artists," after all, are but incidental ornaments upon it. The pianists, the violinists and the violoncellists are at least essential, since there are concertos that as orchestral as well as solo piece deserve performance. The singers, presumably, are pleasures in themselves by voice, artistry and personality, even though there are conductors who would relegate them to operas and to song recitals and austere souls that count them as excrescences upon symphony concerts. It is the wise policy of conductor and manager to keep these "soloists" relatively few and to summon, so far as lies within their power, only singers and virtuosi of high and established rank or of clear and mounting promise.

For the most part, the names upon the list for the new season speak for themselves. Mme. Melba, for maturity, and Miss Farrar, for young prime, are the singers. Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Rosenthal are the elder pianists Mr. Bauer and Mr. Schelling the younger, and Miss Deyo, the only virtuosa among them, has her interest for a part of the public of the concerts. Almost by necessity, Mr. Kriesler is the single violinist, outside Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack of the orchestra itself. Scarcely a notable violinist will come from Europe to America this season; Mr. Zimbalist is in retirement; Mr. Elman prefers his own concerts; and Mr. Kreisler alone was left, since seemingly the powers that be are not yet quite persuaded of the rising deserts of Mr. Spalding. Not a few will regret the absence of the illustrious Casals, who barely made his beginnings in Boston last year and thus ,the only 'cellists to be heard are Mr. Warnke and Mr. Malkin of the orchestra itself. Possibly the elder generation of the concerts will warm to this list more than will the younger.

The Annual Schedule

As for the routine of the season, it is unchanged except in the two respects already noted. The higher-priced seats for the afternoon concerts will be sold at Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Sept. 27; the lower-priced on Tuesday morning, Sept. 28. The higher-priced seats for the evening concerts will be sold on Thursday morning, Sept. 30, and the lower-priced on Friday morning, Oct. 1. For the last time there will be upset prices, bids, brokers and all the other conditions that have counselled the abandonment of these auctions. Furthermore, the purchasers will be buying seats that annual renewal of subscriptions will keep permanently in their hands. The fixed prices, under which subscriptions may be renewed, will be studied during the winter and announced in the spring, and they will be determined by the desirability of the places, the public demand and the standard of the concerts. Prices at the auctions will have their weight, but not necessarily a deciding weight, in the making of the new scale.

The concerts themselves will begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 15 and Saturday evening, Oct. 16, and continue in their usual course through Friday afternoon, May 5 and Saturday, May 6—twenty-four pairs in all, distributed through thirty weeks. There will be no concerts on Nov. 6 and 7; Dec. 4 and 5; Jan. 7 and 8; Feb. 19 and 20, and March 18 and 19, when the orchestra is making its monthly journey to New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, and none on Jan. 28 and 29, when it will be playing in the Middle West. The other concerts in cities outside Boston—like the series in Cambridge, Providence and Worcester—take the orchestra away for only an evening and usually one early in the week. There are those who regret these journeys of the orchestra and who like to believe that it plays less well when it has newly returned from them. But these same grumblers would resent a rise in the prices of seats at home to repair the loss of revenue should the "trips" be abandoned. Moreover, the Symphony Orchestra is not only an orchestra for Boston and New England, but for as much of the whole country as can hear it without the impairing of its standards. Now, in its thirty-fifth year, it is national.

NATIONALIZING THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Strange as at first glance it seems, Boston will hear less than half of the concerts that the Symphony Orchestra is soon to begin in the thirty weeks from October to May that make its working season. As for years past, it will pay its periodical visits to a few neighboring cities like Providence and Worcester. As usual, it will make its five monthly journeys to New York, Philadelphia and the cities further South to which it regularly ministers. By exception this year, that is likely to become annual practice in the years to come, it will give two weeks, instead of one, to little tours of the Middle West that will carry it as far away as Omaha. In all, the orchestra undertakes a hundred or a hundred and ten concerts in the course of a season, and between fifty and sixty of them take place outside Boston. Only four months ago, in the musical year then ending, it was summoned to the world's fair in San Francisco for a series of thirteen consecutive concerts unique in the range of the programmes, the unrelaxing standard of accomplishment and the public eagerness and acclaim for them. Within a year or two, other cities of the Pacific Coast hope to hear the orchestra as well. More and more it tends to become a national orchestra, known and applauded throughout the country.

Gradually the cities that the orchestra regularly visits have come to feel a pride of possession in it that differs only in degree from that of Boston itself. Here in New England, Worcester and Provdence like to believe that they share it with us. A little farther afield, New York speaks and writes of it as though that metropolis was its permanent abiding place. One and another city of the Middle West, like Cleveland and Detroit, expects its annual visit as regularly and eagerly as we in Boston its series of concerts. Chicago, which hears it at long intervals, regrets that it does not come oftener, and the remoter cities upon which it occasionally descends, like Wheeling and Omaha, rejoice in their good fortune. The Pacific Coast, when it heard the band for the first time, could only wish with characteristic exuberance for many happy returns of the day. Wherever the orchestra goes, the number, the quality and the ardor of its audiences alike reward it. The day is past wherein it was only of Boston, New England or even the adjacent East.

The sources of these happy conditions that every year widen national interest and national pride in the orchestra are not far to seek. Wherever it plays, it plays with full forces, unrelaxed standards and unclouded achievement. Busy as it is, it does not attempt too much and so dull the fine edge and the large energies of conductor and men. Whatever it has promised to do, it never scamps and Bostonians who chance to hear its concerts abroad know that they fall not a whit below those to which they listen at home. The orchestra has but one standard and, within the limits of human variability, maintains it. In many of the cities which it visits, especially those of the West, that standard opens new vistas of what an orchestra and a conductor may accomplish, of what music contains and of what pleasure it may give and thereafter when they listen to their own bands or to those that chance to visit them, they hear with new ears, sensibility and appreciation. And so, by the old, old means of unflagging work and unrelaxed achievement, the orchestra has become an æsthetic power in the whole land.

TRAVEL ATURDAY , SEPTEMBER 18,

Soloists Engaged by Symphony Orchestra

Geraldine Farrar, Famous Operatic Soprano; Ignace Paderewski, Peerless Polish Pianist, and Mme. Melba, Operatic Star and Concert Soloist.

The prospectus of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season of 1915-'16, the 35th of the orchestra, promises much, not only to the regular patrons of the orchestra, but to the public in general. The list of soloists is unusually attractive. Dr. Muck continues as conductor, and the orchestra which will assemble Monday evening, Sept. 27, for its first rehearsal, shows practically an unchanged personnel.

The usual quota of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings will be given. The first public rehearsal will be on the afternoon of Oct. 15, and the first concert on the following evening. Thence on, with the exception of six weeks when the orchestra is away on tour, the concerts will be given weekly until Saturday evening, May 6.

The auction sale of season tickets for the concerts in Boston will begin in Symphony Hall Monday morning, Sept. 27, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, beginning at 10 o'clock. The following day the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. Friday, Sept. 20, the $18 seats for the concerts will be placed on sale, and the remaining seats for the concerts will be sold Friday, Oct. 1.

As already announced, the management has about decided to make this the last year when season tickets for the Symphony concerts will be disposed of by auction sale. It is the intention of the management to allow the purchasers of seats for the coming season to retain them under the subscription plan for next.

The singers are Mme. Melba and Geraldine Farrar. Mme. Melba is in America for a considerable concert tour and she will sing with the orchestra six times, twice in Boston, and once in four other cities. Miss Farrar has deserted opera for the time being and will give the major part of the season to concert work.

The violinist from abroad, it is almost needless to say, is Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler has become almost an annual visitor among the soloists in Boston of the Symphony orchestra. The 'cellists will be Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the principal 'cellists of the orchestra.

The list of pianists is headed by the name of Paderewski. This greatest of artists has been in America since early spring. The other pianists are Moriz Rosenthal, that most brilliant Austrian who has not been heard here for nine years; Harold Bauer, who, like Kreisler, has become almost an anuual visitor with the Symphony orchestra; Ruth Deyo, who has such a large and admiring public in this city, and Ernest Schelling.

Boston American SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1915.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SOLOISTS

FRITZ KREISLER
RUTH DEYO
MADAME MELBA
ERNEST SCHELLING
©
PHOTO BY, MARTIN PARIS
HAROLD BAUER

GERALDINE FARRAR.
SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO APPEAR IN "CARMEN" PHOTO OPERA AT SYMPHONY HALL, FOR A LIMITED ENGAGEMENT BEGINNING FRIDAY OCT. 1.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra might well rest upon its reputation as a solo organization without employing a long list of the most distinguished soloists in the world. You frequently hear at a concert satisfaction expressed because no soloists are offered and the audience can revel in the orchestra uninterrupted for an hour and a half.

Nevertheless, the majority of symphony goers like to hear the celebrated singers and players, and Manager Ellis has announced for this season the most remarkable list ever offered.

First there is Paderewski, the most popular living pianist, who is in this country both as a representative of the suffering Poles and as a piano virtuoso.

Next there is Geraldine Farrar, the celebrated soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Farrar is a Boston girl and this year is managed by a Boston manager, Mr. Ellis, who even arranges her operatic appearances with the Chicago and Boston companies.

Nellie Melba is still the greatest coloratura soprano. Middle age has not affected the purity of her tones. She will also appear with the Symphony.

Ernest Schelling, the American pianist, will make the big tour with the orchestra this season. Schelling is a very wonderful artist. Kreisler, Paderewski and other celebrated European performers are his admirers and have not hesitated to tell Mr. Ellis of his powers.

Kreisler, the violinist, will of course appear, and so will Ruth Deyo, the pianist.

IGNACE PADEREWSKI

BOSTON JOURNAL-
SEPTEMBER 18,

FAMED ARTISTS WILL BE HEARD WITH SYMPHONY

Last Sale of Seats by Auction to Begin Monday, Sept. 27.

Rarely has the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived at the opening of a season with such prospects of artistic and material prosperity as face it this year.

The Boston season will begin Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, with the first public rehearsal, and Saturday evening, Oct. 16, with the first concert. Before this, however, the orchestra will have made an extensive trip to the Middle West.

The usual method of disposing of season tickets will be followed this year. All the seats in the hall, save those in the second balcony for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, will be sold at public auction with upset prices of $18 and $10, according to location. All the sales will take place at Symphony Hall. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept. 27, beginning at 10 o'clock, and on the following morning, at the same hour, the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday, Sept. 30, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the rest of the house will be sold Friday, Oct. 1, beginning at the same hour.

The list of soloists which Mr. Ellis has engaged for the coming season is one of surpassing interest. Eight artists have been invited to appear with the orchestra, in addition to four of the great virtuosi who are members of the organization. There will be two singers, one violinist and five pianists from abroad, while the orchestra will be represented by two violinists and two 'cellists.

The singers are Madame Melba and Geraldine Farrar. Melba will sing with the orchestra six times, twice in Boston, and once in four other cities. Miss Farrar will give the major part of the season to concert work. Her appearance at a Symphony concert is always one of the big events of the year.

The violinist from abroad, it is almost needless to say, is Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler undoubtedly has today the largest following of any violinist. The other two violinists will be those admirable artists from the orchestra, Anton Witek, the concert-master, and Sylvian Noack, the second concert-master. The 'cellists will be Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the principal 'cellists of the orchestra.

The pianists will include Paderewski. This greatest of artists will begin a limited concert tour in November, and it goes without saying that he is to appear with the orchestra here. The other pianists are Moriz Rosenthal, the brilliant Austrian, who has not been heard here for nine years; Harold Bauer, Ruth Deyo and Ernest Schelling. Mr. Schelling will appear in the double role of composer and pianist. He has completed a new work for piano and orchestra which he calls "Symphonic Variations," and its first public hearing will be in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra. His "Fantastic Suite," played a few years ago, was one of the great successes of the season, and much is promised of his new work.

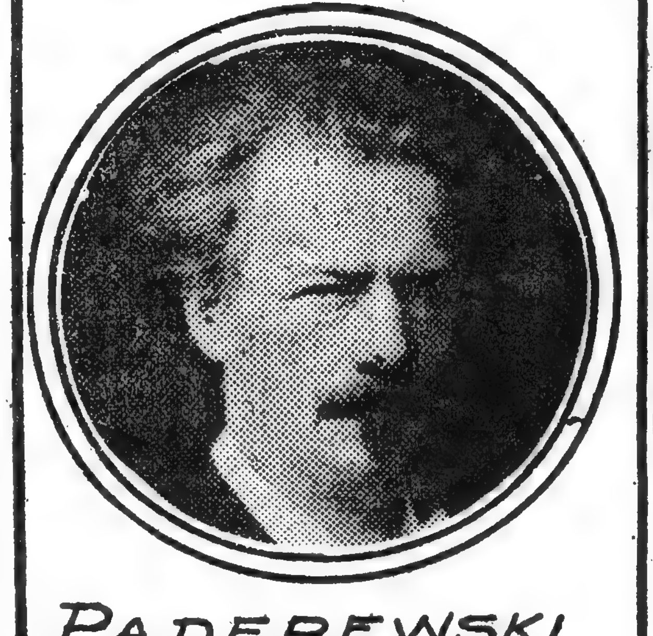
Dr. Muck is not yet ready to announce any programs.

As already announced, the management of the orchestra has about decided to make this the last year when season tickets for the Symphony concerts will be disposed of by auction sale. In all probability next spring an announcement will be made whereby the tickets for Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings will be disposed of by subscription at flat rates, and holders of same will be able to retain their seats from season to season.

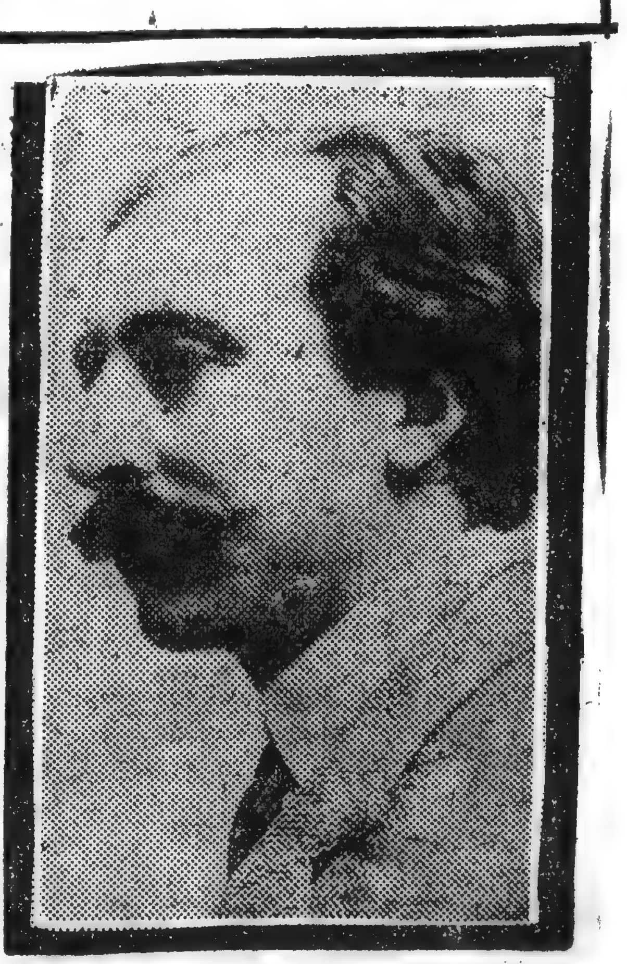
In event of this plan being carried through, this will make the seats secured by the auction sales this year a valuable option for next season and the season to follow, for it is the intention of the management to allow the purchasers of seats for the coming season to retain them under the subscription plan for next.

In this way the management sees a solution of the difficulty of allotting the seats for 1916-1917.

MME. MELBA
SAT SYMPHONY



PADEREWSKI
SAT SYMPHONY.



ERNEST SCHELLING
SAT. SYMPHONY.

KRIESLER
SAT. SYMPHONY

GERALDINE FARRAR
SAT SYMPHONY.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 19, 1915

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

FRITZ KREISLER ©-UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD
ERNEST SCHELLING
GERALDINE FARRAR. ©Photo by-AIMÉ DUPONT
HAROLD BAUER.
MADAME MELBA
PADEREWSKI. Photo by-UNITED PHOTO CO.
MORIZ ROSENTHAL.
RUTH DEYO. Photo by-THE BARNUM STUDIO

PROMINENT SOLOISTS OF THE COMING SYMPHONY SEASON.

Bright Prospects for the Season's Symphony Concerts

After a preliminary trip of 10 days, during which seven concerts will be given in the West, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 35th season in Symphony Hall with the first rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct 15, and the first concert the following evening, Saturday, Oct 16.

Not since 1905 has the orchestra gone West early in October. Such a trip was planned for last year, but it had to be abandoned because the outbreak of the war prevented the return to Boston of Dr Muck and a considerable part of the orchestra in time to prepare the programs.

Boston will get its usual quota of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings, the season ending Saturday evening, May 6. In six weeks during the intervening 30, the orchestra will be away on its five monthly Southern trips and its annual mid-Winter Western trip.

The dates the orchestra will be away are Nov 5 and 6, Dec 3 and 4, Jan 7 and 8, Jan 28 and 29, Feb 18 and 19 and March 17 and 18.

The schedule for the season will call for 120 concerts, of which Boston gets 48 and Cambridge eight. The others are given in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Providence, Worcester and Hartford, in various cities of New England and of the West.

This year, as in the past, all the season tickets for the concerts will be sold at public auction in Symphony Hall. The seats for Friday afternoon, the upset price of which is $18, will be sold Monday, Sept 27, beginning at 10 o'clock. The other seats for Friday afternoons will be sold Tuesday, Sept 28. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday, Sept 30, beginning at 10, and the remaining seats will be sold on the following day, Friday, Oct 1.

As already announced, the management of the orchestra has about decided to make this the last year when season tickets will be disposed of by auction sale. In event of this plan being carried through, this will make the seats secured by the auction sales this year a valuable option for next season and the season to follow, for it is the intention of the management to allow the purchasers of seats for the coming season to retain them under the subscription plan. In this way the management sees a solution of the difficulty of alloting the seats for 1916-1917.

Since the close of last season, May 8, the orchestra has made its much-heralded trip to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco and returned with its prestige throughout the country enormously enhanced. What it accomplished there is quite without precedent in the annals of music in this or any other country, and it may be hazarded that no orchestra in the world could have done likewise.

The orchestra begins its 35th season with practically the same personnel with which Dr Muck accomplished such notable results last year. The season of 1914-15, after all the uncertainties that surrounded its opening, turned out to be one of great glory for Dr Muck and his men.

Existing conditions, brought about by the war, have assembled in this country practically all the great singers and virtuosi of the world, and it has been simply a matter of choice in the question of soloists for the orchestra, for practically everybody is available.

Most fortunately for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its manager, C. A. Ellis, has charge of the concert tours of four of the greatest artists in the country and thus Boston is enabled to have all four of these appear with its orchestra. They are Mme Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler.

Mme Melba has not been heard here as a soloist with the orchestra since December, 1910. She arrived in San Francisco on the last day of August, after having spent a year in her native Australia. Practically all of her time during that year was devoted to raising funds for the Australian Red Cross and the Belgian and Polish Relief Funds, and by concerts and personal solicitation she raised over $150,000.

Miss Farrar last appeared here with the orchestra two years ago. In these two years the prestige of this very remarkable artist has grown mightily. She stands today as the most talented singer this country has ever produced, and she is, in addition to this, probably the most popular singer now before the public. The announcement last Winter that she purposed leaving the Metropolitan Opera Company to give concerts under the direction of C. A. Ellis caused almost an earthquake in the musical world of New York.

Mr Kreisler has come to be an annual visitor among the Symphony soloists, and it is hoped that this condition may continue.

Paderewski is always warmly welcomed, for he is still unique in the world of art. There has been none like him—there is none like him, and the chances are there never will be. He has been in America since last Spring, devoting himself to his chosen work of raising funds for the relief of his fellow Poles.

Four other soloists of very high quality have been engaged. These are Moriz Rosenthal, the great Austrian pianist; Harold Bauer, Ernest Schelling and Ruth Deyo. Rosenthal has not been heard in Boston with the orchestra for nine years. Bauer, like Kreisler, has become almost an annual visitor. Miss Deyo is, in a sense, of Boston, for here she lives and here she has a large body of ardent admirers.

Ernest Schelling has not been heard with the orchestra here in a number of years, and then it was in the double capacity of composer and pianist, when he introduced his charming "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. This year he returns in the same guise with a new work, "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," which will have its first performance anywhere at the Boston concerts.

Naturally, with such distinguished artists in the orchestra, soloists will be drawn from them. These will be Messrs Witek and Noack, concert-master and second concert-master, respectively; Mr Warnke and Mr Malkin, principal 'cellists. Each of these gentlemen may truly be called a great artist whose annual appearances are eagerly welcomed by the patrons of the concerts.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, FRIDAY

Leading Pianists, Violinis
Women Singers to Appea Symphony

Geraldine Farrar

Fritz Kreisler

Mad

Soloists or no soloists at the Symphony is a question that has long been a subject of popular debate wherever real Bostonians gather. Many musical loving persons say—and believe—that there is no place for a soloist at a Symphony concert.

Others frankly say that although this holds theoretically, there should be a little leeway for popular taste. They argue that the soloist gives huge pleasure to the average auditor and should be a concert fixture.

All agree on one point—if there are any soloists at all they should be superlatively fine. Such soloists are announced for the Symphony Orchestra this winter. Occasionally in the past there have appeared on the stage of Symphony Hall artists that were not of "Symphony rank." That cannot be this year, for the soloists are all the leaders in their respective branches of musical art.

Take the women who will appear for instance. First there is the peerless Melba. Singers come, and singers go, but Nellie Melba sings like a nightingale year in, year out, and the crowds throng to hear her.

A younger but almost equally popular singer—here at least—is Miss Farrar, who is doing more concert than opera work this winter. Another interesting woman, although not so widely known as Melba and Farrar, is Miss Ruth Deyo, whose coming pleases the lovers of fine pianism.

An idol of the general public, who will play with the orchestra, is Fritz Kreisler, hero of battlefield and concert stage.

A supreme artist, a man of great personal charm, withal a man of most refreshingly modest demeanor, Mr. Kreisler undoubtedly has today the largest following of any violinist. The other two violinists will be two artists from the orchestra, Anton Witek, the concert-master, and Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master. The 'cellists will be Heinrich Warnke and Josef Malkin, the principal 'cellists of the orchestra.

The list of pianists is headed by the name of Paderewski. This greatest of artists has been in America since early spring, but not for the purpose of playing, for all his time and energy has been devoted to the work he is undertaking to further the cause of the Polish Victims' Relief Funds.

However, he will begin a limited concert tour in November, and it goes without saying that he is to appear with the orchestra here. The other pianists are Moriz Rosenthal, that most brilliant Austrian who has not been heard here for nine years; Harold Bauer, who, like Kreisler, has become almost an annual visitor with the Symphony Orchestra; and Ernest Schelling, composer as well as pianist.

It goes without saying that there will be the usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 evening performances.

The first rehearsal will be Oct. 15, and the first concert on the following evening. Thence on, with the exception of six weeks when the orchestra is away on tour, the concerts will be given weekly until Saturday evening, May 6. The Fridays and Saturdays the orchestra is away are Nov. 5 and 6; Dec. 3 and 4; Jan. 7 and 8; Jan. 28 and 29; Feb. 18 and 19, and March 17 and 18. The orchestra will give a total of 120 concerts, seven of which will be made early in October when beginning Oct. 4, concerts will be given on consecutive days in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis, and Chicago.

In the last week of January, the annual such ci

Detroit certs w the usu delphia
Brookly
Worces be give England
The a for the in Symp
the $18
be sold.
seats fo
Friday, concerts the rema will be s
As alre ment of cided to season t certs wi sale. In an annou
by the t and Sat posed of and hold retain th son.

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 19,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Not often in the 34 years of its existence has the Boston Symphony Orchestra been about to open a season which promises so much for the orchestra for its patrons as 1915-1916. Everything has seemed to conspire to launch the incoming musical year under the most favorable conditions, thus in very direct and pleasant contrast with conditions which ruled a year ago. Then the great war had just begun. Until after the middle of September, it was uncertain whether the orchestra could be assembled owing to the absence in Europe of Dr. Muck and many of its members. The public was timorous, not knowing what might happen, and money in the vernacular of the Street was very tight. This year the entire orchestra will be in Boston three weeks before the Boston season opens. None of its members left the country this last summer—for very good reasons—and for such few new members as will join the orchestra Dr. Muck and the management have been able to find adequate talent in the United States. Moreover, every indication seems to point to a season of great prosperity, not only for our Symphony Orchestra, but for all musical enterprises in Boston and throughout the country generally. Finally, the management has been able to secure a most brilliant set of soloists from the horde of virtuosi of all kinds and conditions and the multitude of singers that have come to America as the one secure haven of peace.

Beginning of Season

The Boston season will begin Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, with the first public rehearsal and Saturday evening, Oct 16, with the first concert. Before this, however, the orchestra will have made an interesting and extensive trip to the middle West. The concerts then to be given were planned for last October, but the uncertainty surrounding the return of Dr. Muck and everyone else compelled Mr. Ellis to cancel them. The orchestra assembles for its first rehearsal Monday evening, Oct. [illegible] and the following week gives concerts in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph and St. Louis. The last concert of the orchestra will be given in Chicago at the Auditorium Theatre, Sunday afternoon, Oct. 10.

The usual method of disposing of season tickets will be followed this year. All the seats in the hall, save those in the second balcony for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, will be sold at public auction, with upset prices of $18 and $10, according to location. All the sales will take place at Symphony Hall. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept. 27, beginning at 10 o'clock, and on the following morning at the same hour the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday, Sept. 30, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the rest of the house will be sold Friday, Oct. 1, beginning at the same hour.

Financially—and this is most remarkable—the trip was not only a success for the orchestra, but for those who took the orchestra to the Coast. Over 45,000 people paid to hear the 13 concerts.

The list of soloists which Mr. Ellis has engaged for the coming season is one of surpassing interest. Eight artists have been invited to appear with the orchestra, in addition to four of the great virtuosi who are members of the organization. There will be two singers, one violinist and five pianists from abroad, while the orchestra will be represented by two violinists and two 'cellists.

The singers are Madame Melba and Geraldine Farrar. It is hardly necessary to go further in detail regarding these two artists, each of whom is supreme in her particular branch of the art of singing. Madame Melba is in America for a considerable concert tour and she will sing with the orchestra six times, twice in Boston and once in four other cities. Miss Farrar has deserted opera for the time being and will give the major part of the season to concert work. Her appearance at a Symphony concert is necessarily one of notable importance.

The violinist from abroad, it is almost needless to say, is Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler has become almost an annual visitor among the soloists in Boston of the Symphony Orchestra, and it is the profound hope of all lovers of [illegible] condition will continue. A supreme artist, a man of great personal charm, modest demeanor, Mr. Kreisler undoubtedly has today the largest following of any violinist. The other two violinists will be those admirable artists from the orchestra, Anton Witek, the concert-master, and Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master. The 'cellists will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke and Mr. Joseph Malkin, the principal 'cellists of the orchestra and artists of most uncommon calibre.

Pianists

The lists of pianists is headed by the name of Paderewski. This greatest of artists has been in America since early spring, but not for the purpose of playing, for all his time and energy has been devoted to the work he is undertaking to further the cause of the Polish Victims' Relief Funds. However, he will begin a limited concert tour in November, and it goes without saying that he is to appear with the orchestra here. The other pianists are Moritz Rosenthal, that most brilliant Austrian who has not been heard here for nine years; Harold Bauer, who, like Kreisler, has become almost an annual visitor with the Symphony Orchestra; Ruth Deyo, who has such a large and admiring public in this city, and Ernest Schelling. Mr. Schelling at his appearance here this winter, as when he last played with the orchestra, will appear in the double role of composer and pianist. He has completed a new work for piano and orchestra which he calls "Symphonic Variations," and its first public hearing will be in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra. His "Fantastic Suite," played a few years ago, was one of the great successes of the season, and much is promised of his new work.

Dr. Muck is not yet ready to announce his early programmes. He has been living near Boston since the first of August, spending two or three days each week in the library at Symphony Hall, and it is fair to presume that the remarkably interesting programmes he gave a year ago will at least be equalled during the coming season.

Last Auction Sale

As already announced, the management of the orchestra has about decerts will sale. In all announcem by the tic and Saturda of by subs holders of s their seats event of through, thi cured by th a valuable the season

tention of the purchase season to re scription pla the managem diffi ty of 1916-1917.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 17,

Pianists, Violinists and n Singers to Appear at Symphony

Fritz Kreisler

Madame Melba

ounger but almost equally pop- singer—here at least—is Miss r, who is doing more concert opera work this winter. Another esting woman, although not so y known as Melba and Farrar, ss Ruth Deyo, whose coming es the lovers of fine pianism.

idol of the general public, who lay with the orchestra, is Fritz ler, hero of battlefield and con- tage.

upreme artist, a man of great al- charm, withal a man of refreshingly modest demeanor, Kreisler undoubtedly has today rgest following of any violinist. ther two violinists will be two s from the orchestra, Anton , the concert-master, and Syl- Noack, the second concert-mas- The 'cellists will be Heinrich e and Josef Malkin, the prin- ellists of the orchestra.

ist of pianists is headed by the of Paderewski. This greatest sts has been in America since pring, but not for the purpose ing, for all his time and energy en devoted to the work he is aking to further the cause of lish Victims' Relief Funds. However, he will begin a limited concert tour in November, and it goes without saying that he is to appear with the orchestra here. The other pianists are Moriz Rosenthal, that most brilliant Austrian who has not been heard here for nine years; Harold Bauer, who, like Kreisler, has become almost an annual visitor with the Symphony Orchestra; and Ernest Schelling, composer as well as pianist.

It goes without saying that there will be the usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 evening performances.

The first rehearsal will be Oct. 15, and the first concert on the following evening. Thence on, with the exception of six weeks when the orchestra is away on tour, the concerts will be given weekly until Saturday evening, May 6. The Fridays and Saturdays the orchestra is away are Nov. 5 and 6; Dec. 3 and 4; Jan. 7 and 8; Jan. 28 and 29; Feb. 18 and 19, and March 17 and 18. The orchestra will give a total of 120 concerts, seven of which will be made early in October when beginning Oct. 4, concerts will be given on consecutive days in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis, and Chicago.

In the last week of January, the annual western trip which includes such cities as Buffalo, Cleveland, and Detroit will be given. Eight concerts will be given in Cambridge, and the usual series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Providence, Hartford, and Worcester. The other concerts will be given in the smaller cities of New England.

The auction sale of season tickets for the concerts in Boston will begin in Symphony Hall, Sept. 27th, when the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The following day the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. Friday, Sept. 20, the $18 seats for the concerts will be placed on sale, and the remaining seats for the concerts will be sold Friday, Oct. 1.

As already announced, the management of the Orchestra has about decided to make this the last year when season tickets for the Symphony concerts will be disposed of by auction sale. In all probability next spring an announcement will be made whereby the tickets for Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings will be disposed of by subscription at flat rates, and holders of same will be able to retain their seats from season to season.

---

condition will cont[illegible]e. A supreme artist, a man of gre[illegible] personal charm, modest demeanor, [illegible]r. Kreisler undoubtedly has toda[illegible] the largest following of any violin[illegible] The other two violinists will be [illegible]hose admirable artists from the [illegible]chestra, Anton Witek, the concert-m[illegible]ster, and Sylvain Noack, the second c[illegible]ncert-master. The 'cellists will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke and Mr. Joseph Mal[illegible]in, the principal 'cellists of the orch[illegible]stra and artists of most uncommon c[illegible]libre.

Pianists

The lists of pianists is headed by the name of Paderewski. This greatest of artists has been in America since early spring, but not for the purpose of playing, for all his time and energy has been devoted to the work he is undertaking to further the cause of the Polish Victims' Relief Funds. However, he will begin a limited concert tour in November, and it goes without saying that he is to appear with the orchestra here. The other pianists are Moritz Rosenthal, that most brilliant Austrian who has not been heard here for nine years; Harold Bauer, who, like Kreisler, has become almost an annual visitor with the Symphony Orchestra; Ruth Deyo, who has such a large and admiring public in this city, and Ernest Schelling. Mr. Schelling at his appearance here this winter, as when he last played with the orchestra, will appear in the double role of composer and pianist. He has completed a new work for piano and orchestra which he calls "Symphonic Variations," and its first public hearing will be in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra. His "Fantastic Suite," played a few years ago, was one of the great successes of the season, and much [illegible] promised of his new work.

Dr. Muck is not [illegible]et ready to announce his early pro[illegible]rammes. He has been living near Bos[illegible]on since the first of August, spending [illegible]wo or three days each week in the lib[illegible]ry at Symphony Hall, and it is fair [illegible]to presume that the remarkably inter[illegible]ting programmes he gave a year ag[illegible] will at least be equalled during the [illegible]oming season.

Last Auct[illegible]n Sale

As already announ[illegible]ed, the management of the orche[illegible]a has about decided [illegible] certs will be disposed of by auction sale. In all probability next spring an announcement will be made whereby the tickets for Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings will be disposed of by subscription at flat rates, and holders of same will be able to retain their seats from season to season. In event of this plan being carried through, this will make the seats secured by the auction sales this year a va[illegible]able option for next season and the [illegible]eason to follow, for it is the intention of the management to allow the purchasers of seats for the coming season to retain them under the subscription plan for next. In this way the management sees a solution of the diffi[illegible]lty of allotting the seats for 1916-[illegible]17.

---

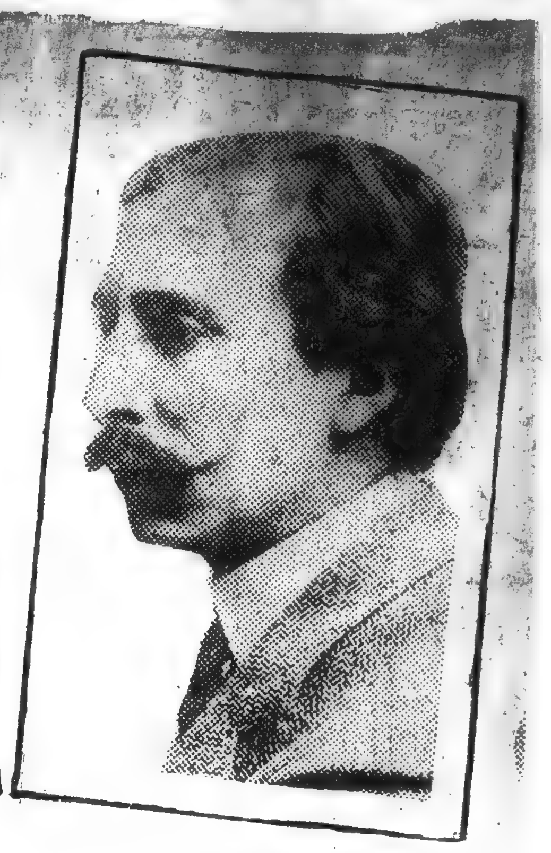
Post

Mme. Nellie Melba.

Fritz Kreisler.
(C.) Underwood & Underwood)



Ernest Schelling.

Ignace Paderewski.

Moritz Rosenthal.

Harold Bauer.

Ruth Deyo.

BOSTON POST,

SEPTEMBER 28,

HIGH BIDS AT SALE AT SYMPHONY

Average Price Above Auction Figures for 1914

If some purchasers of season seats for the Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony were disappointed at the prices which obtained yesterday afternoon at the auction sale in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Hall management was correspondingly delighted, for the average of the bids was considerably higher than those of last season.

This was caused, some believed, by the announcement that the auction sales of 1915 would be the last in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, since seats will be sold by subscription next season, at the Symphony Hall box office.

FATTER POCKETBOOKS

Furtheremore, the seats secured this season may be retained season after season by those who wish, so that the sales of the present week will indicate the permanent location of the many music lovers of this city who patronize these concerts, season in and season out.

But musical managers of the city feel that the cause of the rise in prices is not merely the effect of passing conditions, but an indication of fatter pocketbooks and a fresher enthusiasm for music than the season which saw the dissolution of the Boston Opera Company and small returns for any but a few very successful artists. Furthermore, there is the consolation of which the disappointed buyer for the Friday afternoon concerts usually avails himself—the sale of the Saturday night seats, which usually sell quite a little cheaper than seats for Friday afternoon.

Yesterday the bidding continued through the day, from 10 in the morning to nearly 7 at night. The bidding was spirited, and as a consequence the selling proceeded less rapidly than for last year. The highest figure reached yesterday was $100 for seats 17-18 in row K, both end seats. This is a little short of the highest bid of last year when a seat in row N brought $108, but the general average is considerably higher.

In row F seats Nos. 16 and 20 brought $76. Seat No. 30 in M brought $61 and the next seat $60. The average price for row X was $46 and $47, rather cheap for one of the most comfortable rows in the house, not very far from the stage, and having the advantage of a crossing aisle in front of the sitters, who can cross their legs as they please without kicking the back of a chair in front. Seats 21 and 20 in row IY brought $50.

Seats on the right side of the first balcony, facing the stage, brought $70 as a maximum price. On the other side of the balcony the prices were considerably higher in average, probably because from this side there is a better view of the figure and the hands of the soloists who perform. In this row seat No. 5 brought $79, seat No. 6 $90, seats Nos. 24 and 25 $61, Seats 15 and 16, in the second row on this side, brought $56 apiece.

It was dark when the auction ceased. This auction was attended by an unusual number of buyers, a number of whom were evidently strangers to the sale and its customs. Some ticket agents were quoted as saying that the loss of the premium in coming years on Symphony seats would force the management back into auctioneering, but that is unlikely.

THE SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 19, 191

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL OPEN 35th SEASON OCT. 15; 30 WEEKS' ENGAGEMENT

Eight Celebrated Singers and Instrumentalists, Including Paderewski, Melba, Miss Farrar, Rosenthal, Schelling, Bauer, Kreisler and Miss Deyo Will Appear, Also.

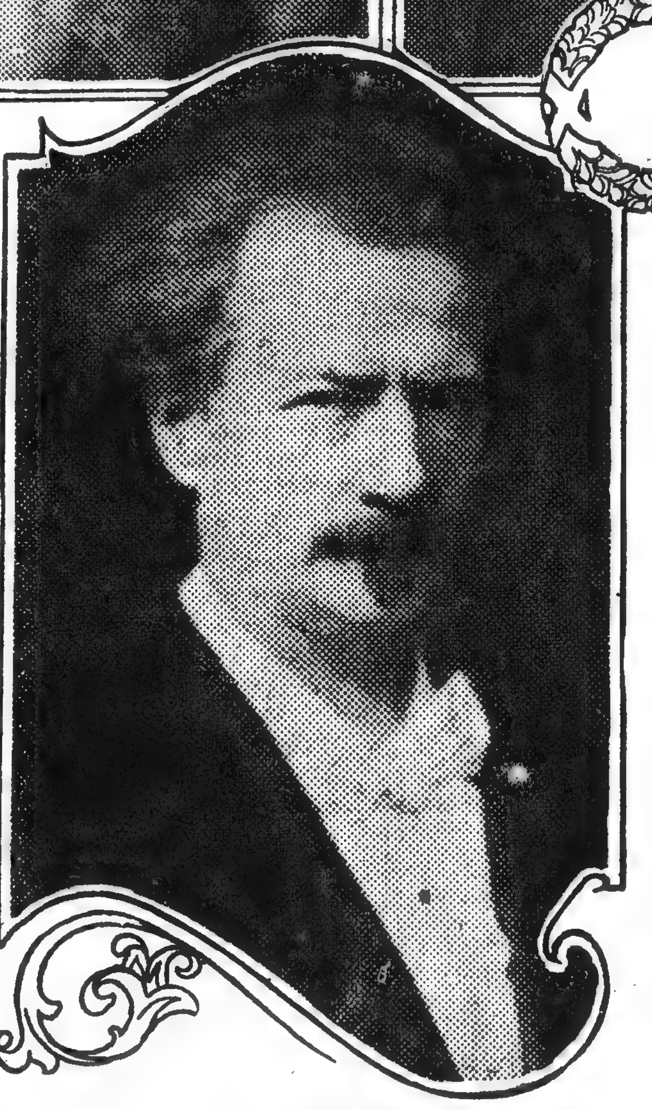
Melba.

Ruth Deyo.

Harold Bauer.

Ernest Schelling.

Fritz Kreisler.
Moriz Rosenthal.



Paderewski.

Geraldine Farrar.

The 35th season of Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall with the first rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, and the first concert will follow Saturday evening, Oct. 16. Then, for 30 weeks, excepting six Fridays and Saturdays when it is away on tour, the orchestra will give to Boston, in the best manner possible, the best music. Season tickets will be sold at auction with upset prices of $10 and $18 according to the location of seats. The auctions will begin Monday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M., when all the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be sold. The next day at 10 A. M., the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. Thursday, beginning at 10 A. M., the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold and the remaining seats whose upset price is $10, will be sold Friday.

The orchestra will be away Nov. 6 and 7; Dec. 4 and 5; Jan. 8, 9, 29 and 30; Feb. 19 and 20, and March 18 and 19.

Calls for 120 Concerts.

The schedule for the season will call for 120 concerts, of which 48 (24 rehearsals and 24 concerts) will be in Boston, and eight in Cambridge. The others will be in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Providence, Worcester, Hartford; in various cities of New Eigland and the West. This year a trip preliminary to the opening of the Boston season will be made by the orchestra during which seven concerts will be given. Beginning in Toledo, Monday evening, Oct. 4, the orchestra will play on the consecutive nights in Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph and St. Louis, giving its last concert of the trip in Chicago Sunday afternoon, Oct. 10.

The prestige of the orchestra was greatly enhanced by the extraordinary success it had in San Francisco at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition last May. That trip promises to remain a record in the history of music in this country for many years. It was without precedent to take so large an organization to a city 3000 miles distant and bring it back without intermediate stops. It was without precedent for any orchestra to give in one city 13 symphony concerts in as many days with a completely different program at each concert and without soloists. But most remarkable of all was the patronage given to these concerts. More than 45,000 people paid to hear the orchestra. The smallest audience was larger than the capacity of Symphony Hall, and the largest audience was more than double that capacity.

Acquire New View.

From an artistic point of view, those concerts of the orchestra were full of significance. It gave the people along the entire Pacific slope a new point of view regarding symphony orchestras and symphonic music. The immediate result was the reorganization of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra on broader and more efficient lines.

The orchestra will be substantially the same as last year. Very few changes have been made. All the members are in this country, and will be on hand for the first rehearsal of the season, Sept. 27.

A combination of favorable conditions has made it possible for the management to offer a most attractive list of soloists, singers and vituosi of the world here in peaceful America. Eight celebrated singers and instrumentalists of these have been engaged to appear here with the orchestra, and in addition, the four chief members of the string section will also be heard; Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists; Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, 'cellists. It is hardly necessary to call attention to the fine qualities of these artists.

The soloists from outside are three women and five men, two singers, one violinist, and five pianists.

Performances in Chicago.

The singers are Mme. Melba and Miss Farrar, who are devoting the major part of the season to concert work; Mme. Melba, in fact, the entire season with the exception of a few operatic performances with the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago. Miss Farrar has promised to give Chicago a few performances with that opera company, and will sing 20 times at the end of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only organization of its kind with which the two singers will appear. Mme. Melba is here for 30 or 40 concerts, six of which will be with the orchestra.

Miss Farrar has not been heard here for two years. Her decision last winter to leave the Metropolitan Opera Company and devote herself for a year to concerts under the direction of Charles A. Ellis caused a sensation in New York, and soon the films will spread even wider abroad a knowledge of her personality.

The one outside violinist will be Fritz Kreisler, of whose gifts the public, professional and lay, never tire.

The five pianists will be Paderewski, Rosenthal, Bauer, Schelling and Miss Deyo. Mr. Paderewski will begin his regular concert tour in November, and naturally has been engaged for the Boston series of the Symphony Orchestra.

Moriz Rosenthal, unquestionably one of the greatest pianists of our time, famous for his stupendous technique, masterly musicianship, has not played with the orchestra in Symphony Hill for nine years. Harold Bauer has a large and enthusiastic following. Miss Ruth Deyo gave her first performance with the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall two years ago, and last year played with much success with the orchestra in Cambridge.

Interest in Schelling.

More than usual interest is attached to the appearance of Ernest Schelling, who has grown greatly in his art in the last few years. This year he comes to Boston, particularly for the first performances of a new work he has written for orchestra and piano. The new fantasia, it is understood, is based on popular American tunes.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, has not seen fit to reveal his plans for the season beyond the fact that he will present Liszt's "Dante" Symphony. As already announced this will be the last year when season tickets for the Symphony concerts will be disposed of by auction sale. Next spring an announcement probably will be made whereby the tickets for Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings will be disposed of by subscription at flat rates, and holders of same will be able to retain their seats from season to season. This will make seats secured by the auction sales this year a valuable option for next season and the season to follow, for the management will allow purchasers of seats for this season to retain them under the subscription plan for next.

EVENING RECORD,

SEPTEMBER 27, 191

Prices Are High for Symphony

Last Auction Held Today

"BOSTON" TURNS OUT FOR THE FAREWELL

Bidding for This Year's Rehearsal and Concerts Passed Last Season's

The "Boston of 30 years ago,"—that was the atmosphere of the company which gathered at Symphony Hall in the cool hours of the morning, to usher out the last symphony sale.

The seats in question this morning were the $18 rehearsal variety. On the platform, in front of the seat plan stood the auctioneer, a very polite and very deferential auctioneer who suggested sale with not too much vehemence in tones not loud enough to offend the hearing of delicate maiden aunts who were there to buy their favorite [illegible]es.

But the real Bostonians on this last occasion were very glad to pay considerably higher prices than were received last year. As usual the prices paid were premiums in addition to the regular $18 subscription price.

The highest price in row A was $24.50 for a seat on the center aisle left. In row B there were some recessions as compared with last year. The highest price paid today was $25.50 for two seats in the center. Last year $27.50 was paid for three left aisle seats.

In row C the highest price was $37 for two seats on the center aisle left. Last year the lowest price m this row was $31.50 for four seats divided by the center aisle.

In row D prices today were advanced as high as $47.50 for one seat on the center aisle left. The highest price in this row last year was $31.50 for a seat on the center aisle left.

The bidders—"the maiden aunts"—who came with the "uncles" often from mansions of older days on Beacon Hill, often had a little tremor to their smile at recollections of other auctions—before the changing of the older order.

"For once in my life I got here ahead of you," said one of them, pointing a finger at a straggler, a little old lady with an Indian shawl over her arm—an Indian shawl in this day of 1915!

So they kept coming until the family reunions multiplied and all that was lacking was the family pew.

"Eighteen, eighteen; we'll start with the price of the seat," politely announced the polite auctioneer.

"Eighteen fifty, nineteen, nineteen fifty," and then a bushy-haired old gentleman who had taken tea with Dr. Holmes, like as not, piped up manfully:

"Twenty—" and the seats went—two, each for twenty.

This caused a demur. "I offered twenty-one—" a gentle voice in the corner announced after the seats had gone for twenty.

"I am very sorry," the polite auctioneer was contrite, "I didn't see your hand."

And through the sale patrons came and patrons went, went mostly with a pleased smile as of an actor who has done well his turn and departs with memories.

Beautiful feather boas, now a generation old, fluttered up and down the aisles, and, as they kept coming, the prices of the seats advanced, for the auctioneer was nearing those farther down the aisle until, in section G, two end seats went for $77 apiece.

Of the older and the newer generation, each lovers of music, the older was chiefly in evidence, the younger and busier mostly were represented by their agents, who, books in hand, bid according to directions. And despite the four or more ticket firms represented, the gathering was the largest in years, for several reasons—the improvement in business conditions, and the fact that subscribers who wish may hold their seats over to another season, and the fact that especially famous soloists will appear this year, Paderewski, Kreisler, Melba and others. Still, on the part of the ticket brokers, the prediction is that after one year of the new order, the management will go back to the auction sales, finding that its revenues will shrink too greatly by the loss of premiums.

At length the sale was through.

"The last time," said the nice aunt [illegible] Hill.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

SEPTEMBER 24,

MR. GABRILOWITSCH SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, has been engaged to take the place of Moriz Rosenthal as soloist in the Symphony concerts, the Symphony hall officials having received notice that Mr. Rosenthal, who is a Russian, is detained by the authorities in Vienna. Mr. Gabrilowitsch is the first soloist of the season and appears at the concerts of Oct. 29 and 30.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch will present the Chopin E minor concerto. The programs of the first three pairs of concerts given by the orchestra are as follows:

Oct. 15 and 16, Beethoven, seventh symphony; Brahms, "Tragic" overture; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" tone poem; Liszt, "Preludes."

Oct. 22 and 23: Enesco, symphony in E flat major; Ravel, "Mother Goose" suite; Loeffler, tone poem, "Tintagiles"; Dvorak, "Husitska" overture.

Oct. 29 and 30: Brahms, fourth symphony in E minor; Schumann, "Manfred"; Chopin, E minor concerto; Berlioz, "Roman Carnival."

BOSTON GLOBE-
SEPTEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY SALE TODAY.

Annual Auction of Seats for the Season's Concerts Will Begin at 10 O'Clock.

The first auction sale of season tickets for the Symphony concerts the coming season begins at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock this morning. The importance of this sale to those who are accustomed to go to the Friday afternoon concerts of the orchestra cannot be exaggerated, for it will determine to a very large extent the seats the regular patrons of the concerts will have next season, 1916-1917.

As already announced, this will be the last year in which the seats for the Symphony concerts are sold by auction, for next season they will be sold by subscription only at a fixed rate, the prices varying according to the location. Later in the season these prices will be announced.

Under the plan devised by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, owners of seats this year will have an option to retain them next year. Toward the end of the year they will have the opportunity to register in the office of Symphony Hall for the seats they own, and in the Spring, when subscriptions are called for, it will be their privilege to retain those seats without any dispute. For this reason, this year more than ever, it is desirable that they should bid on their own seats.

The seats sold today are the $18 seats for 24 Friday afternoon concerts. These comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows and the entire first balcony except the last five rows. The second balcony will be held out for rush seats to be sold on the days of concerts for 25 cents each.

There will be an intermission of one hour for luncheon when the broad aisle, Row X, is reached. This usually comes about 1 o'clock. The balcony is usually reached about 3 o'clock. First the right side is sold; then the left side, then the center.

RECORD,

SEPTEMBER 25,

SYMPHONY SEATS TO BE SOLD MONDAY

The auction sales of season tickets for the symphony concerts of the ensuing season which open at Symphony Hall next Monday morning at 10 a.m. will be by all odds, the most important sales of their kind the orchestra has had since its inauguration. They mark the end of a system that has been in vogue for 30 years, for beginning with the season of 1916-1917, all the seats in the hall for both Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be sold by subscription at fixed prices. The vital point in these coming sales is that they will determine, to a very large extent, what seats the regular patrons of the concerts will have in the future.

In view of this important change it will more than be to the advantage of the patrons of the symphony concerts to attend the auctions in person and secure the seats they desire.

The auction will dispose of all the $18 seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts. These comprise the entire floor with the exception of the last nine rows, and the entire first balcony with the exception of the last five rows. The upset price of these seats is $18, and the cost of the seats is the premium bid in, added to that sum.

Tuesday, Sept. 28, the $19 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, and the last five rows in the first balcony. For the Friday afternoon concerts, this year, as in the past, the entire second balcony is reserved for "rush" seats to be sold on the day of the concert at 25 cents each.

There will be no sale Wednesday, Sept. 29, but Thursday, Sept. 30, the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. These comprise the same seats as the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts. The last sale comes Friday, Oct. 1, beginning at 10 a.m., when all the rest of the seats for the Saturday evening concert will be sold with an upset price of $10. These comprise the last nine rows of the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony.

BOSTON JOURNAL-
SEPTEMBER 24,

SYMPHONY SOLOIST INTERNED IN VIENNA

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has received word that Moriz Rosenthal, the Austrian pianist, who has been engaged as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra for its third concert, will be unable to come to America this year. Rosenthal is a Russian subject, and the Austrian government has refused to let him leave Vienna.

His place will be taken by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another Russian, who is in this country, and who will be the soloist with the orchestra Oct. 29 and 30.

HERALD, SATURDAY,
SEPTEMBER 25,

GABRILOWITSCH TO PLAY IN ROSENTHAL'S PLACE

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, has been notified by the Wolfsohn bureau of New York that Moriz Rosenthal, the Austrian pianist, who had been engaged as soloist with the Symphony orchestra for its third concert, will be unable to come to America this year. Arrangements have been made whereby his place will be taken by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will be the soloist with the orchestra Oct. 29 and 30. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's playing last year with the orchestra was a feature of the season.

SUNDAY GLOBE-
-SEPTEMBER 26,

Last Auction Sale of Symphony Tickets

The auction sales of season tickets, which begin at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning, will be the last sales of their kind for a concert season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for, beginning with the season of 1916-1917, the season tickets for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be sold by subscription at fixed prices. The immediate result of this announcement has been to make the four auction sales this week the most important to the patrons in the history of the orchestra.

In working out a preliminary plan for subscription, Mr Ellis decided that the fairest way in which to allot seats at the beginning of a subscription—which would be a permanent affair—will be to allow the owners of the seats bought at the coming auction sales to retain those seats for 1916-1917, and for as many years after as they wish to do so.

After the season has been well started, the owners of seats for both series of concerts will be given an opportunity to register their names, addresses and the seats they occupy, so that when notice of subscription for the following season is sent out it will be taken for granted that the owners of seats will retain their seats unless they notify the management to the contrary.

Tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock the $18 seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold, the ultimate cost being the premium bid added to the original price of $18.

Tuesday morning the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be offered, comprising the last nine rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. As has been the custom for many years, the second balcony for the Friday afternoon concerts is set aside for "rush" seats, to be sold on the day of the concert at 25 cents each.

There will be no sale on Wednesday, but Thursday the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned. At the final sale Friday morning, Oct 1, the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered. These include the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony and the entire second balcony.

The first concert will be given Friday afternoon, Oct 15. The first program will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, "Tragic Overture," Brahms; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

The second program, Oct 22 and 23, contains the first novelty of the season, a symphony in E-flat major, by Georges Enesco, the Rumanian violinist. Other numbers will be Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," and Dvorak's overt[illegible] "Husitska."

BOSTON GLOBE-
SEPTEMBER 24

CHANGE IN SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

Gabrilowitsch Replaces Rosenthal, Who Is Detained Abroad.

Moriz Rosenthal, the Austrian pianist who had been engaged as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra for its third concert, will be unable to come to America this year. He is a Russian subject, although practically since boyhood he has been a resident of Vienna and identified with Austria, but the Austrian Government refuses to let him leave that country.

His place will be taken by Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist with the orchestra Oct 29 and 30.

SUNDAY HERALD,

SEPTEMBER 26,

Boston Symphony Orchestra

No announcement in many years has raised such wide-spread interest in the musical public of Boston and vicinity as that made 10 days ago by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, that the auction sales of season tickets which begins at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, will be the last sales of their kind and that beginning with the season of 1916-1917 the season tickets for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be sold by subscription at fixed prices. The immediate result of this announcement has been to make the four auction sales to be held next week the most important to the patrons in the history of the orchestra, for they will determine, to a very large extent, where the regular subscribers will sit at the concerts in future years.

In working out a preliminary plan for subscription, Mr. Ellis decided that the fairest way in which to allot seats at the beginning of a subscription—which would be a permanent affair—will be to allow the owners of the seats bought at the coming auction sales to retain these seats for 1916-1917 and as many years after as they wish to do so. The plan is that after the season has been well started, the owners of seats for both series of concerts will be given an opportunity to register their names, addresses, and the seats they occupy so that when notice of subscription for the following season is sent out next spring, it will be taken for granted that the owners of seats will retain their seats unless they notify the management to the contrary.

To put it another way, Mrs. "X" will buy tomorrow M-25-26. Later in the season she will be requested to register her name and address and the seats she owns and in the spring she will be notified that she has the privilege of renewing her subscription for those seats, and unless she fails to renew before a given date or notifies the management she doesn't care for them, the seats are hers for the following year. This is the plan followed by the orchestra with such success in New York and the other cities it visits, and it is also the plan that is used at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The auction sales will be four in number, occupying the greater part of four days. Tomorrow (Monday) the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise all the seats on the floor, excepting the last nine rows and all the seats in the first balcony, except the last five rows. The ultimate cost of these seats will be the premium bid, added to the original upset price of $18. Tuesday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold, comprising the last nine rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. As has been the custom for so many years, the second balcony for the Friday afternoon concerts is set aside for "rush" seats to be sold on the day of the concert at 25 cents each.

There will be no sale on Wednesday, but Thursday the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned. These are the same as for Friday afternoon, all the seats on the floor, except the last nine rows, and all the seats in the first balcony, except the last five rows. The final sale will be Friday, Oct. 1, when the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be put up for sale. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. It is hardly necessary to say that this year, beyond all other years, it will be to the advantage of patrons to attend the auction in person and bid in their seats, as in that way only are they certain of getting the seats they desire.

Dr. Muck has announced the first two programs. At neither does a soloist appear. The first program will comprise Beethoven's A-major Symphony No. 7; Brahms's "Tragic Overture"; Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

The second program, which will be played Oct. 22 and 23, is decidedly French in complexion, and contains the first novelty of the season. This is a symphony in E-flat major by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian violinist and composer, some of whose music has been heard here in the past; the fascinating suite of Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye," which had such success two years ago; Charles Martin Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Dvorak's Overture, "Husitska."

SEPTEMBER 26,

FIRST SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS BEGINS MONDAY

Under the New Plan, Purchasers Can Retain Same Places for Years.

No announcement in many years has raised such wide-spread interest in the musical public of Boston and vicinity as that made ten days ago by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, that the auction sales of season tickets which begin at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning, will be the last of their kind and that beginning with the season of 1916-1917 the season tickets for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be sold by subscription at fixed prices.

The immediate result of this announcement has been to make the four auction sales to be held next week the most important to the patrons in the history of the orchestra, for they will determine, to a very large extent, where the regular subscribers will sit at the concerts in future years.

In working out a preliminary plan for subscription, Mr. Ellis decided that the fairest way in which to allot seats at the beginning of a subscription—which would be a permanent affair—will be to allow the owners of the seats bought at the coming auction sales to retain those seats for 1916-1917 and for as many years after as they wish to do so.

The plan is that after the season has been well started, the owners of seats for both series of concerts will be given an opportunity to register their names, addresses, and the seats they occupy so that when notice of subscription for the following season is sent out next Spring, it will be taken for granted that the owners of seats will retain their seats unless they notify the management to the contrary.

The auction sales will be four in number, occupying the greater part of four days. Tomorrow the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise all the seats on the floor, excepting the last nine rows, and all the seats in the first balcony, except the last five rows.

Tuesday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold.

There will be no sale on Wednesday, but Thursday the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned. These are the same as for Friday afternoon, all the seats on the floor, except the last nine rows, and all the seats in the first balcony except the last five rows. The final sale will be Friday, October 1, when the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be put up for sale.

Dr. Muck has announced the first two programs. At neither does a soloist appear. The first program will comprise Beethoven's A-major Symphony, No. 7; Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

The second program, which will be played October 22 and 23, is decidedly French in complexion, and contains the first novelty of the season. This is a symphony in E-flat major by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian violinist and composer, some of whose music has been heard here in the past; the fascinating suite of Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye," which had such success two years ago; Charles Martin Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Dvorak's Overture, "Husitska."

BOSTON JOURNAL-
SEPTEMBER 23,

GO-CART POEM ON SYMPHONY LIST

Other Novelties on Programs for the Coming Season.

American composers will be well represented on the Symphony programs this coming season. The principal novelty, so it is officially announced, will be a symphonic poem by John Alden Carpenter of Chicago, which is a humorous work entitled "Adventures in a Perambulator" and which describes a baby's outing with a nurse—say, along Commonwealth avenue one fine fall morning.

Other novelties will include a symphony by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer; the "Symphonic Variations" composed by Ernest Schelling, the American pianist, who will play the solo part when the work is performed; a theme and variations by Enrico Bossi, the Italian writer, and a Mahler symphony. Mozart's double concerto for violin and viola will be performed, with Anton Witek and Emil Ferir as soloists. Then there will be a symphonic poem by Liszt that has not yet been heard in Boston, "Ce Qu'on Entend sur la Montagne." Liszt's "Dante" symphony will be revived.

The season will open on Oct. 15 with Beethoven's seventh symphony as the chief number on the program. Dr. Muck also plans to conduct the third and fourth symphonies of Brahms.

Any large variety of new foreign works is out of the question for the present, for the composers living abroad are writing little, owing to the war, and publishers report chaotic conditions.

BOSTON POST,
SEPTEMBER 23,

PROGRAMMES FOR SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Gives List of Works for 24 Concerts

Dr. Karl Muck yesterday announced 24 programmes that he plans to have played at the Symphony concerts this season, and declared that when these interesting works are played he will have other novel features to offer.

The season opens with the seventh symphony of Beethoven. Of Brahms, Dr. Muck is going to do the third and fourth symphony. He has never conducted in the third symphony in Boston.

The principal revival of the season will be the "Dante" symphony of Liszt. Another work of Liszt and one which will appear for the first time on the Symphony programme is the symphonic poem, "Ce qu 'en entend surla montague."

The most interesting novelty of the season from many points of view will be by the American composer, John Alden Carpenter. This is the symphonic poem, "Adventures in a Perambulator." This is said to be a truly humorous music, the theme of which is the adventure of a baby and its nurse during its daily airing.

Another novelty is a symphony by the Roumanian composer, Georges Enesco. Still another is a theme and variations by the Italian composer, Enrico Bessi. Then there will be Ernest Schelling's new "Symphonic

BOSTON JOURNAL.

SEPTEMBER 25.

SYMPHONY SALE TO OPEN MONDAY

The auction sales of season tickets for the coming Symphony concerts open at Symphony Hall next Monday morning. They will be by all odds the most important sales of their kind the orchestra has had since its inauguration. They mark the end of a system that has been in vogue for 30 years, for, beginning with the season of 1916-1917, all the seats in the hall, for both afternoon and evening concerts, will be sold by subscription at fixed prices.

In working out the scheme Mr. Ellis, the manager, decided that the fairest way to allot seats by subscription for 1916-1917 and for the following seasons would be to allow the owners of the seats bought at the coming auction sales to retain them at their will. In view of this important change it will be to the advantage of the patrons of the Symphony concerts to attend the auction sale in person and secure the seats they desire.

At the sale, which begins at 10 o'clock Monday morning, the $18 seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. The upset price of these seats is $18, and the cost of the seats is the premium bid in, added to that sum. The seats comprise all the floor but the last nine rows and whole front balcony except the last five rows.

Tuesday, Sept. 28, the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, and the last five rows in the first balcony. The entire second balcony is reserved for "rush" seats, to be sold on Friday at 25 cents each.

On Thursday, Sept. 30, the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. These comprise the same seats as the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts. The last sale comes Friday, Oct. 1, when all the rest of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold, with an upset price of $10. These comprise the last nine rows of the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony.

Mr. Muck announces that the first program, which will be played Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, and Saturday evening, Oct. 16, comprises the seventh symphony by Beethoven, the "Tragic Overture," by Brahms; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's "Prelude."

The program for Oct. 22 and 23 brings the first novelty of the season, a symphony by Georges Enesco, which will be followed by Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye," Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture.

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 23.

DR. MUCK PLANS FOR CONCERTS

Some of the Works

Symphony Orchestra to Produce This Season.

Conductors of symphony orchestras are hard put to it this year to provide the usual number of "novelties" which should be a feature of each season. Not only is little new music being written in this time of war, but it is next to impossible to get new music to America. The usual repertory must be the most deeply drawn from three or four symphonies by Beethoven, two by Brahms, and at least one by Schumann and Schubert each, while Mozart, Haydn and Bach, of the 18th century, will play their usual part in the programs and the moderns will be duly represented. The season opens with the Seventh Symphony by Beethoven. Of Brahms, Dr. Muck is going to do the Third and Fourth Symphony. He has never conducted the Third Symphony in Boston. The principal revival of the season will be Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, a work of much interest and of prime importance. Another work of Liszt, and one which will appear for the first time on a Symphony program, is the symphonic poem, "Ce qu' on entend sur la montagne."

If its success in Chicago last season is any criterion, the most interesting novelty of the season will be by the American composer, John Alden Carpenter, the symphonic poem, "Adventures in a Perambulator." This is said to be truly humorous music, the theme of which is the adventures of a baby and its nurse during its daily airing.

Another novelty is a symphony in E-flat major by the Roumanian composer, Georges Enesco. The symphony has been in the library for several years, but its performance never has been [illegible] theme and there will be Ernest Schelling's new "Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra with Mr. Schelling as pianist.

Dr. Muck intends also to do some of Mahler's symphonies. Necessarily it will be one without chorus for it is impossible to employ a large chorus in Symphony Hall at a regular symphony concert. Mozart's double concerto for violin and viola will be played by Messrs. Witek and Ferir.

Announcement has been made that Richard Strauss's new "Alpine" tone poem is ready for performance. Dr. Muck would like to do this in Boston, but it is out of the question, for Strauss has gone beyond all limits in the forces he employs. It would be impossible to gather such an orchestra in Boston. Thus he demands 24 horns.

Undoubtedly, Dr. Muck does not lay specific plans for any distance in the future, and the works mentioned are the only unusual ones he desires to announce at the present time. It is possible before the whole 24 programs shall have been played that other interesting and novel works will find their places in the concerts.

SUNDAY POST,

SEPTEMBER 26,

Symphony Auction Sale

The Sale Commencing Tomorrow Morning in Symphony Hall to Be Last Auction Sale in History of Boston Orchestra—To Determine Largely Where Permanent Patrons of Concerts Will Sit in Years to Come

Charles A. Ellis' announcement that the auction sales of seats for the Boston Symphony season which begin tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall will will be the last sales of their kind, and that beginning with the season of 1916-17, the season tickets for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be sold by subscription at fixed prices, is one of the utmost interest and importance to music-lovers of this city. The immediate result of this announcement has been to make the four auction sales to be held this week the most important to the patrons in the history of the orchestra, for they will determine, to a very large extent, where the regular subscribers will sit at the concerts in future years.

In working out a preliminary plan for subscription, Mr. Ellis decided that the fairest way in which to allot seats at the beginning of a subscription—which would be a permanent affair—will be to allow the owners of the seats bought at the coming auction sales to retain those seats for 1916-1917 and for as many years after as they wish to do so. The plan is that after the season has been well started, the owners of seats for both series of concerts will be given an opportunity to register their names, addresses, and the seats they occupy, so that when notice of subscription for the following season is sent out next spring it will be taken for granted that the owners of seats will retain their seats unless they notify the management to the contrary.

To put it in another way, Mrs. "X." will buy tomorrow M 25-26. Later in the season she will be requested to register her name and address and the seats she owns, and in the spring she will be notified that she has the privilege of renewing her subscription for those seats, and unless she fails to renew before a given date or notifies the management she doesn't care for them, the seats are hers for the following year. This is the plan followed by the orchestra with such success in New York and the other cities it visits, and it is also the plan that is used at the Metropolitan Opera House.

$18 Seats for Friday Tomorrow

The auction sales will be four in number, occupying the greater part of four days. Tomorrow (Monday) the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise all the seats on the floor, excepting the last nine rows and all the seats in the first balcony, except the last five rows. The ultimate cost of these seats will be the premium bid, added to the original upset price of $18. Tuesday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold, comprising the last nine rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. As has been the custom for so many years, the second balcony for the Friday afternoon concerts is set aside for "rush" seats, to be sold on the day of the concert at 25 cents each.

There will be no sale on Wednesday, but Thursday the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned. These are the same as for Friday afternoon, all the seats on the floor except the last nine rows, and all the seats in the first balcony except the last five rows. The final sale will be Friday, Oct. 1, when the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be put up for sale. These comprize the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. It is hardly necessary to say that this year, beyond all other years, it will be to the advantage of patrons to attend the auction in person and bid in their seats, as in that way only are they certain of getting the seats they desire.

First Two Programmes

Dr. Muck has announced the first two programmes. At neither does a soloist appear. The first programme will comprise Beethoven's A-major Symphony No. 7; Brahms' "Tragic Overture"; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

The second programme, which will be played Oct. 22 and 23 is decidedly French in complexion, contains the first novelty of the season. This is a symphony in E-flat major by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian violinist and composer, some of whose music has been heard here in the past; the fascinating suite of Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye," which had such success two years ago; Charles Martin Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska."

BOSTON POST,

SEPTEMBER 27,

AUCTION SALE FOR SYMPHONY

Seats for Fridays to Be Disposed of Today

The "Symphony regulars" will have the opportunity today practically to determine what seats they will occupy at Friday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for seasons to come, at the first auction sale of season tickets for the concerts of the coming winter and spring. This will be the last series of auction sales of Symphony tickets, which next season and thereafter will be sold by subscription only at fixed rate, and, under the plan devised by Manager C. A. Ellis of the orchestra, owners of seats this year will have an option to retain them next year, and probably they will be able to secure the same seats during following years.

Today's auction will open at 10 a. m. in Symphony Hall, and the $18 seats for 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. They comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows, and all the first balcony except the last five rows.

BOSTON JOURNAL.

SEPTEMBER 27.

FINAL SYMPHONY AUCTION OPENING

Last Sale of Its Kind to Begin at Symphony Hall Today.

The auction sale of season tickets for the opening Symphony concerts begins at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock this morning. This year's sale will determine to a large extent the seats the regular symphony patrons will have next season as this will be the last time symphony seats will be sold by auction. Next time they will be sold by subscription only, at a fixed rate. The prices, varying according to the location, will be announced later.

Under the plan devised by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, owners of seats this year will have an option to retain them next year. It is expected that for this reason more patrons will bid for their own seats than for many years past.

The $18 seats for 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold today. These comprise the entire floor, except the last nine rows, and the entire first balcony, except the last five rows. The second balcony will be held for "rush" seats to be sold on the days of concerts for 25 cents each.

SEPTEMBER 25,

MONITOR, BOSTON,

NON-UNION ISSUE DEFINED IN CASE OF ORCHESTRAS

Conditions Noted Under Which Boston Symphony Men Visited San Francisco, With the Effect on Federation Elections

Many observers of the orchestral situation in the United States have been curious in regard to the arrangements under which the Boston Symphony orchestra, a non-union organization, made a visit of two weeks in May at the Panama-Pacific exposition, notwithstanding the arrangement supposed to be effective between the American Federation of Musicians and the exposition authorities that all performances should be given under union rules. These observers have been left to suppose that one of two things occurred: Either the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its concerts in San Francisco in spite of the union arrangements, or else it gave them with union [illegible]

It was stated in The Christian Science Monitor of Feb. 20, on the authority of Harold Brenton, New England member of the national executive board of the federation, that before George W. Stewart, the director of exposition music, could engage the Boston organization for appearance at San Francisco, the federation officials would have to discuss the question and act on it. The supposition was, Mr. Brenton noted at that time, that the federation would give its approval; but the point was made, that under an agreement drawn up by Mr. Stewart and the president of the federation, Joseph N. Weber, in December, 1913, union rules should govern all engagements of orchestral and band musicians at San Francisco.

After the Symphony orchestra made its trip to the exposition, gave its concerts, and returned in artistic triumph, the question arose as to whether the union agreement was broken or evaded or whether it was set aside with the consent of the federation. Inasmuch as the question has been persistently asked ever since, some facts in the case may serve to make the situation clear. It will be remembered that the first proposal of the Boston Symphony orchestra to appear in San Francisco was announced as coming from Mr. Stewart, the director of the exposition music, who made the agreement with the federation in regard to union rules. It will be remembered that after the publication of Mr. Brenton's interview, official announcements of negotiations made no particular mention of the exposition music director as a principal factor. Indeed, anybody who desired to know, had extreme difficulty in finding out just what negotiations were made whereby the orchestra was to appear at the fair. And so far as union consent was concerned, that was neither given nor withheld in any public way.

It transpires that the whole enterprise of the Symphony orchestra's visit was taken out of union jurisdiction by a simple managerial device. A plan was evolved whereby the Boston organization could make its visit to San Francisco in what may be called a private instead of an official capacity. This plan is said to have been executed through William H. Leahy, the San Francisco concert manager. Mr. Leahy, it is said, engaged Festival hall on the exposition grounds for two weeks, taking the building as a concession and paying for it, with the understanding that he could use it in whatever appropriate manner he chose. Having done that, it is further said, he took the responsibility of engaging the Symphony orchestra, with guarantors assisting, and acted as local director of the short concert season.

Necessarily this exploit of the concert managers reacted on federation policy. At the very time that the Symphony orchestra opened its series of concerts in Festival hall, delegates of the National American Federation of Musicians were sitting in annual general convention at San Francisco. On the day after the first concert the delegates took up the question of electing a president. It is said that they intended to reëlect Frank Carothers, who had held office since May, 1914, succeeding Mr. Weber, the president who entered into the agreement with the exposition music director. But certain members of the convention raising objections to the reëlection of Mr. Carothers on the ground that under his administration the agreement of 1913 had been evaded, sentiment took a decided turn. It was argued that if union arrangements could be pushed aside on a technicality and a non-union orchestra could be allowed to appear where it had been understood it should not play without federation consent, nothing stable could be expected in agreements. At once the name of the former president, who had drawn up the arrangement with the exposition music director was put in nomination and he was elected with strong acclaim.

It thus appears that the federation held its ground on the question of the official music at the exposition and that it never made any exception in the case of the Boston Symphony orchestra, not having been given an opportunity to do so. And it appears that the reason why the federation had no such opportunity is to be found in the unofficial and technically private manner in which the orchestra was booked to appear on the exposition grounds. It appears, finally, that the maneuver of the concert managers which made such unofficial appearance possible had a direct effect on federation elections, making the issues between the non-union Boston Symphony orchestra and the union orchestras both in Boston and in other cities of the United States, clearer than they have been since Mr. Weber's former incumbency as federation president.

AMERICAN MUSIC NOTES

It is announced that the sales of season tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which open on Monday morning at 10 o'clock in Symphony hall, will mark the end of the

BOSTON JOURNAL-

SEPTEMBER 25,

SYMPHONY SALE TO OPEN MONDAY

The auction sales of season tickets for the coming Symphony concerts open at Symphony Hall next Monday morning. They will be by all odds the most important sales of their kind the orchestra has had since its inauguration. They mark the end of a system that has been in vogue for 30 years, for, beginning with the season of 1916-1917, all the seats in the hall, for both afternoon and evening concerts, will be sold by subscription at fixed prices.

In working out the scheme Mr. Ellis, the manager, decided that the fairest way to allot seats by subscription for 1916-1917 and for the following seasons would be to allow the owners of the seats bought at the coming auction sales to retain them at their will. In view of this important change it will be to the advantage of the patrons of the Symphony concerts to attend the auction sale in person and secure the seats they desire.

At the sale, which begins at 10 o'clock Monday morning, the $18 seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. The upset price of these seats is $18, and the cost of the seats is the premium bid in, added to that sum. The seats comprise all the floor but the last nine rows and whole front balcony except the last five rows.

Tuesday, Sept. 28, the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, and the last five rows in the first balcony. The entire second balcony is reserved for "rush" seats, to be sold on Friday at 25 cents each.

On Thursday, Sept. 30, the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. These comprise the same seats as the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts. The last sale comes Friday, Oct. 1, when all the rest of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold, with an upset price of $10. These comprise the last nine rows of the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony.

Mr. Muck announces that the first program, which will be played Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, and Saturday evening, Oct. 16, comprises the seventh symphony by Beethoven, the "Tragic Overture," by Brahms; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's "Prelude."

The program for Oct. 22 and 23 brings the first novelty of the season, a symphony by Georges Enesco, which will be followed by Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye," Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture.

BOSTON HERALD,

SEPTEMBER 23,

DR. MUCK PLANS FOR CONCERTS

Some of the Works B[illegible] Symphony Orchestra to Produce This Season.

Conductors of symphony orchestras are hard put to it this year to provide the usual number of "novelties" which should be a feature of each season. Not only is little new music being written in this time of war, but it is next to impossible to get new music to America. The usual repertory must be the most deeply drawn from three or four symphonies by Beethoven, two by Brahms, and at least one by Schumann and Schubert each, while Mozart, Haydn and Bach, of the 18th century, will play their usual part in the programs and the moderns will be duly represented. The season opens with the Seventh Symphony by Beethoven. Of Brahms, Dr. Muck is going to do the Third and Fourth Symphony. He has never conducted the Third Symphony in Boston. The principal revival of the season will be Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, a work of much interest and of prime importance. Another work of Liszt, and one which will appear for the first time on a Symphony program, is the symphonic poem, "Ce qu' on entend sur la montagne."

If its success in Chicago last season is any criterion, the most interesting noevelty of the season will be by the American composer, John Alden Carpenter, the symphonic poem, "Adventures in a Perambulator." This is said to be truly humorous music, the theme of which is the adventures of a baby and its nurse during its daily airing.

Another novelty is a symphony in E-flat major by the Roumanian composer, Georges Enesco. The symphony has been in the library for several years, but its performance never has been there will be Ernest Schelling's new "Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra with Mr. Schelling as pianist.

Dr. Muck intends also to do some of Mahler's symphonies. Necessarily it will be one without chorus for it is impossible to employ a large chorus in Symphony Hall at a regular symphony concert. Mozart's double concerto for violin and viola will be played by Messrs. Witek and Ferir.

Announcement has been made that Richard Strauss's new "Alpine" tone poem is ready for performance. Dr. Muck would like to do this in Boston, but it is out of the question, for Strauss has gone beyond all limits in the forces he employs. It would be impossible to gather such an orchestra in Boston. Thus he demands 24 horns.

Undoubtedly, Dr. Muck does not lay specific plans for any distance in the future, and the works mentioned are the only unusual ones he desires to announce at the present time. It is possible before the whole 24 programs shall have been played that other interesting and novel works will find their places in the concerts.

SUNDAY POST,

SEPTEMBER 26,

Symphony Auction Sale

The Sale Commencing Tomorrow Morning in Symphony Hall to Be Last Auction Sale in History of Boston Orchestra—To Determine Largely Where Permanent Patrons of Concerts Will Sit in Years to Come

Charles A. Ellis' announcement that the auction sales of seats for the Boston Symphony season which begin tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall will be the last sales of their kind, and that beginning with the season of 1916-17, the season tickets for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be sold by subscription at fixed prices, is one of the utmost interest and importance to music-lovers of this city. The immediate result of this announcement has been to make the four auction sales to be held this week the most important to the patrons in the history of the orchestra, for they will determine, to a very large extent, where the regular subscribers will sit at the concerts in future years.

In working out a preliminary plan for subscription, Mr. Ellis decided that the fairest way in which to allot seats at the beginning of a subscription—which would be a permanent affair—will be to allow the owners of the seats bought at the coming auction sales to retain those seats for 1916-1917 and for as many years after as they wish to do so. The plan is that after the season has been well started, the owners of seats for both series of concerts will be given an opportunity to register their names, addresses, and the seats they occupy, so that when notice of subscription for the following season is sent out next spring it will be taken for granted that the owners of seats will retain their seats unless they notify the management to the contrary.

To put it in another way, Mrs. "X." will buy tomorrow M 25-26. Later in the season she will be requested to register her name and address and the seats she owns, and in the spring she will be notified that she has the privilege of renewing her subscription for those seats, and unless she fails to renew before a given date or notifies the management she doesn't care for them, the seats are hers for the following year. This is the plan followed by the orchestra with such success in New York and the other cities it visits, and it is also the plan that is used at the Metropolitan Opera House.

$18 Seats for Friday Tomorrow

The auction sales will be four in number, occupying the greater part of four days. Tomorrow (Monday) the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise all the seats on the floor, excepting the last nine rows and all the seats in the first balcony, except the last five rows. The ultimate cost of these seats will be the premium bid, added to the original upset price of $18. Tuesday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold, comprising the last nine rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. As has been the custom for so many years, the second balcony for the Friday afternoon concerts is set aside for "rush" seats, to be sold on the day of the concert at 25 cents each.

There will be no sale on Wednesday, but Thursday the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned. These are the same as for Friday afternoon, all the seats on the floor except the last nine rows, and all the seats in the first balcony except the last five rows. The final sale will be Friday, Oct. 1, when the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be put up for sale. These comprize the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. It is hardly necessary to say that this year, beyond all other years, it will be to the advantage of patrons to attend the auction in person and bid in their seats, as in that way only are they certain of getting the seats they desire.

First Two Programmes

Dr. Muck has announced the first two programmes. At neither does a soloist appear. The first programme will comprise Beethoven's A-major Symphony No 7; Brahms' "Tragic Overture"; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

The second programme, which will be played Oct. 22 and 23 is decidedly French in complexion, contains the first novelty of the season. This is a symphony in E-flat major by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian violinist and composer, some of whose music has been heard here in the past; the fascinating suite of Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye," which had such success two years ago; Charles Martin Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska."

BOSTON POST,

SEPTEMBER 27,

AUCTION SALE FOR SYMPHONY

Seats for Fridays to Be Disposed of Today

The "Symphony regulars" will have the opportunity today practically to determine what seats they will occupy at Friday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for seasons to come, at the first auction sale of season tickets for the concerts of the coming winter and spring. This will be the last series of auction sales of Symphony tickets, which next season and thereafter will be sold by subscription only at fixed rate, and, under the plan devised by Manager C. A. Ellis of the orchestra, owners of seats this year will have an option to retain them next year, and probably they will be able to secure the same seats during following years.

Today's auction will open at 10 a. m. in Symphony Hall, and the $18 seats for 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. They comprise the entire floor except the last nine rows, and all the first balcony except the last five rows.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

SEPTEMBER 27.

FINAL SYMPHONY AUCTION OPENING

Last Sale of Its Kind to Begin at Symphony Hall Today.

The auction sale of season tickets for the opening Symphony concerts begins at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock this morning. This year's sale will determine to a large extent the seats the regular symphony patrons will have next season as this will be the last time symphony seats will be sold by auction. Next time they will be sold by subscription only, at a fixed rate. The prices, varying according to the location, will be announced later.

Under the plan devised by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, owners of seats this year will have an option to retain them next year. It is expected that for this reason more patrons will bid for their own seats than for many years past.

The $18 seats for 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold today. These comprise the entire floor, except the last nine rows, and the entire first balcony, except the last five rows. The second balcony will be held for "rush" seats to be sold on the days of concerts for 25 cents each.

SEPTEMBER 25,

MONITOR, BOSTON,

NON-UNION ISSUE DEFINED IN CASE OF ORCHESTRAS

Conditions Noted Under Which Boston Symphony Men Visited San Francisco, With the Effect on Federation Elections

Many observers of the orchestral situation in the United States have been curious in regard to the arrangements under which the Boston Symphony orchestra, a non-union organization, made a visit of two weeks in May at the Panama-Pacific exposition, notwithstanding the arrangement supposed to be effectiv between the American Federation of Mu sicians and the exposition authoritie that all performances should be give under union rules. These observers hav been left to suppose that one of tw things occurred: Either the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its concerts in Sa Francisco in spite of the union arrangements or else it gave them with unio

It was stated in The Christian Science Monitor of Feb. 20, on the authority of Harold Brenton, New England member of the national executive board of the federation, that before George W. Stewart, the director of exposition music, could engage the Boston organization for appearance at San Francisco, the federation officials would have to discuss the question and act on it. The supposition was, Mr. Brenton noted at that time, that the federation would give its approval; but the point was made, that under an agreement drawn up by Mr. Stewart and the president of the federation, Joseph N. Weber, in December, 1913, union rules should govern all engagements of orchestral and band musicians at San Francisco.

After the Symphony orchestra made its trip to the exposition, gave its concerts, and returned in artistic triumph, the question arose as to whether the union agreement was broken or evaded or whether it was set aside with the consent of the federation. Inasmuch as the question has been persistently asked ever since, some facts in the case may serve to make the situation clear. It will be remembered that the first proposal of the Boston Symphony orchestra to appear in San Francisco was announced as coming from Mr. Stewart, the director of the exposition music, who made the agreement with the federation in regard to union rules. It will be remembered that after the publication of Mr. Brenton's interview, official announcements of negotiations made no particular mention of the exposition music director as a principal factor. Indeed, anybody who desired to know, had extreme difficulty in finding out just what negotiations were made whereby the orchestra was to appear at the fair. And so far as union consent was concerned, that was neither given nor withheld in any public way.

It transpires that the whole enterprise of the Symphony orchestra's visit was taken out of union jurisdiction by a simple managerial device. A plan was evolved whereby the Boston organization could make its visit to San Francisco in what may be called a private instead of an official capacity. This plan is said to have been executed through William H. Leahy, the San Francisco concert manager. Mr. Leahy, it is said, engaged Festival hall on the exposition grounds for two weeks, taking the building as a concession and paying for it, with the understanding that he could use it in whatever appropriate manner he chose. Having done that, it is further said, he took the responsibility of engaging the Symphony orchestra, with guarantors assisting, and acted as local director of the short concert season.

Necessarily this exploit of the concert managers reacted on federation policy. At the very time that the Symphony orchestra opened its series of concerts in Festival hall, delegates of the National American Federation of Musicians were sitting in annual general convention at San Francisco. On the day after the first concert the delegates took up the question of electing a president. It is said that they intended to reëlect Frank Carothers, who had held office since May, 1914, succeeding Mr. Weber, the president who entered into the agreement with the exposition music director. But certain members of the convention raising objections to the reëlection of Mr. Carothers on the ground that under his administration the agreement of 1913 had been evaded, sentiment took a decided turn. It was argued that if union arrangements could be pushed aside on a technicality and a non-union orchestra could be allowed to appear where it had been understood it should not play without federation consent, nothing stable could be expected in agreements. At once the name of the former president, who had drawn up the arrangement with the exposition music director was put in nomination and he was elected with strong acclaim.

It thus appears that the federation held its ground on the question of the official music at the exposition and that it never made any exception in the case of the Boston Symphony orchestra, not having been given an opportunity to do so. And it appears that the reason why the federation had no such opportunity is to be found in the unofficial and technically private manner in which the orchestra was booked to appear on the exposition grounds. It appears, finally, that the maneuver of the concert managers which made such unofficial appearance possible had a direct effect on federation elections, making the issues between the non-union Boston Symphony orchestra and the union orchestras both in Boston and in other cities of the United States, clearer than they have been since Mr. Weber's former incumbency as federation president.

AMERICAN MUSIC NOTES

It is announced that the sales of season tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which open on Monday morning at 10 o'clock in Symphony hall, will mark the end of the tion system, which has been employed for 30 years. Beginning with the season of 1916-17, the managers say, all the seats in the hall for both Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be sold by subscription at fixed prices.

If, as seems probable, the prices of next season are determined by the receipts from the sales this year and recent past years, something like $50 or $60 a subscription may be expected, for in the bidding at recent auctions, the best seats in the middle of the floor section have brought premiums varying from $18 to $40. These sums added to the starting price of $18, bring the price of each of the 24 concerts up to about $2 and $2.50. A few premiums, however, have run far over $40, and have made the price of each concert $3 and $4 and even more. The new season will put an end to excessive prices, though it cannot be said that they were a necessary hardship, inasmuch as seats in the immediate neighborhood of the dearly bought ones have always been available at moderate premiums.

According to the plan now announced purchasers this year may renew possession of their seats, if they wish to become subscribers next season. And they may continue to hold their seats permanently, if they so desire. So the new system, while doing away with the uncertainties of the auction, and putting the receipts of the orchestra on a determinate basis, may also tend to make seat ownership exclusive. The supposed democracy of the concerts will be no longer emphasized. And with the city growing into a large artistic community, the democratic expressions of music will doubtless find other and more suitable means of outlet. But the second balcony on Friday afternoons, with its 25-cent opportunity, named from times when concert hall arrangements were less disciplined than today the "rush" seat, will continue, it is declared, under the new subscription of next year, a place where students and others can enjoy and appraise good music at a low charge.

At the auction of Monday morning, all the $18 seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise the entire floor, with the exception of the last five rows.

On Tuesday Sept. 28, the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, and the last five rows in the first balcony. For the Friday afternoon concerts, this year, as in the past, the entire second balcony is reserved to be sold only on the day of the concert at 25 cents each.

There will be no sale Wednesday, Sept. 29; but on Thursday, Sept. 30, the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. These comprise the same seats as the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts. The last sale comes Friday Oct. 1, beginning at 10 o'clock, when all the rest of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold with an upset price of $10. These comprise the last nine rows of the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony and the entire second balcony.

TRANSCRIPT.
SEPTEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY SEATS AT $100

Strangers Pay High Premium for Rehearsals

Favorite Places in Row K the Ones Chosen

Prices at Auction Run Higher Than Usual

Patrons Eager to Retain Seats Next Year

Many things combined to make this morning's auction sale of Symphony Concert rehearsal seats an important event. Announcement that this plan of disposing of tickets would be discontinued after this year has aroused interest, and when Walter Jackson took his stand on the platform there were many more spectators than generally appear at the auction sales.

Women were there who have occupied the same seats for years and when, owing to the interposition of Fate in the shape of bidders from among the speculators, they lost them, disappointment was evident. There were more strangers on hand than are usually noticed among the contingent of music-lovers. Bidding was counted rather slow by those in authority, and yet the average of prices was above those of recent years.

An example of what people will spend for the sake of sitting in favorite places was demonstrated when row K was reached on the big plan stretched in front of the organ. Seats 17 and 18 are among the most favorable in Symphony Hall. Beginning at $30, the auctioneer was kept counting like a school boy trying to test his ability with numbers until $100 was reached. The bidding was plainly between a speculator and a stranger, who won. The seats are across the [illegible] he top-priced ones in K brought from $50 to $75; those on the extreme right, by the entrance, brought $32, and on the other end, $48.

---

For 19 and 20 in row F, the next highest figure, $76, was paid. The lowest in that section was $21.50. For 18 in L, the bidding began at $40 and soon ran up to $64. There was a rustle of surprise when 30 in M brought $61, and 31, $65. In H and E the highest premiums were $51.50 and $51, both for the coveted 19. The same seat in I brought $59; the four just beyond it $40 each and many others, with seemingly the same advantage for seeing and hearing, went for $30.

The first seat in row B, which might almost be called undesirable if such a word can be properly applied to anything connected with the Symphony Concerts, went for $17. The highest in that section was $25.50 for two seats in the centre. Last year these seats brought two dollars more. In row C the highest price was $37 for two seats on the centre aisle left. Last year the lowest price in this row was $31.50 for four seats divided by the centre aisle. In row D prices were advanced as high as $47.50 for one seat on the centre aisle left. The highest price in this row last year was $31.50 for a seat on the centre aisle left.

The management has announced that purchasers at this sale will be given the option of subscribing in succeeding years. These persons who represent agencies are of the belief that, with the loss of the premiums, a return to the auction system is bound to come.

The $10 seats go on sale tomorrow morning.

MONITOR, BOSTON.
SEPTEMBER 27,

PREMIUMS RISE IN FINAL AUCTION AT SYMPHONY

Patrons of the Symphony concerts and representatives of the ticket agencies bid off about 600 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals this morning at Symphony hall at premiums that far exceeded those of last year and that probably averaged higher than on any former year. The premiums paid were large for the end locations on the floor of the hall, as well as for the center locations. A few seats in the very front went at comparatively low prices, as low as $15 being paid for a place under the balcony. But as soon as the front rows were auctioned off, the premiums began to rise and they kept high throughout the entire morning, running from $40 to $60.

There was less difference this year than formerly between the extreme bids and the regular ones. One bidder gave $375 for three seats in the center at row K, two of the places being on the aisle. Seats next to these went for $43 and $45. Seats on the aisle in row N brought $80 and $99. The demand for aisle locations was decidedly strong, and in many cases agents or others made their purchases in blocks of four in such a way as to take the pairs of end seats of an aisle.

The higher prices are due to the announcement made by the managers that purchasers at this year's sale will be given the option of subscribing in succeeding years to the same seats without having to pay a premium.

BOSTON HERALD.
SEPTEMBER 27.

HOLD SYMPHONY AUCTION TODAY

Sale Begins This Morning—Friday Afternoon Tickets to Go First.

The first auction sale of season tickets for the Symphony concerts this season begins at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock this morning. The importance of this sale to those who are accustomed to go to the Friday afternoon concerts of the orchestra cannot be exaggerated, for it will determine to a very large extent the seats the regular patrons of the concerts will have next season, 1916-1917. As already announced, this will be the last year in which the seats for the Symphony concerts are sold by auction, for next season they will be sold by subscription only at a fixed rate, the prices varying according to the location. Later in the season these prices will be announced.

Under the plan devised by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, owners of seats this year will have an option to retain them next year. Toward the end of the year they will have the opportunity to register in the office of Symphony Hall for the seats they own, and in the spring when subscriptions are called for, it will be their privilege to retain those seats without any dispute. For this reason, this year more than ever, it is desirable that they should bid on their own seats.

The seats sold today are the $18 seats for 24 Friday afternoon concerts. These comprise the entire floor, except the last nine rows, and the entire first balcony, except the last five rows. The second balcony will be held out for rush seats to be sold on the days of concerts for 25 cents each.

---

The usual rule will cover the sale. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

There will be an intermission of one hour for luncheon when the broad aisle, Row X, is reached. This usually comes about 1 o'clock. The balcony is usually reached about 3 o'clock. First the right aisle is sold; then the left side, then the centre.

BOSTON HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 28.

SYMPHONY BIDS AVERAGE HIGHER

Lively Action Marks Opening Sale of Seats—Two Bring $100 Each.

The auction sale of Symphony concert rehearsal seats at Symphony Hall yesterday resulted in an average of about 20 per cent. higher being paid for seats than were paid last year. While last season's high record bid for individual seats was not equalled yesterday, two seats, 17 and 18 in row K, were sold for $100 each.

They were purchased by Col. C. N. Wallace of 478 Commonwealth avenue, who has been a patron of the Symphony concerts ever since they began, and who was the possessor of the same two seats in seasons past. He had to indulge in some spirited bidding before securing them.

As the purchasers of seats this year will be given the opportunity of subscribing in succeeding years without having to pay the auction premium, there was added interest in yesterday's sale. It was noticed that many persons who have not been regular attendants at the concerts were scattered among the bidders.

Walter Jackson, acting as auctioneer, was kept very busy, for the bids in most cases, although coming quickly enough, increased but a dollar or two at a time. For instance, the seats that sold for $100 each were started at $30, and the bids ran along practically a dollar at a time. Last year's high figure was $108 for row N.

The seats on either side of the top-price ones yesterday brought from $50 to $75; those on the extreme left brought $48, and those on the right $32. The second highest price was $76, for seats 19 and 20, row F. The lowest figure for a seat in F row was $21.50. Seats 30 and 31 in row M sold for $61 and $65, respectively, and seat 18 in L brought $64. For seats 18 in rows H and E premiums of $51.50 and $50 were bid. The same sea in row I brought $59; the four seats just beyond it were sold for $40 each, and others in the same locality went for $30.

The highest sum paid for seats in row B was $22.50, the same two seats last year bringing $2 more. The highest paid for seats in C was $37, and in row B the top figure was $47.50, as compared with $31.50 last year.

This morning the $10 seats will be placed on sale.

BOSTON GLOBE–
SEPTEMBER 28,

BROKERS GET SYMPHONY SEATS

Buy Bulk of Desirable Rehearsal Tickets.

Private Buyers Forced to Pay Unusually High Prices.

Top Premium $100 Each for Two Row K Chairs.

Unless something unforeseen happens, it would appear that in the future the seat sale for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and possibly the seat sale for the Saturday evening concerts, will be largely controlled by two or three private ticket brokers' offices in this city, instead of being open to the public as in this and previous years, when the seats were disposed of at auction.

For at yesterday's sale of the $18 tickets for this year's rehearsals, promidesirable seats. And, under the announced policy of the Symphony Orchestra management that the purchasers of tickets this year will be able to retain the same seat holdings next year—when the auction system is to be abolished and the prices of tickets standardized—it would seem that the ticket brokers will be able to retain their present holdings from season to season, and possibly control prices in the future.

---

This appeared to be the general belief of many patrons of the Symphony concerts who, at yesterday's sale, were forced to pay unusually high prices for mediocre seats because of the spirited bidding of the ticket brokers or speculators.

Premiums Higher Than Last Year.

The premiums on the $18 tickets at yesterday's sale ranged fully 25 percent above those of last year, though last year's figure of $112 for a single ticket was not reached. However, $100 each for a pair of center aisle seats in row K was paid by the representative of Col C. N. Wallace of 478 Commonwealth av. This was above the upset price of $18 for each ticket.

Col Wallace's block of seven seats in row K cost him exactly $601, but they are the same that he has had for the last seven years, and his representative was under instructions to get them at any cost.

Low mark was $11, all that seat seven in the front row of the floor brought.

The heavy bidding by the ticket men resulted in a somewhat slow market; individual buyers were slow to take a hand at bidding, feeling that the prices which brokers were offering for the run of good seats were altogether too high to be outdistanced. Throughout the morning, when the front section of floor seats were being disposed of, the bulk of prospective private purchasers just sat back and waited for things to take a turn.

Seats in row N were going at a premium of $80, and one pair of aisle seats in that row, 18 and 19, went to one of the ticket men for $90 each. A block of four in O was knocked down at $69 each, three in P went at $61 each, and even back in R the center aisle seats ran up to $81. Those were fair examples of the high marks for the morning.

Agency Men Get Good Seats.

The afternoon sale, which the individual buyers hoped would run down the prices somewhat, opened with seats 1 and 2 in row T. These are under the side balcony and by no means the most desirable in the row, yet they brought $40 each. For rows T, U, V, W, X, Y and Z the average premium per seat was close to $50.

It was not until the double-letter rows at the rear of the $18 section were reached that prices began to wane. The brokers were not so keen to get these poor seats and allowed individual purchasers more leeway. The minimum price in row AA was $34. It dropped $2 in BB; was down to $27 in FF, and touched $24 in JJ, the last row.

When it came time to dispose of the balcony seats it was thought some spirited bidding would run the top price higher than the $100 bid of the morning. It didn't, however, though one of the agency men ran against a private buyer who forced him to pay $79 and $90 respectively for seats 5 and 6 of row A in the left balcony.

As with the floor seats, the agency men managed to take the best of the balcony seats, and the others were forced to content themselves with the poorer seats at the rear of the side balconies.

A fair idea of the heavy buying by the ticket men may be obtained by comparing the balcony ticket purchases of known representatives of, or the ticket brokers themselves, and the private buyers. The former secured approximately 262 of the choicest seats, while the private buyers took only 163.

And of the 163, at least 20 were withheld from public sale by the management. Buying of the floor seats by the ticket men was certainly as heavy, and probably heavier, than their operations in the balcony.

The $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals go on sale at 10 this morning. The Saturday night tickets will be auctioned at 10 Thursday and Friday mornings.

From NEWS Providence, R. I.
Address SEP 11 1915
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Madamme Melba the greatest coloratura soprano of our time, if not of all times, will make her only appearance in Providence this year at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, October 19th. It is by great chance that the Orchestra has been able to secure the services of his supreme singer. Madamme Melba is now in this country, having landed in San Francisco from Honolulu August 31st. She is to make an extended concert tour, during which she will sing several times with Boston's great orchestra.

The Orchestra, under Dr. Muck will give its usual series of six concerts in Providence on Tuesday evenings, the dates being October 19, November 23, December 28, February 3, March 7, and April 11. Orders are now being taken at Symphony Hall in Boston for season tickets. All such orders should be addressed to C. A. Ellis. The general public sale of season tickets will open at the box office of the Orchestra, Seddons' News stand, early in October.

[12]

uction system, which has been employed r 30 years. Beginning with the season 1916-17, the managers say, all the eats in the hall for both Friday afteroon and Saturday evening concerts will e sold by subscription at fixed prices.

If, as seems probable, the prices of next season are determined by the receipts from the sales this year and recent past years, something like $50 or $60 a subscription may be expected, for in the bidding at recent auctions, the best seats in the middle of the floor section have brought premiums varying from $18 to $40. These sums added to the starting price of $18, bring the price of each of the 24 concerts up to about $2 and $2.50. A few premiums, however, have run far over $40, and have made the price of each concert $3 and $4 and even more. The new season will put an end to excessive prices, though it cannot be said that they were a necessary hardship, inasmuch as seats in the immediate neighborhood of the dearly bought ones have always been available at moderate premiums.

According to the plan now announced purchasers this year may renew possession of their seats, if they wish to become subscribers next season. And they may continue to hold their seats permanently, if they so desire. So the new system, while doing away with the uncertainties of the auction, and putting the receipts of the orchestra on a determinate basis, may also tend to make seat ownership exclusive. The supposed democracy of the concerts will be no longer emphasized. And with the city growing into a large artistic community, the democratic expressions of music will doubtless find other and more suitable means of outlet. But the second balcony on Friday afternoons, with its 25-cent opportunity, named from times when concert hall arrangements were less disciplined than today the "rush" seat, will continue, it is declared, under the new subscription of next year, a place where students and others can enjoy and appraise good music at a low charge.

At the auction of Monday morning, all the $18 seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise the entire floor, with the exception of the last five rows.

On Tuesday Sept. 28, the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts will be sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, and the last five rows in the first balcony. For the Friday afternoon concerts, this year, as in the past, the entire second balcony is reserved to be sold only on the day of the concert at 25 cents each.

There will be no sale Wednesday, Sept. 29; but on Thursday, Sept. 30, the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. These comprise the same seats as the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts. The last sale comes Friday Oct. 1, beginning at 10 o'clock, when all the rest of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold with an upset price of $10. These comprise the last nine rows of the floor, the ast five rows of the first balcony and he entire second balcony.

TRANSCRIPT.
SEPTEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY SEATS AT $100

Strangers Pay High Premium for Rehearsals

Favorite Places in Row K the Ones Chosen

Prices at Auction Run Higher Than Usual

Patrons Eager to Retain Seats Next Year

Many things combined to make this morning's auction sale of Symphony Concert rehearsal seats an important event. Announcement that this plan of disposing of tickets would be discontinued after this year has aroused interest, and when Walter Jackson took his stand on the platform there were many more spectators than generally appear at the auction sales.

Women were there who have occupied the same seats for years and when, owing to the interposition of Fate in the shape of bidders from among the speculators, they lost them, disappointment was evident. There were more strangers on hand than are usually noticed among the contingent of music-lovers. Bidding was counted rather slow by those in authority, and yet the average of prices was above those of recent years.

An example of what people will spend for the sake of sitting in favorite places was demonstrated when row K was reached on the big plan stretched in front of the organ. Seats 17 and 18 are among the most favorable in Symphony Hall. Beginning at $30, the auctioneer was kept counting like a school boy trying to test his ability with numbers until $100 was reached. The bidding was plainly between a speculator and a stranger, who won. The seats are across the main aisle from each other. Last year's high figure was for [illegible] of the top-priced ones in K brought from $50 to $75; those on the extreme right, by the entrance, brought $82, and on the other end, $48.

---

For 19 and 20 in row F, the next highest figure, $76, was paid. The lowest in that section was $21.50. For 18 in L, the bidding began at $40 and soon ran up to $64. There was a rustle of surprise when 30 in M brought $61, and 31, $65. In H and E the highest premiums were $51.50 and $51, both for the coveted 19. The same seat in I brought $59; the four just beyond it $40 each and many others, with seemingly the same advantage for seeing and hearing, went for $30.

The first seat in row B, which might almost be called undesirable if such a word can be properly applied to anything connected with the Symphony Concerts, went for $17. The highest in that section was $25.50 for two seats in the centre. Last year these seats brought two dollars more. In row C the highest price was $37 for two seats on the centre aisle left. Last year the lowest price in this row was $31.50 for four seats divided by the centre aisle. In row D prices were advanced as high as $47.50 for one seat on the centre aisle left. The highest price in this row last year was $31.50 for a seat on the centre aisle left.

The management has announced that purchasers at this sale will be given the option of subscribing in succeeding years. Those persons who represent agencies are of the belief that, with the loss of the premiums, a return to the auction system is bound to come.

The $10 seats go on sale tomorrow morning.

MONITOR, BOSTON.
SEPTEMBER 27,

PREMIUMS RISE IN FINAL AUCTION AT SYMPHONY

Patrons of the Symphony concerts and representatives of the ticket agencies bid off about 600 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals this morning at Symphony hall at premiums that far exceeded those of last year and that probably averaged higher than on any former year. The premiums paid were large for the end locations on the floor of the hall, as well as for the center locations. A few seats in the very front went at comparatively low prices, as low as $15 being paid for a place under the balcony. But as soon as the front rows were auctioned off, the premiums began to rise and they kept high throughout the entire morning, running from $40 to $60.

There was less difference this year than formerly between the extreme bids and the regular ones. One bidder gave $375 for three seats in the center at row K, two of the places being on the aisle. Seats next to these went for $43 and $45. Seats on the aisle in row N brought $80 and $99. The demand for aisle locations was decidedly strong, and in many cases agents or others made their purchases in blocks of four in such a way as to take the pairs of end seats of an aisle.

The higher prices are due to the announcement made by the managers that purchasers at this year's sale will be given the option of subscribing in succeeding years to the same seats without having to pay a premium.

BOSTON HERALD.
SEPTEMBER 27.

HOLD SYMPHONY AUCTION TODAY

Sale Begins This Morning—Friday Afternoon Tickets to Go First.

The first auction sale of season tickets for the Symphony concerts this season begins at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock this morning. The importance of this sale to those who are accustomed to go to the Friday afternoon concerts of the orchestra cannot be exaggerated, for it will determine to a very large extent the seats the regular patrons of the concerts will have next season, 1916-1917. As already announced, this will be the last year in which the seats for the Symphony concerts are sold by auction, for next season they will be sold by subscription only at a fixed rate, the prices varying according to the location. Later in the season these prices will be announced.

Under the plan devised by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, owners of seats this year will have an option to retain them next year. Toward the end of the year they will have the opportunity to register in the office of Symphony Hall for the seats they own, and in the spring when subscriptions are called for, it will be their privilege to retain those seats without any dispute. For this reason, this year more than ever, it is desirable that they should bid on their own seats.

The seats sold today are the $18 seats for 24 Friday afternoon concerts. These comprise the entire floor, except the last nine rows, and the entire first balcony, except the last five rows. The second balcony will be held out for rush seats to be sold on the days of concerts for 25 cents each.

---

The usual rule will cover the sale. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

There will be an intermission of one hour for luncheon when the broad aisle, Row X, is reached. This usually comes about 1 o'clock. The balcony is usually reached about 3 o'clock. First the right aisle is sold; then the left side, then the centre.

BOSTON HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 28,

SYMPHONY BIDS AVERAGE HIGHER

Lively Action Marks Opening Sale of Seats—Two Bring $100 Each.

The auction sale of Symphony concert rehearsal seats at Symphony Hall yesterday resulted in an average of about 20 per cent. higher being paid for seats than were paid last year. While last season's high record bid for individual seats was not equalled yesterday, two seats, 17 and 18 in row K, were sold for $100 each.

They were purchased by Col. C. N. Wallace of 478 Commonwealth avenue, who has been a patron of the Symphony concerts ever since they began, and who was the possessor of the same two seats in seasons past. He had to indulge in some spirited bidding before securing them.

As the purchasers of seats this year will be given the opportunity of subscribing in succeeding years without having to pay the auction premium, there was added interest in yesterday's sale. It was noticed that many persons who have not been regular attendants at the concerts were scattered among the bidders.

Walter Jackson, acting as auctioneer, was kept very busy, for the bids in most cases, although coming quickly enough, increased but a dollar or two at a time. For instance, the seats that sold for $100 each were started at $30, and the bids ran along practically a dollar at a time. Last year's high figure was $108 for row N.

The seats on either side of the top-price ones yesterday brought from $50 to $75; those on the extreme left brought $48, and those on the right $32. The second highest price was $76, for seats 19 and 20, row F. The lowest figure for a seat in F row was $21.50. Seats 30 and 31 in row M sold for $61 and $65, respectively, and seat 18 in L brought $64. For seats 18 in rows H and E premiums of $51.50 and $50 were bid. The same sea in row I brought $59; the four seats just beyond it were sold for $40 each, and others in the same locality went for $30.

The highest sum paid for seats in row B was $22.50, the same two seats last year bringing $2 more. The highest paid for seats in C was $37, and in row B the top figure was $47.50, as compared with $31.50 last year.

This morning the $10 seats will be placed on sale.

BOSTON GLOBE-
SEPTEMBER 28,

BROKERS GET SYMPHONY SEATS

Buy Bulk of Desirable Rehearsal Tickets.

Private Buyers Forced to Pay Unusually High Prices.

Top Premium $100 Each for Two Row K Chairs.

Unless something unforeseen happens, it would appear that in the future the seat sale for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and possibly the seat sale for the Saturday evening concerts, will be largely controlled by two or three private ticket brokers' offices in this city, instead of being open to the public as in this and previous years, when the seats were disposed of at auction.

For at yesterday's sale of the $18 tickets for this year's rehearsals, prominent ticket brokers secured than half the house and the bulk of the desirable seats. And, under an announced policy of the Symphony Orchestra management that the purchasers of tickets this year will be able to retain the same seat holdings next year —when the auction system is to be abolished and the prices of tickets standardized—it would seem that the ticket brokers will be able to retain their present holdings from season to season, and possibly control prices in the future.

---

This appeared to be the general belief of many patrons of the Symphony concerts who, at yesterday's sale, were forced to pay unusually high prices for mediocre seats because of the spirited bidding of the ticket brokers or speculators.

Premiums Higher Than Last Year.

The premiums on the $18 tickets at yesterday's sale ranged fully 25 percent above those of last year, though last year's figure of $112 for a single ticket was not reached. However, $100 each for a pair of center aisle seats in row K was paid by the representative of Col C. N. Wallace of 478 Commonwealth av. This was above the upset price of $18 for each ticket.

Col Wallace's block of seven seats in row K cost him exactly $601, but they are the same that he has had for the last seven years, and his representative was under instructions to get them at any cost.

Low mark was $11, all that seat seven in the front row of the floor brought.

The heavy bidding by the ticket men resulted in a somewhat slow market. individual buyers were slow to take a hand at bidding, feeling that the prices which brokers were offering for the run of good seats were altogether too high to be outdistanced. Throughout the morning, when the front section of floor seats were being disposed of, the bulk of prospective private purchasers just sat back and waited for things to take a turn.

Seats in row N were going at a premium of $80, and one pair of aisle seats in that row, 18 and 19, went to one of the ticket men for $90 each. A block of four in O was knocked down at $69 each, three in P went at $61 each, and even back in R the center aisle seats ran up to $81. Those were fair examples of the high marks for the morning.

Agency Men Get Good Seats.

The afternoon sale, which the individual buyers hoped would run down the prices somewhat, opened with seats 1 and 2 in row T. These are under the side balcony and by no means the most desirable in the row, yet they brought $40 each. For rows T, U, V, W, X, Y and Z the average premium per seat was close to $50.

It was not until the double-letter rows at the rear of the $18 section were reached that prices began to wane. The brokers were not so keen to get these poor seats and allowed individual purchasers more leeway. The minimum price in row AA was $34. It dropped $2 in BB; was down to $27 in FF, and touched $24 in JJ, the last row.

When it came time to dispose of the balcony seats it was thought some spirited bidding would run the top price higher than the $100 bid of the morning. It didn't, however, though one of the agency men ran against a private buyer who forced him to pay $79 and $90 respectively for seats 5 and 6 of row A in the left balcony.

As with the floor seats, the agency men managed to take the best of the balcony seats, and the others were forced to content themselves with the poorer seats at the rear of the side balconies.

A fair idea of the heavy buying by the ticket men may be obtained by comparing the balcony ticket purchases of known representatives of, or the ticket brokers themselves, and the private buyers. The former secured approximately 262 of the choicest seats, while the private buyers took only 163.

And of the 163, at least 20 were withheld from public sale by the management. Buying of the floor seats by the ticket men was certainly as heavy, and probably heavier, than their operations in the balcony.

The $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals go on sale at 10 this morning. The Saturday night tickets will be auctioned at 10 Thursday and Friday mornings.

NEWS
From Providence, R. I.
Address SEP 11 1915
Date
Est 184

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Madamme Melba the greatest coloratura soprano of our time, if not of all times, will make her only appearance in Providence this year at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, October 19th. It is by great chance that the Orchestra has been able to secure the services of this supreme singer. Madamme Melba is now in this country, having landed in San Francisco from Honolulu August 31st. She is to make an extended concert tour, during which she will sing several times with Boston's great orchestra.

The Orchestra, under Dr. Muck will give its usual series of six concerts in Providence on Tuesday evenings, the dates being October 19, November 23, December 28, Febraury 8, March 7, and April 11. Orders are now being taken at Symphony Hall in Boston for season tickets. All such orders should be addressed to C. A. Ellis. The general public sale of season tickets will open at the box office of the Orchestra, Seddons' Newsstand, early in October.

ADVERTISER, TUESDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 28,

SYMPHONY SEATS BRING HIGH PRICE AT AUCTION

Sale of Seats at Popular Musical Event, Announced as Last oj Kind, Brought Many Spectators and Spirited Bidding

The last season for the auction sale of tickets for the Symphony concert rehearsal seats, which began yesterday, brought out an unusually large crowd of bidders and spectators. Persons who have occupied the same seats for years were present to bid against speculators and strangers for their favorite locations.

Officials were not very highly pleased over the bidding, even though the average price for tickets was somewhat above that which has prevailed in recent years. Like similar auctions in the past, there were those present who preferred with much regret to allow their favorite seats pass to another rather than continue the bidding to higher figures.

The number of spectators and strangers present was quite noticeable, and this may have been due to the increased interest taken in the auction.

The highest price for seats was brought for seats 17 and 18 in row K, considered the most desirable in Symphony Hall. Auctioneer Walter Jackson started these two seats at $30, but he found his ability to keep up with the bids taxed to the utmost. When the bid reached $100, one of the two bidders decided that his opponent was welcome to the tickets and dropped out. The seats on each side of the two high-priced ones brought $50 to $75, and those near the entrance dropped down to $32, but rose to $48 on the opposite side of the hall. The record price for tickets last year was $108 for row N.

The second highest price was paid for seats 19 and 20 in row F, but the price dropped to $21.50 as the lowest for seats in that section. Seat 19 in rows H, E and I brought 051.50, $51 and $59, respectively. Others in the same section just beyond dropped to $30, even though they seem to offer just as good advantages in sight and hearing.

The highest price paid for two seats in row B was $25.50, while the lowest was $17. The seats in this section as a whole brought about $2 less than last year. Two seats on the centre aisle in row C sold for $37. In row D prices this year rose over those of last, as one seats here brought $47.50, as compared with $31.50, the highest price paid last year.

The purchasers of seats yesterday who are anxious to retain the same seats for coming years received the announcement with joy that they would have the option of subscribing for them from season to season. Representatives of agencies interested in the Symphony tickets are very skeptical as to the outcome of the new policy and say that the loss of premiums will eventually induce the management to restore the auction system. This morning tickets for $10 will be placed on sale.

The Chicago Composer for the Symphony Concerts

John Alden Carpenter

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 22,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MORE PLANS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dr. Muck Hints at His Programmes—A Symphony by Mahler, Carpenter's Amusing Suite and Other Novel Pieces—Revivals and Classics—More Autumn Opera

IT is Dr. Muck's custom to make his programmes for the Symphony Concerts gradually, as the season progresses, that he may better assort and balance his choice. As yet he has put together no more than the programmes for three pairs of concerts; but he has already pitched upon a few pieces, new to Boston that he will bring to hearing in the course of the autumn and the winter. One such is a symphony by Mahler, necessarily chosen from those in which he has not joined a chorus to his orchestra. Which it will be the conductor has not yet decided; but it is easy to predict that he and the orchestra will be as eloquent in it as they were in the only other symphony of Mahler that Boston yet knows by actual performance. Another novel piece is a symphony by Enesco, the Roumanian who has long dwelt and worked in Paris and who has proved himself a master of vivid rhythms and brilliant instrumentation in such of his music as has been heard here.

Yet another novel number is Mr. Schelling's "Symphonic Variations for Pianoforte and Orchestra," in which the composer himself, as the virtuoso that he also is will play the solo part. A second set of variations to be heard for the first time in America comes from the artful hands of Bossi, the Italian composer, remembered by the happy invention and the suave scholarship of his Intermezzi to comedies of Goldoni. Finally, from the music of American composers, Dr. Muck has pitched upon Mr. Carpenter's suite for orchestra, "Adventures in a Perambulator," that much interested and amused the audiences that heard it in Chicago last spring from Mr. Stock's orchestra. It is the work of an American composer of clear individuality and rising distinction, who has hitherto written little in the symphonic forms, and who dares to follow his own purposes in his own way. The piece, which was described at length in The Transcript, when Chicago rose to it, is music of humor and fancy that records in tones the incidents and the moods of the daily perambulations of a baby. The nurse, the policeman, the hurdy-gurdy, dogs and dreams all have their amusing place in it. The individual bent and invention of Mr. Carpenter in the suite and the clear and gay play of his humor have commended it to Dr. Muck.

In Regular Course

For revivals, Dr. Muck, as already announced, purposes to play Liszt's "Dante" symphony at the final concerts of the season and to bestow upon it the same sedulous care and vitalizing insight that gave new life to the "Faust" symphony when he undertook it last winter and that kindled orchestra and audience with him. A double concerto for violin and viola by Mozart is Férir to play the solo parts. For the first time also in Boston Dr. Muck is to conduct in Brahms's third symphony. Two years ago, it stood on a programme but the conductor fell ill and Mr. Urack led the performance of it. For the rest the programmes of the new year will run their familiar course through the elder and the younger classics and the music of living hands. The seventh symphony of Beethoven is the symphony for the first concert; both the third and the fourth symphonies of Brahms will be played; Schumann and Schubert will have their usual place in the lists and Dr. Muck is too fond of Bach, Mozart and Haydn and too adept with their music to neglect it.

Impossible Strauss

Difficult as it now is to obtain from Europe the scores and the parts of newly written or newly published music more of it than is now announced will be heard in the winter and the spring. One such piece, however, is out of the question for the Symphony Concerts, even though it is the first purely orchestral music that Strauss has written since the "Sinfonia Domestica." His new "Alpine Symphony" cannot be played here because the score imposes forces impossible to assemble in Boston. It asks, for example, the mere trifle of twenty-four horns—twelve on the stage and twelve in the middle distance. Once more, seemingly Strauss has confused magnitude and mastery.

"Aida" at the Opera House

The second performance of the San Carlo Company at the Opera House, last evening, when "Aida" was sung, pleased the audience heartily and was creditable to the necessary standards of touring singers and modest prices. In one particular indeed it excelled them—in the quality of the settings, which were ampler and more illusive than such companies ordinarily use. The principal singers—Mmes. Kaestner and Zawner and Messrs. Agostini, Modesti and di Biasi—acquitted themselves according to their individual voices and talents, but not one lacked quick and intelligent feeling for Verdi's glowing music.

JOURNAL-

SEPTEMBER 28,

$100 PAID FOR TWO SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

Highest Mark at Sale Is $8 Lower Than Last Year's.

Favorite seats for the Symphony concert rehearsal sold yesterday for $100. They were seats 17 and 18 in row K. The bidding started at $30 between a speculator and a stranger and the stranger won at the century mark. Last year's high figure was for $108 in row N.

Lively bidding featured the sale, which began at 10 A. M., when the $18 seats for the Friday rehearsals were put up. About 300 persons were present, including many strangers and also many women who have occupied the same seats for years. Among the latter there were many disappointments because strangers bid vociferously and won the seats.

An interesting feature of this, the last auction sale of seats to be held, was the announcement by the management that purchasers at this sale will be given the option of subscribing in succeeding years.

Under the plan devised by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, owners of seats this year may at the end of the year have the opportunity to register in the office of Symphony Hall for the seats they own, and in the spring, when subscriptions are called for, it will be their privilege to retain those seats without any dispute.

For 19 and 20 in row F, the next highest figure, $76, was paid. The lowest in that section was $21.50. For 18 in L, the bidding began at $40 and soon ran up to $64. There was a rustle of surprise when 30 in M brought $61, and 31, $65. In H and E the highest premiums were $51.50 and $51, both for the coveted 19. The same seat in I brought $59; the four just beyond it $40 each and many others, with seemingly the same advantage for seeing and hearing, went for $30.

The first seat in row B, which might almost be called undesirable if such a word can be properly applied to anything connected with the Symphony concerts, went for $17. The highest in that section was $22.50 for two seats in the center. Last year these seats brought $2 more. In row C the highest price was $37 for two seats on the center aisle left.

ADVERTISER, TUESDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 28,

SYMPHONY SEATS BRING HIGH PRICE AT AUCTION

Sale of Seats at Popular Musical Event, Announced as Last of Kind, Brought Many Spectators and Spirited Bidding

The last season for the auction sale of tickets for the Symphony concert rehearsal seats, which began yesterday, brought out an unusually large crowd of bidders and spectators. Persons who have occupied the same seats for years were present to bid against speculators and strangers for their favorite locations.

Officials were not very highly pleased over the bidding, even though the average price for tickets was somewhat above that which has prevailed in recent years. Like similar auctions in the past, there were those present who preferred with much regret to allow their favorite seats pass to another rather than continue the bidding to higher figures.

The number of spectators and strangers present was quite noticeable, and this may have been due to the increased interest taken in the auction.

The highest price for seats was brought for seats 17 and 18 in row K, considered the most desirable in Symphony Hall. Auctioneer Walter Jackson started these two seats at $30, but he found his ability to keep up with the bids taxed to the utmost. When the bid reached $100, one of the two bidders decided that his opponent was welcome to the tickets and dropped out. The seats on each side of the two high-priced ones brought $50 to $75, and those near the entrance dropped down to $32, but rose to $48 on the opposite side of the hall. The record price for tickets last year was $108 for row N.

The second highest price was paid for seats 19 and 20 in row F, but the price dropped to $21.50 as the lowest for seats in that section. Seat 19 in rows H, E and I brought 051.50, $51 and $59, respectively. Others in the same section just beyond dropped to $30, even though they seem to offer just as good advantages in sight and hearing.

The highest price paid for two seats in row B was $25.50, while the lowest was $17. The seats in this section as a whole brought about $2 less than last year. Two seats on the centre aisle in row C sold for $37. In row D prices this year rose over those of last, as one seats here brought $47.50, as compared with $31.50, the highest price paid last year.

The purchasers of seats yesterday who are anxious to retain the same seats for coming years received the announcement with joy that they would have the option of subscribing for them from season to season. Representatives of agencies interested in the Symphony tickets are very skeptical as to the outcome of the new policy and say that the loss of premiums will eventually induce the management to restore the auction system. This morning tickets for $10 will be placed on sale.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 22,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MORE PLANS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dr. Muck Hints at His Programmes—A Symphony by Mahler, Carpenter's Amusing Suite and Other Novel Pieces—Revivals and Classics—More Autumn Opera

IT is Dr. Muck's custom to make his programmes for the Symphony Concerts gradually, as the season progresses, that he may better assort and balance his choice. As yet he has put together no more than the programmes for three pairs of concerts; but he has already pitched upon a few pieces, new to Boston that he will bring to hearing in the course of the autumn and the winter. One such is a symphony by Mahler, necessarily chosen from those in which he has not joined a chorus to his orchestra. Which it will be the conductor has not yet decided; but it is easy to predict that he and the orchestra will be as eloquent in it as they were in the only other symphony of Mahler that Boston yet knows by actual performance. Another novel piece is a symphony by Enesco, the Roumanian who has long dwelt and worked in Paris and who has proved himself a master of vivid rhythms and brilliant instrumentation in such of his music as has been heard here.

Yet another novel number is Mr. Schelling's "Symphonic Variations for Pianoforte and Orchestra," in which the composer himself, as the virtuoso that he also is will play the solo part. A second set of variations to be heard for the first time in America comes from the artful hands of Bossi, the Italian composer, remembered by the happy invention and the suave scholarship of his Intermezzi to comedies of Goldoni. Finally, from the music of American composers, Dr. Muck has pitched upon Mr. Carpenter's suite for orchestra "Adventures in a Perambulator," that much interested and amused the audiences that heard it in Chicago last spring from Mr. Stock's orchestra. It is the work of an American composer of clear individuality and rising distinction, who has hitherto written little in the symphonic forms, and who dares to follow his own purposes in his own way. The piece, which was described at length in The Transcript, when Chicago rose to it, is music of humor and fancy that records in tones the incidents and the moods of the daily perambulations of a baby. The nurse, the policeman, the hurdy-gurdy, dogs and dreams all have their amusing place in it. The individual bent and invention of Mr. Carpenter in the suite and the clear and gay play of his humor have commended it to Dr. Muck.

In Regular Course

For revivals, Dr. Muck, as already announced, purposes to play Liszt's "Dante" symphony at the final concerts of the season and to bestow upon it the same sedulous care and vitalizing insight that gave new life to the "Faust" symphony when he undertook it last winter and that kindled orchestra and audience with him. A double concerto for violin and viola by Mozart is Férir to play the solo parts. For the first time also in Boston Dr. Muck is to conduct in Brahms's third symphony. Two years ago, it stood on a programme but the conductor fell ill and Mr. Urack led the performance of it. For the rest the programmes of the new year will run their familiar course through the elder and the younger classics and the music of living hands. The seventh symphony of Beethoven is the symphony for the first concert; both the third and the fourth symphonies of Brahms will be played; Schumann and Schubert will have their usual place in the lists and Dr. Muck is too fond of Bach, Mozart and Haydn and too adept with their music to neglect it.

Impossible Strauss

Difficult as it now is to obtain from Europe the scores and the parts of newly written or newly published music more of it than is now announced will be heard in the winter and the spring. One such piece, however, is out of the question for the Symphony Concerts, even though it is the first purely orchestral music that Strauss has written since the "Sinfonia Domestica." His new "Alpine Symphony" cannot be played here because the score imposes forces impossible to assemble in Boston. It asks, for example, the mere trifle of twenty-four horns—twelve on the stage and twelve in the middle distance. Once more, seemingly Strauss has confused magnitude and mastery.

"Aida" at the Opera House

The second performance of the San Carlo Company at the Opera House, last evening, when "Aida" was sung, pleased the audience heartily and was creditable to the necessary standards of touring singers and modest prices. In one particular indeed it excelled them—in the quality of the settings, which were ampler and more illusive than such companies ordinarily use. The principal singers—Mmes. Kaestner and Zawner and Messrs. Agostini, Modesti and di Biasi—acquitted themselves according to their individual voices and talents, but no one lacked quick and intelligent feeling for Verdi's glowing music.

The Chicago Composer for the Symphony Concerts

John Alden Carpenter

JOURNAL—

SEPTEMBER 28,

$100 PAID FOR TWO SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

Highest Mark at Sale Is $8 Lower Than Last Year's.

Favorite seats for the Symphony concert rehearsal sold yesterday for $100. They were seats 17 and 18 in row K. The bidding started at $30 between a speculator and a stranger and the stranger won at the century mark. Last year's high figure was for $108 in row N.

Lively bidding featured the sale, which began at 10 A. M., when the $18 seats for the Friday rehearsals were put up. About 300 persons were present, including many strangers and also many women who have occupied the same seats for years. Among the latter there were many disappointments because strangers bid vociferously and won the seats.

An interesting feature of this, the last auction sale of seats to be held, was the announcement by the management that purchasers at this sale will be given the option of subscribing in succeeding years.

Under the plan devised by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, owners of seats this year may at the end of the year have the opportunity to register in the office of Symphony Hall for the seats they own, and in the spring, when subscriptions are called for, it will be their privilege to retain those seats without any dispute.

For 19 and 20 in row F, the next highest figure, $76, was paid. The lowest in that section was $21.50. For 18 in L, the bidding began at $40 and soon ran up to $64. There was a rustle of surprise when 30 in M brought $61, and 31, $65. In H and E the highest premiums were $51.50 and $51, both for the coveted 19. The same seat in I brought $59; the four just beyond it $40 each and many others, with seemingly the same advantage for seeing and hearing, went for $30.

The first seat in row B, which might almost be called undesirable if such a word can be properly applied to anything connected with the Symphony concerts, went for $17. The highest in that section was $22.50 for two seats in the center. Last year these seats brought $2 more. In row C the highest price was $37 for two seats on the center aisle left.

Paper ~~Telegraph~~ Post
City ~~New York~~ Chicago
Date 915 State, ~~N.~~ Ill

Announcement by Boston Orchestra

By Karleton Hackett.

AN INTERESTING announcement has just come from Boston regarding the sale of season tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The patrons have been notified that after the present year there will be no further auctioning off of the season tickets, and the subscribers to this present season will be permitted to retain their seats next year by signifying at the proper time their wish so to do.

This represents the definite abandonment by the management of the Boston orchestra of one of the most cherished aims of the founder of these concerts. It was the original intention to make these symphony concerts popular in the proper meaning of the word by establishing a scale of prices which would bring them within the reach of every purse. The subscription seats at first fell into two catagories, those at $12 and those at $7.50. At these prices it was known that there must be a large deficit each year, but Major Henry L. Higginson established the concerts with this fully in mind and prepared to pay the necessary amount out of his own purse.

In order to make sure that these concerts should not become the exclusive privilege of a sort of voluntary close corporation, nobody was permitted to purchase more than four tickets, and there was no renewal of subscriptions from one year to the next. Each individual could buy four seats at the open sale, but this gave no right to prior consideration when it came time for the sale of tickets for the next season. Each year it was by open sale, with no favor for anybody because he had purchased tickets the year previous.

The desire of the public of Boston to attend these concerts and the anxiety to procure seats in advance finally compelled the management to resort to the plan of auctioning the choice of tickets. At first only the higher priced seats were thus offered, the $7.50 seats still being sold at the box office at the advertised figure. But here, too, the pressure grew too great until it reached a point where the line would form before the window three days before the sale was to begin. Messenger boys and men out of employment were engaged in relays to stand so many hours in the line to keep a place until it should be time for the window to open. So they had to give way and sell all the seats at auction.

Some years ago the prices were raised to $18 and $10, at which figure they now remain. The second balcony, as in our Orchestra Hall, has always been thrown open to the public for 25 cents, with no reserved seats. But Major Higginson's desire to make of the Boston Symphony Orchestra an institution open to the public at a small fee, which anybody could pay has been defeated by the people themselves.

The more desirable $18 seats bring an average price at the auction of from $40 to $80, and so on, in proportion, down the list. The whole thing had become systematized. Certain people always had certain seats, and the actual purchasing was put into the hands of a few men who went with prepared lists, bid in the tickets, and distributed them to the owners. Altho the management would not give any rights, officially, to previous subscribers, the matter was handled in such a manner at the auction that the purposes of Major Higginson were rendered in this respect of no avail. The same people had the same seats each year and if an outsider by high bidding should have attempted to gain them for himself—well, dear me, that would not have done at all and the idea never en-

---

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Established

MUSICAL JOYS PROMISED

MRS. WILSON-GREENE, in an announcement for the coming season, promises Washington a program that will include many of the foremost musical artists of the world. As usual, Mrs. Greene will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in five concerts Tuesday afternoons, November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15, and March 14. The soloists to appear with the Boston Symphony are Miss Florence Hinkle, Ernest Schelling, Fritz Kriesler and Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

One of the most important announcements will be the "artists' course" of five concerts, opening with Mme. Emmy Destinn, the great soprano from the Metropolitan Opera, on December 3. The course will also include Mischa Elman, the great violinist, January 14; Mme. Gadski and Clarence Whitehill from the Metropolitan Opera, in a joint Wagnerian program, February 18; Harold Bauer, pianist, and Pablo Casals, the great cellist, in joint recital, March 3, and Pasquale Amato, barytone, and Florence Macbeth, coloratura soprano, from the Chicago Opera, in joint recital, March 31.

Other artists to appear under Mrs. Greene's management during the season will be Geraldine Farrar, November 9; Mary Garden, November 16; John McCormack, November 26; Fritz Kreisler, December 9; Mme. Melba, Paderewski and Titto Ruffo, dates to be announced later.

Mrs. Greene will also present Selwyn & Co.'s Whitney Fashion Show at two matinee performances. This will be the first entire theatrical performance devoted to the fine art of dress and the first fashion show to be presented by an established firm of theatrical managers as a regular dramatic entertainment. Also Mme. Pavlowa with entire ballet and grand opera company will be presented by Mrs. Greene some time during the season.

All of these attractions will be given in the National Theater.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date SEP 1 9
Estal 84

Boston Symphony Will Give Five Concerts Here

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in announcing her plans for the coming season, will present to Washington a program that will include many of the foremost musical artists of the world. As usual, Mrs. Greene will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in five concerts, Tuesday afternoons, November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15, and March 14. The soloists to appear with the Boston Symphony are Miss Florence Hinkle, Mr. Ernest Schelling, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, and Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

One of the most important announcements will be the "artists' course" of five concerts, in which will be heard world-renowned artists in recital programs. The artists' course will be opened with Mme. Emmy Destinn, the great soprano from the Metropolitan Opera, on December 3. The "artists' course" is planned to include Mischa Elman, the great violinist, January 14; Mme. Gadski and Clarence Whitehill, from the Metropolitan Opera, in a joint Wagnerian program, February 18; Harold Bauer, pianist, and Pablo Cassals, the great 'cellist, in joint recital, March 3, and Pasquale Amato, barytone, and Florence MacBeth, coloratura soprano, from the Chicago opera, in joint recital March 31.

Other artists scheduled to appear under Mrs. Greene's management during the season will be Geraldine Farrar, November 9; Mary Garden, November 16; John McCormick, November 26; Fritz Kreisler, December 9; Mme. Melba, Paderewski, and Tito Ruffo on dates to be announced. In addition to the above concerts, Mrs. Greene will present Selwyn & Co.'s Whitney Fashion Show at two matinee performances. Also Mme. Pavlowa, with entire ballet and grand opera company, are included in the future plans, according to Mrs. Greene. All of these attractions will be given in the National Theater.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Es 1884

SOLOISTS SELECTED FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

17

Madame Melba to Sing at First Concert in October.

Soloists of unusually high quality have been secured for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city this season, it is said upon good authority. As usual the soloists will be divided about equally between singers and instrumentalists.

Madame Melba will sing at the opening concert. Some critics of high standing rank Mme. Melba as the greatest of living sopranos. The other two singers of the season are Madame Louise Homer, the famous contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Madame van Endert, a German soprano who has met with great success in America the last two years.

The instrumentalists include Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist; Ernest Schelling, noted both as a fine musician and as Paderewski's only pupil, and Josef Malkin, the chief 'cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The renewal of last year's subscriptions has been going on since last spring, but it is said that desirable seats will be available to the general public when the sale opens Oct. 11.

From Bulletin
Address Providence, R. I.
Date SEP 18
Esta 4

SOLOISTS SELECTED FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

Madame Melba to Sing at First Concert in October.

Soloists of unusually high quality have been secured for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city this season, it is said upon good authority. As usual the soloists will be divided about equally between singers and instrumentalists.

Madame Melba will sing at the opening concert. Some critics of high standing rank Mme. Melba as the greatest of living sopranos. The other two singers of the season are Madame Louise Homer, the famous contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Madame van Endert, a German soprano who has met with great success in America the last two years.

The instrumentalists include Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist; Ernest Schelling, noted both as a fine musician and as Paderewski's only pupil, and Josef Malkin, the chief 'cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The renewal of last year's subscriptions has been going on since last spring, but it is said that desirable seats will be available to the general public when the sale opens Oct. 11.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
E

* * *

Boston musical circles have received something of a shock in the announcement made last week by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that this year will bring the last of the auction sales of season tickets.

This method of selling tickets which has been in vogue for 30 years has been each year increasingly unsatisfactory from almost every point of view. In the fall of 1916-1917 all tickets will be sold by subscription at fixed prices, following the same method as has been used from the beginning in this city. The only difference will be that the tickets will be considerably higher in price than those in Providence, which gets the Boston Symphony concerts at a lower rate per concert by subscription than any other city in the country.

The announcement already made that the renewal of subscriptions by last season's patrons is in excess of the average does not mean that all the desirable seats have been taken. Some still remain for the opening here of the season sale on Monday, Oct. 11.

* * *

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Estab

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is announcing for its series of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, an extraordinary list of soloists. They are Madame Melba, Miss Farrar, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Bauer, Miss Ruth Deyo and Mr. Ernest Schelling. In addition to these eight, four members of the orchestra will appear, so that there will be soloists on 12 out of the 24 programmes. This is about the usual number provided for Boston.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, who is at present living in a cottage near the Profile House in the White Mountains, preparing her concert repertoire with her accompanist, Richard Epstein, is leaving for New York toward the end of the month, and begins her long concert tour the first week of October. In her company will be Miss Ada Sassaoli, the Italian harpist, and Reinald Warrenrath, the distinguished American baritone.

Fritz Kreisler has done much work with his pen during his stay in Bar Harbor the past summer. In response to a query as to what he had accomplished, he writes as follows:

"I wrote, or rearranged this summer, the following pieces:

"Rondino from a theme by Beethoven. The theme in question consists of eight bars which occur in a very early and unimportant composition by Beethoven, now quite forgotten. The little theme itself is of indescribale charm and its rhythm is of such alluring piquancy that it gains by every repetition. In order to set this peculiarity off to advantage, I conceived the idea of writing a rondo around it, the rondo being a form of composition where a short theme returns obstinately in more or less irregular intervals. Rondino means little rondo. I have tried to keep the old elastic style throughout the little piece, and hope I have succeeded. Then followed two violin transcriptions. The first is of a fascinating Spanish dance by Granados, the Spanish composer whose opera, "The Goyescas," is to be performed next winter at the Metropolitan Opera House. The second is a quaint posthumous mazurka by Chopin.

"Furthermore I have just finished the adaptation of two sacred Latin hymns, 'O Sanctissima' and 'O Salutaris Hostia,' two old melodies of Cofelli and Couperin, respectively, and I have rearranged a beautifgul Viennese folk-song, 'The Old Refrain,' all three of these for my friend, John McCormack.

"Some time ago, a lady set me the words of a cradle song, which the rhythm of the main melody in my 'Caprice Viennois' had inspired. The words being quaint and touching, 'Soldier's Widow Singing to Her Orphan.' I, in turn, remodelled the melody somewhat to suit the words and the result is a song called 'Cradle Song, 1915.'

"By the way," continues Mr. Kreisler, "I shall play very much next winter several short compositions by Leopold Godowsky; these pieces are, in their way, quite unique. Rich, melodious invention, exquisite harmonic treatment and an unusual treatment of the violin as an instrument are their most salient features."

The benefit concert which Paderewski gave in San Francisco last month in aid of the Polish victims of the war was so successful, realizing over $9000, that the great pianist has determined to do more work of the kind in the East. He will give at least three concerts in October, the entire proceeds of which will be devoted to this cause. These will be given in New York, Boston and Chicago. There is a possibility that he will give a fourth, but this is not altogether determined. Mr. Paderewskia, as a preliminary to his recital, will make an appeal to the public for his suffering countrymen. Then, as is most appropriate, he will play a programme devoted entirely to the works of his great compatriot, Frederic Chopin. Full details concerning these concerts will be made public later.

Beginning next Sunday, Sept. 26, the Strand Theatre will run a series of Sunday night concerts. The opening announcement includes Fairman's Concert Orchestra, consisting of 24 selected musicians, the Doric Male Quartet, and other vocal and instrumental numbers. The immense pipe organ which has been in use at the Strand for some time will be employed to augment Fairman's Orchestra in some of the numbers. The management will endeavor to present the best local talent obtainable. Arrangements are being made to secure artists from Boston and New York for some of the conserts later. Admission will be at popular prices. The opening concert is announced for 8:15 next Sunday evening.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Esta 384

The Boston Symphong Orchestra, whose concerts in Providence are the most important musical events of a season, has ust been selling tickets for the 48 concerts it gives each season in Boston. These tickets, as was the case for many years, were sold at auction, and the report is that all records were broken in prices brought. This is partly due to the fact that times are good and partly due to the fact that next year all the Boston tickets will be sold by subscription at fixed rates, and the owners for seats this year will have the same privilege given as to Providence subscribers, which is that they may retain their seats for another season.

The orchestra is leaving Boston today in a special train of Pullmans on a Western trip that will carry it as far as the Missouri river. The last concert on the trip will be given in the Audotium, Chicago, Sunday afternoon, October 10th.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Establ 4

* * *

Devoting a long discussion to the prospective season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its new departures, its dates and the repetition of its routine, the Transcript recently pointed out that "hardly ever before have the announcements of the concerts been so barren of what the public most wishes to know."

While paying a high tribute to the attainments and achievements of Dr. Muck, the balance he has always maintained in his programmes and his success in penetrating his men with his ideals, it complains, not unjustly, that the public on which the orchestra is dependent for its patronage still misses and inquires for the old comprehensive prospectus, and is forced to "piece together a series of announcements made more or less obscurely from week to week, and not one of them as it happens hints at the programmes of the new year."

Continuing, it says: "Such preliminary announcement would by no means bind him to literal fidelity to it. Circumstances alter the best-laid plans, and there is reason even in the things of music. The audiences of the concerts would merely enjoy the pleasures of anticipation in that which most stimulates them—the music they are to hear under Dr. Muck's hand. Managements, as a rule, are not chary of announcements interesting to the public that they wish to attract. It is a superfluous reticence on the part of a conductor to withhold them."

* * *

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its full personnel, is leaving Boston today on a Western tour, in the course of which it will give seven concerts in as many days. It will travel in a special train of its own Pullmans, to which will be added a private car for the use of Dr. Muck. The concerts beginning tomorrow evening will be given in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis, with the last concert next Sunday afternoon in the Chicago Auditorium. All the auditoriums in which it plays, with the exception of that in St. Louis, hold from 4000 to 5000 persons, and all of them are completely sold out for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, so that the orchestra will play to more persons in a given time than is on record in this country.

The subscription for the Providence concerts is progressing well, and tickets are already being distributed from the Boston office to subscribers. The public sale of season tickets opens at Seddon's News Stand a week from to-morrow.

One of the most important compositions to be given by the orchestra in Boston this year is the "Dante" Symphony of Liszt, which employs the use of a female chorus in the last movement; and it is also planned to give what, so far as can be found out, has never been heard in Boston, Liszt's "Ce qu'on Entend sur le Montagne." It is also proposed to do one of the Mahler Symphonies which does not employ the use of a chorus.

One of the most interesting things Dr. Muck has on his list, which, if it is successful, is likely to be heard in this city, is a symphonic poem by the American, John Carpenter, entitled "Adventures in a Perambulator." This work, which has as its hero a baby, was played twice last season by the Chicago Orchestra under Stock in Chicago and made a success. It is said to be humorous music of real originality. Dr. Muck studied the score for a while last spring, and was pleased with it.

An interesting work that is to be heard in this city is Ernest Schelling's "Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Schelling as pianist. Mr. Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," which he wrote several years ago, employed incidentally as themes the tunes of "Dixie" and "Yankee Doodle." Those who have seen the new work say that it is equally attractive and astonishingly clever.

Mme. Melba, who will be soloist at the first concert, will sing three arias: "The Sweet Bird," from Handel's "Il Penseroso," and two from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro;" the Page's song, "Voi che sapete," and the Countess's aria, "Porgi Amor."

* * *

Mme. Magarete Matzenauer, who will open the forthcoming Steinert series with Edoardo Ferrari-Fontana, in Infantry Hall on Nov. 9, is notable for her interpretation of soprano, mezzo-soprano and contralto roles, and heretofore restricted principally to activity in opera, has yielded to the popular demand for her appearance in concerts.

She will begin her season on Friday, when she will sing at the last concert of the 58th annual Worcester Music Festival, which opens in Mechanics Hall tomorrow evening.

The list of soloists and principal works to be performed was announced in this column last Sunday. "The Children's Crusade," by Pierne, which has twice been successfully given in this city by the Arion Club, is officially announced as the principal novelty of the festival, and the new work given last year, "The New Life," will be repeated.

* * *

Est 384

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

The Boston Sympony Orchestra is most fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This is most important, for it enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practically he finished at the end of last.

Establi

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose ive concerts are important features of he musical and social season in Washngston, is leaving today on a Western rip on which it will give concerts in s many days. The cities visited, beinning tomorrow night and ending ext Sunday afternoon, are Toledo, Milvaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. ouis and Chicago, the last concert being n the auditorium of the latter city, unday afternoon, October 10.

Est 1884

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 3 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Subscribers to the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Baltimore the coming season have been notified that their tickets are ready for distribution at Albaugh's ticket office, Fayette and Charles streets. Mr. Albaugh, who, in the matter of tickets is agent here for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reports that the subscription preceding the opening of the general public sale of the season tickets here is the largest in the history of the orchestra. The general sale will open at Albaugh's a week from tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 11th. There are still desirable seats to be secured: The concerts, as usual, will be in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings, and the dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 15th.

Establ

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Symphonic Precedence.—An effort has been made to induce the conductors of the different representative orchestras playing in Washington to agree to vary their programs so that auditors might not find numbers duplicated in the different concerts. The plan met with the approval of the New York Symphony Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic Society and the Philadelphia Orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, claims to be first in the Washington field and intimates that it would be impossible, with propriety, to submit programs to other orchestras whose concerts have been made possible through the success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is further suggested by the management that other orchestras, if they wish to avoid duplicating selections, should endeavor to get programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before making up their own. The claim to precedence made by the Boston orchestra is challenged by the New York Symphony Orchestra with the reminder of its success in giving symphony concerts in Washington since the year 1886.

Jacques Futrelle. — Jacques Futrell

Estab 4

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

FOR several years these columns of The Post have voiced the regret which has been felt by many music lovers in Washington, that the symphony orchestras which visit the Capital should so frequently duplicate programs. It has even happened that the same symphony has been played by three orchestras within a period of six weeks. While such incidents have a certain value for purposes of comparison, nevertheless it has been a loss to the public to have the number of musical masterpieces offered thus reduced. Those cities which support their own orchestras do not often hear the same numbers given twice or three times in a single season, and Washington, by virtue of its generous patronage of visiting musical organizations, should be given the greatest possible variety of orchestral music.

This duplication finally brought about a formal protest on the part of a large number of music lovers in the Capital. Now, through the good offices of T. Arthur Smith, an understanding has been reached among the directors of the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Philharmonic Orchestra and the New York Symphony Society whereby the programs for their concerts have been so arranged as to avoid all repetition. Elsewhere in this department today the programs for the eleven concerts to be given by these three orchestras is published, and it will be noted that there are no duplications, but, on the other hand, many novelties are promised.

It now remains for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to do its share in avoiding duplications. It is to be hoped that that management will seek to arrange its programs so as to meet the wishes of Washington music lovers.

Es 884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Subscribers to the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia this season have been notified that their tickets are ready for distribution at Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1119 Chestnut street. George T. Haly, who, in the matter of tickets is the agent here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reports that the subscription preceding the opening of the general public sale of season tickets here is the largest in the history of the orchestra. The general sale will open at Heppe's a week from tomorrow morning. The concerts, as usual, will be on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music and the dates are November 1 and 30, January 3, February 14 and March 13.

Establi

[15]

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management announces that the tickets for the subscribers to the series of five concerts by that organization are ready for distribution at 1119 Chestnut Street, and that George T. Haly, who is in charge, reports that the subscriptions are far in advance of any previous season. The general sale will open at Heppe's to-morrow. The dates for the concerts are November 1, 30, January 3, February 14 and March 13.

* * *

Another interesting announcement is that Philadelphia is one of the four cities chosen by Paderewski in which he will give a recital, the entire receipts to be turned over to the Polish Victims' Relief Fund. The Philadelphia benefit will be at the Academy of Music on Saturday afternoon, October 30. The eminent musician and composer will be heard in the two-fold capacity of orator and pianist. The subject of his address will be "Poland, Past and Present," which will be followed by a recital of Chopin's music. The fund embraces all sufferers, Gentiles and Hebrews alike.

* * *

Another important concert this month will be the appearance here on Saturday afternoon, October 23, of Madame Nellie Melba, the famous Australian prima donna. Madame Melba recently sung with great success along the Pacific Coast, and reports state that her voice shows absolutely no diminuation in beauty. To-morrow evening she gives a concert in Toronto for the Canadian Red Cross, and on October 13, another one in Montreal for the same charity.

At her concert in Philadelphia Melba will have the assistance of Beatrice Harrison, the charming English 'cellist, who made so deep an impression here last Winter; Robert Parker, an American barytone, and Frank St. Legere, the Australian pianist.

* * *

Estab 184

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date Oct 2 / 15

Among the soloists engaged to appear in Boston with its Symphony Orchestra are Farrar, Melba, Paderewski, Kreisler, Rosenthal, Harold Bauer, Ruth Deyo, and Ernest Schelling. The manager of these concerts, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, announces that after this season subscription tickets will not be sold at auction, subscribers being allowed to retain their seats from year to year, as is the case with other orchestral organizations.

Es 384

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 2 - 1915

Boston Symphony

Subscribers to the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Baltimore the coming season have been notified that their tickets are ready for distribution at Albaugh's ticket office, Fayette and Charles streets.

Mr. Albaugh, who in the matter of tickets is agent here for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reports that the subscription preceding the opening of the general public sale of the season tickets here is the largest of the history of the Orchestra.

The general sale will open at Albaugh's a week from Monday morning, October 11. There are still desirable seats to be secured. The concerts, as usual, will be in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings, and the dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16, March 15.

Establ 884

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

In the 80 odd years that the Boston Symphony has been a regular visitor each winter to Providence, there have never been brighter prospects for a successful season than that which is about to open. The orchestra is in magnificent physical condition, so to say. Changes in personnel are almost none. A trip to the West preliminary to the opening of the regular season in Boston, brings the orchestra together two weeks earlier than usual, so that by the time they come to Providence, Oct. 19, they will have been well settled down to their work. Moreover, the soloists which have been provided for the Providence concerts are of unusual quality. Rarely does any city have a chance to hear such artists as Melba, Homer, van Endert, Schelling, Hartley and Malkin in conjunction with so splendid an organization as the Boston Symphony, and incidentally it may be remarked Providence gets its concerts at a cheaper rate per concert than any city in the country.

The renewal of subscriptions which have been going on in Boston since last spring is most encouraging. Very few who had tickets a year ago have failed to take them for the coming season. It is not at all unlikely that by the time of the October concert practically every seat in Infantry Hall will have been taken for the season. This will put Providence on the same plane as New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, where that condition prevails. The opening of the season sale is set for Monday, Oct. 10, but mail orders for season tickets may be sent up to that time to Mr. C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., and they will be filled before the opening of the public sale.

Establi

Providence, R. I.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Dr. Karl Muck conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made a brief statement last week, which in a measure outlines his plans for the coming season. His announcement of unusual works to be performed is naturally of interest to subscribers in this city, where a fair proportion of such works is usually given.

Novelties must necessarily be scarce this year in the repertory of all orchestras in this country, owing chiefly to the great difficulty in getting music from Germany and Austria. While it is not so difficult to obtain the scores of a work, it is almost impossible to get the parts. Dr. Muck now has for approval half a dozen works which he would like to do, but he has been informed by importers in this country that parts cannot be secured, or the uncertainty about securing them is so great that it is not safe to announce them for performance.

* * *

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City

Date OCT 3 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced in Boston his purpose to play this year John Alden Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator." This work was last year on two different programmes of the Chicago Orchestra. If it is as successful in Boston as it was in Chicago Dr. Muck probably will find a place for it in one of his New York programmes.

The orchestra, with its full personnel, is leaving Boston to-day on a Western tour, in the course of which it will give seven concerts in as many days. It will travel in its own special train of Pullmans, to which will be added a private car for the use of Dr. Muck. The concerts will be given in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis and Chicago, the last concert being given Sunday afternoon, October 10, in the Auditorium of the last named city.

From SUN

Address: New York City

Date T 3 1915

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced in Boston his purpose to play this year John Alden Carpenter's Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator." This work was on two different programmes of the Chicago orchestra last year, and had an extraordinary success. It is said to be humorous music that really is humorous. If it is successful in Boston, as it was in Chicago, undoubtedly he will find a place for it on one of his New York programmes.

The orchestra, with its full personnel, is leaving Boston to-day on a most interesting Western tour in the course of which it will give seven concerts in as many days. It will travel in its own special train of Pullmans, on which will be a private car for the use of Dr. Muck. The concerts, beginning to-morrow (Monday) evening, will be given in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis and Chicago, the last concert being given Sunday afternoon, October 10, in the Auditorium of the last named city. In a way, this tour is as interesting as the San Francisco trip taken last spring. All the auditoriums in which it plays, with the exception of the one in St. Louis, hold from four to five thousand people, and all of them are completely sold out for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. In other words, the orchestra will play to more people in a given time than is on record in this country or perhaps in any other country.

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 28

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is most fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This is most important for it enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practi-

---

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 1915

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personal practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins; otherwise the same men who played under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This is most important, for it enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practically he finished at the end of last. It will interest the frends of the Boston Orchestra here to know that its local subscription at the present time is larger than it has been for many years. There was a time, years ago, when the house was completely sold out by subscription. Then a confessed error was made in putting in an extra series of concerts here, which arrangement was not altogether successful. This year, unless all signs fail, there will be nothing to sell for the single concerts. A part of this increase is due to the steady growth of business that has been the fortune of the orchestra here in the last few years and partly to the unusual soloists that are promised—Mme. Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler and Ernest Schelling.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

Date SEP 28 1915

SYMP. ONY SEATS

Careful Boston Gives Higher Average Prices for Classical Concert Tickets Than Ever Before.

LAST OF THE AUCTION SALES

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Sept. 27.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra held its last auction sale for choice seats for its series of Friday concerts at Symphony Hall yesterday. This auction sale has long been one of the features of Boston musical life, and the bidding has always been spirited. The average of prices was higher than in former years.

Seats 17 and 18 of row K, among the best in the hall, were bid in at $100, the highest price of the sale.

Last year's highest figure was $108 in row N. The seats on either side of the best ones in row K brought from $50 to $75; those on the extreme right, by the entrance, brought $32, and on the other end, $48.

For 19 and 20 in Row F the next highest figure, $76, was paid. The lowest in that section was $21.50. For 18 in L the bidding began at $40 and soon ran up to $64. There was a rustle of surprise when 30 in M brought $61, and 31, $65. In H and E the highest premiums were $51.50 and $51, both for the coveted seat 19. The same seat in I brought $59; the four just beyond it $40 each, and many others, with apparently equal advantages for seeing and hearing, went for $30.

There are no boxes in Symphony Hall, Boston, and consequently there can be no personal display or parade of fine clothing. Consequently the floor seats are considered the most valuable, as no physical climbing has to be undertaken to reach them.

The concerts are practically always sold out, except for two seats which the management reserve for distinguished strangers.

From AMERICAN BROOKLYN EDI

Address: New York City

Date SEP 26 1915

Only Two Changes in Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard here this season with practically the same personnel as last. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year.

For the past two or three years the Academy of Music has been sold out for the Boston Symphony concerts by subscription. The soloists this season are Madame Melba, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Anton Witek.

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address New York City.

Date SEP 26 1915

Die geſchäftliche Leitung des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters theilt uns mit, daß die Sitze für die alten Subſkribenten im Laufe dieſer Woche ausgeſandt werden würden. Die Abonnenten, welche ihre Sitze noch nicht erneuert haben, werden darauf aufmerkſam gemacht, daß dies in den allernächſten Tagen zu geſchehen habe, da eine Warteliſte von mehreren hundert Perſonen die etwa übrigbleibenden Sitze

---

From STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date SEP 25 1915

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is most fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. The subscription for the coming year has been in progress by mail in the Boston office since last spring. It promises to be a banner season and it is most questionable whether there will be any seats left for the single concerts. The soloists offered for the coming season include the great names of Melba, Farrar, Kreisler, Schelling and Witek.

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 27 1915

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, keeps intact, except a change in the trumpet section and one in the second violins. For the past year and more the Academy seats have been sold before performances began; it may be so this season. Soloists to appear include Mme. Melba, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Anton Witek. The quality of the work by the players is expected to be fully equal to that in the past, but Dr. Muck, never quite satisfied, strives for perfection.

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date SEP 25 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY PERSONNEL INTACT

Musical Organization Begins Season Under Favorable Circumstances.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is most fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year.

When one sees the great audiences that attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore it is a bit difficult to believe that little more than a dozen years ago the management of the Orchestra considered seriously abandoning the concerts here on account of the poor patronage. It was only a guarantee subscribed by a number of the Orchestra's admirers that enabled it to go on with its work here. Incidentally, in no year was any part of the guarantee called for.

The subscription for the coming year has been in progress by mail in the Boston office since last spring. It promises to be a banner season, and it is questionable whether there will be any seats left for the single concerts. A part of the gratifying state of affairs is due to the steady growth the Orchestra has made for itself in Baltimore after 30 years' hard work and many years of losses. It is partly due to the unusual soloists offered for the coming season, which includes the names of Melba, Farrar, Kreisler, Schelling and Witek.

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is most forunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men, who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago, will be with him this year. This is most important for it enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practically he finished at the end of last.

It will interest the friends of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia to know that its Philadelphia subscription at the present time is larger than it has been for many years. There was a time, years ago, when the house was completely sold out by subscription. Then the confessed error was made in putting in an extra series of concerts here, which arrangement was not altogether successful. This year, unless all signs fail, there will be nothing to sell for the single concerts. A part of this increase is due to the steady growth of business that has been the fortune of the orchestra here in the last few years, and partly to the unusual soloists that are promised—Madame Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Frits Kreisler and Ernest Schelling.

* * *

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

MANY OPERA STARS NOW SHINE IN VAUDEVILL

The appearance of many of the mo noted artists of the grand opera conce and musical stage as vaudeville head liners is becoming more regular eac season and few weeks pass now with out the bill containing a singer or in strumentalist of note as a feature o the program. Much of the disappoint ment over the lack of grand opera and concerts during the past year has been lessened by the engagement in vaudeville of such stars as Madame Calve, Carolina White and Orville Harold.

A fortnight ago the Apollo Quartette of Philadelphia appeared at B. F. Keith's Theater and the bill for the week of September 27, has no less a luminary of the musical world than the eminent American grand opera barytone, David Bispham, who is to offer a program consisting of operatic numbers, original songs, poems and old ballads. Being a Philadelphian, David Bispham is, of course popular here, but he has gained international fame for there is no more noted concert singer and operatic star of the present day.

* * *

Mr. Theodore Cella, the Philadelphia harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left this city on Friday last to be present at the opening of the season in Boston, with which orchestra he has a two-years' contract.

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

SAME MEN UNDER DR. MUCK.

With Two Exceptions Personnel of Boston Symphony Is Unchanged.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is most fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins; otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene, who has charge of the Washington affairs of the orchestra, reports that the subscription is on a par with those of the last several years, which means that by the time of the first concert all the desirable seats in the National will have been taken for the entire series of five concerts.

The list of soloists is very attractive, comprising Florence Hinkle, one of the most exquisite singers of our time; two brilliant pianists in Ernest Schelling and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and Josef Malkin, cellist.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is most fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Doctor Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This is most important, for it enables Doctor Muck to start virtually at the point, at the beginning of the season, where he finished at the end of the last series.

It will interest the friends of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia to know that its Philadelphia subscription at the present time is larger than it has been for many years. There was a time, years ago, when the house was completely sold out by subscription. Then the confessed error was made in putting in an extra series of concerts here, which arrangement was not altogether successful. This year, unless all signs fail, there will be nothing to sell for the single concerts. This increase is partly due to the steady growth of the business that has been the fortune of the orchestra here in the last few years, and partly to the unusual soloists that are promised—Madame Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler and Ernest Schelling.

* * *

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. The Philadelphia subscription is larger than it has been for years. A part of this increase is due to the steady growth of business that has been the fortune of the orchestra here in the last few years, and partly to the unusual soloists that are promised—Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler and Ernest Schelling.

* * *

[16]

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is congratulating itself this season on having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practically he finished at the end of last.

It will interest the friends of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia to know that its Philadelphia subscription at the present time is larger than it has been for many years. There was a time, years ago, when the house was completely sold out by subscription. Then the confessed error was made in putting in an extra series of concerts here, which arrangement was not altogether successful.

This year, unless all signs fail, there will be nothing to sell for the single concerts. A part of this increase is due to the steady growth of business that has been the fortune of the orchestra here in the last few years, and partly to the unusual soloists that are promised—Madame Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler and Ernest Schelling.

MADE A NOTE

rk, 884

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Liszt in Boston and New York.

LIKE all the really great musicians and true lovers of music, Dr. Muck is an ardent admirer of Liszt as a composer. It will be remembered what tremendous enthusiasm he aroused in Boston last year, when the famous Symphony Orchestra of that city played Liszt's "Faust" symphony under his direction. The critics for once were unanimous in pronouncing this concert the climax of the season, and the public was so deeply stirred that that sublime work was repeated at another pair of concerts, with the same results. Dr. Muck has now decided to bring out this season Liszt's other great symphony, the "Dante." The performance of this great work was, as was pointed out in this journal, the climax of last year's concert season in New York, when it was produced by the Philharmonic Orchestra under the inspired bâton of Josef Stransky. No other composition heard by the critic of the Evening Post brought out such a storm of prolonged applause as this work, which is not only wonderful as music, but contains (like "Hamlet") a surprising number of "familiar quotations" borrowed from Liszt by later composers, one of them being Richard Wagner. It was the marvellous way in which Stransky made the Philharmonic players enter into the true spirit of Liszt's great work on this and previous occasions that won him the admiration and intimate friendship of another great Liszt specialist, the late Rafael Joseffy, to whom the world owes the best edition of Liszt's rhapsodies and other piano works.

, 1884

Newspaper Cutting

From [illegible]
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 26 1915

Academy of Muſic.

Konzerte des Boſtoner Symphonie Orcheſters unter Dr. Muck's Leitung.

Das Brooklner Inſtitut für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften wird auch in dieſem Winter wieder in der Academy of Muſic einige Konzerte veranſtalten, in denen das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter unter der Leitung ſeines hervorragenden Dirigenten Dr. Karl Muck auftreten wird. Die Beſetzung des Orcheſters iſt faſt die nämliche wie im letzten Jahre, ſodaß Dr. Muck genau an dem Punkte wieder anfangen konnte, an dem er bei Schluß der vergangenen Saiſon aufgehört hat. Als Soliſten ſind für dieſe Konzerte unter anderen Fritz Kreisler, Ernſt Schelling, Madame Melba und Anton Witek gewonnen worden. In früheren Jahren ſind ſämmtliche Konzerte durch Subſkriptionen ausverkauft geweſen und das nämliche wird vorausſichtlich auch wieder in dieſem Winter der Fall ſein.

Establi

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

